Homesteads have also been held liable to an equitable lien for materials furnished for their improvement; 105 Ala. 933; to prior liens on the land; 56 Kan. 170; or contracts existing when the statute is enacted; 98 Ga. 540; 62 Minn. 380. When the statute makes it liable to debts existing at the time of its purchase this includes renewal of prior notes; 67 Vt. 128; s. c. 27 L. R. A. 808.

When the exemption does not apply to a debt contracted for the purchase of the homestead, it has been held that the homestead cannot be sold to pay money borrowed from a third person to pay off that debt; 94 Tenn. 232; 50 Ill. 500; 53 Kan. 120; Contra; 82 S. W. Rep. (Ky.) 679. There is, however, a conflict of authority on this point from which it is said to be impossible to extract any consistent rule. See Thomp. Hom. & Ex. §§ 338-347; Waples, Hom. & Ex. 387-346; 99 Am. Dec. 571 note.

Money due on an insurance policy upon homestead property is not subject to garnishment; 88 Tex. 318; 83 Ia. 342; 60 Cal. 101; 48 N. Y. 188; 26 Vt. 289; 20 Minn. 309; 81 Ark. 632; 5 S. W. Rep. (Ky.) 193.

The right of exemption is lost by the unequivocal abandonment of the homestead by the owner, with the intention of no longer treating it as his place of residence; Thomp. Hom. & Ex. § 263, citing 87 Tex. 573; 69 id. 248; Waples, Hom. & Ex. 538; 4 N. H. 31. A lease of land for more than a year, and a residence elsewhere, was held to forfeit the homestead; 59 Ala. 566; also the owner's removal from the state; 87 Ga. 761; 91 id. 367; 101 N. C. 811. The building situated on the homestead loses its exemption from seizure and sale upon being segregated from the homestead property; 33 Ark. 303; 35 id. 186.

To establish an abandonment there must be a removal with the intention of not returning; 44 Neb. 269; but when removal for a temporary purpose is permitted by statute, it must be for a fixed and temporary purpose or for a temporary reason; 89 Wis. 558. To leave a homestead farm and move in town to become a merchant, intending to return "if he quit business," was an abandonment; 60 Ark. 263. See also 67 Ala. 533; 75 Mo. 559. Leaving a tenant at will in possession is not abandonment; 33 S. W. Rep. (Ky.) 1084; nor is storing goods in the house and sleeping in it at times, the wife being insane; id. 201. An abandonment does not relate back so as to give validity to a void prior sale of the homestead under an execution; 10 Wash. 879.

It has been held that the homestead may be abandoned by a husband's conveyance and the removal to another place against the desire of the wife; 88 Tex. 421; 14 Cal. 507; Thomp. Hom. & Ex. § 276; contra, 95 Ga. 415. See ABANDONMENT.

A deed or mortgage of a homestead must be the joint conveyance of the husband and wife; 100 Cal. 165; 63 N. W. Rep. (La.) 333. A mere release of dower by the wife is not sufficient; 90 Ark. 269; nor an execution by the husband under a power of attorney from the wife; 54 Kan. 442. And a conveyance by the claimant to his or her wife or husband, not subscribed or acknowledged by the latter is a nullity; 159 Ill. 98. Even when the wife is insane, a conveyance by the husband is void; 18 So. Rep. (Ala.) 315; 61 La. 160; 33 Neb. 829; and so also where the wife is living apart from her husband; 72 Wis. 553; 47 Kan. 587; 29 Ark. 290; 95 N. C. 281. See 65 Am. Dec. 481.

This right of exemption depends upon the construction of statutes in various states. The decisions are, therefore, far from harmonious. The subject has been fully and very ably treated in Judge Thompson's work frequently cited above. See also 36 Am. Rep. 728; 10 Am. L. Reg. n. s. 1, 137; id. 641, 705 (by Judge Dillon). See FAMILY: EXEMPTION; MANOR; MAN-SION.

Every person who is the head of a family, or is over 21 years of age and is a citizen, or has declared his intention to become such, also soldiers, seamen, and members of the marine corps, including officers, who have served in the rebellion for ninety days, and remained loyal to the government, may take up a quarter section or less of unappropriated public lands, as a homestead; R. S. § 2289 et seq.

HOMICIDE (Lat. homo, a man, cedere, to kill). The killing any human creature. 4 Bla. Com. 177.

Excusable homicide is that which takes place under such circumstances of accident or necessity that the party cannot strictly be said to have committed the act wilfully and intentionally, and whereby he is relieved from the penalty annexed to the commission of a felonious homicide.

Felonious homicide is that committed wilfully under such circumstances as to render it punishable.

Justifiable homicide is that committed with full intent, but under such circumstances of duty as to render the act one proper to be performed.

According to Blackstone, 4 Com. 177, homicide is the killing of any human creature. This is the most extensive sense of this word, in which the intention is not considered. But in a more limited sense, it is always understood that the killing is by human agency; and Hawkins defines it to be the killing of a man by a man. 1 Hawk. Pl. Cr. c. 8, § 2. See Dallos, Dict.; 5 Cush. 308. Homicide may perhaps be described to be the destruction of the life of one human being, either by himself or by the act, procurement, or culpable omission of another. When the death has been intentionally caused by the deceased himself, the offender is called felo de se; when it is caused by another, it is justifiable, excusable, or felonious homicide.

The distinction between justifiable and excusable homicide is that in the former, the killing takes place without any manner of fault on the part of the slayer; in the latter there is some slight fault, or at any rate the absence of any duty rendering the act a proper one to be performed, although the blame is so slight as not to render the party punishable. The distinction is very frequently disregarded, and would seem to be of little practical utility; See 3 Bish. Cr. Law § 617. But between justifiable or excusable and felonious homicide the distinction, it will be evident, is of great importance. 1 East, Pl. Cr. 260, gives the following example: "If a person driving a carriage happen to kill another, if he saw or had timely notice of the mischief likely to ensue, and yet wilfully drove on, it will be murder; if he might have seen the danger, but did not look before him, it will be manslaughter; but if the accident happened in such a manner that no want of due care could be imputed to the driver, it will be accidental death and excusable homicide." See 4 Bla. Com. 176; Rosc. Cr. Ev. 580; Cl. Cr. L. 131.

There must be a person in actual existence; 6 C. & P. 349; 7 id. 814, 850; 9 id. 25; 24 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 283; but the destruction of human life at any period after birth is homicide, however near it may be to extinction from any other cause; 2 C. & K. 784; 2 Bish. Cr. Law § 632; but a child in the act of being born would not be included; 5 C. & P. 539; and the death must have occurred within a year and a day from the time the injury was received; 1 Dev. 139; 6 Cal. 210; 41 Tex. 496; 86 Mo. 125; 101 Mass. 6. It is not necessary that the injury inflicted was the sole cause of the death, provided it contributed mediately or immediately in a degree sufficient for the law's notice; 38 La. Ann. 797; 2 Bish. Cr. Law §§ 637, 639; 10 Nev. 108. A person illegally arrested may use such force as is necessary to regain his liberty, and should there be reasonable ground to believe that the officer making the arrest intends shooting the prisoner to prevent his escape, such prisoner may shoot the officer in self-defence; 29 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 1074. So where one is assaulted and there is reasonable ground for him to fear loss of his life, or great bodily harm, he is not obliged to retreat nor consider whether he may so act in safety, but he is entitled to stand his ground and meet any attack made upon him with a deadly weapon, even if in so doing he cause the death of his assailant; 15 Sup. Ct. Rep. 962; 40 N. E. Rep. (Ind.) 745. The person killed, to constitute the homicide felonious, must have been entitled to his existence. Thus, a soldier of the enemy in time of war has no right to his life, but may be killed. A criminal sentenced to be hanged has no right to his life; but no person can take it but the authorized officer, in the prescribed manner. See MURDER: MAN-SLAUGHTER; SELF-DEFENCE; ADEQUATE CAUSE.

HOMICIDAL MANIA. "Homicidal mania" is recognized as irresponsible insanity 6 Bush (Ky.) 276

HOMICIDE SE DEFENDENDO. Homicide in self-defence; the killing of a person in self-defence upon a sudden affray.

HOMICIDE PER INFORTUNUM. Homicide by misfortune or accidental homicide. See HOMICIDE; EXCUSABLE HOMICIDE.

HOMINE CAPTO IN WITHER-NAM. See DE HOMINE CAPTO IN WITHER-NAM.

HOMINE ELIGENDO (Lat.). In English Law. A writ directed to a corporation, requiring the members to make choice of a new man, to keep the one part of a seal appointed for statutes merchant. Tech. Dict. Reg. Orig.

HOMINE REPLEGIANDO. See DE HOMINE REPLEGIANDO.

HOMINES (Lat.). In Feudal Law. Men; feudatory tenants who claimed a privilege of having their causes, etc., tried only in their lord's court. Paroch. Antiq. 15. See HINDENI HOMINES.

HOMINES LIGII. In Feudal Law. Liege men; feudal tenants or vassals, especially those who held immediately of the sovereign. 1 Bla. Com. 367.

HOMIPLAGIUM. In Old English Law. The maiming of a man. Blount.

HOMMES DE FIEF (Fr.). In Feudal Law. Men of the fief; feudal tenants; the peers of the lord's court. Montesq., Esprit des Loix, liv. 28, c. 27.

HOMMES FEODaux (Fr.). In Feudal Law. Feudal tenants; the same with hommes de fief (q. v.). Montesq., Esprit des Loix, liv. 28, c. 36.

HOMO (Lat.). A human being, whether male or female. Co. 2d Inst. 45.

In Feudal Law. A vassal; one who, having received a feud, is bound to do homage and military service for his land; variously called vassalus, vassus, miles, clerus, feodalis, tenens per servitium militare, sometimes baro, and most frequently leudes. Spelman, Gloss. Homo is sometimes also used for a tenant by socage, and sometimes for any dependent. A homo claimed the privilege of having his cause and person tried only in the court of his lord. Kennett, Paroch. Antiq. 152.

Homo chartularius. A slave manumitted by charter. Homo commendatus. In feudal law. One who surrendered himself into the power of another for the sake of protection or support. See Commendator. Homo ecclesiasticus. A church vassal; one who was bound to serve a church, especially to do service of an agricultural character. Spel. Gloss. Homo exercitatus. A man of the army (exercitus); a soldier. Homo feodalis. A vassal or tenant; one who held a fee (feodum), or part of a fee. Spel. Gloss. Homo fiscalis, or fiscalinus. A servant or vassal belonging to the treasury or fiscus. Homo francus. In old English law. A freeman. A Frenchman. Homo ingenuus. A free man. A free and lawful man. A yeoman. Homo liber. A freeman. Homo ligus. A liege man; a subject; a king's vassal. The vassal of a subject. Homo novus. In feudal law. A new tenant or vassal; one who was invested with a new fee. Spel. Gloss. Homo pertinens. In feudal law. A feudal bondman or vassal, one who belonged to the soil (et gratia adscribitur). Homo regius. A king's vassal. Homo Romanus. A Roman. An appellation given to the old inhabitants of Gaul and other Roman provinces, and retained in the law of the barbarous nations. Spel. Gloss. Homo trium litterarum. A man of three letters; that is the three letters, "g," "u," "r," the Latin word fur meaning "thief."

HOMOLOGACION. In Spanish Law. The tacit consent and approval, inferred by law from the omission of the parties, for the space of ten days, to complain of the sentences of arbitrators, appointment of syndics, or assignees, of insolvents, settlements of successions, etc. Also, the approval given by the judge of certain acts and agreements for the purpose of rendering them more binding and executory. Escriche.

HOMOLOGATION. In Civil Law. Approbation; confirmation by a court of justice; a judgment which orders the execution of some act; as, the approbation of an award and ordering execution on the same. Merlin, Répert.; La. Civ. Code; Dig. 4. 8; 7 Toullier, n. 224. See L. R. 8 App. Cas. 1028. To homologate is to say the like, similiter dicere. 9 Mart. La. 324.

A judgment homologating, as far as not opposed, the account of distribution of a syndic, is res judicata, except as to opponents, whether the account was correct or not; 14 So. Rep. (La.) 90.

In Scotch Law. An act by which a person approves a deed, so as to make it binding on him, though in itself defective. Erskine, Inst. 8. 8. 47; 2 Bligh. 197; 1 Ball, Com. 144.

HOND HABEND. See HAND HABEND.

HONOR. In English Law. The signory of a lord paramount. 2 Bla. Com. 91.

In Common Law. To accept a bill of exchange; to pay a bill accepted, or a promissory note, on the day it becomes due. 7 Taunt. 164; 1 Term 172.

HONORABLE. A title of distinction or respect.

In England it is given to the younger sons of earls, to the children of viscounts and barons, to persons occupying official places of trust and honor, and to the house of commons as a body. In the United States it is usually given to persons who hold or have held positions of importance under the national or state government.

HONORARIUM. Something given in gratitude for services rendered.

A voluntary donation in consideration of services which admit of no compensation in money; in particular to advocates at law, deemed to practice for honor or influence and not for fees. 14 Ga. 80.

It is so far of the nature of a gift that it cannot be sued for; 58 & R. 412; 1 Chitty, Bailm. 38; 2 Atk. 382; 3 Bla. Com. 28. Of this character are in England, the professional fees of barristers and of physicians. The same rule once prevailed in Pennsylvania, but was afterwards rejected; 19 Pa. 95; and now prevails in New Jersey; 8 Green 85; and to some extent in the federal courts, as applied to counsel in the special sense of the term; Weeks, Atty. 548; 2 Cra. C. C. 144. In many states the contrary rule has been expressly laid down; 10 Tex. 81; 6 Fla. 214; 14 Mo. 54; 28 Wend. 452 (a full discussion by Walworth, C.); 1 Pick. 415. The payment of the fees of English solicitors, attorneys, and proctors is provided for by statute and rules of court. See Weeks, Atty. 536. See 3 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 28.

HONORARY CANONS. Those without emolument. 8 & 4 Vict. c. 113, § 28.

In England. Clergymen selected by the bishops from their dioceses to be attached to the cathedral churches as canons in a purely honorary capacity, with no emolument and no place in the various chapters. Byrne.

HONORARY FEUDS. Titles of nobility which were not of a divisible nature, but could only be inherited by the eldest son in exclusion of the rest. 2 Bla. Com. 56; Wright, Tenures 82.

HONORARY SERVICES. Services by which lands in grand serjeanty were held: such as, to hold the king's banner, or to hold his head in the ship which carried him from Dover to Whitsand, etc. 2 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 78, and note.

HONOUR. The term frequently applied (instead of 'manor') to the signory of one of the king's greater barons, especially if it had belonged to an ancient feudal baron, or had been at any time in the hands of the crown. 2 Bla. Com. 91.

HOO. A hill. Co. Litt. 5 b.

HOOK. The verb "to hook" may not be equivalent to "to steal." 7 Blackf. 117.

HOPCON. A valley. Cowel.

HOPE. A valley. Co. Litt. 5 b.

HOPE. As Used in Will. The word "hope" as used in a will is considered sufficient to raise a trust where the subject and object are sufficiently certain. 78 Ky. 128.

Hope, Wish, Request. A trust will be created by such precatory words as "hope," "wish," "request," etc., if they be not so modified by the context as to amount to no more than mere suggestions, to be acted on or not, according to the caprice of the immediate devisee, or negated by other expression indicating a contrary intention, and the subject and object be sufficiently certain. 79 Ky. 382.

HORA AURORÆ. The morning bell. Ignilegium, or coverfeu was the evening bell. Wharton.

HORÆ JUDICLÆ (Lat.). Hours judicial, or those in which judges sit in court. In Fortesque's time, these were from 8 to 11 A. M., and the courts of law were not open in the afternoon. Co. Litt. 185 a; Co. 2d Inst. 246; Fortesque 51, p. 120, note.

HORDA. In old records a cow in calf.

HORDERA. A treasurer. Du Cange. Hence we have the hord or hoard, as used for treasuring or laying up a thing. Jacobs; Leg. Athelstan, cap. 2.

HORDERIUM. A hoard, treasury, or repository. Cowel.

HORDEUM PALMALE. Beer barley. Cowel.

HORN TENURE. Tenure by winding a horn on approach of an enemy, called tenure by cornage. If lands were held by this tenure of the king, it was grand serjeanty; if of a private person, knight-service. Many anciently so held their lands towards the Picts' Wall. Co. Litt. § 156; Camd. Britan. 690.

HORNBOOK. A book containing the first principles of any science or branch of knowledge; a primer.

Horn book law. The elementary or rudimentary law.

So called because a sheet of horn covered the small, thin board of oak, or the slip of paper on which the alphabet, digits, etc., were written or printed; a primer. Webster.

HORNBOOK LAW. See HORNBOOK.

HORNGELD. A forest tax paid for horned beasts, also an acquittance thereof, which was granted by the king unto such as he thought good. Cowel; Toml.

HORNING. In Scotch Law. A process issuing on a decree of court of sessions, or of an inferior court, by which the debtor is charged to perform, in terms of his obligation, or on failure made liable to caption, that is, imprisonment. Bell, Dict. Horning Letters of Diligence. The name comes from the ancient custom of proclaiming letters of horning not obeyed, and declaring the recusant a rebel, with three blasts of a horn, called putting him to the horn. 1 Ross, Lect. 258, 308.

HORREUM. A place for keeping grain, a storehouse. Calvinus, Lex; Bract. fol. 48.

HORS DE SON FEE (Fr. out of his fee).

In Old English Law. A plea to an action brought by one who claimed to be lord for rent-services as issuing out of his land, by which the defendant asserted that the land in question was out of the fee of the demandant. 9 Co. 80; 2 Mod. 104.

HORS WEALH. In Old English Law. The wealth, or Briton who had the care of the king's horses.

HORS WEARD. In Old English Law. A service or corvée, consisting in watching the horses of the lord. Ano. Inst. Eng.

HORSE. Until a horse has attained the age of four years he is called a colt. 1 Russ. & R. 416. This word is sometimes used as a generic name for all animals of the horse kind; 44 Ga. 283; 8 Brev. 9. See Yelv. 67 a; 84 N. C. 226.

It is also used to include every description of the male, as gelding or stallion, in contradistinction to the female; 88 Tex. 555. In a statute giving a remedy against railroad companies for injuries to horses and cattle, it includes mules; 50 Ill. 184; 47 id. 463. The exemption of a horse from execution has been held to include whatever is essential to his enjoyment, as shoes and saddle; 21 Tex. 449; and it may include an ass or a jackass; 2 Heisk. 223; 47 Ill. 463; but not a stallion not kept for farm work; 38 Cal. 383.

HORSE GUARDS. The name applied to the public office in Whitehall appropriated to the departments under the general-commanding-in-chief. The term is also used conventionally to signify the military authorities at the head of army affairs, in contradistinction to the civil chief, the secretary of state for war.

HORSE RACE. Any race in which any horse, mare, or gelding is run or made to run in competition with any other horse, mare, or gelding or against time, for any prize of what nature or kind soever, or for any bet or wager made or to be made in respect to any such horse, mare, or gelding or the riders thereof, and at which more than twenty persons are present. Stat. 42 & 43 Vict. c. 18, s. 1.

The first statute regarding horse-racing was passed in 1664, entitled an act against deceitful, disorderly and excessive gaming; but this act being found insufficient to prevent the abuses at which it was directed, the statute 9 Anne, c. 14, was passed in 1710, reciting that all mortgages and instruments, where the consideration was money won by gaming or betting, or the repayment of money lent at such gaming and betting, should be void; and that the loser of ten pounds or upwards on such gaming or betting might, within three months, sue and recover back treble the value of his losses; and that any person winning ten pounds or upwards might be indicted and, on conviction, forfeit five times the value so won, and if won by cheating, the winner should be deemed infamous, and suffer such corporal punishment as in cases of wilful perjury. This act, being only directed to races at which betting of ten pounds or over was indulged, increased the number at which the limit was below that amount to such an extent that it was found necessary to restrict still further the practice, and in 1740 and 1745 the acts 18 Geo. II. c. 19 and 18 Geo. II. c. 34 went into effect. The latter, as an encouragement to breeders, legalized those races at which the stakes amounted to fifty pounds, and also made a distinction between matches and races. So much of the acts 18 Car. II. c. 7 and 9 Anne, c. 14 as rendered void any note, bill or mortgage given for a gambling contract was repealed during the reign of William IV. and they were amended so as to make such instruments not void, but given for an illegal consideration; 5 & 6 Will. IV. c. 41. This statute is still in force. The acts 3 & 4 Vict. c. 8 and 8 & 9 Vict. c. 109 repealed the former acts of 18 Car. II. c. 7, and all of 9 Anne, c. 14 that had not already been altered by 5 & 6 Will. IV. c. 41. The act 17 & 18 Vict. c. 38 was supplementary to 8 & 9 Vict. c. 109, as were also 37 Vict. c. 15 and 43 & 44 Vict. c. 18, and 55 Vict. c. 9.

Contributions or subscriptions towards any plate, prize, or sum of money to be awarded to the winner of any lawful horse race are not unlawful and do not constitute a wager; 1 Q. B. D. 189; [1895] 1 Q. B. 696; but a match between two horses, for a sum of money contributed by their respective owners, although legal, is a void contract within the statute 8 & 9 Vict. c. 109; and money in the hands of a stakeholder or loser cannot be recovered by the winner in an action at law; 1 C. P. D. 573; and see 2 Ex. D. 442 (overruling 5 C. B. 881); 5 App. Cas. 342 approving 2 Ex. D. 442.

The stakeholder is bound to retain the money in his hands until it is clearly decided which party is entitled to it; 2 M. & W. 869; but he is merely a stakeholder, and has no right to the stakes until he actually receives them in his hands; 5 C. & P. 147. Where the race has not been, and cannot be, run, the position of the stakeholder is that of a debtor to each party for the amount contributed by each, and a specific demand of the stake from him is unnecessary; but where there is a possibility that the race may still be run and decided, each party must make a specific demand of his stake from the stakeholder before he can recover from him; 28 L. J. Q. B. 126. In a lawful horse race, the payment of entrance money to the stakeholder constitutes a legal contract, and such money cannot be recovered back unless there is a mutual rescission of the contract; 2 M. & W. 369. See also 25 L. J. Ex. 169. As to the recovery back of money paid to a stakeholder pending the result of an illegal contest, it has been held that it may be recovered before the contest takes place, but not afterwards; 8 B. & C. 226; 46 N. W. Rep. (Neb.) 161; but the former case, although regarded as an authority; 5 H. & N. 929; 1 Q. B. D. 126; [1895] 1 Q. B. 696; 110 Cal. 159; has been doubted;

14 M. & W. 719; and held irreconcilable with the statute; 9 Ir. C. L. R. 18. In Diggle v. Higgs, 2 Ex. D. 443, the court say "what legal right there may be to recover back money, paid under such a contract, the statute leaves it untouched." In the United States it is held that the depositor may revoke the stakeholder's authority to pay over the stakes and bring an action against him for its recovery; 9 Col. 212; and if, after the receipt of such notice, the stakeholder pay over the money to the winner, he is liable to the depositor; 48 Mo. App. 48; 110 Cal. 159.

If the owner of a horse entered for a race is aware of its disqualification he may recover his money back before the race, but not afterwards; 2 C. & P. 603.

Money expended by one part owner of a racehorse for the common benefit of another owner and himself, with the understanding that the owners are to share alike in the winnings of such horse, is recoverable (from the second owner), to the amount of one-half the sum expended where the horse loses the race; 26 L. J. C. P. 181.

In this country the decisions as to whether horse racing constitutes gaming within the statutes are not uniform. It has been held, to be gaming or a gambling device; 83 Ala. 428; 33 Ark. 780; 80 id. 438; 2 Coldw. 235; 9 Col. 214; 8 Blackf. 389; 2 Bush 263; 4 Harr. Racing a horse on or along a public road, though no bet has been offered on the result of such race, has been held an indictable offence; 7 Humph. 503; and the fact that a charter has been granted for a race-course will not authorize betting thereon; 2 Bush 263. To trot a horse in another state for a wager or for stakes is not prima facie illegal in that state; 81 N. Y. 539. In many of the states, however, the times at, and seasons in, which horse-racing may be indulged are regulated by statutes which tax and license the racing associations. The trotting for a purse or premium contributed or subscribed by other persons is not trotting for a wager; 67 Vt. 586; 46 N. E. Rep. (N. Y.) 296, affg. 39 N. Y. Supp. 835; 81 N. Y. 532; 67 Ia. 481; 13 Or. 135; 71 Wis. 296; 63 Ind. 58; but see 85 N. Y. Supp. 245; 94 Pa. 132; 24 Mich. 441.

Pools on horse races are games within the statute against gaming; 51 Mich. 203; 154, Ill. 234; 104 Mass. 203; contra, 63 Md. 242; and the rule applies to pools sold in one state on a race to be run in another; 8 Lea 411; 99 Tenn. 275; 24 S. E. Rep. (Va.) 990; but not where only the orders for bets were taken and transmitted by telegraph, as it was held that the actual betting was done out of the state; 17 S. E. Rep. (Va.) 646; 89 Va. 878.

The general rule against betting on horse races applies to all betting wherever done; 49 N. J. L. 483; and all pooling schemes are within the statute; 79 Ky. 618; but in some states betting or pool-selling with reference to races run on a licensed track are excepted from the statutory prohibition; 1 Humph. 384; 7 id. 501; 2 Coldw. 235; 2 Swan 279; but not otherwise; 92 Tenn. 275.

One who keeps a room as a resort for persons who bet on horse races is guilty of keeping a disorderly house; 23 Atl. Rep. (N. J.) 581; so where one maintains a partly enclosed place for the purpose of making books and selling pools; 154 Ill. 284.

Blackboards, sheets, manifold books, and policy slips for placing bets on horse races are gambling devices; 160 Mass. 810; 39 Minn. 163; contra, 98 Mich. 681.

Although the business of pool selling is illegal, the crime of embezzlement may be committed by the agent who receives the money, in appropriating it to his own use; 80 Mo. 358.

Money lent for the purpose of betting on a gambling device cannot be recovered; 24 N. E. Rep. (Ill.) 667; nor can a note given for money lent for such a purpose; 43 N. H. 497; and see 1 Flp. 410. In the District of Columbia, it is held that the Statute 9 Anne, c. 14, a. 1, supra, is still in force and that all notes given for gambling contracts are void, even in the hands of a bona fide purchaser; 21 D. C. 88; contra, 43 Ala. 515. A promissory note given for an interest in a race horse is not void; 62 Ill. App. 650. See Byles, Bills 141; Oliphant, Horses 307; 2 McClain, Cr. L. § 1297 GAMING; GAMING HOUSE; LOTTERY; WAGER; STAKEHOLDER; BETTING.

HORSE STEALING. Obtaining possession of a horse under the false pretense of hiring it, without intending to return it, but with the felonious intent to convert it, and permanently deprive the owner of it, is "horse stealing," without a subsequent sale or wrongful disposition of the horse. 118 S. W. 314; 112 S. W. 615.

HORTUS (Lat.). In the Civil Law. A garden. Dig. 32. 91. 5.

HOSPITAL. An institution for the reception and care of sick, wounded, infirm, or aged persons; generally incorporated, and then of the class of corporations called "eleemosynary" or "charitable." See CHARITABLE USES; CHARITIES; PUBLIC HOSPITAL.

HOSPITALIERS. The knights of a religious order, so called because they built a hospital at Jerusalem, wherein pilgrims were received. All their lands and goods in England were given to the sovereign by 22 Hen. VIII. c. 24.

HOSPITATOR (Lat.). A host or entertainer.

Hospitator communis. An innkeeper. 8 Co. 32.

Hospitator Magna. The marshal of a camp.

HOSPITIA. Inns. Hospitia communia, common inns. Reg. Orig. 105.

Hospitia curia, inns of the court. Hospitia cancellaria, inns of chancery. Crabb. Eng. Law 423; 4 Reeve, Hist. Eng. Law 102.

HOSPITICIDE. One who kills his guest or host.

HOSPITIUM. An inn; a household.

A monastery serving as an inn for entertaining travellers, chiefly applied, in modern times, to the inns on St. Bernard and St. Gothard in Switzerland, where travellers to and from Italy are entertained. Worcester.

HOSPODAE. A Turkish governor in Moldavia or Wallachia.

HOSTAGE. A person delivered into the possession of a public enemy in the time of war, as a security for the performance of a contract entered into between the belligerents.

Hostages were frequently given as a security for the payment of a ransom-bill; and if they died their death did not discharge the contract; 3 Burr. 1734; 1 Kent 106; Dane, Abr. Index.

HOSTELER. An innkeeper. Now applied, under the form ostler, to those who look to a guest's horses. Cowel.

HOSTELLAGIUM. In English Law. A right reserved to the lords to be lodged and entertained in the houses of their tenants.

HOSTES. Enemies. Hostes humani generis, enemies of the human race; i. e. pirates. See HOSTIS.

HOSTIA. In Old Records. The hostbread, or consecrated wafer, in the eucharist. Cowel.

From this word Somner derives the Sax. husel, used for the Lord's supper, and huslan, to administer the sacrament, which were kept long in old English, under housel, and to housel. Toml.; Paroch. Antiq. 270.

HOSTILARIA, HOSPITALARIA. A place or room in religious houses used for the reception of guests and strangers.

HOSTILE. When applied to the possession of an occupant of real estate holding adversely it is not to be construed as showing ill-will, or that he is an enemy of the person holding the legal title; but it means an occupant who holds and is in possession as owner, and therefore against all other claimants of the land. 83 Neb. 861.

Belonging to an enemy; appropriate to an enemy; showing ill will and malevolence, or a desire to thwart and injure; occupied by an enemy or a hostile people; inimical; unfriendly; as, hostile forces, hostile intentions, etc. 15 A. & E. Ency. 2nd ed., 765.

HOSTILE EMBARGO. One laid upon the vessels of an actual or prospective enemy. See EMBARGO.

HOSTILE WITNESS. A witness who manifests so much hostility or prejudice under examination in chief that the party who has called him, or his representative, is allowed to cross-examine him, i. e. to treat him as though he had been called by the opposite party. Whart. See WITNESS.

HOSTILITY. A state of open enmity; open war. Wolff, Droit de la Nat. § 1119.

Permanent hostility exists when the individual is a citizen or subject of the government at war.

Temporary hostility exists when the individual happens to be domiciliated or resident in the country of one of the belligerents; in this latter case the individual may throw off the national character he has thus acquired by residence, when he puts himself in motion, bona fide, to quit the country sine animo revertendi; 3 C. Rob. 13; 8 Wheat. 14. See ENEMY; DOMICIL.

HOSTIS (Lat.). An enemy; one who makes war by an open formal proclamation of hostility. Plural, hostes.

A host or army. This sense of the word was common in ancient European laws, proceedings of councils, and authors of the middle ages. Burrill.

HOT WATER ORDEAL. See ORDEAL.

HOTCHPOT (spelled, also, hodge-podge, hotch-potch). The blending and mixing property belonging to different persons, in order to divide it equally. 2 Bla. Com. 190.

The bringing together all the personal estate of the deceased, with the advancements he has made to his children, in order that the same may be divided agreeably to the provisions of the statute for the distribution of intestates' estates.

In bringing an advancement into hotchpot, the donee is not required to account for the profits of the thing given; for example, he is not required to bring into hotchpot the produce of negroes, nor the interest of money. The property must be accounted for at its value when given; 1 Wash. Va. 224; 17 Mass. 358; 3 Pick. 450; 2 Des. 127; 8 Rand. 117, 559. See ADVANCEMENT.

HOTEL. See INNKEEPER; BOARDER; GUEST.

An inn or hotel is a house where all who conduct themselves properly, and who are able and ready to pay for their entertainment, are received, if there is accommodation for them, and who, without any stipulated engagement as to the duration of their stay, or as to the rate of compensation, are, while there, supplied at a reasonable charge with their meals, their lodging, and such services and attention as are necessarily incident to the use of the house as a temporary home. Abbott; 3 Abb. Pr. N. S. 26.

HOUGH. A valley. English. See HOO; HAUGH.

HOUE. The twenty-fourth part of a natural day; the space of sixty minutes of time. Co. Litt. 185.

HOURS OF SERVICE ACT. Under the "hours of service act" an employee is not engaged in service within the meaning of the act unless he is actually engaged in or connected with the movement of a train. 158 Ky. 176, 164 S. W. 818.

Dead-Heading. A brakeman who is "dead-heading" from one point to another on the road under direction of the company so that he may be able to report for duty at the place to which he is going, is not, while so "dead-heading," engaged in service within the meaning of the act, when he has no duties to perform in connection with the movement of the train on which he is "dead-headed." 158 Ky. 176, 164 S. W. 818.

HOUSAGE. A fee paid for housing goods by a carrier, or at a wharf or quay, etc. Tomlin; Shep. Epit. 1725.

HOUSE. See HOSTIA.

HOUSE. A place for the habitation and dwelling of man.

A collection of persons; an institution; a commercial firm; a family.

In a grant or demise of a house, the curtilage and garden will pass, even without the words "with the appurtenances" being added; Cro. Eliz. 89; 8 Leon. 214; 1 Plowd. 171; 2 Wms. Saund. 401, n. 2; 4 Pa. 98; 113 Mo. 27. In a grant or demise of a house with the appurtenances, no more will pass although other lands have been occupied with the house; 1 P. Wms. 603; Cro. Jac. 526; 2 Co. 32; Co. Litt. 5 d, 86 a, b; 2 Wms. Saund. 401, n. 2.

If a house, originally entire, be divided into several apartments, with an outer door to each apartment, and no communication with each other subsists, in such case the several apartments are considered as distinct houses; 6 Mod. 214; Woodf. L. & T. 178.

A church is a "house" within a statute prescribing a street line for houses; L. R. 15 Eq. 159; a smoke house is a house; 37 Tex. 412; but a theatre is not a house; 14 M. & W. 181.

As to what the term includes in cases of arson and burglary, see ARSON; BURGLARY; DWELLING-HOUSE; FLAT; APARTMENT. See, also, ARREST; ANY HOUSE.

HOUSE-BOLE. An allowance of necessary timber out of the landlord's woods for the repairing and support of a house or tenement. This belongs of common right to any lessee for years or for life. House-bole is said to be of two kinds, estoverium edificandi et arandi. Co. Litt. 41 b.

HOUSE-DUTY. A tax on inhabited houses imposed by 14 and 15 Vict. c. 38, in lieu of window-duty, which was abolished.

A tax assessed in England on inhabited dwelling-houses, according to their annual value, payable by the occupier, the landlord being deemed the occupier where the house is let to several persons. R. & L. Dict. See also FUMAGE; HEARTH-MONEY.

HOUSE OF COMMONS. One of the constituent houses of the English parliament.

It is composed of the representatives elected by the people, as distinguished from the house of lords, which is composed of the nobility. It consists of six hundred and seventy members: four hundred and ninety-five from England and Wales, seventy-two from Scotland, and one hundred and three from Ireland. See PARLIAMENT; HIGH COURT OF PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF CORRECTION. A place for the imprisonment of those who have committed crimes of lesser magnitude.

HOUSE OF ILL-FAME. In Criminal Law. A house resorted to for the purpose of prostitution and lewdness. 5 Ired. 603.

A disorderly house need not be a dwelling house. "However lexicographers may define the word 'house,' it is clear the legislature has used it as generic, and has applied it to nearly all kinds of buildings;" 38 Conn. 77. A flat boat, floating on a river, with a cabin on it, with men and women eating, sleeping, and living on it, may be such; 35 Ia. 199; so also a tent, of which it has been said, "such structures are more apt to become disorderly nuisances than houses of brick or stone, owing to the facility with which noises made within could be heard from without;" 2 Tex. App. 222. So it has been held of one room of a steamship, though the latter is not an inn; 118 Mass. 456.

Keeping a house of ill-fame is an offence at common law; 3 Pick. 26; 17 id. 80; 1 Russ. Cr. 322; 1 Bish. Cr. L. 1082. So the letting of a house to a woman of ill-fame, knowing her to be such, with the intent that it shall be used for purposes of prostitution, is an indictable offence at common law; 3 Pick. 26; 11 Cush. 600. And it is no defence that the landlord did not know the character of the tenant; 90 Ala. 1. If a lodger lets her room for the purpose of indiscriminate prostitution, she is guilty of keeping a house of ill-fame, as much as if she were the proprietor of the whole house; 2 Raym. 1197; 15 R. I. 24. A married woman who lives apart from her husband may be indicted alone, and punished, for keeping a house of ill-fame; 1 Metc. Mass. 151. See 11 Mo. 27; 10 Mod. 63. The house need not be kept for lucre, to constitute the offence; 21 N. H. 345; 2 Gray 357; 18 Vt. 70. See 17 Pick. 80; 6 Gill 425; 4 Ia. 541; 2 B. Monr. 417.

It is not necessary, in order to sustain a charge of keeping such a house, that the indecency, disorder, or misconduct should be patent from the outside; L. R. 1 C. C. R. 21; and it has been said evidence of its general reputation as a house of ill-fame is admissible; 2 Cra. C. C. 675; 79 Ia. 742; 105 Ind. 271; 61 Cal. 389; Dudley 846; 20 Ont. 489; contra, 32 Md. 231; 45 N. H. 466; 1 S. & R. 841; 24 How. Pr. 276; 4 Cra. C. C. 838; 39 Ia. 379; 64 Me. 523; but evidence of the reputation of the women frequenting the house and the character of their conversation and acts in and about it is admissible; id.; 7 Gray 328; 1 Allen 8. Wharton says: "It has been ruled, though on questionable authority, that the 'ill-fame,' or bad repute, may be proved"; 2 Whart. Cr. L. 10th ed. § 1452; but the doubt cast by this language on the cases referred to is not warranted by the cases, a long list of which, in addition to those above cited, may be found in a note to the section quoted. And indeed the same author in another work says: "On indictments, however, for keeping houses of ill-fame, when such is the statutory term describing the offence, the ill-fame or bad reputation of the house may be put in evidence. The bad reputation of the visitors is, in any view, competent evidence. But of a disorderly house the reputation is inadmissible, being secondary evidence of disorder, which is susceptible of immediate proof"; Whart. Cr. Ev. 9th ed. § 201. On indictment for keeping a house of ill-fame the reputation of the house as such must be proved; 17 Conn. 467; 88 id. 523; but it must be "ill-repute in the vicinity. . . Rumors at a distance do not make up reputation"; 79 Mich. 110. But the reputation where admitted at all must be connected in time with the person who is now the proprietor; 22 Tex. App. 639. It is not necessary to prove who frequents the house; it is enough to show that unknown persons were there behaving as charged; 1 Term 748. Contracts of lease of such a house, or to furnish goods for the purposes of the business, if made with knowledge of the use intended, are illegal and void; L. R. 1 Eq. 620; and see L. R. 4 Q. B. 809; L. R. 1 Ex. 213. See BAWDY HOUSE; BROTHEL; DISORDERLY HOUSE.

HOUSE OF LORDS. One of the constituent houses of the English parliament.

It is at present composed of twenty-six lords spiritual (bishops and archbishops), and five hundred and thirty-four lords temporal; but the number is liable to vary. See PARLIAMENT; HIGH COURT OF PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF REFUGE. A prison for juvenile delinquents. See 55 Am. Rep. 450-02.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES. The name given to the more numerous branch of the federal congress, and of the legislatures of several of the states of the United States.

The constitution of the United States, art. 1, s. 2, § 1, provides that the "house of representatives shall be composed of members chosen every second year by the people of the several states; and the electors of each state shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the state legislature." No person can be a representative until he shall have attained the age of twenty-five and has been seven years a citizen of the United States, and unless he is at the time of his election an inhabitant of the state in which he is chosen; U. S. Const. art. I, sec. 2, § 2. A representative cannot hold any office under the United States; art. I, s. 6, § 2; nor can any religious test be required of him; art. VI, § 3; nor is any property qualification imposed upon him. Representatives are apportioned (Amend. XIV. sec. 2) among the several states according to their respective numbers, excluding Indians not taxed; with a proviso, that, if the right to vote for state or U. S. officers is denied to any male inhabitants of a state, of 21 years of age and citizens of the United States, except for participation in rebellion or other crime, the representation in such state shall be proportionately reduced. The number of representatives shall not exceed one for every thirty thousand, but each state shall have at least one representative; U. S. Const. art. I, sec. 1. A reapportionment among the states is made every tenth year. Under the act of Feb. 7, 1891 (26 Stat. L. 735), it consists of 356 members, which is based upon the census of 1890. The house of representatives has the exclusive right of originating bills for raising revenues, but the senate may concur with amendments, U. S. Const. I. sec. 7; Story on Const. 571. See CONGRESS; QUORUM; SPEAKER; MAJORITY.

HOUSEBREAKING. In Criminal Law. The breaking and entering the dwelling house of another by night or by day, with intent to commit some felony within the same, whether such felonious intent is executed or not. Housebreaking by night is burglary. Cr. Ch. L. 237.

This crime is of a local character, and the evidence respecting the place must correspond with the allegation in the indictment. An indictment for housebreaking must allege the ownership of the house; 31 W. Va. 355. See BURGLARY; BREAKING.

HOUSEHOLD. Those who dwell under the same roof and constitute a family. Webster. But it is not necessary that they should be under a roof, or that the father of the family be with it, if the mother and children keep together so as to constitute a family; 18 Johns. 402.

Belonging to the house and family; domestic. Webster, Dict.

HOUSEHOLD EFFECTS. All the furnishings of one's residence. 132 Ky. 589, 116 S. W. 769.

HOUSEHOLD FURNITURE. By this expression, in wills, all personal chattels will pass that may contribute to the use or convenience of the household or the ornament of the house; as, plate linen, china, both useful and ornamental, and pictures. 2 Wms. Exec. 1185; 1 Rep. Leg. 273. But goods or plate in the hands of testator in the way of his trade will not pass, nor books, nor wines; 1 Jarm. Wills. 591, 596, notes; 1 Ves. Sen. 97; 2 Will. Ex. 1017; 1 Johns. Ch. 329.

But books and wines have been held, on the other hand, to pass in a bequest, where the testator had made them part of the household furniture by his use of them; 1 Robt. 21; see 2 Am. L. Reg. n. s. 489; 33 Me. 535; 60 Pa. 220; and so has plate; 8 Ves. 313; 20 Beav. 578; bronzes, statuary, pictures; 124 Mass. 228. See FIXTURES; FURNITURE.

HOUSEHOLD GOODS. In a will this expression will pass everything of a permanent nature (that is, articles of household which are not consumed in their enjoyment) that were used or purchased, or otherwise acquired by the testator, for his house, but not goods in the way of his trade. Plate will pass by this term, but not articles of consumption found in the house, as malt, hops, or victuals, nor guns and pistols, if used in hunting or sport, and not for defence of house. A clock in the house, if not fixed to it, will pass: 1 Jarm. Wills 589; 1 Rep. Leg. 253; 2 Will. Exec. 464. See 2 Munf. 234; 33 Me. 535.

HOUSEHOLD STUFF. Words sometimes used in a will. Plate will pass under the term; 2 Freem. 64; but not apparel, books, cattle, victuals, and choses in action, which do not fall within the natural meaning of the word, unless there be an intention manifest that they should pass; 15 Ves. 319. Goods, as seven hundred beds in possession of testator for purposes of trade, do not pass under the term "utensils of household stuff"; 2 P. Wms. 302. In general, "household stuff" will pass all articles which may be used for the convenience of the house; Swinb. Wills 484. See FIXTURES; HOUSEHOLD FURNITURE.

HOUSEHOLDER. Master or chief of a family; one who keeps house with his family. Webster. But a man who has absconded from the state, and left his wife and children remaining together as a family, was for their benefit held to be a householder; 18 Johns. 402; 19 Wend. 476.

A keeper of a tavern or boarding-house, or a master or mistress of a dwelling-house; 11 N. Y. Leg. Obs. 248. A person having and providing for a household. The character is not lost by a temporary cessation from housekeeping; 14 Barb. 456; 19 Wend. 475; 51 How. Pr. 45. For purposes of bail, one who rents and occupies part of a building as an office has been held a householder; 33 How. Pr. 323. See 8 Code R. 17; 37 Ala. 106; 52 id. 161; 1 Q. B. 72; 59 How. Pr. 71.

HOUSEKEEPER. One who occupies a house.

A person who, under a lease, occupies every room in the house except one, which is reserved for his landlord, who pays all the taxes, is not a housekeeper; 1 Chitty, Bail. 502. Nor is a person a housekeeper who takes a house which he afterwards underlets to another, whom the landlord refuses to accept as his tenant: in this case the undertenant paid the taxes, and let to the tenant the first floor of the house, and the rent was paid for the whole house to the tenant, who paid it to the landlord; id. note.

In order to make the party a housekeeper, he must be in actual possession of the house; 1 Chitty, Bail. 289; and must occupy a whole house. See 1 B. & C. 178; 2 Term 406; 3 Peterd. Abr. 103, note; 2 Mart. La. 313. See HOUSEHOLDER. BONA FIDE HOUSEKEEPER.

HOUSEL. See HOSTIA.

HOVEL. A place used by husbandmen to set their ploughs, carts and other farming utensils, out of the rain and sun. Law. Lat. Dict. Ashed; a cottage; a mean house.

HOWE. In Old English Law. A hill. Co. Litt. 5 b.

HOWGH. See HAUGH.

HOY. A small vessel usually rigged as a sloop, and employed in conveying passengers and goods from place to place on the sea coast. Webster.

HOYMAN. The master or captain of a hoy.

Hoymen are liable as common carriers; Story, Bailm. § 496.

HUDEFAEST. See HZORDFESTE.

HUDE-GELD. In Old English Law. A compensation for an assault (transgressio illata) upon a trespassing servant (servus). Supposed to be a mistake or misprint in Fleta for hinegeld. Fleta, lib.

1, c. 47, § 20. Also, the price of one's skin, or the money paid by a servant to save himself from a whipping. Du Cange.

HUE AND CRY. In Old English Law. A pursuit of one who had committed felony, by the highway.

The meaning of hue is said to be shout, from the Saxon huer; but this word also means to foot, and it may be reasonably questioned whether the term may not be up foot and cry, in other words, run and cry after the felon. We have a mention of hue and cry as early as Edward I.; and by the Statute of Winchester, 13 Edw. I., "Immediately upon robberies and felonies committed, fresh suit shall be made from town to town, and county to county, by horsemen and footmen, to the seaside. The constable (the person being described, etc.) is to call upon the parishioners to assist him in the pursuit in his precinct; and to give notice to the next constable, who is to do the same as the first, etc. If the county will not answer the bodies of the offenders, the whole hundred shall be answerable for the robberies there committed, etc." A person engaged in the hue and cry apprehending a felon was, on the felon's conviction, entitled to forty pounds, on a certificate of the judge or justice before whom there was conviction, as well as to the felon's horse, furniture, arms, money, and other goods taken with him, subject to the rights of other persons therein; Wood, Inst. 370. See 2 Hale, Pl. Cr. 100.

HUEBRA. In Spanish Law. An acre of land, or as much as can be ploughed in a day by two oxen. 2 White, Recop. 49.

HUISSENUM. A ship used to transport horses. Also termed "uffar."

It is mentioned in Hoveden by the name of uisers. Some say the word is derived from the French huis, i. e. a door, because when the horses are on shipboard, the doors or hatches are shut upon them to keep out water. Cunningham; Cowell, edit. 1727.

HUISSIER. An usher of the court. An officer who serves process.

In France, an officer of this name performs many of the duties of an English sheriff or constable. In Canada there may be many huissiers in each county, whose acts are independent of each other, while there can be but one sheriff, who is presumed cognizant of the acts of his subordinates. The French huissier certifies his process; the Canadian merely serves what is put into his hands.

HULKA. A hulk, or small vessel. Cowell.

HULKS, THE. Old, dismasted ships formerly used in England as prisons. Webster.

HULL AND MACHINERY. Terms frequently used together in marine insurance policies to designate the frame or body of a vessel as distinguished from its machinery. An insurance upon a hull and machinery was held not to cover provisions. 15 A. & E. Ency. 2nd ed., 753; 2 Q. B. 380. Neither does it cover those things included by "disbursement" policies, such as coals, stores, and expenses. 4 Joyce, Insurance, 2nd ed., 4731. Often the hull and machinery are separately valued. Id.; p. 4524; 3 Best & S. 873.

HULLUS. A hill. Cowell; 2 Mon. Angl. 292.

In hullis et holmis, in hills and dshes. Jacob; Mon. Angl. tom. 2 p. 292.

HUMAGIUM. A moist place. Mon. Angl.

HUNDRED. In English Law. A division of a county, which some make to have originally consisted of one hundred hides of land, others of ten tithings, or one hundred free families. See 60 Conn. 124.

It differed in size in different parts of England; 1 Steph. Com. 122. In many cases, when an offence is committed within a hundred, the inhabitants are liable to make good the damage if they do not produce the offender. See 12 East 244.

This system was probably introduced by Alfred (though mentioned in the Penitential of Egbert, where it seems to be the addition of a later age), being borrowed from the continent, where it was known to the Franks, under the name centena, in the sixth century. See Charlemagne Capit. l. 3, c. 10; 1 Poll. & Mail. 543.

It had a court attached to it, called the hundred court, or hundred lagh, like a court baron, except in its larger territorial jurisdiction. It was governed by the hundredary (hundredarius); 9 Co. 25. The jurisdiction of this court has devolved upon the county courts. Jacob, Law Dict.; Du Cange. Hundred-penny was a tax collected from the hundred by its lord or by the sheriff. Hundred-fetena signified the dwellers in the hundred; Charta Edg. Reg. Mon. Angl. to. 1, p. 16. In Delaware the subdivisions of a county are called hundreds. They correspond to towns in New England, townships in Pennsylvania, parishes in Louisiana, and the like.

HUNDRED COURT. An inferior court, long obsolete, and practically abolished by the County Courts Act of 1887, s. c. 28, whose jurisdiction extended to the whole territory embraced in a hundred. They were courts not of record; the freeholders were the judges; they were held before the steward of the manor as register; and they resembled courts baron in all respects except in their territorial jurisdiction; 3 Bla. Com. 84, 85.

HUNDRED-FECTA. The performance of suit and service at the hundred courts.

HUNDRED-FETENA. Dwellers or inhabitants of a hundred.

HUNDRED GEMOTE. An assembly among the Saxons of the freeholders of a hundred.

It met twelve times in the year, originally; though subsequently its meetings became less frequent.

It had an extensive jurisdiction, both civil and criminal, and was the predecessor of the county court and sheriff's court, and possessed very similar powers; Spelman, Gloss. Hundredum; 1 Reeve, Hist. Eng. Law 7.

HUNDRED LAGH (Sax.). Liability to attend the hundred court. Spelman, Gloss. See Cowell; Blount.

HUNDRED-PENNY. The hundred-fet, or tax collected by the sheriff or lord of a hundred.

HUNDRED ROLLS. In 1274 Edward I. sent out commissioners to enquire by what warrant the great landowners were exercising jura regalia (q. v.). The result of these enquiries is embodied in what are known as the Hundred Rolls. Byrne.

HUNDREDARIUS. The chief officer of a hundred. Cowell.

HUNDREDARY (hundredarius). The chief magistrate of a hundred. Du Cange.

HUNDREDES EARLDOR, or HUNDREDEDES MAN. The presiding officer in the hundred-court. Anc. Inst. Eng.

HUNDREDORS. The inhabitants of a hundred, who, by several statutes, are held to be liable, in the cases therein specified, to make good the loss sustained by persons within the hundred by robbery or other violence, therein also specified. The principal of these statutes are 18 Edw. I. st. 2, c. 1, s. 4; 28 Edw. III. c. 11; 27 Eliz. c. 13; 29 Car. II. c. 7; 8 Geo. II. c. 16; 22 Geo. II. c. 24.

Persons serving on juries, or fit to be empanelled thereon, dwelling within the hundred where the land in question lies. 35 Hen. VIII. c. 6. And some such were necessarily on every panel till the 4 & 5 Anne, c. 16. 4 Steph. Com. 870. One that had the jurisdiction of the hundred. The bailiff of the hundred. Horne, Mitt. of Just. lib. 1; Jacob, Law Dict.

HUNG. Sometimes applied to a jury which fails to agree upon a verdict. Anderson, L. Dict.

HUNGER. The desire to eat. Hunger is no excuse for larceny; 1 Hale, Pl. Cr. 54; 4 Bla. Com. 31. As to death from hunger, see DEATH.

HUNTING. The act of pursuing and taking wild animals; the chase.

The chase gives a kind of title by occupancy by which the hunter acquires a right or property in the game which he captures. In the United States the right of hunting is universal, and limited only so far as to exclude hunters from committing injuries to private property or to the public—as, by shooting on public roads—or from trespassing. See FERÆ NATURÆ; OCCUPANCY.

HURDEREFERST. A domestic; one of a family.

HURDLE. In English Law. A species of sledge, used to draw traitors to execution.

HURSELEGA. See HURST.

HURST, HYRST, HERST, or HIRST. A wood or grove of trees. Co. Litt. 4 b.

There are many places in Kent, Sussex, and Hampshire, which begin and end with this syllable; and the reason may be, because the great wood called Anderswold extended through those counties. Tomlin; Cowell. Hurst Castle is so called because situated near the woods. Hurselega is a woody place; and probably from thence is derived Hurley, a village in Berkshire. Id. See HIRST.

HUSBAND. A married man; a man who has a wife.

His obligations at common law. He was bound to receive his wife at his home, and to furnish her with all the necessities and conveniences which his fortune and his rank enabled him to do, and which her situation required; 9 C. & P. 643; 1 Hurl. & N. 641; 33 Minn. 348; but this did not include such luxuries as, according to her fancies, she deemed necessities; 78 Ia. 638. He was required to fulfil toward her his marital promise of fidelity, and could, therefore, have no carnal connection with any other woman without a violation of his obligations. See ADULTERY; CRIM. CON.; DIVORCE. As he was bound to govern his house properly, he was liable for its misgovernment, and he could be punished for keeping a disorderly house, even where his wife had the principal agency. See BAWDY HOUSE; DISORDERLY HOUSE; HOUSE OF ILL-FAME. He was liable for her torts; 11 Gray 437; 112 Mass. 287; 5 Car. & P. 484; 115 Mo. 1; 44 Ill. 42; 26 Ohio St. 9; Add. (Minn.) 912; 101 Mass. 344; and for her crimes, if committed in his presence, except treason and murder where they were jointly liable; 15 Ohio 72; 94 Ala. 31; 10 South 506; 74 Ia. 589; see 10 Mass. 154; 111 N. Y. 401; 45 La. Ann. 1221; but he may introduce evidence to rebut the presumption of coercion; 74 Ia. 589; and he should not be joined for trespass committed by her in the management of her separate estate; 135 N. Y. 201. He was liable for his wife's debts incurred before coverture; 1 P. Wms. 462, 469; 47 N. Y. 351; 41 Vt. 311; 19 Wis. 333; 13 Mass. 384; 38 Ga. 255; 13 Ind. 44; 10 B. Monr. 411; 89 Va. 786; provided they were recovered from him during their joint lives; id.; and this rule applies where the husband was an infant; 9 Wend. 238; 7 Metc. 164; 25 Vt. 220; and, generally, for such as were contracted by her after coverture, for necessities, or by his authority, express or implied, and for her funeral expenses; 12 C. B. 344; 1 H. Bla. 90; 98 Mass. 538; 41 Mich. 596. See DEAD BODY.

Hirights. Being the head of the family, the husband had the right to establish himself wherever he pleased, and in this he could not be controlled by his wife; 63 Pa. 450; 10 Rich. Eq. 103; 29 N. J. Eq. 96; 87 Ill. 250; 11 Fost. 11. See DOMICIL. He was entitled to all her earnings; 2 Man. & G. 173; 1 Salk. 114; 7 Pick. 65; 77 Ill. 155; 48 Ind. 18; 23 Me. 305; 94 U. S. 580; 51 Ind. 61; 2 J. D. 671; although it has been held that he may restrain her from committing a crime; 1

Grant, Cas. 389; or from interfering with the exercise of his parental control over his children; 42 Tex. 221. He also had the right to moderately chastise her; 1 Bla. Com. 445; 1 Phil. N. C. 453; but this is no longer recognized, and any chastisement inflicted on the wife renders him guilty of assault and battery; 108 Mass. 458; 1 Swab. & T. 601; 2 Paige 501; [1891] 1 Q. B. 671; 67 Me. 304; 8 N. H. 307; and excessive cruelty or frequent repetition of slight abuses is in many states a ground of divorce. See DIVORCE; CRUELTY.

As to the rights of husband and wife in property owned either jointly or separately, and as to their respective rights in suits both by and against either party, see MARRIED WOMAN. See also COMMUNITY; DESCENT AND DISTRIBUTION; TRUST.

HUSBAND LAND. In Old Scotch Law. A piece of land containing about six acres. Skene.

HUSBAND OF A SHIP. See SHIP'S HUSBAND.

HUSBAND AND WIFE. At Common Law. Husband and wife are regarded as one person, and the legal existence of the wife is suspended during marriage, or, in other words, is merged in that of the husband. 15 A. & E. Ency. 2nd ed., 790; 23 Cal. 563.

In Equity, however, this common-law principle has been much modified; and for many purposes the courts of equity recognize husband and wife as distinct persons. Id.

By Statute. Here, also, in all jurisdictions in modern times, the principle either has been greatly restricted in its application or has been removed altogether. Id.

HUSBANDMAN. See FARMER.

HUSBRECE. Housebreaking; burglary.

HUSCARLE. A menial servant. Domesd.

It signifies properly a stout man, or a domestic; also the domestical gatherers of the Danes' tributes were anciently called huscarles. Tomlin; Domesd.

HUSEL. See HOSTIA.

HUSFASTNE. He that holdeth house and land. Termes de la Ley; Cowell.

HUSGABLE. House rent or house tax. Toml.

HUSH MONEY. A colloquial expression to designate a bribe to hinder information; pay to secure silence. See BLACK-MAIL.

HUSTAN. See HOSTIA.

HUSTINGS. In English Law. The name of a court held before the lord mayor and aldermen of London: it was the principal and supreme court of that city. See Co. 2d Inst. 327; St. Armand, Hist. Essay on the Legis. Power of England 75.

The place of meeting to choose a member of parliament.

The term is used in Canadian as well as English law. Formerly the manner of conducting an election in Canada and England for a member of the legislative body was substantially as follows. Upon warrant from the proper officer, a writ issued from the clerk of the crown in chancery, directed to the sheriff, registrar, or other returning officer of the electoral division. He thereupon issued and posted in public places a proclamation appointing a day, place, and hour for his holding an election, and also fixing a day when a poll would be opened, if one were demanded and granted. The first day was called nomination day. On this day he proceeded to the hustings, which were in the open air and accessible to all the voters, proclaimed the purpose of the election, and called upon the electors present to name the person they required to represent them. The electors then made a show of hands, which might result in an election, or a poll might be demanded by a candidate or by any elector. On such demand, a poll was opened in each township, ward, or parish of the election district, at the places prescribed by statute. Now, however, by statute 35 & 36 Vict. c. 83, the votes are given by ballot in accordance with certain fixed rules.

It is also applied to a local court in Virginia. Va. Code, 1887, § 3072; 6 Gratt. 690.

HUTESIUM ET CLAMOR. Hue and cry (q. v.).

HYDROMETER. An instrument for measuring the density of fluids: being immersed in fluids, as in water, brine, beer, brandy, etc., it determines the proportion of their density, or their specific gravity, and thence their quality. See Act of Congr. Jan. 3, 1825, § 8 Story, Laws 1976.

HYPNOTISM. Artificial catalepsy; induced somnambulism; a method of artificially inducing sleep; artificial somnambulism.

The following summary of the physical manifestations accompanying hypnotism, is given in the International Cyclopædia:

"This is a term invented by the late Mr. Braid, of Manchester, to designate certain phenomena of the nervous system which in many respects resemble those which are induced by animal magnetism, but which clearly arise from the physical and psychical condition of the patient, and not from any emanation proceeding from others. The following are the directions of Mr. Braid, for inducing the phenomena, and especially the peculiar sleep-like condition of hypnotism. Take a patient, a female, or other bright object, and hold it between the fingers of the left hand, about a foot from the eyes of the person experimented on, in such a position above the forehead as to produce the greatest strain on the eyes compatible with a steady fixed stare at the object. The patient must be directed to rivet his mind on the object at which he is gazing. His pupils will first contract, but soon dilate considerably; and if they are well dilated, the first and second fingers of the operator's right hand, extended and a little separated, are carried from the object towards the eyes; the eyelids will most probably close with a vibratory motion. After 10 or 15 seconds have elapsed, it will be found that the patient retains his arms and legs in any position in which the operator places them. It will also be found that all the special senses, excepting sight, are at first extremely exalted, as also are the muscular sense, and the sensibility of heat and cold; but after a time the exaltation of function is followed by a state of depression far greater than the torpor of natural sleep. The patient is now thoroughly hypnotized. The rigidity of the muscles and the profound torpor of the nervous system may be increased by directing a current of air against the muscles which we wish to render limber, or the organ we wish to excite to action; and then by mere repose the senses will speedily regain their original condition. If a current of air directed against the face is not sufficient to arouse the patient, pressure and friction should be applied to the eyelids, and the arm or leg sharply struck with an open hand.

"From the careful analysis of a large number of experiments Mr. Braid is led to the conclusion that by a continual fixation of the mental and visual eye upon an object with absolute repose of the mind, a general quiescence, a feeling of stupor supervenes, which renders the patient liable to be readily affected in the manner already described. As the experiment succeeds with the blind, he considers that it is not so much the optic, as the sentient, motor, and sympathetic nerves, and the mind through which the impression is made. See Tuke's Sleep-walking and Hypnotism (1844).

"Many of the minor operations of surgery have been performed on patients in the hypnotized state without pain, and hypnotism has been successfully employed as a therapeutic agent in numerous forms of disease, especially such as have their seat in the nervous system. An interesting memoir On Hypnotic Therapeutics was published by Mr. Braid in the 17th volume of The Monthly Journal of Medical Science (1853)." Int. Cyc. sub v.

A committee of the British Medical Association made a report to the annual meeting in 1892, in the course of which they say:

"Test experiments which have been carried out by members of the committee have shown that this condition is attended by mental and physical phenomena, and that these differ widely in different cases.

"Among the mental phenomena are altered consciousness, temporary limitation of the will power, increased receptivity of suggestion from without, sometimes to the extent of producing passing delusions, illusions, and hallucinations, an exalted condition of the attention and post-hypnotic suggestions.

"Among the physical phenomena are vascular changes (such as flushings of the face and altered pulse rate), deepening of the respirations, increased frequency of deglutition, autonomic tremors, inability to control suggested movements, altered muscular sense, anaesthesia, modified power of muscular contraction, catalepsy, and rigidity, often intense. It must, however, be understood that all these mental and physical phenomena are rarely present in any one case. The committee takes this opportunity of pointing out that the term hypnotism is somewhat misleading, inasmuch as sleep, as ordinarily understood, is not necessarily present. The committee are of opinion that, as a therapeutic agent, hypnotism is frequently effective in relieving pain, procuring sleep, and alleviating many functional ailments. As to its permanent efficacy in the treatment of drunkenness, the evidence before the committee is encouraging, but not conclusive."

arguments, or the instructions," and "the only reference, either direct or remote, during the whole trial that was made to the question of hypnotism," was the remark of counsel for the defence to the jury that "we might almost say that Gray possessed a hypnotic power over McDonald." McDonald as principal and Gray as accessory, being charged with murder, upon a severance, the latter was tried first and convicted and afterwards the former was acquitted on the ground of self-defense; 3 Am. Lawy. 45; 13 Med. Leg. J. 51.

The case of Hayward, tried at Minneapolis for the murder of Katherine Gilling, and afterwards hanged, and the case at Eau Claire, Wisconsin, in which a young man named Pickens was charged with hypnotizing two young girls, have both been shown to have no connection with hypnotism; 18 Crim. L. Mag. 100. The facts of both cases may be found in 13 Med. Leg. J. 241.

In a California case of a woman on trial for murder, in whose behalf it was alleged that she was hypnotized by her husband, it was held that evidence that she was told by her husband to commit the act does not tend to show that she was hypnotized, and does not render admissible evidence of the effect of hypnotism on persons subject to its influence; 105 Cal. 160.

Notwithstanding the drift of opinion indicated above there are writers of authority on medico-legal subjects who think differently. In discussing the possibility of rape committed upon a person in the hypnotic state, a late work, after alluding to the lack of attention given to hypnotism in England and America, continues: "Like other theories and investigations received at first with ridicule, hypnotism has been placed on a sure scientific basis, thanks to the labor of Charcot and his successors. It has found a place in French, Austrian, and Hungarian law, and must, sooner or later, creep into the Anglo-Saxon. The great French experts in legal medicine, so far as we know, without an exception (Tardieu, Devergie, Brouardel, Vibert, Tourdes, Tourrette) recognize the possibility that the will may be entirely abolished under hypnotic influence." It is further asserted that the crime mentioned is not frequent, but that it undoubtedly exists in a small number of authentic cases. See 2 Witth. & Beck. Med. Jur. 452, where these cases are narrated, and the authorities given. It will be found that they are all open to the criticism and doubt which affect the question of rape on a sleeping woman, and which are inherent in the nature of the crime. HYPOBOLUM (Lat.). In Civil Law. The bequest or legacy given by the husband to his wife, above her dowry. Tech. Dict.

HYPOTHECATE. To pledge a thing without delivering the possession of it to the pledgee.

HYPOTHECATION. A right which a creditor has over a thing belonging to another, and which consists in a power to cause it to be sold, in order to be paid his claim out of the proceeds.

There are two species of hypothecation, one called pledge, pignus, and the other properly denominated hypothecation. Pledge is that species of hypothecation which is contracted by the delivery by the debtor to the creditor of the thing hypothecated. Hypothecation, properly so called, is that which is contracted without delivery of the thing hypothecated; 2 Bell, Com. 25.

In the common law, cases of hypothecation, in the strict sense of the civil law, that is of a pledge of a chattel without possession by the pledgee, are scarcely to be found; cases of bottomry bonds and claims for seamen's wages against ships are the nearest approach to it; but these are liens and privileges, rather than hypothecations; Story, Bailm. § 288. It seems that chattels not in existence, though they cannot be pledged, can be hypothecated, so that the lien will attach as soon as the chattel has been produced; 14 Pick. 497.

In Scotland hypothec is the landlord's right, independently of any stipulation, over the crop and stocking of his tenant, giving the landlord a security over the crop of each year for the rent of that year; Bell.

Conventional hypothecations are those which arise by agreement of the parties. Dig. 20. 1. 5.

General hypothecations are those by which the debtor hypothecates to his creditors all his estate which he has or may have.

Legal hypothecations are those which arise without any contract therefor between the parties, expressed or implied.

Special hypothecations are hypothecations of a particular estate.

Tacit hypothecations are such as the law gives in certain cases, without the consent of the parties, to secure the creditor. They are a species of legal hypothecation.

Thus, the public treasury has a lien over the property of public debtors; Code, 8. 15. 1. The landlord has a lien on the goods in the house leased, for the payment of his rent; Dig. 20. 2. 2; Code 8. 15. 7. The builder has a lien, for his bill, on the house he has built; Dig. 20. 1. The pupil has a lien on the property of the curator for the balance of his account; Dig. 46. 6. 22; Code, 5. 37. 20. There is hypothecation of the goods of a testator for the security of the legacy; Code 6. 48. 1.

HYPOTHEQUE. In French Law. Hypothecation; the right acquired by the creditor over the immovable property which has been assigned to him by his debtor as security for his debt, although he be not placed in possession of it.

It thus corresponds to the mortgage of real property in English law, and is a real charge, following the property into whose-soever hands it comes. It may be légal, as in the case of the charge which the state has over the lands of its accountants, or which a married woman has over those of her husband; judiciaire, when it is the result of a judgment of a court of justice; and conventionnelle, when it is the result of an agreement of the parties; Brown.

HYPOTHETICAL QUESTION. A question put to an expert witness containing a recital of facts assumed to have been proved or proof of which is offered in the case, and requiring the opinion of the witness thereon.

It must present fairly the state of facts which the counsel claims to have proved or which the testimony of the witnesses tends to prove; 40 N. Y. 42; 83 id. 838; 90 id. 640; 97 id. 501; 66 Ind. 94; 70 id. 15; 118 id. 42; 104 id. 409; 84 Minn. 430; 88 id. 511; 112 Mass. 470; 152 id. 599; 48 Vt. 835; 87 Ga. 69; 72 Ia. 84; 74 id. 352; 65 Miss. 204; 63 id. 233; 30 Fla. 41; 10 Or. 448; 82 Ill. App. 468; 43 Mo. 201; 81 W. Va. 659; 85 id. 682; 60 Md. 419; 75 Tex. 667; 42 Mich. 206; 88 id. 567; 63 Wis. 664; 76 Cal. 828; and such state of facts must be relevant to the issue; 97 N. Y. 501; 138 id.

428; 83 Vt. 398; 28 Ohio St. 547; 63 Conn. 393; 64 Fed. Rep. 689. The question must contain all the facts proved when it was put; 2 Misc. Rep. 335; 62 Mo. App. 593; and the witness will not be allowed to answer a question which excludes from his consideration testimony which is essential to the formation of an intelligent opinion concerning the matter; 80 Wis. 523; 55 Mo. App. 540; but the authorities as to this point are conflicting, as it has been held that a question should not be rejected because it does not include all the facts in the case; 135 Ind. 254; 63 Conn. 393; unless it thereby fails to present the case fairly; 63 Conn. 393. A question put to an expert witness calling for his opinion may refer him to the testimony in the case if he has heard it, instead of stating the facts which the answer tends to prove, but in such a case the witness must assume the testimony to be true; 43 Minn. 279; 12 Misc. Rep. 13; and it has been held that he may not base his opinion on the testimony but must confine himself to the hypothetical statement; 57 Hun 123, 586; 136 N. Y. 1. The witness may not assume for himself from the testimony the facts on which he bases his opinion without informing the jury what he supposes the facts to be; 15 N. Y. Supp. 176; he may, however, include as a basis of his opinion, facts known to be true as well as those stated in the question; 75 Tex. 501; 90 Wis. 405.

The truth of the facts assumed by the question is, in doubtful cases, a question for the jury, and if they find that the assumed facts are not proved, they should disregard the opinions based on such hypothetical questions, and the court will so instruct them; 64 Mich. 148; 69 id. 400; but the court is not required to submit the matter to the jury unless there is some substantial evidence tending to establish the hypothesis; 70 Ind. 15. If there is no testimony in the case tending to prove the facts assumed in the question, it is improper; the facts must be proved or proof of them must be offered; 60 Mich. 400; 64 id. 148; 52 Me. 304; 39 Iowa 615; 115 Pa. 500; 28 Ohio St. 547; 63 Wis. 664; 65 Miss. 204; 107 Ill. 865.

The length of the question is to be regulated, largely, by the discretion of the trial judge; 120 U. S. 73; it has been held an error to permit it to be so long and complicated as to confuse the witness or baffle his memory; 53 Mich. 531; 107 Ill. 365; but to obviate this difficulty the court may require the question to be reduced to writing; 88 Mich. 598. If unfair and misleading, hypothetical cases assumed in framing questions are to be considered in determining whether or not a fair trial has been had; 82 Ill. App. 463; but it cannot be expected that the interrogatory will include the proofs or theory of the adversary, since this would require a party to assume the truth of that which he generally denies; 96 Ind. 550. Hypothetical questions cannot be asked of an ordinary observer; 40 Pa. 199; 46 Mo. 224; 14 Gray 835; 53 Miss. 367; 117 Mass. 143; 27 Conn. 192. And, as to this, a professional man, in a matter of which he has not made special study is regarded as an ordinary observer; 64 Barb. 364.

IBIMUS. We will go.

ICE. Ice formed in a stream not navigable is part of the realty, and belongs to the owner of the bed of the stream, who has a right to prevent its removal; 33 Ind. 402; 34 Conn. 482; 80 Wis. 531; 101 Ill. 46; but see, contra, 41 Mich. 318, where it is said that the ephemeral character of ice renders it incapable of any permanent or beneficial use as part of the soil, and therefore a sale of ice already formed, as a distinct commodity, should be held a sale of personality whether in the water or out of the water. See, also, 32 Am. Rep. 160, note; 32 Am. L. Rep. 168. Riparian owners on navigable streams have no title to the ice which forms on such streams, as an incident to their ownership of the bank; and if a statute gives them title to the ice opposite their property, and prescribes a remedy for invasion of their rights therein, that remedy is exclusive; 11 Misc. Rep. 197. The right of taking ice either for use or sale from a pond which is a public water, is a public right which may be exercised by any citizen who can obtain access to the pond without trespassing on the lands of other persons, or unreasonably interfering with their rights; 7 Allen 159; 121 Mass. 539; 26 Kan. 682. A landowner cannot cut ice for sale from a pond situated on his land, where its removal works an actual injury to one having a pondage right therein; 62 Conn. 898; but the owner of land abutting on a millpond may take ice from the pond if it does not interfere with the use of the mill; 42 Neb. 288. Ice in an ice-house is a subject of larceny, but before being gathered it is not, being part of the pond or river; 8 Hill 895; 6 id. 144. See Bish. N. Cr. L. § 765, n. 2.

See, generally, as to ice and the property therein, 32 Am. L. Reg. n. s. 66; 27 id. 281, 240; 30 Cent. L. J. 6; 37 id. 357; 8 Alb. L. J. 886; 48 id. 504.

ICENI. The ancient name for the people of Suffolk, Norfolk, Cambridgeshire, Huntingdonshire.

ICONA. A figure or representation of a thing. Du Cange.

ICTUS. In Old English Law. A stroke or blow from a club or stone; a bruise, contusion, or swelling produced by a blow from a club or stone, as distinguished from "plaga" (a wound). Fleta, lib. 1, c. 41, 8.

ICTUS ORBIS (Lat.). In Medical Jurisprudence. A maim, a bruise, or swelling; any hurt without cutting the skin.

When the skin is cut, the injury is called a wound. Bracton, lib. 2, tr. 2, c. 5 and 24.

Ictus is often used by medical authors in the sense of percussus. It is applied to the pulsation of the arteries, to any external lesion of the body produced by violence; also, to the wound inflicted by a scorpion or venomous reptile. Orbis is used in the sense of circle, circuit, rotundity. It is applied, also, to the eyeballs: oculi dicuntur orbis. Castelli. Lex. Med.

ID EST (Lat.). That is. Commonly abbreviated i. e.

IDAHO. One of the states of the United States.

It was a part of the Louisiana purchase but was included in the portion affected by the joint occupation of the United States and Great Britain under the treaty of 1818 which was terminated in 1846. It was a part of the Oregon territory organized under act of August 14, 1846, and afterwards of the territory of Washington organized under act of March 2, 1883; it was organized as a separate territory under its present name by act of March 8, 1883. It then included Montana and part of Wyoming, which were afterward separately organized, and the present boundaries of Idaho were settled by act of July 25, 1884, setting apart Wyoming as a territory. Under a constitution adopted August 6, and ratified November 3, 1889, it was admitted as a state July 3, 1890; U. S. Rev. Stat. 1, Supp. 754.

IDEM (Lat.). The same. According to Lord Coke, "idem" has two significations, sc. idem syllabis seu verbis (the same in syllables or words), and idem re et sensu (the same in substance and in sense). 10 Coke 124 a.

Referring to a volume, the same series or set; also, the same book or page. Abbreviated, id. Anderson.

IDEM PER IDEM. The same for the same. An illustration of a kind that really adds no additional element to consideration of the question.

IDEM SONANS (Lat.). Having the same sound.

In indictments and pleadings, when a name which it is material to state is wrongly spelled, yet if it be idem sonans with that proved, it is sufficient. The following have been held to be idem sonans, Segrave for Seagrave; 2 Stra. 839; Whyneard for Winyard; Russ. & R. 412; Benedetto for Benedetto; 2 Taunt. 401; Keen for Keene; Thach. Cr. Cas. 67; Deadema for Diadema; 2 Ired. N. C. 340; Hutson for Hudson; 7 Mo. 142; Coonrad for Conrad; 8 Miss. 291; Gibney for Giboney; 81 Tex. 422; Allen for Allain; 144 Ill. 32; Emery for Emley; 1 Tex. Civ. App. 695; Johnston for Johnson; 50 Kan. 420; Busse for Bosse; 86 Tex. 380; Chambles for Chambless; 28 Ala. 53; Conly for Conolly; 2 Greene (Iowa) 88; Urey for Usury; 10 Ala. 370; Faust for Foust; 168 U. S. 452; Bubb for Bopp; 39 Pa. 429; Heckman for Hackman; 88 id. 120; Shaffer for Shafer; 29 Kan. 837; Woolley for Wolley; 21 Ark. 462; Penryn for Pennyryne; 14 Md. 121; Barbra for Barbara; 52 Kan. 85; Israel B. for Israel B.; 82 Tex. Cr. Rep. 637; Alwin for Alvin; 50 Ill. App. 202; Helmer for Hillmer; 84 Tex. Cr. Rep. 415; Juley for Julia; id. 1; Elliott for Ellett; 85 Tenn. 171; Chegwagwequay for Chegwagwoquay; 75 Mich. 289; Kealhier, Keolhier, Kelliher, Kellier, Keolhier, Kelhier, all sufficient for Kealhier; 81 Me. 531; Luckenbough for Luckenbach; 78 Ia. 101; Rooks for Rux; 83 Ala. 79. The rule seems to be that if names may be sounded alike without doing violence to the power of letters found in the various orthography, the variance is immaterial; 27 Tex. App. 80; 1 Whart. Cr. L. 309; 1 Bish. Cr. Proc. § 688; 28 Am. Rep. 435. Whether or not the names are idem sonantia was held a question for the jury, where the name was laid Darius C (pronounced in Dorset dialect D'rius) and it was in fact Trius; 2 Den. Cr. Cas. 231; 3 Russ. Cr. Sharsw. ed. 317. See 6 Ala. n. s. 679; 147 Mass. 414. In the following cases the variances there mentioned were declared to be fatal; McCann for McCann; Russ. & R. 351; Shakespeare for Shakepear; 10 East 83; Calver for Calvert and Day for Day; 2 Cr. & M. 189; Moores for Mohr; 55 Mo. App. 325; Mulette for Merlette; 100 Ala. 42; Siemson for Simonson; 21 S. W. Rep. (Mo.) 510; Bart for Bartholomew; 20 Ill. 508; Comyns for Cummins; 24 Ill. 602; Grautis for Gerardus; 4 Cow. 148; Henry for Harry; 21 Ill. 535; Jeffery for Jeffries; 1 Hempst. 299; Byerly for Byrly; Baldw. 83.

The same principle applies to words as well as names, and a verdict is not vitiated by misspelling if the words are idem sonans, as murder for murder, turn for term, too for two; but a verdict for damages was void when given for impunitive damages, or when a burglar was found guilty of bergetery, or where the defendant was found guilty instead of guilty, there being no such words as the last three in English; 2 Tex. App. 487; id. 504; 4 id. 527; 36 Tex. 152.

IDENTITATE NOMINIS (Lat.). In English Law. The name of a writ which lay for a person taken upon a capias or exigent, and committed to prison, for another man of the same name; this writ directs the sheriff to inquire whether he be the person against whom the action was brought, and if not, then to discharge him; Fitzh. N. B. 267. In practice, a party in this condition would be relieved by habeas corpus.

IDENTITY. Sameness. Identity of persons is a phrase applied especially to those cases in which the issue before the jury is, whether a man be the same person with one previously convicted or attainted. 4 Bla. Com. 396; 4 Steph. Com. 468.

In cases of larceny the question of the identity of property is for the jury and a verdict will be set aside where the court said in the charge that one of the stolen "bills was positively identified;" 17 Wis. 675. The question of identity of a prisoner as well as of property may arise. In a case of larceny of a hog the question of identity both of prisoner and hog was submitted to the jury; 1 Tex. App. 628; and evidence of a confession given by a fellow-prisoner of the accused (who had conversed with him through soil pipes in the gaol) that he recognized him by his voice was allowed to go to the jury on the question of identity; 76 Pa. 319. As to the modes of identifying different kinds of personal property, see Harris, Identification, Ch. XIII. And as to the different kinds of evidence resorted to for proving the identity of a prisoner, see id. Ch. IV. In cases of larceny, trover, and replevin, the things in question must be identified; 4 Bla. Com. 390. So, too, the identity of articles taken or injured must be proved in all indictments where taking property is the gist of the offence, and in actions of tort for damage to specific property. See 2 Crim. Law Mag. 287; 34 La. Ann. 1092. Many other cases occur in which identity must be proved in regard either to persons or things. One case in which such questions arise under chattel mortgages, in which this identification need be such only as would enable identification by a third person aided by inquiry, and not such as would enable a stranger to select it; Jones, Chat. Mortg. § 54; 24 Ia. 323; 74 Ind. 495; 66 Ala. 258; 7 Ohio St. 194; 13 Gray 517. The question is sometimes one of great practical difficulty, as in case of the death of strangers, reappearance after a long absence, and the like. See Ryan, Med. Jur. 301; 1 Beck, Med. Jur. 509; 1 Hall, Am. L. J. 70; 8 C. & P. 677; 1 Cr. & M. 780; 53 Ga. 496; 1 Hagg. Cons. 180; Shelf. Marr. & D. 226; Best, Pres. App. Case 4; 88 Ill. 498; Wills, Circ. Ev. 143; 4 Bla. Com. 390; 4 Steph. Com. 468; Harris, Identity.

Identity of the name of a grantor or grantee is prima facie evidence of identity of the person; 35 Neb. 587; and a conveyance by a grantee of the same name as the holder of the title is presumably sufficient; 78 Ia. 499; even where the names are not identical in spelling, as Savory and Savory; 80 Tex. 120; 15 Daly 479. These cases apply a general principle, that a presumption of identity of persons arises from identity of name, and the former is recognized as prima facie evidence of the latter in a great variety of cases; 108 U. S. 47; 87 Mo. 197, 642; 4 Q. B. 626; 9 Cow. 140; 18 N. Y. 86; 75 Cal. 240; 46 Mich. 320; 76 Me. 176; 29 Vt. 179; 83 Ala. 528; 76 Tex. 1; contra, 9 M. & W. 75; 1 Dana 155; 2 R. I. 319; 5 Ia. 486; 29 N. H. 420. But it has been held that it is a question for the jury to determine the identity of a grantor with the former grantee; 28 Cal. 221; or that a person pleading former conviction is the same party; 89 Me. 154; or that a person bearing the name of a deceased is one of his heirs; 6 Jones, L. 528. The identity of a family name and initials raises no presumption of identity; 27 Mich. 489. As between father and son of the same name it is presumed that the former is intended if there is no distinguishing mark; 10 Paige 170; Hob. 330; 90 Ill. 612; 1 Stark. 106; 9 N. H. 519.

As to the effect of variation in names with respect to records as notice, see 4 L. R. A. 122; 9 id. 471; 12 id. 58. And as to names in a record index, see 14 id. 393.

IDEO (Lat.). Therefore. Calv. Lex.

IDEO CONSIDERATUM EST. Therefore it is considered. See CONSIDERATUM EST PER CURIAM.

IDEOT. An old form for idiot (q. v.).

IDES (Lat.). In Civil Law. A day in the month from which the computation of days was made.

The divisions of months adopted among the Romans were as follows: The calends occurred on the first day of every month, and were distinguished by adding the name of the month; as, calendis Januarii, the first of January. The nonas occurred on the fifth of each month, with the exception of March, July, October, and May, in which months they occurred on the seventh. The ides occurred always on the ninth day after the nonas, thus dividing the month equally. In fact the ides would seem to have been the primal division, occurring in the middle of the month, nearly. Other days than the three designated were indicated by the number of days which would elapse before the next succeeding point of division. Thus, the second of April is the quarto nonas Aprilis; the second of March, the sextio nonas Martii; the eighth of March, octavus idus Martii; the eighth of April, sextus idus Aprilis; the sixteenth of March, decimus septimus calendis Aprilis.

This system is still used in some chanceries in Europe; and we therefore give the following Table of the Calends, Nones, and Ides.

	Jan., Aug., Dec., 31 days.	March, May, July, Oct., 31 days.	April, June, Sept., Nov., 30 days.	Feb. 28, biennially, 29 days.

31	Prid. Cal.	Prid. Cal.

<sup>1</sup> If February is bissextile, sextio Calendis (6 Cal.) is counted twice, viz., for the 24th and 25th of the month. Hence the word bissextile.

IDIOCHIRA (from Gr. idios, private, and chio, hand). In Civil Law. An instrument privately executed, as distinguished from one publicly executed. Vicat, Voo. Jur.

IDIOCY. In Medical Jurisprudence. Mental deficiency of varying grades down to extreme stupidity resulting from imperfect development or disease of the nervous centers either prenatal or occurring before the evolution of the mental faculties in childhood. Brush in Cyclopaedia of Diseases of Children. A condition of defective brain-development. See 3 Witth. & Beck. Med. Jur. 384 et seq.; 2 Ham. Leg. Med. 80 et seq.

It always implies some defect or disease of the brain, which is generally smaller than the standard size and irregular in its shape and proportions. Hydrocephalus is an occasional cause of idioey. The senses are very imperfect at best, and one or more are often entirely wanting. None can articulate more than a few words; while many utter only cries or muttered sounds. Some make known their wants by signs or sounds which are intelligible to those who have charge of them. The head, the features, the expression, the movements, all convey the idea of extreme mental deficiency. The reflective faculties are entirely wanting, whereby they are utterly incapable of any effort of reasoning. The perceptive faculties exist in a very limited degree, and hence they are rendered capable of being improved somewhat by education, and are deemed, in some measure, from their brutish condition. They have been led into habits of propriety and decency, have been taught some of the elements of learning, and have learned some of the coarser industrial occupations. The moral sentiments, such as self-esteem, love of approbation, veneration, benevolence, are not unfrequently manifested; while some propensities, such as cunning, destructive-ness, sexual impulse, are particularly active.

In some parts of Europe a form of idioey prevails epidemically, called cretinism. It is associated with disease or defective development of other organs besides the head. Cretins are short in stature, their limbs are attenuated, the belly tumid, and the neck thick. The muscular system is feeble, and their voluntary movements restrained and undecided. The power of language is very imperfect, if not entirely wanting. In the least degraded forms of this disease the perceptive powers may be somewhat developed, and the individual may evince some talent at music or construction. In Switzerland they make parts of watches. Cretinism like idioey is frequently congenital, and its causation is very obscure.

Both idioey and cretinism exhibit various degrees of mental deficiency, but they never approximate to any description of men supposed to be rational, nor can any amount of education efface the chasm which separates them from their better-endowed fellow-men. The oldest and truest writers, whose observations of mental manifestations were not very profound, thought it necessary to have some test of idioey; and accordingly, Fitzherbert says, if he have sufficient understanding to know and understand his letters, and to read by teaching or information, he is not an idiot. Natura Brevius 368. Again, he says, a man is not an idiot if he hath any glimmering of reason, so that he can tell his parents, his age, or the like common matters. The inference was, no doubt, that such a man is responsible for his criminal acts. At the present day, such an idea would not be entertained for a moment, nor are we aware of any case on record of an idiot suffering capital punishment. See INSANITY; DEMENTIA; IMBECILITY.

IDIOT. A person who has been without understanding from his nativity, and whom the law, therefore, presumes never likely to attain any. Shelf. Lun. 2; 3 Witth. & Beck. Med. Jur. 871.

It is an imbecility or sterility of mind, and not a perversion of the understanding; Chitty, Med. Jur. 827, note 2, 845; 1 Rus. Cr. 6; Bacon, Abr. Idiot (A); Brooke, Abr.; Co. Litt. 246, 247; 3 Mod. 44; 1 Vern. 16; 4 Co. 126; 1 Bla. Com. 302; Tayl. Med. Jur. 688. When a man cannot count or number twenty, nor tell his father's or mother's name, nor how old he is, having been frequently told of it, it is a fair presumption that he is devoid of understanding; Fitzh. N. B. 238. See 1 Dow, P. Cas. N. S. 392; 8 Bilgh, N. S. 1. Persons born deaf, dumb, and blind were presumed to be idiots; for, the senses being the only inlets of knowledge, and these, the most important of them, being closed, all ideas and associations belonging to them are totally excluded from their minds; Co. Litt. 42; Shelf. Lun. 3. See 118 Mo. 127. But this is a mere presumption, which, like most others, may be rebutted; and doubtless a person born deaf, dumb, and blind, who could be taught to read and write, would not be considered an idiot. A remarkable instance of such a one may be found in the person of Laura Bridgman, who was taught how to converse, and even to write. See Locke, Hum. Und. b. 2, c. 11, §§ 12, 13; Ayliffe, Pand. 234; 4 Comyns, Dig. 610; 8 id. 644. See DEAF AND DUMB; DEAF, DUMB AND BLIND; IDIOCY.

Idiots are incapable of committing crimes, or entering into contracts. They cannot, of course, make a will; but they may acquire property by descent.

IDIOTA. In the Civil Law. An unlearned, illiterate, or simple person. Calv. Lex. A private man; one not in office.

In Common Law. An idiot or fool. Idiota a natiuitate, an idiot from birth, or natural fool. Burrill; 1 Bl. Com. 303. Purus idiota, an absolute fool. Id.

IDIOTA INQUIRENDUM, WRIT DE. This is the name of an old writ which directs the sheriff to enquire whether a man be an idiot or not. The inquisition is to be made by a jury of twelve men. Fitzh. N. B. 232.

IDONEUM SE FACERE. IDONEARE SE. To purge one's self by oath of a crime of which one is accused.

IDONEUS (Lat.). Sufficient; fit; adequate. He is said to be idoneus homo who hath these three things, honesty, knowledge, and civility; and if an officer, etc., be not idoneus, he may be discharged; 8 Co. 41. If a clerk presented to a living is not persona idonea, which includes ability in learning, honesty of conversation, etc., the bishop may refuse him. And to a quare impedit brought thereon, "in literatura minus sufficiens is a good plea, without setting forth the particular kind of learning;" 5 Co. 58; 6 id. 49 b; Co. 2d Inst. 631; 8 Lev. 311; 1 Show. 88; Wood, Inst. 32.

So of things: idonea quantitas; Calvinus, Lex.; idonea paries, a wall sufficient or able to bear the weight.

In Civil Law. Rich; solvent; e. g. idoneus tutor, idoneus debitor. Calvinus, Lex.

IFUNGIA. The finest white bread, formerly called "cocked bread." Blount.

IGLISE (L. Fr.). A church. Kelham. Another form of "eglise."

IGNIS JUDICIUM (Lat.). In Old English Law. The judicial trial by fire.

IGNITEGIUM. The curfew (q. v.). Cowel. (ignis, Lat., fire, and tego, to cover.) See ORA AURORAE.

IGNOMINY. Public disgrace; infamy; reproach; dishonor. Ignominy is the opposite of esteem. Wolf § 145. See 38 Ia. 220.

IGNORAMUS (Lat.) we are ignorant or uninformed. In Practice. The word which is written on a bill by a grand jury when they find that there is not sufficient evidence to authorize their finding it a true bill. They are said to ignore the bill, which is also said to be thrown out. The proceedings being now in English, the grand jury indorse on the bill, Not found, No bill, or, No true bill. 4 Bla. Com. 805.

IGNORANCE. The lack of knowledge. Ignorance is distinguishable from error. Ignorance is want of knowledge; error is the nonconformity or opposition of ideas to the truth. Considered as a motive of action, ignorance differs but little from error. They are generally found together, and what is said of one is said of both.

Essential ignorance is ignorance in relation to some essential circumstance so intimately connected with the matter in question, and which so influences the parties that it induces them to act in the business; Pothier, Vente, nn. 3, 4; 2 Kent 367.

Non-essential or accidental ignorance is that which has not of itself any necessary connection with the business in question, and which is not the true consideration for entering into the contract.

Ignorance of fact is the want of knowledge as to the fact in question; as if a man marry a married woman, supposing her unmarried; 11 Allen 23.

It is not yet fully settled, at least in this country, whether a person who does a criminal act, supposing it to be lawful through ignorance of fact, can properly be convicted; 13 Am. L. Rev. 469. Such a conviction was held proper; 11 Allen 23 (where a man was convicted of adultery, in innocently marrying a woman whose husband was living); 114 Mass. 566; 103 id. 444; 98 id. 6; 124 id. 324; 69 Ill. 601; 24 Wis. 60; 56 Mo. 546; contra, 53 Ga. 229; 24 Ind. 113; 30 Ohio St. 382. See 62 Ala. 141; 46 Ind. 459. The doctrine was adhered to in a late Massachusetts case, where a belief that the husband was dead was held no defence in a prosecution for bigamy; 188 Mass. 458. The opposite conclusion was reached in England by nine out of fourteen judges; 23 Q. B. D. 168. The Massachusetts court took issue directly with the English case. Mr. Bishop severely criticises the Massachusetts doctrine and, reviewing the authorities, strongly approved the English rule; 1 Bish. N. Cr. L. § 803 a, note. Nevertheless, it is generally well established that ignorance of facts is a defence, where a knowledge of certain facts is essential to an offence, but no defence where a statute makes an act indictable, irrespective of guilty knowledge. Thus there can be no conviction of murder, larceny, or burglary, without proof of the intention, mens rea, to commit these crimes; but where selling liquor to minors is by statute indictable, the mistaken belief that the vendee is of full age, is no defence; 98 Mass. 6; 158 id. 496; see 19 Alb. L. J. 64; 1 Whar. Cr. L. § 88; 2 id. § 1704; 23 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 427; 37 W. Va. 1; 127 Pa. 330; but see 116 Ind. 495; 71 Mich. 548. Nor is it any defence that the party selling intoxicating liquor did not know that it was intoxicating; 63 Kan. 69; 148 Mass. 428; 66 Miss. 502.

Ignorance of a fact extrinsic and not essential to a contract, but which, if known, might have influenced the actions of a party to the contract, is not such a mistake as will authorize equitable relief; 182 U. S. 818. Nor is ignorance of facts a sufficient ground for equitable relief, if it appear that the requisite knowledge might have been obtained by reasonable diligence; 99 U. S. 85, 47.

See Brett, L. Cas. Mod. Eq. 84; MISTAKE. Ignorance of the laws of a foreign government, or of another state, is ignorance of fact; 9 Pick. 112, where there will be found a discussion of the difference between ignorance of law and ignorance of fact. See also Clef des Lois Rom. Fait.

Ignorance of law consists of the want of knowledge of those laws which it is our duty to understand, and which every man is presumed to know.

The principle that ignorance of the law is no defence, ignorantia legis neminem excusat, is generally recognized. It was a maxim of the Roman law, in which this case was put, to illustrate the distinction between ignorance of law and fact:—If the heir is ignorant of the death of his ancestor, he is ignorant of a fact; but if, being aware of his death, and of his own relationship, he is, nevertheless, ignorant that certain rights have thereby become vested in himself, he is ignorant of the law; D. 22. 6. 1. See 1 Spence, Eq. Jur. 632. The English rule is that every man is presumed to know the law, subject to certain qualifications with respect to questions of doubtful construction, practice, and the like; Broom, Leg. Max. 8th Am. ed. 254; 6 Cl. & Fin. 911; 11 Exch. 840. In a later case it was held that the court will only relieve against a payment of money under mistake of law, if there be some equitable ground which renders it inequitable that the party who received the money should retain it; 8 Ch. D. 351. This case is said by Brett to "contain probably the best statement . . . of the principles upon which the courts proceed in relieving or declining to relieve on the ground of mistake of law;" L. Cas. Mod. Eq. 80. The case itself proceeded upon the ground that an erroneous construction of an instrument was a mistake of law, and it was so held in several cases; 4 Ch. D. 389; id. 693; L. R. 14 Eq. 85; 6 H. L. Cas. 798, 811; but for a dictum, contra, see L. R. 6 H. L. 223, 234; and see also 42 Ch. D. 98; [1898] 1 Ch. 101, 111. The same general rule is recognized by American courts, though earlier cases indicate hesitation on the part of the courts before it was definitely settled. It was said in an early case that whether money paid through ignorance of the law can be recovered back, is a question much vexed and involved in no inconsiderable perplexity; 9 Pick. 112; and that when one makes a promise as an "expression of an opinion of what he should be obliged to allow, rather than of what he was willing to allow, and being under a mistake of his right, he is not bound by it;" 1 Binn. 27, 37. But it may be considered as well established that money paid with full knowledge of all the facts and circumstances cannot be recovered back upon the ground that the party supposed he was bound in law to pay it, when in truth he was not; 9 Cow. 674, 681; 74 Pa. 371; 90 Ind. 244; 50 Ga. 304 (practically overruling 7 id. 64 and 31 id. 117); 35 N. J. L. 290; 46 Ark. 187; 15 Minn. 35; 46 Mo. 200; 16 Cal. 143; 1 Or. 292; contra, 2 Metcalf (Ky.); and a person cannot be permitted to disavow or avoid the operation of an agreement entered into with a full knowledge of the facts, on the ground of ignorance of the legal consequences which flow from those facts; 1 Johns. Ch. 512, 516. See 1 Atk. 581; 1 V. & B. 23, 30; 1 Ch. Cas. 84; 2 Vern. 243; 18 S. E. Rep. (Va.) 285; 77 Ga. 340. Ignorance of one's legal right does not take a case out of the rule of equitable estoppel where one encourages a purchaser to take land from one having a color of title when otherwise he would be entitled to interpose an equitable bar to the latter's legal title; 6 id. 166.

It has been said that whatever rule may prevail elsewhere, in the equity courts of the United States, there is no relief from a mistake of law alone; 80 Fed. Rep. 466; 1 Pet. 15; 12 id. 55; 91 U. S. 50, 51; 97 id. 186; 99 id. 40. But there is to be found by careful reading of the Federal cases the same disposition apparent in English cases, to avoid the establishment of an inflexible rule which shall preclude relief if there be any other circumstances or any feature of the case itself to warrant it. In the familiar case of Hunt v. Rousmanier, 2 Mas. 244, 8 Wheat. 174, 1 Pet. 1, the United States supreme court said, where an instrument is executed by the parties, which contains a mistake of the draughtsman either of fact or law it may be reformed not when it was executed in the form agreed upon under a misapprehension of the law as to its nature or effect; that a mistake of law is not a ground for reformation a deed and the exceptions are both few and peculiar, but it was not the intention to lay down a rule that there might not be relief against a plain mistake arising from ignorance of law; and in a later case the court quoted this expression with approval and also the declaration from 1 Sto. Eq. Jur. Redf. ed. § 138 e, that established misapprehension of the law does afford a basis for relief resting on discretion and to be exercised only in flagrant and unquestionable cases; 98 U. S. 85, 91.

In some cases the laches of the other party affects the liability of one who promises under a mistake of law, as, when one, through a mistake of the law, as an endorser of a bill of exchange, acknowledges himself under an obligation which the law will not impose on him, as payment after failure of the holder to give reasonable notice of protest for non-acceptance, he shall not be bound thereby; 7 Mass. 452, 463. See also 12 East 88; 3 J. & W. 269; 3 B. & C. 280; the operation of the rule is adjusted to the equitable conditions existing as between the parties. "If a man has actually paid what the law would not have compelled him to pay, but what in equity and conscience he ought, he cannot recover it back; [1 Wend. 355; 18 Cal. 265; 17 N. H. 573; 50 Me. 130]; but where money is paid under a mistake, which there was no ground to claim in conscience, the party may recover it back;" 1 Term 285; 15 Am. Rep. 171, 184.

The subject may be well summed up by the collation of two or three cases which show the substantial uniformity of the application of the doctrine. "The maxim ignorantia legis neminem excusat is not universally applicable, but only when damages have been inflicted or crimes committed. It is true that the law will not permit the excuse of ignorance of the law to be pleaded for the purpose of exempting persons from damages for breach of contract, or from punishment for crimes committed by them, but on other occasions and for other purposes, it is evident that the fact that such ignorance existed will sometimes be recognized so as to affect a judicial decision;" 44 N. J. L. 244; and "there is no maxim which says that for all intents and purposes a person must be taken to know the legal consequences of his acts;" Lush, J., in L. R. 3 Q. B. 639; "it would be too much to impute knowledge of this rule of equity" (the doctrine of election); Westbury, Ld. Ch., in 11 H. L. Cas. 602.

Ignorance was held no defence in the case of a woman convicted of illegal voting, who set up a defence that she believed she had a legal right to vote; 11 Blatch. 200, 374; 57 Barb. 625; so in an indictment for adultery, where defendant erroneously believed she had been legally divorced; 65 Me. 30; so in the conviction of a man for polygamy, who, knowing that his wife was living, married again in Utah, and set up the Mormon doctrine as a defence; 98 U. S. 145. It was held not a defence that the defendant believed that, by reason of the absence of the first wife, the marriage was void and that he was released from it, as that was a mistake of law; 82 Tex. Cr. Rep. 214. A Jew may be indicted under a state law for working on Sunday; 122 Mass. 40; so where one shoots another through criminal negligence, his ignorance of the law can form no basis for acquittal; 36 Pac. Rep. (Cal.) 13.

An elector's ignorance of a law disqualifying a candidate at an election does not make his vote a nullity; he must have knowledge both of the law and the fact which constitutes the disqualification; 60 N. Y. 443; L. R. 3 Q. B. 639.

Involuntary ignorance is that which does not proceed from choice, and which cannot be overcome by the use of any means of knowledge known to a person and within his power; as, the ignorance of a law which has not yet been promulgated.

Voluntary ignorance exists when a party might, by taking reasonable pains, have acquired the necessary knowledge. For example, every man might acquire a knowledge of the laws which have been promulgated; Doctor & Stud. 1, 46; Plowd. 848.

IGNORANTIA (Lat.) Ignorance; want of knowledge. See IGNORANCE.

IGNORANTIO ELENCHI. An overlooking of the adversary's counter position in an argument.

IGNORE. To be ignorant of. Webster, Dict. To pass over as if not in existence. A grand jury is said to ignore a bill when they do not find the evidence such as to induce them to make a presentment. Brande.

IKBAL. Acceptance (of a bond, etc.). Wilson's Gloss. Ind.

IKBAL DAWA. Confession of judgment. Wilson's Gloss. Ind.

IKRAH. Compulsion; especially constraint exercised by one person over another to do an illegal act, or to act contrary to his inclination. Wilson's Gloss. Ind.

IKRAR. Agreement, assent, or ratification. Wilson's Gloss. Ind.

IKRAR NAMA. A deed of assent and acknowledgment. Wilson's Gloss. Ind.

ILL. In Old Pleading. Bad; defective in law; null; naught; the opposite of good or valid.

Contracted from "evil": as in ill-fame. Also, contrary to rule or practice: as in ill-pleading; ill for want of certainty. Anderson.

ILL-FAME. A technical expression, which not only means bad character as generally understood, but applies to every person, whatever may be his conduct and character in life, who visits bawdy-houses, gaming-houses, and other places which are of ill-fame. 2 Hill, N. Y. 559; 17 Pick. 80; 1 Hagg. Eccl. 720, 767; 1 Hagg. Cons. 302; 2 Greenl. Ev. § 44.

The common interpretation of the term "house of ill-fame" is as a mere synonym for "bawdy-house," having no reference to the fame of the place. Yet, in evidence, some courts allow proof of the fact to be aided by the fame; 1 Bish. Cr. L. § 1088. See DISORDERLY HOUSE; HOUSE OF ILL-FAME.

ILLATA ET INVECTA. Things brought into the house for use by the tenants were so called, and were liable to the jus hypothecæ of Roman law, just as they are to the landlord's right of distress at common law.

ILLEGAL. Contrary to law; unlawful. Cf. ERRONEOUS.

ILLEGAL CONDITIONS. All conditions that are impossible, or contrary to law, immoral, or repugnant to the nature of the transaction. See CONDITION.

ILLEGAL CONSIDERATION. See CONSIDERATION.

ILLEGAL CONTRACT. See CONSIDERATION; CONTRACT; UNLAWFUL AGREEMENT; VOID; VOIDABLE.

ILLEGAL COVENANTS. See COVENANT.

ILLEGAL PRACTICES. In English Law. Certain acts so termed in, and prohibited by, the Corrupt and Illegal Practices Prevention Acts, 1883 and 1895. Both of those acts were passed in order to put an end to such practices (and also to corrupt practices, q. v.) at parliamentary elections.

The Municipal Elections (Corrupt and Illegal Practices) Act, 1884, was passed in order to purify municipal elections in like manner: It has been extended to county council elections by the Local Government Act, 1888, and to parish and district council, and other local government elections by the Local Government Act, 1894, and by various orders made under statutory powers.

Illegal practices are: Payments for conveyance of voters to the poll, or for exhibition of addresses, bills or notices, or for excessive number of committee rooms; publishing false statement of withdrawal of candidate; publishing a bill, etc., without name and address of the printer; payment made by election agent after the authorized time or otherwise improperly made; election expenses in excess of maximum permitted, or election expenses paid otherwise than through the election agent; voting by prohibited persons; failing to make return of election expenses; false statements as to the personal character of a candidate. Byrne. See CORRUPT PRACTICES.

ILLEGAL TRADE. That which is carried on in violation of law, municipal or international. See ILLCIT.

A term sometimes used in reference to domestic buying and selling, irrespective of any obligations arising from the existence of war. But they are used in the decisions upon the laws of war in a special sense, signifying buying and selling which a subject of a government engaged in a war carries on with the enemy or enemy subjects, in violation of his allegiance. This is to be distinguished from traffic which a subject of a neutral nation carries on in violation of the obligations of neutrality only. Abbott. See ILLCIT.

ILLEGALITY. That which is contrary to the principles of law, as contradistinguished from mere rules of procedure. It denotes a complete defect in the proceedings. 2 Tex. App. 74; 1 Abb. Pr. N. S. 432; 2 Halst. 203.

ILLEGITIMACY. The status of a child born of parents not legally married at the time of birth. Moz. & W.

ILLEGITIMATE. That which is contrary to law; it is usually applied to children born out of lawful wedlock. 25 Alb. L. J. 131. See BASTARD.

ILLEVIABLE. A debt or duty that cannot or ought not to be levied. Nihil set upon a debt is a mark for illeviable.

ILLICENCIATUS. In Old English Law. Without license. Fleta, lib. 8, c. 5. 12.

ILLCIT. What is unlawful; what is forbidden by the law.

This word is frequently used in policies of insurance, where the assured warrants against illicit trade. By illicit trade is understood that "which is made unlawful by the laws of the country to which the object is bound." It is distinguished from "contraband trade," though sometimes used interchangeably with it. 1 Pars. Mar. Ins. 614. The assured, having entered into this warranty, is required to do no act which will expose the vessel to be legally condemned; 2 La. 337, 338. See INSURANCE; WARRANTY.

ILLCITE. Unlawfully.

This word has a technical meaning, and is requisite in an indictment where the act charged is unlawful: as, in the case of a riot; 2 Hawk. Pl. Cr. 25, § 98.

ILLCITUM COLLEGIUM. An unlawful corporation.

An illegal college, (society or assembly). Tayler's L. Gloss.

ILLINOIS. One of the states of the United States, being the twenty-eighth admitted to the Union.

Civil government was organized under the jurisdiction of the United States, by the ordinance of the Continental Congress, in 1787, the present state being then a part of the northwestern territory. In 1800 that territory was divided, and a territorial government was created in the Indiana territory, including this present state. In 1809 the territory of Illinois was created, and continued under the same ordinance and the laws of the Indiana territory. For a fuller statement of the territorial history, see CINO.

In 1818 Illinois formed a constitution and was admitted into the Union.

ILLITERATE. Unacquainted with letters.

When an ignorant man, unable to read, signs a deed or agreement, or makes his mark instead of a signature, and he alleges and can prove that it was falsely read to him, he is not bound by it, in consequence of the fraud. And the same effect would result if the deed or agreement were falsely read to a blind man who could have read it before he lost his sight, or to a foreigner who did not understand the language. For a plea of "laymen and unlettered," see 4 Rawle 85, 94, 95.

To induce an illiterate man, by false representations and false reading, to sign a note for a greater amount than that agreed on, is indictable as a cheat; 1 Yerg. 76. See, generally, 2 Nel. Abr. 946; 2 Co. 3; 11 id. 28; F. Moore 149; 2 Bish. Cr. L. § 156.

ILLNESS. Pregnancy may create an illness within the meaning of 11 & 12 Vict. c. 43, § 17, so as to give the presiding judge discretionary power to admit in evidence upon a criminal trial the deposition of a witness, duly taken, who, owing to pregnancy is proved to be unable to travel; 3 Q. B. D. 436.

Illness is a word which may include, properly, an attack of a less grave and serious character than disease; an illness may be slight or severe; in either case it is an illness. 112 U. S. 259, quoting the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York.

In an insurance policy, held that "illness" meant a disease or ailment of such a character as to affect the general soundness and healthfulness of the system seriously, and not a mere temporary indisposition, which does not tend to undermine and weaken the constitution of the insured. 15 A. & E. Eucy. 2nd ed., 1018; 20 Fed. Rep. 596.

Paralysis of speech has been held to constitute an illness. Id.; 26 L. J. M. C. 136. But mere nervousness is not an illness. Id.; 38 J. P. 390. See DISEASE; AFFECTION.

ILLOABLE. Not capable of being let out or hired.

ILLUD (Lat.) That.

ILLUMINATING GAS. See GAS.

ILLUSION. A term loosely applied to both delusions and hallucinations, but more frequently to the latter (q. v.). By some it is restricted to the perception of objects in characters which they do not possess.

The patient is deceived by the false appearance of things, and his reason is not sufficiently powerful to correct the error; and this last particular is what distinguishes the same from the insane. Illusions are not unfrequent in a state of health, but reason corrects the errors and dissipates them. A square tower seen from a distance may appear round, but on approaching it the error is corrected. A distant mountain may be taken for a cloud, but as we approach we discover the truth. To a person in the cabin of a vessel under sail, the shore appears to move; but reflection and a closer examination soon destroy this illusion. An insane individual is mistaken in the qualities, connections, and causes of the impressions he actually receives, and he forms wrong judgments as to his internal and external sensations; and his reason does not correct the error; 1 Beck, Med. Jur. 539; Tayl. Med. Jur. 633; Esquirol, Mémoires Médicales, prem. partie, III, tome 1, p. 22; Dict. des Sciences Médicales, Hallucination, tome 20, p. 64. See HALLUCINATION.

ILLUSORY APPOINTMENT. Such an appointment or disposition of property under a power as is merely nominal and not substantial.

Illusory appointments are void in equity; Sugd. Pow. 489; 1 Vern. 67; 1 Term 433, note; 4 Ves. 793; 16 id. 20; 1 Taunt 289. The rule at common law was, to require some allotment, however small, to each person, where the power was given to appoint to and among several persons; but the rule in equity requires a real substantial portion to each, a mere nominal allotment being deemed fraudulent and illusive; 4 Kent 343; 5 Fla. 53; 2 Stockt. Ch. 164.

In England equity jurisdiction on this point was ended by the statute 1 Wm. IV. c. 46, which declares that no appointment shall be impeached in equity on the ground that it was unsatisfactory, illusory, or nominal; but the entire exclusion of any object of a power not in terms exclusive was illegal, notwithstanding that act, until 1874. In that year the statute 37 and 38 Vict. c. 37 was passed, providing that, under a power to appoint among certain persons, appointments may be made excluding one or more objects of the power; Moa. & W. Dict.

IMAGINE. In English Law. In cases of treason the law makes it a crime to imagine the death of the king. In order to complete the offence, there must, however, be an overt act.—the terms compassing and imagining being synonymous. It has been justly remarked that the words to compass and imagine are too vague for a statute whose penalty affects the life of a subject. Barrington, Stat. 243. See FICTION.

IMBARGO. Obsolete for embargo (q. v.).

IMBASING OF MONEY. Mixing the species with an alloy below the standard of sterling, which the king by his prerogative may do. Tonil.

IMBECILITY. In Medical Jurisprudence. A form of mental disease consisting in mental deficiency, either congenital or resulting from an obstacle to the development of the faculties supervening in infancy. Idiocy.

Generally, it is manifested both in the intellectual and moral faculties; but occasionally it is limited to the latter, the former being but little, if at all, below the ordinary standard. Hence it is distinguished into intellectual and moral. In the former there are seldom any of the repulsive features of idiocy, the head, face, limbs, and movements, being scarcely distinguishable at first sight, from those of the race at large. The senses are not manifestly deficient, nor the power of articulation; though the use of language may be very limited. The perceptive faculties exhibit some activity; and thus the more obvious qualities of things are observed and remembered. Simple industrial operations are well performed, and, generally, whatever requires but little intelligence is readily accomplished. Occasionally a solitary faculty is prominently, even wonderfully, developed,—the person excelling, for instance, in music, in arithmetical calculations, or mechanical skill, far beyond the ordinary measure. For any process of reasoning, or any general observation or abstract ideas, imbeciles are totally incompetent. Of law, justice, morality, property, they have but a very imperfect notion. Some of the affective faculties are usually active, particularly those which lead to evil habits, thieving, incendiarism, drunkenness, homicide, assaults on women.

The kind of mental defect here mentioned is universal in imbecility, but it exists in different degrees in different individuals, some being hardly distinguishable, at first sight, from ordinary men of feeble endowments, while others encroach upon the line which separates them from idiocy; Tayl. Jur. 666.

The various grades of imbecility, however interesting in a philosophical point of view, are not very closely considered by courts. They are governed in criminal cases solely by their tests of responsibility, and in civil cases by the amount of capacity in connection with the act in question, or the abstract question of soundness or unsoundness.

Touching the question of responsibility, the law makes no distinction between imbecility and insanity. See I C. & K. 129.

In civil cases, the effect of imbecility is differently estimated. In cases involving the validity of the contracts of imbecile persons, courts have declined to gauge the measure of their intellects, the only question with them being one of soundness or unsoundness, and "no distinction being made between important and common affairs, large or small property;" 4 Dane, Abr. 561. See 4 Cow. 207. Courts of equity, also, have declined to invalidate the contracts of imbeciles, except on the ground of fraud; 1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 288. Of late years, however, courts have been governed by other considerations. If the contract were for necessities, or showed no mark of fraud or unfair advantage, or if the other party, acting in good faith and ignorant of the other's mental infirmity, cannot be put in statu quo, the contract has been held to be valid; Chitty, Contr. 112; Story, Contr. § 27; Poll. Contr. 88; 4 Exch. 17.

The same principles have governed the courts in cases involving the validity of the marriage contract. If suitable to the condition and circumstances of the party, and manifestly tending to his benefit, it has been confirmed, notwithstanding a considerable degree of incompetency. If, on the other hand, it has been procured by improper influences, manifestly for the advantage of the other party, it has been invalidated; 1 Hagg. 355; Ray, Med. Jur. 100. The law has always showed more favor to the wills of imbeciles than to their contracts. "If a man be of a mean understanding, neither of the wise sort nor of the foolish, but indifferent, as it were, betwixt a wise man and a fool,—yea, though he rather inclined to the foolish sort, so that for his dull capacity he might worthily be called grossum caput, a dull pate, or a dunce,—such a one is not prohibited to make a testament;" Swinb. Wills, part 2, s. 4. Whether the testament be established or not, depends upon the circumstances of the case; and the English ecclesiastical courts have always assumed a great deal of liberty in their construction of these circumstances. The general principle is that if the will exhibits a wise and prudent disposition of property, and is unquestionably the will of the testator, and not another's, it should be established, in the face of no inconsiderable deficiency; 1 Hagg. 334. Very different views prevailed in a celebrated case in New York; Stewart v. Lisenard, 26 Wend. 256. The mental capacity must be equal to the act; and if that fact be established, and no unfair advantage have been taken of the mental deficiency, the will, the marriage, the contract, or whatever it may be, is held to be valid.

The term moral imbecility is applied to a class of persons who, without any considerable, or even appreciable, deficiency of intellect, seem to have never been endowed with the higher moral sentiments. They are unable to appreciate fully the distinctions of right and wrong, and, according to their several opportunities and tastes, they indulge in mischief as if by an instinct of their nature. To vice and crime they have an irresistible proclivity, though able to discourse on the beauties of virtue and the claims of moral obligation. While young, many of them manifest a cruel and quarrelsome disposition, which leads them to torture brutes and bully their companions. They set all law and admonition at defiance, and become a pest and a terror to the neighborhood. It is worthy of notice, because the fact throws much light on the nature of this condition, that a very large proportion of this class of persons labor under some organic defect. They are scrofulous, rickety, or epileptic, or, if not obviously suffering from these diseases themselves, they are born of parents who did. Their progenitors may have been insane, or eccentric, or highly nervous, and this morbid peculiarity has become, unquestionably, by hereditary transmission, the efficient cause of the moral defect under consideration. Thus lamentably constituted, wanting in one of the essential elements of moral responsibility, they are certainly not fit objects of punishment; for though they may recognize the distinctions of right and wrong in the abstract, yet they have been denied by nature those facilities which prompt men more happily endowed to pursue the one and avoid the other. In practice, however, they have been regarded with no favor by the courts; Ray, Med. Jur. 112. See INSANITY; DEMENTIA.

IMBLADARE. To plant or sow grain. Bract. fol. 178 b.

IMBRACERY. See EMBRACERY.

IMMATERIAL. Unnecessary or non-essential; impertinent (q. v.); indecisive.

IMMATERIAL AVERMENT. In Pleading. A statement of unnecessary particulars in connection with, and as descriptive of, what is material. Gould, Pl. c. 3, § 186. Such averments must, however, be proved as laid, it is said; Dougl. 665; though not if they may be struck out without striking out at the same time the cause of action, and when there is no variance; Gould, Pl. c. 3, § 188. See 1 Chitty, Pl. 282.

IMMATERIAL ISSUE. In Pleading. An issue taken upon some collateral matter, the decision of which will not settle the question in dispute between the parties in action. For example, if, in an action of debt on bond, conditioned for the payment of ten dollars and fifty cents at a certain day, the defendant pleads the payment of ten dollars according to the form of the condition, and the plaintiff, instead of demurring, tenders issue upon the payment, it is manifest that, whether this issue be found for the plaintiff or the defendant, it will remain equally uncertain whether the plaintiff is entitled to maintain his action, or not; for, in an action for the penalty of a bond, conditioned to pay a certain sum, the only material question is whether the exact sum were paid or not, and the question of payment of a part is a question quite beside the legal merits; Hob. 113; 5 Taunt. 386; Cro. Jac. 585; 2 Wms. Saund. 319 b. A repleader will be ordered when an immaterial issue is reached, either before or after verdict; 2 Wms. Saund. 319 b, note; 1 Rolle, Abr. 86; Cro. Jac. 585. See REPLEADER.

IMMEDIATE. As to time. Present; without delay or postponement. Strictly it implies not deferred by any lapse of time, but as usually employed, it is rather within reasonable time having due regard to the nature and circumstances of the case. This word and immediately (q. v.) are of no very definite signification and are much subject to the context. In legal proceedings they do not impart the exclusion of any interval of time; 31 N. J. L. 313. As to immediate delivery, see 36 N. J. L. 148. "Immediate" notice may be construed as meaning "reasonable notice;" 27 S. W. Rep (Mo.) 439. See 7 Cent. L. J. 15, 73.

As to place, etc. Not separated by any intervening space, cause, right, object, or relation. See 2 Lev. 77; 7 Mann. & G. 493; 23 Pa. 198; 43 Wis. 316, 479; IMMEDIATELY; FORTHWITH.

As to descent. Judge Story says it may be mediate or immediate with respect to the estate or right, or with respect to the pedigree or degrees of consanguinity; 6 Pet. 112.

Danger. By "immediate danger" the law means such as is then and there present and about to be inflicted. 11 Bush (Ky.) 688.

Notice. The term "immediate notice" in an insurance policy means that notice must be furnished within a reasonable time. 140 Ky. 610, 131 S. W. 523; 149 Ky. 735, 149 S. W. 1025.

IMMEDIATELY. The words "forthwith" and "immediately" have the same meaning. They are stronger than the expression "within a reasonable time," and imply prompt, vigorous action, without any delay, and whether there has been such action is a question of fact, having regard to the circumstances of the particular case; 4 Q. B. Div. 471. See 4 Yo. & Colly. Ch. 511; 8 M. & W. 281.

Within a reasonable time. Auderson; Never, or very rarely, employed to designate an exact portion of time. *Id.; 8 M. & W. * 286-9.* Imports "as soon as conveniently could be done." R. & L. Dict.; 4 Com. Dig. 671 n. (b). Not synonymous with "then and there." Id.; 1 Mo. App. 3, 6.

IMMEMORIAL POSSESSION. In Louisiana. Possession of which no man living has seen the beginning, and the existence of which he has learned from his elders. 2 Mart. La. 214; 7 La. 46; 3 Toul. p. 410; Potli. Contr. de Société, n. 244.

IMMEMORIAL USAGE. Prescription; custom which has existed so long that the memory of man runneth not to the contrary.

IMMEUBLES. In French Law. Immovables. They derive their character as such (1) from their own nature as lands, etc.; (2) from their destination, as animals or implements furnished to a tenant by his landlord; and (3) by the object to which they are annexed.

IMMIGRANTS. See ALIEN IMMIGRANTS.

IMMIGRATION. The removing into one place from another. It differs from emigration, which is the moving from one place into another.

By an act of congress, passed August 3, 1893, it was provided that there should be collected "a duty of fifty cents for each and every passenger, not a citizen of the United States, who shall come by steam or sail vessel from a foreign port to any port within the United States . . . The money thus collected shall be paid into the United States treasury, and shall constitute a fund to be called the immigrant fund, and shall be used, under the direction of the secretary of the treasury, to defray the expense of regulating immigration under this act and for the care of immigrants arriving in the United States." This has been termed the head-money tax. This act of congress is similar in its essential features to statutes enacted by many states of the Union for the protection of their own citizens, and for the good of the immigrants who land at seaports within their borders. A statute of New York, covering this ground was, however, held void as infringing upon the ground of national legislation; 92 U. S. 259, 273, and 107 id. 59. The question arose under the act of congress in the supreme court of the United States in what were called the head-money cases; 112 id. 580; and that act was held valid. See POLICE POWER.

The immigration of the Chinese has been and continues to be the subject of important legislation. The act of congress of March 3, 1875, Rev. Stat. §§ 2158-2164, prohibits any vessels being built or registered in the United States for the purpose of procuring from any port the subjects of China, Japan, or any other oriental country, known as "coolies," to be transported to any foreign place, to be disposed of or sold as servants or apprentices; § 2158. Vessels so employed shall be forfeited; § 2159. Building, fitting out, or otherwise preparing or navigating vessels for such trade, is punishable by fine and imprisonment; §§ 2160, 2161. But this act does not interfere with voluntary immigration; § 2162; and no tax shall be enforced by any state, upon any person immigrating thereto from a foreign country, which is not equally imposed upon every person immigrating thereto, from any other foreign country; § 2164. The immigration of convicts and women for purposes of prostitution is also prohibited; Supplement to Rev. Stat. p. 181, §§ 3 & 5; 18 Stat. L. 477; 53 Fed. Rep. 1001; also alien laborers; 23 Stat. L. 332; and also all Chinese laborers, whether under contract or not; 25 Stat. L. 476, 504.

The act which provides for the exclusion from admission of certain classes of aliens, and which makes the decision of the inspectors of immigration adverse to the right of any alien to land, final and conclusive unless appeal is taken to the superintendent of immigration, is a constitutional exercise of the power of congress; 142 U. S. 651.

The government of the United States, through the action of the legislative department, can exclude aliens from its territory, although no actual hostilities exist with the nation of which the aliens are subjects; 130 U. S. 581. See ALIEN; CHINESE; DEPORTATION.

IMMIGRATION LAWS. Laws passed by Congress to regulate immigration into the United States. E. g., Congress has provided that all idiots, insane persons, paupers, or persons likely to become a public charge, persons suffering from a loathsome or dangerous contagious disease, persons who have been convicted of a felony or other infamous crime or misdemeanor involving moral turpitude, polygamists, and persons assisted by others to immigrate shall be excluded from the United States. The statute further provides for the regulation of transportation companies, the appointment of inspectors and the retransportation of aliens entering in defiance of the act. The statute also makes several exceptions from its provisions. 15 A. & E. Ency. 2nd ed., 1026.

IMMISCERE (Lat.). In Civil Law. To put or let into, as a beam into a wall. Calv. Lex.

In Old English Law. To turn cattle out on a common. Fleta, lib. 4, c. 20, § 7.

To mix or mingle with; to meddle with; to join with. Burrill; Calv. Lex.

To take or enter upon an inheritance. A term applied to those heirs called haeredes sui, corresponding with adire, which was applied to haeredes extranei. Id.; Calv. Lex.

IMMOBILIS (Lat.). Immovable. Immobilia, or res immobiles, immovables (q. v.).

IMMORAL CONSIDERATION.

One contrary to good morals, and therefore invalid. Contracts based upon an immoral consideration are generally void; Poll. Con. 286. An agreement in consideration of future illicit cohabitation between the parties; 3 Burr. 1568; 1 Esp. 13; 1 B. & P. 340 & 341; an agreement for the value of libelous and immoral pictures; 4 Esp. 97, or for printing a libel, 2 Stark. 107, or for an immoral wager, Chitty, Contr. 156; cannot, therefore, be enforced. For whatever arises from an immoral or illegal consideration is void; quid turpi ex causa promissum est non valet; Inst. 3, 20, 24.

It is a general rule that whenever an agreement appears to be illegal, immoral, or against public policy, a court of justice leaves the parties where it finds them; when the agreement has been executed, the court will not rescind it; when executory, the court will not help the execution; 4 Ohio 419; 4 Johns. 419; 11 id. 388; 12 id. 308; 19 id. 341; 3 Cow. 213; 2 Wils. 841. See CONSIDERATION.

IMMORALITY. That which is contra bonos mores.

In England, it is not punishable, in some cases, at the common law, on account of the ecclesiastical jurisdictions: e. g. adultery. But except in cases belonging to the ecclesiastical courts, the court of king's bench is the custos morum, and may punish delicta contra bonos mores; 3 Burr. 1438; 1 W. Blackst. 94; 2 Stra. 788.

IMMOVABLES. In Civil Law. Property which, from its nature, destination, or the object to which it is applied, cannot move itself or be removed. Pothier, des Choses, § 1; Clef des Lois Rom. Immeubles.

IMMUNITY. An exemption from serving in an office, or performing duties which the law generally requires other citizens to perform. See Dig. lib. 50, t. 6; 1 Chitty, Cr. Law 821; 4 H. & M'H. 341.

IMPAIRING THE OBLIGATION OF CONTRACTS. By Article First, Section 10, Clause 1, of the Constitution of the United States "No state shall pass . . . any bill of attainder, ex post facto law, or law impairing the obligation of contracts."

There has been much discussion as to the reasons which led the Convention of 1787 to insert this clause in the constitution. They seem to have intended that it should prevent the states from passing stay laws and bankrupt laws (Bradley, J., 99 U. S. 745), and other acts which would interfere with private contracts or engagements previously formed. Stay laws to prevent the collection of debts had been passed in many of the states, especially in the South. In the Dartmouth College case, 4 Wheat. 518, Chief Justice Marshall said that he thought it more than possible that the convention had not intended by the clause to preserve the integrity of the charters of corporations. But in Pennsylvania the legislature had revoked the charter of the College of Philadelphia and virtually confiscated its property by taking it away from its trustees and giving it to another set of trustees who were of the political party which controlled the legislature. The same legislature had annulled the charter of the Bank of North America to which it was hostile, and would have succeeded in wrecking it, if the bank had not had another charter from congress, and soon after obtained one from the state of Delaware. These acts of spoliation alarmed all men of property, and James Wilson, a Pennsylvania member of the convention, who had been interested in both the bank and the college, was most active in procuring the adoption of the clause. Fisher's "Pennsylvania: Colony and Commonwealth" 375, 383; Fisher's "Evolution of the Constitution" 262; Shirley's "Dartmouth College Case" 213, 220; Alfred Russell's Address before Grafton and Coos Bar Association of New Hampshire, 1895 (reprinted Am. Law Rev. vol. 30, p. 321).

This article of the constitution forbids only the states to pass laws impairing the obligation of contracts, and there is no express provision prohibiting congress from passing such laws. It would seem, moreover, as some have argued, that there is an implied power in congress to pass such laws, for we find in the constitution a number of general prohibitions in which both congress and the states are prohibited from passing bills of attainder and ex post facto laws; 1 Pet. 22. The omission of the prohibition in one case and the expression of it in the other might seem to imply that the power to pass laws impairing the obligation of contracts remained in congress; and congress is expressly given power to pass bankrupt laws which impair the obligation of contracts between debtors and creditors; 4 Wheat. 122; and, under the decisions of the supreme court, congress may issue notes as legal tender in satisfaction of antecedently contracted debts. But the general exercise of such a power by congress has been said to be contrary to the first principles of the social compact and to every principle of sound legislation; Federalist No. 44. Bradley, J., in a dissenting opinion in the Sinking-Fund Cases, 99 U. S. 746, took the same view of the origin of this provision, and said further that it fully explained the fact that no such inhibition was laid upon the national legislature, and he was further of opinion that the absence of such inhibition furnished no ground of argument in favor of the proposition that congress can pass arbitrary and despotic laws with regard to contracts any more than with regard to any other subject-matter of legislation.

The provision of the constitution is, however, not applicable to laws enacted by the states before the first Wednesday in March, 1789; 5 Wheat. 420.

All contracts, whether executed or executory, express or implied, are within the prohibition; 6 Cranch 135; 7 id. 164; 8 Wheat. 1; 109 U. S. 285; 15 Wall. 300; 116 U. S. 134; and also judgments founded upon contracts; 103 U. S. 338; 105 id. 228, 733. A state law annulling private conveyances is also within the prohibition, as are laws repealing grants and corporate franchises; 3 Hill, N. Y. 531; 1 Pick. 224; 2 Yerg. 534; 13 Miss. 112; 9 C. R. 43, 292; 2 Pet. 657; 4 Wheat. 656; 6 How. 301.

A state constitution is not a contract, the obligation of which the state is prohibited by the federal constitution from impairing; 121 U. S. 282; nor is a judgment for a tort; 109 U. S. 285; 131 U. S. 405. But the prohibition applies to state constitutions as well as to the laws of a state; 10 Wall. 511; 115 U. S. 650; 116 id. 631; and to a decision of a state court altering a former construction of a law, subsequently to which construction the contract was made. The prohibition does not apply to judicial decisions or the acts of state tribunals or officers under statutes in force at the time of making the contract; 163 U. S. 273; citing 121 id. 358; 150 id. 18; 159 id. 103. "The sound and the true rule is that, if the contract, when made, was valid by the laws of the state, as then expounded by all the departments of its government and administered in its courts of justice, its validity and obligation cannot be impaired by any subsequent act of the legislature of the state, or decision of its courts, altering the construction of the law." Taney, C. J., in 16 How. 433; approved in Gelpcke v. Dubuque, 1 Wall. 175. See, also, id. 678; 101 U. S. 677; 105 id. 728.

The judgment of a state court declaring a contract invalid does not impair the obligation of the contract, unless such judgment gives effect to some provision of the state constitution, or some act which is claimed by the unsuccessful party to impair the obligation of the contract in question; 121 U. S. 388. In such cases, the supreme court of the United States does not accept as conclusive the judgment of the state court as to the non-impairment of the contract; 101 U. S. 791; 109 id. 244.

An act may regulate or limit existing remedies on a contract, provided it leaves a substantial remedy in force; for instance, by providing that service of process may be made on any officer or agent of a corporation; 95 U. S. 168; an act may abolish imprisonment for debt as a remedy for breach of contract; 103 U. S. 714; may invalidate technically defective mortgages; 108 U. S. 477; and conveyances by femes covert; 23 Wall. 137; grant new trials; 11 How. 202; repeal usury laws, though if not repealed they would have rendered a contract void; 108 U. S. 143; may reduce the period of limitation for bringing suits if it leaves a reasonable period for suits for breaches of existing contracts; 104 U. S. 860; require the recording of existing mortgages, if it allow a reasonable time before the act takes effect; 108 U. S. 514; may provide for the reorganization of an insolvent corporation, and that creditors who have notice and do not dissent, shall be bound thereby; 109 U. S. 401.

An act is invalid which, after a contract is made, changes the measure of damages to be recovered for a breach; 115 U. S. 568; also, which imposes as a condition precedent to enforcing a right that the plaintiff shall prove that he never aided the rebellion against the United States; 16 Wall. 284. So is an act which, after a judgment has been entered, materially increases the debtor's exemption; 15 Wall. 610; and an act which, after the execution of a mortgage, increases the period of redemption after foreclosure; 24 How. 481; and an act which forbids a sale on the foreclosure of a mortgage at which less than two-thirds of the appraised value of the mortgage premises is realized; 1 How. 811.

The law, as declared by a decision of the supreme court, when not a construction of a statute, does not enter into contracts made thereafter, and the subsequent reversal of the decision does not, therefore, impair the obligation of contracts; 121 U. S. 888; 159 id. 108. See 2 Hare, Am. Const. L. 726.

Contracts to which a state is a party are within the protection of this constitutional prohibition; 8 Cra. 87; and a provision in a charter of a toll bridge company that it shall not be lawful for any person to erect another bridge within a specified distance of the bridge authorized by said charter constitutes a contract which binds the state not to authorize the construction of such other bridge; 8 Wall. 51. A contract between a state and a party, whereby he is to perform certain duties for a specified period for a stipulated compensation, is within the protection of the constitution; 108 U. S. 5. It being held that where a state descends from the plane of its sovereignty, it is regarded, pro hac vice, as a private person itself and is bound accordingly.

A state is bound by its grants of franchises and exclusive privileges, such as the privilege of supplying a municipality with water; 115 U. S. 874; or gas; id. 680, 688. A state is bound by the issue of bonds and coupons under the terms of an act which provided that such coupons should be receivable for taxes, etc., and a subsequent act which forbids the receipt of these coupons for taxes is a violation of the contract and void as against coupon-holders; 114 U. S. 270; 110 id. 572; 121 id. 106.

A state, when it borrows money and promises to pay it with interest, cannot, by its own ordinance, relieve itself from performing to the letter all that it has expressly promised to its creditors; 96 U. S. 483. But with regard to grants, this clause of the constitution was not intended to control the exercise of the ordinary functions of government. It was not intended to apply to public property, to the discharge of public duties, to the exercise or possession of public rights, or to any changes or qualifications in these which the legislature of a state may at any time deem expedient; 1 Ohio St. 803, 609, 657; 5 Me. 389; 13 Ill. 27; 13 Fed. 175; 1 Green, N. J. 553; 1 Dougl. Mich. 235; 17 Conn. 79; 6 S. & R. 322; 13 Pa. 133; 1 H. & J. 286; 6 How. 548; 1 Sumn. 277. See 4 Wheat. 427; 19 Pa. 258; 4 N. Y. 419; 3 How. 183.

One of the first applications of the doctrine of the impairment of contracts was to the charter of a corporation in the Dartmouth College case; 4 Wheat. 518; which held that the charter was a contract the obligation of which could not afterwards be impaired by the legislature without the corporation's consent. Since then charters of incorporation which are granted for the private benefit or purposes of the corporation have always been held to be contracts between the legislature and the corporation, having for their consideration or liability the duties which the corporation assumes by accepting them; Cooley, Const. Lim. 279; Moraw. Priv. Corp. 1044; Hare, Am. Const. L. 421, 527; 146 U. S. 258. To guard against the danger which the growth of great corporations, under the protection of this principle, has developed, the new constitutions of many of the states forbid the granting of corporate powers except subject to amendment and repeal. Provisions of this sort have become so general that the effect of the doctrine that a state cannot pass an act impairing the obligation of a contract has been largely modified. The decisions of the supreme court of the United States have also worked further modifications. The first was in the famous Charles River Bridge case in 1837, 11 Pet. 420, where the court held that when the legislature had chartered a bridge company with the right to take tolls there was no implied contract that they would not charter another company to build a bridge alongside of the first which would in effect destroy the profits of the first by competition. The next modification was in the Granger cases in 1876; 94 U. S. 113 to 187; which held that the regulation by the legislature of the rates to be charged by railroads and elevators was not an impairment of the obligation of a contract. See also 143 U. S. 339. This doctrine having been carried to great lengths in allowing the legislature to regulate the rates to be charged, the supreme court has now modified the doctrine by declaring that the power to regulate is not a power to destroy, and that a legislature, under the pretence of regulating fares and freights, cannot require a railroad to carry persons and property without profit; 164 U. S. 578, 583.

On the general subject of the power of the legislature under its right reserved to alter, amend, and repeal, see 109 Mass. 103; 68 Me. 569; 41 Ia. 297; 9 R. I. 194; Cooley, Const. Lim. 279, note; Moraw. Priv. Corp. 1098; 146 U. S. 258; 138 id. 287.

In general, only contracts are embraced in this provision which respect property or some object of value and confer rights which can be asserted in a court of justice. Debts are not property. A non-resident creditor of a state cannot be said to be, by virtue of a debt which it owes him, a holder of property within its limits; 96 U. S. 432.

The following acts have been held void as impairing the obligation of a contract: The Insolvent Act of 1812 of Pennsylvania, so far as it attempted to discharge the contract; 6 Wheat. 131; the Insolvent Law of Indiana affecting debts to citizens of other states; 5 How. 295; the Act of Maryland of 1841 taxing stockholders in banks impaired the obligation in the Act of 1821 organizing banks; 8 How. 133; the Act of Ohio of 1851, taxing the state bank; 16 How. 369; General Tax Law of North Carolina as applied to a railroad whose charter exempted it from taxation; 13 Wall. 264; the same in South Carolina; 16 Wall. 244; the same in New Jersey; 95 U. S. 104; the same in Illinois as applied to the charter of a university; 99 U. S. 809; the same in Louisiana applied to the charter of an asylum; 105 U. S. 362; the Act of Illinois of 1841 restricting mortgage sales impaired the obligation of a mortgage contract; 1 How. 311; the Acts of Arkansas withholding assets of state banks from creditors impaired contracts with creditors; 15 How. 304; the Act of New York of 1855 authorizing a bridge to be built impaired the obligation in a charter to another company; 8 Wall. 51; the Act of Georgia of 1868 exempting property from execution impaired the obligation of a prior judgment; 13 Wall. 646; the same in Georgia; 15 Wall. 610; the same in North Carolina; 96 U. S. 595; the Act of Virginia of 1870 as to the deduction of taxes from coupons on state bonds impaired the obligation to the state bondholders under the Funding Act of 1871; 102 U. S. 672; the Ordinance of New Orleans of 1881 authorizing a light company to furnish New Orleans with gas impaired the obligation to another company under another act; 115 U. S. 550; so in Kentucky; 115 U. S. 683.

Grants of exclusive privileges by state governments are subject to the exercise of the right of eminent domain by the state. The legislature has full authority to exercise an unlimited power as to the management, employment, and use of the eminent domain of the state, and to make all provisions necessary to the exercise of this right or power, but no authority whatever to give it away or take it out of the people directly or indirectly; 6 How. 532; 20 Johns. 75; 17 Conn. 61; 23 Pick. 360; 15 Vt. 745; 8 N. H. 898; 8 Dana 289; 9 Ga. 517; 84 Va. 271. See EMINENT DOMAIN; FRANCHISES.

The power of one legislature to exempt altogether from taxation certain lands or property, and in this way to bind subsequent legislatures and take from the people one of their sovereign rights, may, where a consideration has been given, be considered now as distinctly settled by the supreme court of the United States, though not without remonstrance on the part of state courts; and the abandonment of this taxing power is not to be presumed where the deliberate purpose of the state does not appear; 4 Pet. 514; 3 How. 133; 4 Mass. 305; 2 Hill, N. Y. 353; 10 N. H. 188; 5 Gill 231; 13 Vt. 525; 30 Pa. 442; 1 Ohio St. 563, 591, 603; 7 Cra. 164; 10 Conn. 495; 8 Wall. 430; 20 id. 96. See 143 U. S. 192; 143 id. 1; 37 Fed. Rep. 24; 86 Tenn. 614. The grant of the power of taxation by the legislature to a municipal corporation is not a contract, but is subject to revocation, modification, and control by the legislature; 139 U. S. 189.

In relation to marriage and divorce, it is now settled that this clause does not operate. The obligation of the marriage contract is created by the public law, subject to the public will, and to that of the parties; 7 Dana 181; 125 U. S. 190; 1 Bish. Mar. & D. § 9. The prevailing doctrine seems to be that the legislature has complete control of the subject of granting divorces, unless restrained by the constitution of the state; but in a majority of the states the constitutions contain this prohibition; Cooley, Const. Lim. 133; and there the jurisdiction in matters of divorce is confined exclusively to the judicial tribunals, under the limitations prescribed by law; 2 Kent 106. But where the legislature has power to act, its reasons cannot be inquired into; marriage is not a contract but a status; the parties cannot have vested rights of property in a domestic relation; therefore the legislative act does not come under condemnation as depriving parties of rights contrary to the law of the land; 8 Conn. 541; Cooley, Const. Lim. 112.

In relation to bankruptcy and insolvency, the constitution, art. I, § 8, cl. 4, gives to congress the power of making a bankrupt law. But it seems to be settled that this power is not exclusive; because the several states may also make distinct bankrupt laws,—though they have generally been called insolvency laws,—which will only be superseded when congress chooses to exercise its power by passing a bankruptcy law; 4 Wheat. 122; 12 id. 213; 13 Mass. 1. See 3 Wash. C. C. 313; Bish. Insolv. Debt. 59.

Exemption from arrest affects only the remedy, an exemption from attachment of the property, or a subjection of it to a stay law or appraisement law, impairs the obligation of the contract. Such a statute can only be enforced as to contracts made subsequently to the law; 1 How. 311; 8 Wheat. 1, 75; see 9 Pet. 359; 4 Wall. 535; 96 U. S. 69; but a law abolishing distress for rent has been held to be applicable to cases in force at its passage; 14 N. Y. 22. With regard to exemption from arrest the supreme court holds that in modes of proceeding and forms to enforce the contract the legislature has the control, and may enlarge, limit, or alter them, provided it does not deny a remedy, or so embarrass it with conditions or restrictions as seriously to impair the value of the right; 103 U. S. 720. See 135 U. S. 602. Whatever belongs, merely, to the remedy may be altered according to the will of the state, provided the alteration does not impair the obligation of a contract; 134 U. S. 515.

It is admitted that a state may make partial exemptions of property, as of furniture, food, apparel, or even a homestead; 1 Denio 128; 1 N. Y. 129; 2 Dougl. Mich. 38; 4 W & S. 218; 17 Miss. 310. A homestead exemption may be made applicable to previously existing contracts; 66 N. C. 164; contra, 22 Gratt. 266; 6 Baxt. 225. But a law preventing all legal remedy upon a contract would be void; 13 Wall. 662; 1 S. C. n. s. 63; 15 Wall. 610. An act providing that dower or right of dower shall not be subject to seizure or execution for the husband's debts during his lifetime, cannot affect the rights of creditors whose claims arose before the passage of the act; 109 N. C. 685. See 101 id. 382.

Nothing in the constitution prevents a state from passing a valid statute to divest rights which have been vested by law in an individual, provided it does not impair the obligation of a contract; 3 Dall. 386; 2 Pet. 412; 8 id. 89; 5 Barb. 48; 9 Gill 299; 1 Md. Ch. Dec. 66. See 54 Fed. Rep. 660; 129 U. S. 36; 134 id. 296. This inhibition in the constitution is wholly prospective, and the states may legislate as to contracts thereafter made as they see fit; 96 U. S. 603; 128 U. S. 489; 121 id. 388; 145 id. 454.

Insolvent laws are valid which are in the nature of a cessio bonorum, leaving the debt still existing, or which provide for the discharge of the debt, but refer only to subsequent contracts, or which merely modify or affect the remedy, as by exempting the person from arrest, but still leave means of enforcing. But a law exempting the person from arrest and the goods from attachment on mesne process or execution would be void, as against the constitution of the United States; 6 How. 328; 16 Johns. 233; 6 Pick. 440; 9 Conn. 314; 1 Ohio 236; 9 Barb. 382; 4 Gilm. 221; 13 B. Monr. 285; the right of antecedent creditors are protected by the constitution; 129 U. S. 36. The state insolvent laws in practice operate in favor of the citizens of the particular state only, as to other citizens of the same state, and not against citizens of other states, unless they have assented to the relief or discharge of the debtor expressly, or by some equivalent act, as by becoming a party to the process against him under the law, taking a dividend, and the like; 1 Gall. 371; 3 Mas. 89; 5 Mass. 509; 13 id. 18, 19; 2 Blackf. 360; 3 Pet. 41; but the mere circumstance that the contract is made payable in the state where the insolvent law exists will not render such contract subject to be discharged under the law; 1 Wall. 223, 234; 4 id. 409.

Some states refuse to aid a citizen of another state in enforcing a debt against a citizen of their own state, when the debt was discharged by their insolvent law. In such cases the creditor must resort to the court of the United States within the state; 1 Gall. 168; 8 Pick. 194; 2 Blackf. 394; Baldw. 296; 9 N. H. 478. See INSOLVENT

LAW.

A statute of limitation does not impair the obligation of a contract, or deprive one of property without due process of law, unless, in its application to an existing right of action, it unreasonably limits the opportunity to enforce that right by suit; 137 U. S. 245; 137 id. 258, note; 135 id. 662.

The law of place acts upon a contract, and governs its construction, validity, and obligation, but constitutes no part of it. The law explains the stipulations of parties, but never supersedes or varies them.

This is very different from supposing that every law is applicable to the subject-matter, as statutes of limitation and insolvency, or enters into and becomes a part of the contract. This can neither be drawn from the terms of the contract, nor presumed to be contemplated by the parties.

There is a broad distinction taken as to the obligation of a contract and the remedy upon it. The abolition of all remedies by a law operating in presenti is, of course, an impairing of the obligation of the contract. But it is admitted that the legislature may vary the nature and extent of remedies, as well as the times and modes in which these remedies may be pursued, and bars suits not brought within such times as may be prescribed. A reasonable time within which rights are to be enforced must be given by laws which bar certain suits; 3 Pet. 290; 1 How. 311; 2 Gall. 141; 8 Mass. 430; 1 Blackf. 36; 14 Me. 344; 7 Ga. 103; 21 Miss. 335; 1 Hill, S. C. 328; 7 B. Monr. 16; 8 Barb. 489.

The meaning of obligation is important with regard to the distinction taken between the laws existing at the time the contract is entered into and those which are enacted afterwards. The former are said to have been in contemplation of the parties, and so far entered into their contract. The latter are said to impair, provided they affect the contract at all. See cases supra.

The weight of authority is that this clause of the constitution, like that which relates to the regulation of commerce by the congress of the United States, does not limit the power of a state to enact general police regulations for the preservation of public health and morals; 8 How. 163; 1 Ohio St. 15; 12 Pick. 194; 7 Cow. 349, 585; 27 Vt. 149; 17 Colo. 376. See 8 Mo. 607, 697; 3 Harr. Del. 442; 5 How. 504; 7 id. 283; 11 Pet. 102. See, generally, Story, Const. § 1308; Sergeant, Const. Law 556; Hare, Am. Const. L. 768; Rawle, Const.; Dane, Abr. ## IMPAIRMENT

Earning Power. The phrase "impairment of the power to earn money" implies that the injured person can perform some service or follow some wage-earning occupation and that his ability to earn money although reduced, is not totally destroyed. 140 Ky. 488, 131 S. W. 278.

"Temporary impairment of power to earn money" means "loss of time." 126 S. W. 120.

Impairing. The word "impairing" in the federal constitution, does not mean destroying. 4 Litt. (Ky.) 47.

IMPALARE. To impound. Du Cange.

IMPANEL. In Practice. To write the names of jurors on a panel (q. v.), which is a schedule or list, in England of parchment; this is done by the sheriff, or other officer lawfully authorized.

In American practice, the word is used of a jury drawn for trial of a particular cause by the clerk, as well as of the general list of jurors returned by the sheriff. Grah. Pr. 275. See 1 Archb. Fr. 865; 3 Bla. Com.

354; 7 How. Fr. 441. Strictly speaking and at common law, juries are impanelled when the jurymen are selected and ready to be sworn; 55 Fed. Rep. 928.

IMPARCATUS. Shut up; confined in prison. Burrill.

IMPARGANCUTUM. The right to impound cattle.

IMPARIANCE (from Fr. parier, to speak).

In Pleading and Practice. Time given by the court to either party to answer the pleading of his opponent: as, either to plead, reply, rejoin, etc.

It is said to be nothing else but the continuance of the cause till a further day; Bacon, Abr. Pleas (C). In this sense impariances are no longer allowed in English practice; 3 Chitty, Gen. Pr. 700; Andr. Steph. Pl. 162.

Time to plead. This is the common signification of the word; 2 Wms. Saund. 1, n. 2; 2 Show. 310; Barnes 346; Laws, Civ. Pl. 93. In this sense impariances are not recognized in American law, the common practice being for the defendant to enter an appearance, when the cause stands continued, until a fixed time has elapsed within which he may file his plea. In the act of congress of May 19, 1828, § 2, the word impariance was originally used for "stay of execution," but the latter phrase has been substituted for it: Rev. Stat. § 988. See CONTINUANCE.

A general impariance is the entry of a general prayer and allowance of time to plead till the next term, without reserving to the defendant the benefit of any exception; so that after such an impariance the defendant cannot object to the jurisdiction of the court, or plead any matter in abatement. This kind of impariance is always from one term to another.

A general special impariance contains a saving of all exceptions whatsoever, so that the defendant after this may plead not only in abatement, but he may also plead a plea which affects the jurisdiction of the court, as privilege. He cannot, however, plead a tender, and that he was always ready to pay, because by craving time he admits that he is not ready, and so falsifies his plea; Tidd, Pr. 418.

A special impariance reserves to the defendant all exception to the writ, bill, or count; and therefore after it the defendant may plead in abatement, though not to the jurisdiction of the court.

See Comyns, Dig. Abatement (I) 19, 20, 21, Pleader (D); 1 Chitty, Pl. 420; 1 Sell. Pr. 265; Bacon, Abr. Pleas (C).

IMPARSONEE. A clergyman who by induction (q. v.) is in possession of a benefice. He is then termed persona impersonata—a parson impersonatee. 1 Bla. Com. 391; Co. Litt. 800.

IMPARTIALLY. See FAITHFULLY.

IMPEACHMENT. A written accusation usually by the house of representatives of a state or of the United States to the senate of the state or of the United States against an officer.

The constitution declares that the house of representatives shall have the sole power of impeachment; art. 1, s. 2, cl. 5; and that the senate shall have the sole power to try all impeachments; art. 1, s. 3, cl. 6.

The persons liable to impeachment are the president, vice-president, and all civil officers of the United States; art. 2, s. 4. A question arose upon an impeachment before the senate, in 1799, whether a senator was a civil officer of the United States within the purview of this section of the constitution; and it was decided by the senate, by a vote of fourteen against eleven, that he was not; Senate Jour. Jan. 10, 1799; Story, Const. § 791; Rawle, Const. 213; Von Holst Con. Hist. 160. See UNITED STATES COURTS.

The offences for which a guilty officer may be impeached are treason, bribery, and other high crimes and misdemeanors; art. 2, s. 4. The constitution defines the crime of treason; art. 8, s. 8. Recourse must be had to the common law for a definition of bribery. Not having particularly mentioned what is to be understood by "other high crimes and misdemeanors," resort, it is presumed, must be had to parliamentary practice and the common law in order to ascertain what they are; Story, Const. § 795. It is said that impeachment may be brought to bear on any offense against the constitution or the laws which is deserving of punishment in this manner or is of such a character as to render the officer unfit to hold his office. It is primarily directed against official misconduct, and is not restricted to political crimes alone. The decision rests really with the senate; Black, Const. L. 121. The guilt of the accused must be established beyond a reasonable doubt; 37 Neb. 96.

The mode of proceeding in the institution and trial of impeachments is as follows: When a person who may be legally impeached has been guilty, or is supposed to have been guilty, of some malversation in office, a resolution is generally brought forward by a member of the house of representatives, either to accuse the party, or for a committee of inquiry. If the committee report adversely to the party accused, they give a statement of the charges and recommend that he be impeached. When the resolution is adopted by the house, a committee is appointed to impeach the party at the bar of the senate, and to state that the articles of impeachment against him will be exhibited in due time and made good before the senate, and to demand that the senate take order for the appearance of the party to answer to the impeachment. The house then agree upon the articles of impeachment, and they are presented to the senate by a committee appointed by the house to prosecute the impeachment. The senate then issues process, summoning the party to appear at a given day before them, to answer to the articles. The process is served by the sergeant-at-arms of the senate, and a return is made of it to the senate under oath. On the return-day of the process, the senate resolves itself into a court of impeachment, and the senators are sworn to do justice according to the constitution and laws. The person impeached is called to answer, and either appears or does not appear. If he does not appear, his default is recorded, and the senate may proceed ex parte. If he does appear, either by himself or attorney, the parties are required to form an issue, and a time is then assigned for the trial. The final decision is given by yeas and nays; but no person can be convicted without the concurrence of two-thirds of the members present; Const. art. 1, s. 2, cl. 6. See "Chase's Trial," and "Trial of Judge Peck;" also proceedings against Judge Humphreys, June 26, 1862, Congress. Globe, pt. 4, 3d sess., 32d Congress, pp. 2942-2953; and Trial of President Johnson, March 5, 1868, Congress. Globe, pt. 5, supplement, 40th Congress, 2d sess.; Lecture by Prof. Theo. W. Dwight, before Columbia Coll. Law School, 6 Am. Law Reg. 257; Article by Judge Lawrence, of Ohio, same volume, p. 641.

When the president is tried, the chief justice presides. The judgment, in cases of impeachment, does not extend further than to removal from office and disqualification to hold and enjoy any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States. Disqualification, as a punishment, is discretionary with the senate; Black, Const. L. 122. The party impeached remains liable to trial and punishment according to law. See UNITED STATES COURTS. Proceedings on impeachments under the state constitutions are somewhat similar.

In England, the articles of impeachment are a kind of indictment found by the house of commons, and tried by the house of lords. It has always been settled that a peer could be impeached for any crime. It was formerly believed that a commoner could only be impeached for high misdemeanors, not for capital offences; 4 Bla. Com. 260; but it seems now settled they may be impeached for high treason; May's Parl. Prac. Ch. 23. Impeachments have been very rare in England in modern times.

In Evidence. An allegation, supported by proof, that a witness who has been examined is unworthy of credit.

Every witness is liable to be impeached as to his character for truth; and, if his general character is good, he is presumed at all times to be ready to support it; 49 Ill. 299. See 97 Ala. 14.

It is not admissible to impeach a defendant's testimony by showing that at a former trial for a like offence, he raised a similar issue and was contradicted; 155 Mass. 168. An accused person who testifies in his own behalf, is subject to impeachment, as other witnesses, by evidence of previous contradictory statements; 98 Ala. 169; 86 Tenn. 259. A witness cannot be impeached by the contradiction of immaterial statements; 58 Ark. 135; nor can he be as to collateral and irrelevant matter on which he was cross-examined; 66 Miss. 196; 75 Cal. 108; 78 Ia. 87; 39 Kan. 115; 97 N. C. 443; 69 Tex. 730; 61 Vt. 53; 32 W. Va. 177. Statements out of court inconsistent with those made by a witness in court are admissible to impeach him, where the proper foundation has been laid; 97 Mo. 165; 77 Ga. 781; 23 Neb. 683; 40 Minn. 65; 77; 74 Ia. 623; 86 Ala. 110; 25 Tex. App. 686. In order to impeach a witness by showing his contradictory statements on other occasions, his attention must be first called to the time, place, and circumstances of the statements, whether they are in writing or were made orally; 137 U. S. 507; 132 id. 394.

IMPEACHMENT OF WASTE. A restraint from committing waste upon lands or tenements; or, a demand of compensation for waste done by a tenant who has but a particular estate in the land granted, and, therefore, no right to commit waste.

All tenants for life or any less estate are liable to be impeached for waste, unless they hold without impeachment of waste; in the latter case they may commit waste without being questioned, or any demand for compensation for the waste done; 11 Co. 82. See WASTE.

IMPECHIARE. To impeach, accuse, or prosecute for felony or treason. Cowel.

IMPEDIATUS. Disabled from mischief by expedition (q. v.). Cowel.

IMPEDIENS. One who hinders; the defendant or deforciant in a fine. Cowel; Blount.

IMPEDIMENTO. In Spanish Law. A prohibition to contract marriage, established by law between certain persons.

The disabilities arising from this clause are twofold, viz.:

Impedimento Dirimente. Such disabilities as render the marriage null, although contracted with the usual legal solemnities. The disabilities arising from this source are enumerated in the following Latin verses:—

"Error, conditio, votum, cognatio, crimen, Cultus disparitas, vis, ordo, ligamen, honestas, Si sis affinis, si forte coire nequibis, Si parochi et duplicis coire presentia testis, Raptave sit mulier, nec parit reddita tutes, Hæc facienda vetant connubia, facta retractant."

Among these impediments, some are absolute, others relative. The former cannot be cured, and render the marriage radically null; others may be removed by previous dispensation.

In Spain, marriage is regarded in the twofold aspect of a civil and a religious contract. Hence the disabilities are of two kinds, viz.: those created by the local law and those imposed by the church. In the earlier ages of the church, the emperors prohibited certain marriages: thus, Theodosius the Great forbade marriages between cousins-german; Justinian, between spiritual relations; Valentinian, Valens, Theodosius, and Arcadius, between persons of different religions.

The Catholic church adopted and extended the disabilities thus created, and by the third canon at the twenty-fourth session of the Council of Trent, the church reserved to itself the power of dispensation. As the Council of Trent did not determine, being divided, who had the power of granting dispensation, it is accorded in Italy to the pope, and in France and Spain, with few exceptions, to the bishops. The dispositions of the Council of Trent being in force in Spain (see Schmidt, Civ. Law of Spain, p. 6, note a), the ecclesiastical authority is alone invested with this power in Spain.

For the cases in which it may be granted, see

Schmidt, Civ. Law c. 2, s. 14.

Impedimento, Impediente, or Prohibitive.—Such disabilities as impede the contracting of a marriage, but do not annul it when contracted. Accidentally, the impediments expressed in the following Latin verses were of this nature:—

"Incestus, raptus, eponalia, mors mulieris, Susceptus propriis nobilibus, mors puerberialis, Vel si pontifex solemniter, aut monialem Accipiat quisquam, votum simplex, catechismus, Ecclesies vetitum, nec non tempus forlarum, Impediunt fieri, permittunt facta temerit."

For the effects of these impediments, see Eschriche, Dict. Raz. Impedimento Prohibitive.

IMPEDIMENTS. Legal hindrances to making contracts. Some of these impediments are minority, want of reason, coverture, and the like. See CONTRACT; INCAPACITY.

In Civil Law. Bars to marriage.

Absolute impediments are those which prevent the person subject to them from marrying at all, without either the nullity of marriage or its being punishable.

Dirimant impediments are those which render a marriage void: as, where one of the contracting parties is already married to another person.

Prohibitive impediments are those which do not render the marriage null, but subject the parties to a punishment.

Relative impediments are those which regard only certain persons with regard to each other: as, the marriage of a brother to a sister.

IMPENSÆ (Lat.). In Civil Law. Expense; outlay. Divided into necessarie, for necessity, utiles, for use, and voluptuaria, for luxury; Dig. 70. 8. 14; Voc. Jur.

IMPERATIVE. Mandatory as opposed to directory, as used of a statute (q. v.).

IMPERATOR. Emperor. The title of the Emperor in Rome and used also for the Kings of England in charters before the conquest. 1 Bla. Com. 242.

IMPERFECT OBLIGATIONS. Those which are not, in view of the law, of binding force.

IMPERFECT RIGHTS. See RIGHTS.

IMPERFECT TRUST. An executory trust (q. v.).

IMPERTITIA. Want of skill.

IMPERIUM. The right to command, which includes the right to employ the force of the state to enforce the laws: this is one of the principal attributes of the power of the executive. 1 Toullier, n. 58.

IMPERSONALITAS. Impersonality. An expression used where no particular person is referred to, as where the words ut dicitur are used. Co. Litt. 352 b.

IMPETINENT (Lat. in, not, pertinent, pertaining or relating to).

In Pleading. In Equity. A term applied to matters introduced into a bill, answer, or other proceeding in a suit which are not properly before the court for decision at that particular stage of the suit. 1 Sumn. 508; 3 Stor. 13; 1 Paige, Ch. 555; 5 Blackf. 439; 15 Fed. Rep. 561. Impertinent matter is not necessarily scandalous; but all scandalous matter is impertinent.

The rule against admitting impertinent matter is designed to prevent oppression, not to become oppressive; 1 T. & R. 489; 6 Beav. 444; 27 N. H. 38. No matter is to be deemed impertinent which is material in establishing the rights of the parties or ascertaining the relief to be granted; 3 Paige, Ch. 608; 12 Beav. 44; 10 Sim. 345; 13 id. 588.

A pleading may be referred to a master to have impertinent matter expunged at the cost of the offending party; Story, Eq. Pl. § 268; 19 Me. 214; 4 Hen. & M. 414; 2 Hayw. 407; 4 C. E. Gr. 343; but a bill may not be after the defendant has answered; Coop. Eq. Pl. 19. In England, the practice of excepting to bills, answers, and other proceedings for impertinence has been abolished. The 27th Equity Rule of the United States courts requires that exceptions for scandal or impertinence shall point out the exceptionable matter with certainty; 6 Paige 288; 1 Dan. Ch. Pr. *343, n., *350, n.

AT LAW. A term applied to matter not necessary to constitute the cause of action or ground of defence; 5 East 275; 2 Mass. 283. It constitutes surplusage, which see.

In Practice. A term applied to evidence of facts which do not belong to the matter in question. That which is immaterial is, in general, impertinent, and that which is material is not, in general, impertinent. 1 M'C. & Y. 337. Impertinent matter in the interrogatories to witnesses or their answers, in equity, will be expunged after reference to a master at the cost of the offending party; 2 Y. & C. 445.

IMPESCARE. To impeach or accuse. Impescatus, impeached. Jac.; Blount.

IMPETITIO VASTI. Impeachment of waste, which title see.

IMPETRATION. The obtaining any thing by prayer or petition. In the ancient English statutes it signifies a pre-obtaining of church benefices in England from the church of Rome which belonged to the gift of the king or other lay patrons.

IMPIER. Umpire (q. v.).

IMPIERMEN. Impairing or prejudicing. Jac. L. Dict.

IMPIGNORATA. Pledged; given in pledge (pignori data); mortgaged. A term applied in Bracton to land. Bract. fol. 20.

IMPIGNORATION. The act of pawning or pledging.

IMPLACITARE (Lat.). To implead; to sue.

IMPLEAD. In Practice. To sue or prosecute by due course of law. 9 Watts 47.

IMPLEMENTS (Lat. impleo, to fill). Such things as are used or employed for a trade, or furniture of a house. 11 Metc. 82.

Whatever may supply wants: particularly applied to tools, utensils, vessels, instruments of labor: as, the implements of trade or of husbandry. Webster, Dict.; 28 Iowa 359; 6 Gray 298; or a music teacher's piano; 69 Ill. 338. The word does not include horses or other animals; 11 Met. 79; 5 Ark. 41; 44 Conn. 98.

IMPLICATA (Lat.). Small adventures for which the freight contracted for is to be received although the cargo may be lost. Targa, c. 34; Emerigon, Mar. Loans § 5.

IMPLICATION. An inference of something not directly declared, but arising from what is admitted or expressed. See CONTRACT; DEED; EASEMENT; WAY; WILL.

IMPLIED. This word is used in law as contrasted with "express;" i. e., where the intention in regard to the subject-matter is not manifested by explicit and direct words, but is gathered by implication or necessary deduction from the circumstances, the general language, or the conduct of the parties.

IMPLIED ABROGATION. See ABROGATION.

IMPLIED AGREEMENT. See AGREEMENT.

IMPLIED ASSUMPSIT. See ASSUMPSIT.

IMPLIED COLOR. See COLOR.

IMPLIED CONSENT. See CONSENT.

IMPLIED CONSIDERATION. One that is implied by law, or presumed to exist in contradistinction to an expressed consideration (q. v.). In a case of a sealed instrument or negotiable paper the consideration is presumed. See CONSIDERATION.

IMPLIED CONTRACT. See CONTRACT.

IMPLIED COVENANT. See COVENANT.

IMPLIED MALICE. See MALICE.

IMPLIED POWER. See POWER.

IMPLIED TRUST. See TRUST.

IMPLIED USES. See RESULTING USE; USE.

IMPLIED WARRANTY. See CAVEAT EMPTOR; SALE; WARRANTY.

IMPORTATION. In Common Law. The act of bringing goods and merchandise into the United States from a foreign country. 5 Cra. 368; 9 id. 104, 120; 2 M. & G. 155, note a.

To prevent the mischievous interference of the several states with the national commerce, the constitution of the United States, art. I, s. 10, provides as follows: "No state shall, without the consent of congress, lay any imposts or duties on imports or exports, except what may be absolutely necessary for executing its inspection laws; and the net produce of all duties and imposts laid by any state on imports or exports shall be for the use of the treasury of the United States; and all such laws shall be subject to the revision and control of congress;" Story, Const. § 1616. Under this section it has been held that a state law imposing a license tax on importers of foreign liquors was unconstitutional; 12 Wheat. 419; See 5 How. 504; 7 id. 283; 12 id. 299; 11 Pet. 102. As was a state law imposing a tax on the tonnage of vessels entering her ports; 34 U. S. 238. But a state tax on the gross receipts of a railroad company, where freights are received partly from another state, is not a tax on imports; 8 Wall. 123; 15 id. 264. An importation is not complete within the revenue laws, until a voluntary arrival within some port of entry; 9 Cra. 104; 13 Pet. 486; 4 Wash. C. C. 158; 1 Gall. 200; but see 1 Pet. C. C. 256; and the duties accrue at the time of such arrival; 1 Deady 124; but the importation, as between the importer and the government, is not complete as long as the goods remain in the custody of the officers of the customs, and until delivered to the importer, they are subject to any duties on imports which congress may see fit to impose; 2 Cliff. 512. See EXPORTATION.

Importation, in an ordinary sense, consists in bringing an article into a country from the outside. If there be an actual bringing in it is importation regardless of the mode in which it is effected. Entry through a customs house is not of the essence of the act. 262 U. S. 122.

As distinguished from "migration," see IMPORT.

IMPORTED. This word, in general, has the same meaning in the tariff laws that its etymology shows, im, porto, to bear; to carry. To "import" is to bear or carry into. An "imported" article is one brought or carried into a country from abroad. 49 Fed. Rep. 99. See IMPORTS; IMPORTERS.

IMPORTS. Goods or other property imported or brought into the country from foreign territory. Story, Const. § 949. See U. S. Const. art. I, § 8, 1, § 10; 7 How. 477; 9 id. 619; 8 Wall. 110, 128.

Imports cease to be "imported articles" within the constitution, after the packages are broken up, or, after the first wholesale disposition of them; 1 Dev. & B. L. 19; but imported goods, after having been sold by the importer, are subject to state taxation, even though still in the original packages; 5 Wall. 479. See ORIGINAL PACKAGE. Persons cannot be considered imports; 4 Wats. 283.

To bring in from abroad; to introduce from without; especially, to bring wares or merchandise into a place or country from a foreign country, in the transactions of commerce. Opposed to "export." Webster.

Also, used to imply the bringing in of persons involuntarily, such as slaves, as distinguished from the voluntary migration of a free person. The two words "migration" and "importation" refer to the different conditions of this race (the African race) as regards freedom and slavery. When the free black man came here, he migrated; when the slave came, he was imported. 17 Otto (U. S.) 62. See IMPORTED.

IMPORTUNITY. Urgent solicitation, with troublesome frequency and pertinacity.

Wills and devises are sometimes set aside in consequence of the importunity of those who have procured them. Whenever the importunity is such as to deprive the devisor of the freedom of his will, the devise becomes fraudulent and void; Dane, Abr. c. 127, a. 14, a. 5, 6, 7; 2 Phill. Eccl. 551.

IMPOSED TAX. See TAX.

IMPOSITIONS. Imposts, taxes, or contributions. See 104 Mass. 470.

IMPOSSIBILITY. A thing which under the law or according to the due course of nature cannot be done or performed.

Impossibility of performance is an important head of the law of contract, and the questions arising as to its effect may be affected by the classification to which the impossibility is assigned, the time at which it arises, and whether it affects the promise or the consideration for it.

There may be an impossibility of fact, existing in the nature of things, or arising out of the circumstances of the case or a legal impossibility created by law.

Of the first kind there may be a contradiction in the contract resulting from promises inconsistent with each other when made. There may also be a physical impossibility as when the thing contracted for is against the course of nature. Of the latter class examples are suggested of an agreement "to make two spheres of the same substance, but one twice the size of the other of which the greater should fall twice as fast as the smaller when they were both dropped from a height; or to construct a perpetual motion;" the former having been considered an elementary fact before Galileo's experiment and the latter being still attempted, though as yet unsuccessfully. Wald, Pol. Cont. 350.

A physical impossibility may be either absolute, which means impossible in any case, as if one should contract to reach the moon; or relative, as to make a payment to one who is dead. Of this kind is what is termed practical impossibility, as when a ship is so injured that it cannot be repaired except at an excessive or unreasonable cost; in this case it is treated as a total loss, being physically but not practically possible to repair. Certain accidents occurring from death, tempests, and the like are characterized by the phrase "impossibility arising by the act of God" (q. v.).

A contract or condition, the performance of which is made impossible by a rule of law, is termed a legal impossibility; as if one should give a bond to secure a simple contract with a collateral agreement that there should be no merger of the contract debt. A logical impossibility exists when the agreement is inconsistent with the nature of the transaction, as where a gift is made to one expressly for his own benefit with a condition that he immediately transfer it to a third person.

The impossibility may exist at the time of making the agreement, in which case it is said to be original; or it may be caused by matter arising ex post facto, as where the party to be benefited dies after the contract to be executed though before the performance. Such subsequent impossibility may be caused by the act of the party making the promise or the party to be benefited, or of a stranger, as a public enemy (q. v.), or by the act of God (q. v.).

An agreement to perform an impossibility whether in law or in fact is void; Wald, Pol. Cont. 352; Leake, Cont. 358; 3 Add. Cont. 8th Am. ed. 1196; Harr. Qont. 34, 174. See L. R. 5 C. P. 577. There may, however, be the liability in damages for the breach of an unqualified undertaking to perform an impossibility; id.; 149 U. S. 1; the real question in such a case is the existence of the liability; id.; 2 Q. B. 680; it is a question of construction, whether the language of the contract is to be treated as not applying to a situation which renders its literal performance impossible; Harr. Cont. 176. A contract to perform a notorious impossibility known to the parties to be such at the time of making the contract is void; 15 M. & W. 253; L. R. 6 Q. B. 124; L. R. 5 C. P. 577; if the impossibility has arisen after the making of the contract, although without any fault of the covenantor, he is not discharged from liability under it; 160 U. S. 514; an impossibility is no defence if occasioned by the act of a stranger; 2 Ld. Raym. 1164; 9 El. & Bl. 698; or of alien enemies; Aleyn 36. Where, in an action of breach of promise of marriage, a plea that consummation had become impossible by reason of bodily disease endangering the life of the defendant was held by four judges to three in the Exchequer chamber to be of no defence, the court of the queen's bench having been equally divided; El. Bl. & El. 748, 39 L. J. Q. B. 45; but of this case it is said that "it is so much against the tendency of the latter cases that it is of little or no authority beyond the point actually decided;" Wald, Pol. Cont. 878; and in an American case upon analogous facts the court approved the criticism upon the English case and refused to follow it. The cases upon this subject are necessarily of infinite variety, as is natural where the question is so largely one of construction. To examine them in detail would be impossible within the scope of this title, but they will be found collected and classified in the various works on contracts. See Wald, Pol. Cont. ch. vii.; 3 Add. Cont. 8th Am. ed. 1196; Leake, ch. iii. sec. iii.; Harr. Cont. ch. v. sec. 2; 16 Cont. L. J. 105; Keener, Quasi-Cont. ch. iv. sec. iii.; CONTRACT; UNLAWFUL AGREEMENT; CONDITION; PERFORMANCE.

The question whether an act is possible is of importance in law, with reference to the performance of conditions and agreements. With reference to the nature of the act required, an impossibility is either physical, legal or logical.

Physical Impossibility. An act is PHYSICALLY IMPOSSIBLE when it is contrary to the course of nature. Such an impossibility may be either absolute, i. e., impossible in any case (e. g. for A. to reach the moon), or relative (sometimes called impossible in fact, i. e. arising from the circumstances of the case. E. g. for A. to make a payment to B., he being a deceased person. R. & L. Dict.; 3 Sav. Syst. 157, 164; Pol. Cont. 330).

Practical Impossibility. To the latter class belongs what is sometimes called PRACTICAL IMPOSSIBILITY, which exists when the act can be done, but only at an excessive or unreasonable cost. Thus, when a ship is so injured that it is not worth while repairing her, the same effect with respect to the liability of the insurer is produced, as if it were physically as well as practically impossible to repair her. Id.; Leake Cont. 2nd ed., 682.

Legal or Judicial Impossibility. An act is LEGALLY or JURIDICALLY IMPOSSIBLE when a rule of law makes it impossible to do it, e. g. for A. to make a valid will before his majority. This class of acts must not be confounded with those which are possible, although forbidden by law, as to commit a theft. Id.; 3 Sav. 169.

Logical Impossibility. An act is logically IMPOSSIBLE when it is contrary to the nature of the transaction, as where A. gives property to B. expressly for his own benefit, on condition that he transfers it to C. Id.; 3 Sav. 159.

Original Impossibility. With reference to the time when the impossibility first exists, the act may be either ORIGINALLY IMPOSSIBLE (ab initio), or become impossible by MATTER SUBSEQUENT (ex post facto). Thus, if A. contracts with B. to pay money into the hands of C., and C. was dead at the time the contract was entered into, then the payment was originally impossible; if C. was alive at the time, but dies before the payment, it becomes impossible by matter subsequent. Id. The latter class is again divisible according as the performance of the act required is rendered impossible by the person creating the requirement, by the person for whose benefit the act was to be done, by the person required to do it, by a stranger, such as the public enemy, by the act of God, by a change in the law, etc. Id.; Leake Cont. 692 et seq.

IMPOSSIBLE CONTRACT. One which the law will not hold binding upon the parties because of the natural or legal impossibility of the performance by one party of that which is the consideration for the promise of the other. 7 Wait, Aot. & D. 184. See IMPOSSIBILITY.

Perhaps the only contracts that are impossible in the true sense are those in which the consideration is impossible. A distinction must be drawn between impossibility of consideration and impossibility of performance. If the consideration for the promise is obviously and absolutely impossible of performance and such fact is apparent upon the face of the contract and is known to the parties, the consideration is unreal and will not support the contract. 3 Elliot, Cont. 35; 14 Pick. (Mass.) 156. "If the covenant be within the range of possibility, however absurd or impossible the idea of execution may be, it will be upheld. To bring the case within the rule of dispensation, it must appear that the thing to be done can not by any means be accomplished; for if it be only improbable, or out of the power of the obligor, it is not deemed in law impossible." Id.; 27 N. J. L. 513. Mere impossibility of performance of the consideration by the individual promisor does not necessarily relieve such promisor from his liability on the contract. Id.; 113 Ky. 372. (Inability to perform is not synonymous with impossibility of performance.) See IMPOSSIBILITY.

IMPOSTS. Taxes, duties, or impositions. A duty on imported goods or merchandise. Federalist, no. 30; Elliot, Deb. 289; Story, Const. § 949; Cooley, Tax. 8.

The Constitution of the United States gives congress power "to lay and collect taxes, duties, excises, and imposts," and prohibits the states from laying "any imposts or duties on exports or imports" without the consent of congress; U. S. Const. art. 1, § 8, n. 1; art. 1, § 10, n. 2. See Bacon, Abr. Smuggling; Davis, Imp.; Co. 2d Inst. 63; Dig. 165, n.; 7 Wall. 433; 9 Rob. (La.) 324.

IMPOTENCE. In Medical Jurisprudence. Inability on the part of the male organ of copulation to perform its proper function. Impotence applies only to disorders affecting the function of the organ of copulation, while sterility applies only to lack of fertility in the reproductive elements of either sex. Dennis, System of Surgery.

Impotence may be considered as incurable, curable, accidental, or temporary. Absolute or incurable impotence is that for which there is no known relief, principally originating in some malformation or defect of the genital organs. Its existence or non-existence is not to be determined by mere anatomical appearances, and the mere fact of age alone is never sufficient to imply absence of the procreative power; 2 With. & Beck. 396. It may also be the result of infirmity rather than of age or deformity, as the effect of vicious habits: id. 396.

Ability to procreate is not the test; it is enough if the parties are able to have sexual intercourse; 18 Kan. 871; 6 Paige 554; 3 Phill. Eco. 325; and impotency arising after the marriage does not avoid it; 80 L. J. Prob. Mat. & Adm. 73. Unless otherwise by statute, impotence renders a marriage voidable, not void; L. R. 1 Ex. 246; 24 N. J. Eq. 19.

It has been held that, in a divorce case, an examination may be ordered of a defendant alleged to be impotent; 47 La. 876-88; 29 Kan. 460, 474. See also 19 Cent. L. J. 144-48 and 2 Bish. M. & D. § 590, and cases cited in both.

Impotence is a statutory ground of divorce in most states, and in some courts it is held that jurisdiction of suits for nullity, is impliedly conferred with jurisdiction in divorce; Tiffany, Pers. & Dom. Rel. 89. See 35 Vt. 365; 88 Md. 401. Where this defect existed at the time of the marriage and was incurable, by the ecclesiastical law and the law of several of the American states, the marriage may be declared void ab initio; Comyns, Dig. Baron and Femme (C) 8; Bacon, Abr. Marriage, etc. (E) 8; 1 Bla. Com. 440; 1 Beck, Med. Jur. 67; Code, 5. 17. 10; 5 Paige, Ch. 554; 25 N. H. 267; but see Hopk. Ch. 557. Impotency arising from idiocy intervening after the marriage is no ground for divorce in Vermont; 2 Atk. 188; see Merlin, Rep. impuissance. But it seems the party naturally impotent cannot allege that fact for the purpose of obtaining a divorce; 8 Phill. Eccl. 147; 1 Eng. Eccl. 184. See 2 Phill. Eccl. 10; 8 id. 325; 1 Eng. Eccl. 408; 1 Chitty, Med. Jur. 877; Ryan, Med. Jur. 95-111; Bish. Marr. & D.; 1 Bla. Com. 440; 1 Hagg. 725. See, as to the signs of impotence, 1 Briand, Méd. Lég. c. 2, art. 2, § 2, n. 1; Dictionnaire des Sciences médicales, art. Impuissance; and generally, Trebuchet, Jur. de la Méd. 100; 1 State Tr. 815; 8 id. App. no. 1, p. 23; 3 Phill. 147; 1 Hagg. Eccl. 523; Foderé, Méd. Lég. § 287.

IMPOTENTIAM, PROPERTY PROPTER. A qualified property, which may subsist in animals feræ naturæ, on account of their inability, as where hawks, herons, or other birds build in a person's trees, or cones, etc., make their nests or burrows in a person's land, and have young there, such person has a qualified property in them till they can fly or run away, and then such property expires. 3 Steph. Com. 7th ed. 8.

IMPOUND. To place in a pound goods or cattle distrained or astray. 3 Bla. Com. 12; 120 Mass. 864. Also, to retain in the custody of the law. A suspicious instrument produced at a trial is said to be impounded, when it is ordered by the court to be retained, in case criminal proceedings should be taken.

IMPRESCRIPTIBILITY. The state of being incapable of prescription.

A property which is held in trust is imprescriptible: that is, the trustee cannot acquire a title to it by prescription; nor can the borrower of a thing get a right to it by any lapse of time, unless he claims an adverse right to it during the time required by law.

IMPRESCRIPTIBLE RIGHTS. Such as a person may use or not, at pleasure, since they cannot be lost to him by the claims of another founded on prescription.

IMPRESSION. A case involving a new state of facts or a question yet undetermined and therefore without precedent is usually termed a "case of first impression."

IMPRESSMENT. The arresting and retaining mariners for the king's service. 1 Bla. Com. 420; 3 Steph. Com. 594.

It was "the mode formerly resorted to of manning the British navy. The practice had not only the sanction of custom, but the force of law, for many acts of parliament, from the reign of Philip and Mary to that of George III. had been passed to regulate the system of impressment. Impressment consisted in seizing by force, for service in the royal navy, seamen, river-watermen, and at times landmen, when state emergencies rendered them necessary. An armed party of reliable men, commanded by officers, usually proceeded to such houses in the seaport towns as were supposed to be the resort of the seafaring population, laid violent hands on all eligible men and conveyed them forcibly to the ships of war in the harbor. As it was not in the nature of sailors to yield without a struggle, many terrible fights took place between the press-gangs and their intended victims—combats in which lives were often lost. In point of justice there is little, if anything, to be said for impressment, which had not even the merit of an impartial selection from the whole available population;" Int. Ovc.

IMPREST MONEY. Money paid on enlisting or impressing soldiers or sailors.

In Old English Law. Money given out for a certain purpose to be afterwards accounted for. Money advanced by the crown to be employed for its own purpose in connection with the government, as in the case of secret service money. See Man. Exch. Fr. 17; 13 Eliz. c. 4; 1 Mad. Exch. c. 10, 13, p. 387; 6 Price 424 a; and Public Revenues Acts of New Zealand.

IMPRETIABILIS (Lat.). Beyond price; invaluable.

IMPRIMATUR (Lat.). A license or allowance to one to print.

At one time, before a book could be printed in England, it was requisite that a permission should be obtained: that permission was called an imprimatur. In some countries where the press is liable to censorship, an imprimatur is required.

IMPRIMERE. To press upon; to impress or press; to imprint or print.

IMPRIMERY. In some of the ancient English statutes this word is used to signify a printing office; the art of printing; a print or impression.

IMPRIMIS (Lat.). In the first place. It is commonly used to denote the first clause in an instrument, especially in wills, item being used to denote the subsequent clauses. This is also its classical and literal meaning. Ainsworth, Dict. See Fleta, lib. 2. c. 54. Imprimis and imprimum also occur. Du Cange; Prec. Ch. 430; Cases temp. Talb. 110; 6 Madd. 81; Magna Cart. 9 Hen. III.; 2 Anc. Laws & Inst. of Eng. The use of imprimis does not import a precedence of the bequest to which it is prefixed; 59 Me. 325; 1 Rep. Leg. 428.

IMPRISON. To confine; to put in prison; to detain in custody.

IMPRISONMENT. The restraint of a man's liberty.

The restraint of a person contrary to his will. Co. 2d Inst. 589; Bald. 289, 600.

It may be in a place made use of for purposes of imprisonment generally, or in one used only on the particular occasion, or by words and an array of force, without bolts or bars, in any locality whatever; 9 N. H. 491; 7 Humphr. 43; 13 Ark. 43; Webb, Poll. Torts 259; 1 W. Bla. 19; 7 Q. B. 742; but it cannot be applied to the detention of a youth in a reform school; 52 N. W. Rep. (Minn.) 935. A forcible detention in the street, or the touching of a person by a peace-officer by way of arrest, are also imprisonments; Bac. Abr. Trespass (D. 3); 1 Esp. 431, 526; 3 Harr. (Del.) 416. See 7 Humphr. 43; 26 How. Pr. 84. It is not necessary to touch the person, but it is enough if he is within the power of the officer and submits; 100 Mass. 79. Forcibly taking a person in an omnibus across a city; 92 Mich. 498; or where a person is constantly guarded by detectives so that he is at no time free to come and go as he pleases, but his movements are at all times subject to the control and direction of those who have him in charge; 36 Fed. Rep. 252; constitute imprisonment. It has been decided that lifting up a person in his chair and carrying him out of the room in which he was sitting with others, and excluding him from the room, was not an imprisonment; 1 Chitty, Pr. 48; and the merely giving charge of a person to a peace-officer, not followed by any actual apprehension of the person, does not amount to an imprisonment, though the party, to avoid it, next day attend at a police court; 3 B. & P. 211; 1 C. & P. 153; and if, in consequence of a message from a sheriff's officer holding a writ, the defendant execute and send him a bail bond, such submission to the process will not constitute an arrest; 6 B. & C. 528; D. & R. 233. No other warrant is necessary for the detention of a prisoner than a certified copy of the judgment against him; 32 Cal. 48; or of the precept on which the arrest was made; 9 N. H. 185.

It is not error in a judgment in a criminal case, to make one term of imprisonment commence where another terminates; 153 U. S. 308.

See, FALSE IMPRISONMENT; ARREST; INFAMY; FELONY; ACCUMULATIVE SENTENCES; PERSONAL LIBERTY.

IMPRIST. Followers; partisans; adherents; supporters. Those who take the part of or side with another in attack or defence.

IMPROBATION. In Scotch Law. An act by which falsehood and forgery are proved. Erskine, Inst. 4. 119; Stair, Inst. 4. 20.

The setting aside of deeds or other writings prima facie probative, on the ground of falsehood or forgery. Bell, Dict.

Under the Scotch division of action into ordinary and reconditory the latter are further divided into (1) actions of proper impropriation; (2) actions of reduction-improvement; (3) actions of simple reduction.

Proper impropriations are brought for declaring writings false or forged. The proof in this proceeding is either direct by the testimony of the writer and the instrumentary witnesses, or indirect from circumstances or intrinsig arguments. If one of two instrumentary witnesses supports the writing and the other does not, the writing is nullified; but the user will not be subjected to the payment of falsehood being supported by one witness. Where witnesses test the deed without knowing the grantor and seeing him subscribe, or hearing him own his subscription, the deed is not only improvable but such witnesses are declared accessory to forgery; Ersk. Pr. iv. 1. 5, iv. 1. 37.

Reduction-improvement is an action whereby a person who may be hurt or affected by a writing, insists on its production in court in order to have it set aside or its effects ascertained under the certificate, if the writing, if not produced, shall be declared false and forged. This certification is a fiction of law, introduced that the production of the writing may be effectually forced; and therefore it acts only in the effects of the pursuer; so that the writing, though declared false, continues in full force in all questions with third party; id. iv. 1. 5.

In simple reduction the certification is only temporary, the effect though not the form being to declare the writings null until within the period allowed with opening up decrees in absence, or on default they be produced; so that they recover their full force after production, even against the pursuer himself; id. iv. 1. 6. The most usual grounds of reduction of writings are, the want of the requisite solemnities; or that the grantor was minor; or interdicted; or inhibited; or, formerly, that he signed the deed on his death-bed; or, both formerly and now, that the deed was compelled or frightened into it; or was circumvented; that it granted in prejudice of his lawful creditors; id. iv. 1. 9.

IMPROPER. Not suitable; unfit; not suited to the character, time, and place. 48 N. H. 196.

Improper conduct is such as a man of ordinary and reasonable care and prudence, under the circumstances, would not have been guilty of. 16 A. & E. Ency. 2nd ed., 57; 48 N. H. 211.

IMPROPER FEUD. "Under the title of improper or derivative feuds were comprised all such as do not fall within the other descriptions; such, for instance, as were originally bartered and sold to the feudatory for a price; such as were held upon base or less honorable service, or upon a rent, in lieu of military services; such as were in themselves, alienable, without mutual license; and such as might descend indifferently either to males or females. But, where a difference was not expressed in the creation, such new created feuds did in all respects follow the nature of an original, genuine, and proper feud." 1 Bla. Com. 58. See FEUDUM.

IMPROPER NAVIGATION. The navigation of a ship without due care and skill. It includes anything wrongly done with a ship, or any part of it, in the course of the voyage; L. R. 6 C. P. 563.

IMPROPRIATION. In Ecclesiastical Law. The act of employing the revenues of a church living to one's own use; it is also a parsonage or ecclesiastical living in the hands of a layman, or which descends by inheritance. Techn. Dict.

The transfer to a layman of a benefice to which the cure of souls is annexed with an obligation to provide with a performance of the spiritual duties attached to the benefice is said to be nearly the same as an appropriation. Holth. Before the Reformation the terms were used without a very clear distinction, and appropriations by spiritual persons and incorporation were termed impropriation. Later the use of the latter word was restricted by Spelman and others to appropriation by laymen. Moz. & W.

The distinction is thus clearly stated: The practice of impropriation differs from the somewhat similar but more ancient usage of appropriation, inasmuch as the latter supposes the revenues of the appropriated benefice to be transferred to ecclesiastical or quasi-ecclesiastical persons or bodies, as to a certain degree in a convent, a college, a hospital; while impropriation applies that the temporalities of the benefice are enjoyed by a layman; the name, according to Spelman, being given in consequence of their thus being improperly applied, diverted from their legitimate use. The practice of impropriation still more that of appropriation, as in the case of monasteries, etc., and other religious houses, prevailed extensively in England before the Reformation; and on the suppression of the monasteries, all such rights were by 27 Henry VIII. c. 28, and 21 Henry VIII. c. 13 vested in the crown, and were by the crown freely transferred to laymen, to whose heirs have thus descended, not only the right to the tithes, but also in many cases the entire property of rectories. The spiritual duties of such rectories are discharged by a clergyman, who is called a vicar, and who receives a certain portion of the emoluments of the living, generally consisting of a part of the glebe-land of the parsonage, together with what are called the "small tithes" of the parish. Int. Cyc.

The word impropriation is said to be derived from impropietatem, because the living is held as a lay property. Phill. Ecc. L. 273.

An impropriator rector was the term applied to a lay rector as opposed to a spiritual rector; and tithes in the hands of a lay owner were called impropriate tithes, as those in the hands of a spiritual owner were termed appropriate tithes.

See 1 Bla. Com. 384; 2 Steph. Com. 678; Brown, Dict.; APPROPRIATION.

IMPROVE. To cultivate; to reclaim. 4 Cow. 190.

"Improved" land may mean simply land "occupied;" it is not a precise technical word; 8 Allen 219; it includes ground appropriated for a railroad; 68 Pa. 396.

Land on which there are three dwelling-houses, besides suitable farm buildings, which has been farmed for the last twenty years, and from which, in the last eighteen years, there has been received $12,000 in rents, besides a share of the landlord in the growing crops, is not "unimproved real estate," as that phrase is used in a will; 173 Pa. 320; and the fact that the property was bought by the testator for the purpose of being cut into city lots, and sold as such, does not render it "unimproved" land; id.

In Scotch Law. To impeach as false or forged. To improve a lease means to grant a lease of unusual duration, to encourage a tenant, when the soil is exhausted, etc. Bell, Dict.; Stair, Inst. 676.

IMPROVEMENT. An amelioration in the condition of real or personal property effected by the expenditure of labor or money for the purpose of rendering it useful for other purposes than those for which it was originally used, or more useful for the same purposes. It includes repairs or addition to buildings, and the erection of fences, barns, etc.; 70 Pa. 98; 16 How. Pr. 220; 10 So. Rep. (Ala.) 157; 1 Cush. 93; 78 N. Y. 1, 581; or a windmill; 49 Kan. 434.

As between the rightful owner of lands and an occupant who in good faith has put on improvements, the land with its improvements belongs to the rightful owner of the land, without compensation for the increased value at common law; 8 Wheat. 1; 1 Dana 481; 3 Ohio St. 483; 4 McLean 489; 5 Johns. 272; 2 Paine 74; 66 Miss. 21; 7 Ind. App. 561; though the rule may be otherwise in equity; 3 Atk. 134; 8 Sneed 228; 1 Yerg. 380; 24 Vt. 580; 2 Johns. Cas. 441; 133 U. S. 553; see 133 Id. 21; and by statute in some of the states; 10 Cush. 451; 2 N. H. 115; 20 Vt. 614; 13 Ala. N. S. 31; 9 Me. 62; 13 Ohio 308; 9 Ill. 87; 9 Ga. 133; 12 B. Monr. 195; 16 La. 423; 3 Cal. 69; 1 Zab. 248; 38 Minn. 433; 87 Fed. Rep. 756; and their value may be offset to an action for mesne profits at common law; 2 Wash. C. C. 165; 4 Cow. 168; 4 Dev. N. C. 85; 6 Humphr. 824; 1 Story 478; 2 Greene 151; 8 La. 63. See 95 Mich. 819; 153 Pa. 238. A life tenant is not entitled to payment for improvements made by him without the consent of the remaindermen; 127 Pa. 348; 37 Fed. Rep. 756; 40 Minn. 450. In determining the right to recover for improvements placed on land, ordinary repairs necessary for the enjoyment of the object sold cannot be classed as improvements; 41 La. Ann. 6.

As to donor in improvements, see DOWER, and as to improvement in Patent Law, see PATENT, LOCAL IMPROVEMENT, ORIGINAL IMPROVEMENT, PUBLIC UTILITY.

IMPROVIDENCE. Such want of care and foresight in the management of property as would be likely to render it less valuable and impair the interests of those who may be or become entitled to it. Such is the construction of the word in a statute excluding one found incompetent by reason of improvidence, to perform the duties of an administrator; 1 Barb. Ch. 45. See also 14 N. Y. 449; 4 Redf. 218.

IMPRUAMENTUM. Improvement of land, from impruare, to improve it.

IMPURER (Lat.). In Civil Law. One who is more than seven years old, or out of infancy, and who has not attained the age of puberty; that is, if a boy, till he has attained his full age of fourteen years, and if a girl, her full age of twelve years. Donat. Lib. Prél. t. 2, a. 2, n. 8.

IMPULSE. See IRRESISTIBLE IMPULSE.

IMPULSIVE INSANITY. That form of insanity by which the person is irresistibly impelled to the commission of an act. It is sometimes accompanied by delusions, and sometimes exists without them. The insanity may be patent in many ways, or it may be concealed. The cases are to be carefully distinguished from those where persons are impelled by passion merely. 15 Wall. (U. S.) 590.

IMPUNITY. Freedom or safety from punishment. The phrase impunitive damages was said to be unintelligible; 36 Tex. 153.

IMPUTATIO. In Civil Law. Legal liability.

IMPUTATION OF PAYMENT. In Civil Law. The application of a payment made by a debtor to his creditor.

The rules covering this subject are thus stated, substantially, in Howe, Studies in the Civil Law, 156:—

1. The debtor may apply his payment as he pleases, with the exception that in case of a debt carrying interest it must be first applied to discharging the interest.

2. If the debtor makes no application, the creditor may apply the funds by informing the debtor at the time of payment.

3. The lanc imputes in the neglect of the parties to do so, and it will be made by the law in favor of the debtor. It directs that imputation which would have been best for the debtor at the time of payment. Hence it applies the funds to obligations most burdensome to the debtor: e. g. to a debt which is not disputed, rather than to one that is; to a debt that is due rather than to one that is not; to one on which the debtor may be arrested, rather than to one on which he cannot; to a debt for which the debtor has given sureties, rather than to one which he owes singly; to a debt for which the debtor is principal obligor, rather than one of which he is merely surety; to a mortgage rather than to an unsecured debt, and to a debt which would render the debtor insolvent if unpaid, rather than to any less important one.

4. Of debts of equal grade, if there be no imputation by the parties, the application will be to that of the longest standing.

5. To debts of the same date, and in other respects equal, the application will be pro rata.

6. As to debts bearing interest, the imputation is to interest before principal.

When the creditor is to pay himself out of a fund realized,—for example, from the sale of property pledged,—he should apply the money to the debt secured by the pledge, rather than to some other; to interest before principal; to the debt of the highest rank, rather than to those of lower rank; and if there are several of equal rank then pro rata.

Some of these rules have been followed in England and America, some decisions following the exact language of the Roman law. See 1 Sto. Ecq. Jur. 13th ed. § 459; but see APPROPRIATION OF PAYMENTS.

In Louisiana the preceding civil law rules are in force. The statutory enactment, Civ. Code, art. 2159, is a translation of the Code Napoleon, art. 1253-1256, slightly altered. See Pothier, Obl. n. 529, by Evans, and not—. Payment is imputed first to the discharge of interest; 1 Mart. La. N. S. 571; 5 La. Ann. 738. But if the interest was not binding, being usurious, the payment must go to the principal; 2 La. Ann. 683; 5 id. 616. The law applies a payment to the most burdensome debt; 10 La. 1. 337; 2 La. Ann. 405, 520. A creditor's receipt is an irrevocable imputation, except in cases of surprise or fraud; 2 La. Ann. 24; 3 id. 351, 810. See APPROPRIATION OF PAYMENTS.

IMPUTED NEGLIGENCE. See NEGLIGENCE.

IN. A preposition which is used in real estate law to designate title, seisin, or possession, or when one is said to be "in by lease of his lessor." It may be as an abbreviation of invested or intitled, or of in possession.

In English, as a preposition means within, inside of, surrounded by. Anderson; 31 Hun, 245. Under a statute requiring notices to be posted "in" public places, a posting "at" such places may not be sufficient. Id.; 51 Wis. 71. In a bond payable "in twenty-five years" means, at the end of that period, not within nor at any time during the period. Id.; 115 Pa. 446.

In English, as an adverb: not out, within; invested with title or possession: as, "in" by descent, "in" by purchase. Id.

In Latin. In; into; upon; against. Abbott.

"IN ACCORDANCE WITH THIS ACT." The Supreme Court of the Territory of New Mexico construed the words "in accordance with this act" as meaning "under this act." 231 U. S. 169.

IN ACTION. A thing is said to be in action when it is not in possession, and for its recovery, the possessor unwilling, an action is necessary. 2 Bla. Com. 396. See CHOSE IN ACTION.

IN ACTUAL USE. In the statute which provides for the exemption from duty of certain importations, the words "not merchandise" relate to the words "wearing apparel in actual use" as well as to the words "personal effects." The words "not merchandise" thus used may properly be regarded as explaining and defining the words "in actual use," and the clause may be rightly construed as if those were synonymous or correlative terms. 111 U. S. 206. See ACTUAL.

IN ADDITION TO. The words "in addition to" do not carry with them any idea of sequence or order of time, but as being synonymous with also, moreover, likewise, they not only fail to aptly express the idea of dependence or sequence, but they do not express it at all. 14 Bush (Ky.) 625.

IN ADVERSUM. Where a decree is obtained against one who resists, it is termed "a decree not by consent but in adversum." 3 Sto. 313.

IN AEDIFICATIO (Lat.). In Civil Law. Building on another's land with one's own materials, or on one's own land with another's materials. L. 7, §§ 10, 18, D. de Acquis. Rer. Domin.; Henneccius, Elem. Jur. Civ. § 363. The word is especially used of a private person's building so as to encroach upon the public land. Calvinus, Lex. The right of possession of the materials yields to the right to what is on the soil. Id. See ACCRETION.

IN AËQUA MANU. In equal hand. Fleta, l. 3, c. 14, § 2.

IN AËQUALI JURE (Lat.). In equal right. See MAXIMS.

IN AËQUALI MANU. In equal hand; held indifferently between two parties. Where an instrument was deposited by the parties to it, in the hands of a third person, to hold it under certain conditions or stipulations it was said to be held in aequali manu. Reg. Orig. 28.

IN ALIENO SOLO. On another's land. 2 Steph. Com. 20.

IN ALIO LOCO. See CEPIT IN ALIO LOCO.

IN AMBIGUA VOCE LEGIS (Lat.). In an ambiguous expression of law.

IN AMBIGUO. In doubt.

IN AMITY. The fact that an Indian tribe which committed depredations was carrying on hostilities only to resist the opening of a military road does not permit its being considered a tribe "in amity" with the United States within the meaning of the act of congress of March 3, 1891, concerning a claim for Indian depredations; 161 U. S. 291.

IN ANTEA (L. Lat.). Henceforth; in future.

IN APERTA LUCE. In open daylight; in the day-time. 9 Co. 65 b.

IN APICIBUS JURIS. Among the subtleties or extreme doctrines of the law. 1 Kames, Eq. 190.

IN ARBITRIUM JUDICIS. At the pleasure of the judge.

IN ARCTA ET SALVA CUSTODIA. In close and safe custody. 3 Bla. Com. 415.

IN ARTICULO MORTIS. At the point of death.

IN AUTRE, or AUTER, DROIT (L. Fr.). In another's right. As representing another. An executor, administrator, or trustee sues in autre droit.

Where two estates come to one person, so that if in the same right they would merge, if one of them be in autre droit, there will be no merger. 2 Bla. Com. 177, but see Sharsw. note 17.

IN AUTER SOILE (L. Fr.). In or on another's land.

IN BANCO. In banc (q. v.).

The judges of the three superior courts of common law in England sit during the term, and also in vacation, if they so determine, for the dispatch of business, in their full courts, but the puisne Judges sit by rotation, in each term, or otherwise, as they agree among themselves, so that no greater number than three of them sit at the same time in banc, unless in the absence of the Lord Chief Justice or Chief Baron, the number of the Judges forming the full court in banc being limited to four. The usual business brought on before the court in banc are arguments on demurrers, rules in arrest of judgment, and for new trials, etc. Wharton.

IN BLANK. Without restriction. Applied to indorsements on promissory notes where no indorsee is named. See INDORSEMENT.

IN BONIS. Among the goods, or property; in actual possession. Inst. 4, 2, 2. In bonis defuncti, among the goods of the deceased.

IN CAMERA. A case is said to be heard in camera when the doors of the court are closed and only persons concerned in the case are admitted. This is done when the facts are such as to make a private hearing expedient, as in some divorce cases. The term belongs rather to the English law of practice in which the power to grant private hearings in certain cases is established, though there has been a difference of opinion as to its exact limitations.

It was said by Lord Eldon that it was the uniform practice in chancery, as long as the court had existed, in the case of family disputes, on the application of counsel on both sides, to hear the same in the chancellor's private room, and that what was so done was not the act of the judge but of the parties; Coop. t. Eldon 106; in a later case, on application for a private hearing relating to the custody of a young lady who was a ward of the court, Lord Brougham directed the case to be heard in private on the assurance of counsel that such course was proper, notwithstanding that one party withheld his consent; 3 Russ. & M. 689; and it is noted that this course was frequently followed by the same judge: id. In a patent case, the court being of opinion that the patent was valid, permitted the defendant to state his secret process in camera; 24 Ch. D. 156; an application for an injunction to restrain a solicitor from disclosing confidential information was ordered to be heard in private without consent of defendant, upon the statement of plaintiff's counsel that in his opinion a public hearing would defeat the object of the action; 31 Ch. D. 55; 9 Ch. App. 522; but this will not be done without consent of both parties unless it is clear that such would be the result of a public hearing; id. Jessell, M. R., considered that a private hearing was not within the power of the court, even by consent, except in cases affecting lunatics, or wards of court, or where the object of the action would be otherwise defeated, or in those cases where the practice of the old ecclesiastical courts is continued; 4 Ch. D. 173. It has been held that, following that practice, suits for nullity of marriage or judicial separation may be heard in camera, but not a petition for dissolution of marriage; L. R. 1 P. & D. 640; this case was put upon the ground that the matter was controlled, to that result, by 20 & 21 Vict. c. 85, § 22; but in a later case there was a distinct disapproval of the limitation, and it was said that as the ecclesiastical courts had the power to hear nullity suits in private when it was desirable for the sake of public decency, the same power must exist in other cases where it was required for the same reason; 1 L. R. 3 P. & M. 230. It is also held that under the present English practice, a law court has power to try a case in camera, without a jury, when the parties consent; 53 J. P. 822.

The term in camera is not used in American law, but the constitutional provision in most of the state constitutions and in the sixth amendment of the federal constitution, securing the right of a person accused to a speedy and public trial, gives rise to a question of constitutional law entirely different from the question of practice under English law. As to this subject, see OPEN COURT. A hearing in camera also differs from one at chambers (q. v.); the former being a private hearing by a court and the latter a hearing by a judge not in a regular session of court.

IN CAPITA (Lat.). To or by the heads or polls. Thus, where persons succeed to estates in capita, they take each an equal share; so, where a challenge to a jury is in capita, it is to the polls, or to the jurors individually, as opposed to a challenge to the array. 3 Bla. Com. 361. Per capita is more commonly used in the former instance.

IN CAPITE (Lat.). In chief. A tenant in capite was one who held directly of the crown, 2 Bla. Com. 60, whether by knight's service or socage. Chal. R. P. 5. But tenure in capite was of two kinds, general and special; the first from the king (caput regni), the second from a lord (caput feudi). A holding of an honor in the king's lands, but not immediately of him, was yet a holding in capite; Kitch. 127; Dy. 44; Fitzh. N. B. 5. Abolished by 12 Car. II. c. 24.

IN CASU PROVISIO. In a (or the) case provided. In tali casu editum et provisum, in such case made and provided. Touch. Pl. 164, 165.

IN CAUSA. In the cause, as distinguished from in initialibus (q. v.), a term in Scotch practice. 1 Brown, Ch. 252.

IN CHIEF. Principal; primary; directly obtained. A term applied to the evidence obtained from a witness upon his examination in court by the party producing him, in relation to the matter in issue at the trial. The examination so conducted for this purpose.

Evidence or examination in chief is to be distinguished from evidence given on cross-examination and from evidence given upon the voir dire.

Evidence in chief should be confined to such matters as the pleadings and the opening warrant; and a departure from this rule will be sometimes highly inconvenient, if not fatal. Suppose, for example, that two assaults have been committed, one in January and the other in February, and the plaintiff prove his cause of action to have been the assault in January; he cannot abandon that, and afterwards prove another committed in February, unless the pleadings and openings extend to both; 1 Campb. 473. See, also, 6 C. & P. 73; 1 Mood. & R. 282.

This matter, however, is one of practice; and a great variety of rules exist in the different states of the United States, the leading object, however, being in all cases the same,—to prevent the plaintiff from introducing in evidence a different case from the one which he had prepared the defendant to expect from the pleadings.

IN THE CLEAR. In Railroad Parlance. A conductor whose train is on a siding and which is too long to be "in the clear" of the main track at both ends, is guilty of negligence in giving an order to back up when he knows by so doing he will run the rear of the train into a closed switch, and injure property and derail cars. 156 Ky. 550, 161 S. W. 557.

IN COMMENDAM (Lat.). The state or condition of a church living which is void or vacant, and which is commended to the care of some one. In Louisiana, there is a species of limited partnership called partnership in commendam. See COMMENDAM.

IN COMMUNI. In common. Fleta, lib. 3, c. 4, § 2.

IN CONCURSU. See CONCURSU.

IN CONSIDERATIONE EJUS. In his sight or view. 12 Mod. 85.

IN CONSIDERATIONE INDE. In consideration thereof. 3 Salk. 64, pl. 5.

IN CONSIDERATIONE LEGIS. In consideration or contemplation of law; in abeyance. Dyer 102 b.

IN CONSIDERATIONE PRÆMISSORUM. In consideration of the premises. 1 Strange 585.

IN CONSPPECTU EJUS. In his sight or view. Burrill; 12 Mod. 95.

IN CONTINENTI. Immediately; without any interval or intermission. Dig. 44, 5, 1. Sometimes written in one word, "incontinenti."

IN CORPORE. In body or substance; in a material thing or object.

IN COURT. See IN PAIS.

IN CRASTINO. On the morrow. In crastino Animarum, on the morrow of All Souls. 1 Bla. Com. 342.

IN CUJUS REI TESTIMONIUM. In testimony whereof; q. v.

IN CURRENT FUNDS. "In current funds" used in a certificate of deposit means lawful money of the United States. 3 Ky. Opin. 524.

IN CUSTODIA LEGIS (Lat.). In the custody of the law. In general, when things are in custodia legis, they cannot be distrained, nor otherwise interfered with by a private person, or by another officer acting under authority of a different court or jurisdiction; 10 Pet. 400; 20 How. 583, and cases cited; 75 Md. 445. See CUSTODIA LEGIS.

IN DEFENSO. In defence; in a state of prohibition; in fence; inclosed. A term applied, in old English Law, to lands either actually surrounded by an enclosure, or otherwise exclusively appropriated. Burrill. See DEFENSUM; DEFENSA; DEFENDERE.

IN DELICTO. In fault. See IN PARI DELICTO.

IN DIEM. For a day; for the space of a day. Calv. Lex.

On, or at a day. In diem debitum; a debt due at a certain day. Burrill.

IN DOMINICO. In demesne. In dominico suo ut de feodo, in his demesne as of fee.

IN DORSO. On the back, from which come indorse, indorsement. 2 Bla. Com. 468. In dorso recordi, on the back of the record. 5 Co. 45.

IN DUBIO. In doubt; either in a condition of uncertainty, or in a doubtful case.

IN DUE COURSE. See INDORSEE IN DUE COURSE.

IN DUPLO. In double. Damna in duplo, double damages. Fleta, 4. 10. 1.

IN EADEM CAUSA. In the same state or condition. Calv. Lex.

IN EMULATIONEM VICINI. In hatred or envy of a neighbor. Where an act is done or action brought, solely to hurt or distress another, it is said to be in emulationem vicini. 1 Kames, Eq. 56.

IN EQUITY. In a court of chancery in contra-distinction to a court of law; within the contemplation or purview of equity jurisprudence; according to the doctrine of equity.

IN ESSE (Lat.). In being. In existence. An event which may happen is in posse; when it has happened, it is in esse. The term is often used of liens or estates. A child in its mother's womb is, for some purposes, regarded as in esse; 3 Barb. Ch. 488.

IN EST DE JURE (Lat.). It is implied of right or by law.

IN EVIDENCE. The proofs in a cause which have been offered and admitted are said to be in evidence.

IN EXCAMBIA. In exchange. The technical and formal words in an old deed of exchange.

IN EXECUTION AND PURSUANCE OF. Words used to express the fact that the instrument is intended to carry into effect some other instrument, as in case of a deed in execution of a power. They are said to be synonymous with "to effect the object of;" 7 Biss. 129.

IN EXITU. In issue. De materia in exitu, of the matter in issue. 12 Mod. 372.

IN EXTENSO. Fully; at length; a copy of a document made verbatim.

IN EXTREMIS (Lat.). At the very end. In the last moments; on the point of death.

IN FACIE CURIE. In the face of the court. Dyer 28.

IN FACIE ECCLESIE (Lat.). In the face or presence of the church. A marriage is said to be made in facie ecclesie when made in a consecrated church or chapel, or by a clerk in orders elsewhere; and one of these two things is necessary to a marriage in England in order to the wife's having dower, unless there be a dispensation or license; 1 Bish. Mar. Div. & Sep. 404, 405. But see 6 & 7 Will. IV. c. 85; 1 Vict. c. 22; 3 & 4 Vict. c. 72. It was anciently the practice to marry at the church-door, and there make a verbal assignment of dower. These verbal assignments, to prevent fraud, were necessarily held valid only when made in facie et ad ostium ecclesie. See 2 Bla. Com. 103; Taylor, Gloss.

IN FACIENDO (Lat.). In doing. Story, Eq. Jur. § 1308.

IN FACT. Words used in pleading to introduce an amount of fact,—as "the said plaintiff (or defendant) further in fact saith"—indicating that what follows is a statement of acts of parties as distinguished from a legal conclusion or intentment. The latter in equity pleading, when it may frequently be proper, after a statement of the facts on which the conclusion rests, begins,—and the defendant is advised that, etc. "When pleadings were in Latin the words in facto were used, thus in facto dicti, he, in fact, says. See 1 Salk. 22 Pl. 1.

In reality; in a matter of fact. Opposed to "in law" (q. v.); in a matter of law; empowered by law; imputed in law; as, an attorney in fact, and an attorney at-law; error or fraud in fact and in law.

"Fact" is contrasted with "law." Law is a principle, fact is an event; law is conceived, fact is actual; law is a rule of duty, fact is that which accords with or contravenes the rule. Anderson.

Facts, not evidence, are to be pleaded; and are proven by moral evidence. Questions of fact are said to be solved by the jury, questions of law by the court. Id.

Questions, issues, conclusions, and errors are of law or of fact, or of mixed law and fact. Id.

IN FAVOREM LIBERTATIS (Lat.). In favor of liberty.

IN FAVOREM VITAE (Lat.). In favor of life.

IN FEODO. In fee. Bract. f. 207; Fleta, l. 2, c. 64, § 15. Seisitus in feodo, seised in fee. Id. 8, 7, 1.

IN FIERI (Lat.). In process of completion. A thing is said to rest in fieri when it is not yet complete: e. g. the records of a court were anciently held to be in fieri, or incomplete, till they were recorded on parchment, but now till the giving of judgment, after which they can be amended only during the same term. 2 B. & Ad. 791; 3 Bla. Com. 407. It is also used of contracts.

IN FINE (Lat.). At the end. A term used with a citation to denote that it is at the end of the section, chapter, book, law, or paragraph.

IN FORMA PAUPERIS (Lat.). In the character or form of a poor man.

When a person is so poor that he cannot bear the charges of suing at law or in equity, upon making oath that he is not worth five pounds, and bringing a certificate from a counsellor at law that he believes him to have a just cause, he is permitted to sue in forma pauperis, in the manner of a pauper; that is, he is allowed to have original writs and subpoenas gratis, and counsel assigned him without fee; 3 Bla. Com. 400. See 3 Johns. Ch. 65; 1 Paige, Ch. 588; 3 id. 273; 5 id. 58; 2 Moll. 475.

IN FORO. In the forum (q. v.); before the tribunal or court.

IN FORO CONSCIENTIÆ (Lat.). Before the tribunal of conscience; conscientiously. The term is applied to moral obligations as distinct from the obligations which the law enforces. In the sale of property, for example, the concealment of facts by the vendee which may enhance the price is wrong in foro conscientia, but there is no legal obligation on the part of the vendee to disclose them, and the contract will be good if not vitiated by fraud; Pothier, Vent. part 2, c. 2, n. 233; 2 Wheat. 185, note v.

IN FORO CONTENTIOSO. In the tribunal or forum of litigation.

In a contentious court. Taylor's L. Gloss.

IN FORO ECCLESIASTICO. In an ecclesiastical forum, tribunal, or court. Fleta, l. 2, c. 57, § 14. Early in the reign of Henry III., the Episcopal constitutions were published, forbidding all ecclesiastics to appear as advocates in foro seculari, nor did they long continue to act as judges there, not caring to take the oath of office which was found necessary. 1 Bla. Com. 20.

IN FORO SÆCULARI. In a secular court. See last title; 1 Bla. Com. 20; Fleta 2, 57, 14.

IN FRAUDEM CREDITORUM (Lat.). In fraud of creditors or with an intent to defraud them. Inst. l. 6, 8.

IN FRAUDEM LEGIS (Lat.). In fraud of the law; contrary to law. Taylor, Gloss. Using process of law for a fraudulent purpose. If a person gets an affidavit of service of declaration in ejectment, and thereupon gets judgment and turns the tenant out, when he has no manner of title in a house, he is liable as a felon, for he used the process of law in fraudem legis; 1 Ld. Raym. 276; Sid. 334.

An act done in fraudem legis cannot give a right of action in the courts of the country whose laws are evaded; 1 Johns. 433.

IN FULL. Complete, or without abbreviation, e. g. a copy of a paper. Of the entire amount due, as used in a receipt for money.

IN FULL LIFE. Neither physically nor civilly dead. The term life alone has also been taken in the same sense, as including natural and civil life: e. g. a lease made to a person during life is determined by a civil death, but if during natural life it would be otherwise. 2 Co. 48. It is a translation of the French phrase en plein vie. Law Fr. & L. Lat. Dict.

IN THE FULLEST CONFIDENCE. As Used in Will. The phrase "in the fullest confidence" as used in a will is considered sufficient to raise a trust where the subject and object are sufficiently certain. 75 Ky. 128.

IN FUTURO. At a future time. The alternative expressions are in presenti and in esse. 2 Bla. Com. 166, 175.

IN GENERALI PASSAGIO (L. Lat.). In the general passage; passagium being a journey, or, more properly, a voyage, and especially when used alone or with the adjectives magnum, generale, etc.,—the journey to Jerusalem of a crusader, especially of a king. 30 Hen. III.; 3 Prynn, Collect. 767; Du Cange.

In generali passagio was an excuse for non-appearance in a suit, which put off the hearing sine die; but in simplici peregrinatione or passagio—i. e. being absent on a private pilgrimage to the Holy Land—put off the hearing for a shorter time. Bracton 838.

IN GENERE (Lat.). In kind; of the same kind. Things which when bailed may be restored in genere, as distinguished from those which must be returned in specie, or specifically, are called fungibiles. Kaufman's Mackelday, Civ. Law § 148, note. Heineccius, Elem. Jur. Civ. § 619, defines genus as what the philosophers call species, viz.: a kind. See Dig. 12. 1. 2. 1. See LOAN FOR CONSUMPTION.

IN GREMIO LEGIS (Lat.). In the bosom of the law. This is a figurative expression, by which is meant that the subject is under the protection of the law: as, where the title to land is in abeyance. See GREMIUM; IN NUBIBUS; ABEYANCE.

IN GROSS. At large; not appurtenant or appendant, but annexed to a man's person: e. g. common granted to a man and his heirs by deed is common in gross; or common in gross may be claimed by prescriptive right. 2 Bla. Com. 34. See EASEMENT.

IN HAC PARTE. In this behalf; on this part or side.

IN HAC VERBA. In these words.

IN HOC. In this.

IN HUNC MODUM (L. Lat.). After this manner.

IN HISDEM TERMINIS. In the same terms. 9 East 487.

IN INDIVIDUO. In the distinct individual, specific, or identical form. Sto. Bailm. § 97.

IN INFINITUM. Indefinitely; impotently to infinity.

IN INITIALIBUS (Lat.). In Scotch Law. In the preliminaries. Before a witness is examined as to the cause in which he is to testify, he must deny bearing malice or ill-will, being instructed what to say, or having been bribed, and these matters are called initialia testimoni, and the examination on them is said to be in initialibus: it is similar to our voir dire. Bell, Dict. Initialia Testimoni; Erskine, Inst. p. 451; Halkerton, Tech. Terms.

IN INITIO. At the beginning; in the beginning, as in initio legis, at the outset of the suit. Bract. f. 400.

IN INTEGRUM (Lat.). The original condition. See RESTITUTIO IN INTEGRUM. Vicat, Voc. Jur. integrer.

IN INVITUM (Lat.). Unwillingly. Taylor, Gloss. Against an unwilling party (or one who has not given his consent); by operation of law. Wharton, Dict.

IN IPSIS FAUCIBUS. In the very throat. A vessel just entering a port is said to be in ipsis faucibus portæ.

IN ITINERE (Lat.). On a journey; on the way. Justices in itinere were justices in eyre, who went on circuit through the kingdom for the purpose of hearing causes. 3 Bla. Com. 351; Spelman, Gloss. In itinere is used in the law of lien, and is there equivalent to in transitu; that is, not yet delivered to vendee.

IN JUDGMENT. In a court of justice.

A case is said to be in judgment when it has proceeded so far as that the successful party is entitled to judgment.

In a judgment seat: Lord Hale was characterized "one of the greatest and best men who ever sat in judgment." 1 East 806.

IN JUDICIO (Lat.). In or by a judicial proceeding; in court. In iudicio non creditur nisi juratis, in judicial proceedings no one is believed unless on oath. Cro. Car. 64. See Bracton, fol. 98 b, 106, 287 b.

In Civil Law. The proceedings before a prætor, from the bringing the action till issue joined, were said to be in iure; but after issue joined, when the cause came before the judez, the proceedings were said to be in iudicio. See JUDEX.

IN JURE (Lat. in law). In Civil Law. A phrase which denotes the proceedings in a cause before the prætor, up to the time when it is laid before a judez; that is, till issue joined (litis contestatio); also, the proceedings in causes tried throughout by the prætor (cognitiones extraordinariæ). Vicat, Voc. Jur. Jus.

In English Law. In law; rightfully; in right. In iure, non remota causa, sed proxima, spectatur.

IN JURE ALTERIUS. In another's right. Hale, Anal. § 28.

IN JURE PROPRIO. In one's right. Hale, Anal. § 28.

IN JUS VOCARE. To call, cite, or summon to court. Inst. 4, 10, 3; Calv. Lex. In jus vocando, summoning to court. 8 Bla. Com. 279.

IN KIND. Of the same class, description, or kind of property, as a deposit, mandate, or loan which is said to be returnable in kind where the terms and character of the transaction do not require the return of the identical money, security, or thing, but only its equivalent in amount or kind. See IN GENERE; LOAN FOR CONSUMPTION. KIND.

A payment of money, the delivery or deposit of an object, as of rent, or services rendered, are made or rendered "in kind," when of a thing or services which correspond in class or general nature to that intended. Opposed, in specie: in the identical state or condition, in exact terms. Anderson.

IN LAW. In contemplation of law; implied by law; subsisting by force of law. See IN FACT.

IN LECTO MORTALI. On a death-bed. Fleta, 5, 28, 12.

IN LIBERAM ELEMOSINAM (ELEMOSYNAM). In (or as of) a tree gift (or alms). Taylor's L. Gloss.

IN LIEU OF DOWER. The phrases "in lieu of dower" and "as dower" are often used interchangeably. 112 S. W. 911. See AS DOWER; DOWER.

IN LIKE MANNER. See ALSO.

IN LIMINE (Lat.). In or at the beginning. This phrase is frequently used: as, the courts are anxious to check crimes in limine.

IN LITEM (Lat.). For a suit; to the suit. Greenl. Ev. § 348.

IN LOCO. In place; in lieu; instead; in the place or stead. Townsh. Pl. 58.

IN LOCO PARENTIS (Lat.). In the place of a parent: as, the master stands towards his apprentice in loco parentis. See APPRENTICESHIP; GUARDIAN.

IN MAJOREM CAUTELAM. For greater security. 1 Stra. 105.

IN MALAM PARTEM. In a bad sense; so as to wear an evil appearance.

IN THE MANNER PROVIDED. See As PROVIDED.

IN MANU. See MANUS MARRIAGE.

IN MEDIAS RES (Lat.). In the middle of things; into the heart of the subject, without preface or introduction.

IN MEDIO. Intermediate.

In Scotch Law. A term denoting a fund in controversy in an action of double or multiple-pounding, which is a species of interpleader resorted to by a debtor distressed or threatened by two or more persons claiming the debt. While the subject in controversy continues in medio, any third person who conceives he has right to it may, though he should not be cited as a defender, produce his titles as if he were an original party to the suit, and he will be admitted for his interest in the competition. Ersk. Pr. 4, 1, 80.

IN MERCY. To be in mercy is to be at the discretion of the king, lord, or judge in punishing any offence not directly censured by the law. Thus, to be in the grievous mercy of the king is to be in hazard of a great penalty; 11 Hen. VI. c. 6. So, where the plaintiff failed in his suit, he and his pledges were in the mercy of the lord, pro falso clamore suo. This is retained nominally on the record; 3 Bla. Com. 376. So the defendant is in mercy if he fail in his defence; id. 398. See MERCY.

IN MISERICORDIA (Lat. in mercy). The entry on the record where a party was in mercy was, Ideo in misericordia, etc. The phrase was used because the punishment in such cases ought to be moderate. See Magna Cart. c. 14; Bracton, lib. 4, tr. 5, c. 6. Sometimes misericordia means the being quit of all amercedments (q. v.).

IN MITIORI SENSU (Lat. in a milder acceptance).

A phrase denoting a rule of construction formerly adopted in such suits, the object of which was to construe phrases, if possible, so that they would not support an action. Ingenuity was continually exercised to devise or discover a meaning which by some remote possibility the speaker might have intended; and some ludicrous examples of this ingenuity may be found. To say of a man who was making his livelihood by buying and selling merchandise, "He is a base, broken rascal; he has broken twice, and I'll make him break a third time," was gravely asserted not to be actionable.—"no poet dar porter action, car poet estre intend de burness & felony," Latch 114. And to call a man a thief was declared to be no slander, for this reason: "perhaps the speaker might mean he had stolen a lady's heart."

The rule now is to construe words agreeably to the meaning usually attached to them. It was long, however, before this rule, rational as it is, and supported by every legal analogy, prevailed in actions for words, and before the favorite doctrine of construing words in their mildest sense, in direct opposition to the finding of the jury, was finally abandoned by the courts. "For some inscrutable reason," said Gibson, J., "the earlier English judges discouraged the action of slander by all sorts of evasions, such as the doctrine of mitiori sensu, and by requiring the slanderous charge to have been uttered with the technical precision of an indictment. But, as this discouragement of the remedy by process of law was found inversely to encourage the remedy by battery, it has been gradually falling into disrepute, inasmuch that the precedents in Croke's Reports are beginning to be considered apocryphal." 20 Pa. 102; 7 S. & R. 451; 1 N. & M.C. 217; 2 id. 511; 8 Mass. 218; 1 Wash. Va. 152; 1 Kibr. 12; Heard, Lib. & S. § 162.

IN MODUM ASSISE. In the manner or form of an assize. Bract. fol. 183 b. In modum jurata, in manner of a jury. Id. fol. 181 b.

IN MORA (Lat.). In delay; in default. In the civil law a borrower in mora is one who fails to return the thing borrowed at the proper time: Sto. Bailm. § 254. In Scotch law a creditor is in mora who has failed in respect to the diligence required in levying an attachment on the property of the debtor. Bell, Dict.

IN MORTUA MANU (Lat. in a dead hand). Property owned by religious societies was said to be held in mortua manu, or in mortmain, since religious men were civilliter mortui. 1 Bla. Com. 479; Taylor, Gloss.

IN NOMINE DEI, AMEN. In the name of God, Amen. A phrase, anciently used in wills and many other instruments, the translation of which is often used in wills at the present day, but chiefly by ignorant draughtsmen or testators.

IN NOTIS. In the notes.

IN NUBIBUS (Lat.). In the clouds; in abeyance; in custody of law. In nubibus, in mare, in terra vel, in custodia legis: in the air, sea, or earth, or in the custody of the law. Taylor, Gloss. In case of abeyance, the inheritance is figuratively said to rest in nubibus, or in gremio legis; e. g. in case of a grant of life estate to A, and afterwards to heirs of Richard, Richard in this case, being alive, has no heirs until his death, and, consequently, the inheritance is considered as resting in nubibus, or in the clouds, till the death of A, when the contingent remainder either vests or is lost and the inheritance goes over. See 2 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 107, n.; 1 Co. 137; ABEYANCE.

IN NULLIUS BONIS. Among the goods or property of no person; belonging to no person, as treasure-trove and wreck were anciently considered.

In the civil law, things sacred and religious were considered as not the subjects of private property. Inst. 2. 1. 7. Animals, while they remain wild, are accounted nullius in bonis, the common property of mankind. Burrill; 2 Steph. Com. 17.

IN NULLO EST ERRATUM (Lat.). In Pleading. A plea to errors assigned on proceedings in error, by which the defendant in error affirms there is no error in the record. As to the effect of such plea, see 1 Ventr. 252; 1 Stra. 684; 9 Mass. 532; 1 Burr. 410; 2 Raym. 231. It is a general rule that the plea in nullo est erratum confesses the fact assigned for error; Yelv. 57; Dane, Abr. Index; but not a matter assigned contrary to the record; 7 Wend. 55; Bacon, Abr. Error (G).

IN ODIUM SPOLIATORIS (Lat.). In hatred of a despoiler. All things are presumed against a despoiler or wrongdoer: in odium spoliatoris omnia presumuntur. See MAXIMS.

If a man wrongfully opened a bundle of papers, sealed and left in his hands, so that he may have altered them or abstracted some, all presumptions will be taken against him in settling an account depending on the papers; 3 Macq. Sc. App. 766; the same rule is applied if one withhold evidence bearing on the case; 1 Stark. 35; 18 Jur. 703; or an agreement with which he is charged; 9 Cl. and Fin. 775. See at large 1 Sm. L. Cas. 8th Am. ed. 638-9; Br. Leg. Max. 8th Am. ed. 688; SPOILLATION.

IN OMNIBUS. In all things; on all points. "A case parallel in omnibus;" 10 Mod. 104. A modern phrase to the same effect is "on all fours" (q. v.).

IN OPERATION. A salary contract fixing a lower salary upon the employer's factory when not in operation, does not require the factory to be in full operation to entitle the employee to full salary. 148 Ky. 4, 145 S. W. 1122.

IN PACATO SOLO. In a country which is at peace.

IN PACE DEI ET REGIS. In the peace of God and the king. Fleta 1, c. 31, § 6. Formal words in old appeals of murder.

IN PAIS. This phrase, as applied to a legal transaction, primarily means that it has taken place without legal formalities or proceedings. Thus a widow was said to make a request in pais for her dower when she simply applied to the heir without issuing a writ; Co. Litt. 32 b. So conveyances are divided into those by matter of record and those by matter in pais. In some cases, however, "matters in pais" are opposed not only to "matters of record," but also to "matters in writing," i. e. deeds, as where estoppel by deed is distinguished from estoppel by matter in pais; id. 352 a; 4 Kent 260.

In the country, as distinguished from "in court," out of court, or without judicial process; by deed, or not of record. Matter in pais is distinguished from matter of record. Burrill.

Common assurances are of four kinds: (1) By matter in pais, or deed; which is an assurance transacted between two or more private persons in pais, in the country; that is (according to the old common law) upon the very spot to be transferred. (2) By matter of record, or an assurance transacted only in the king's public court of record. (3) By special custom. (4) By devise. 2 Bl. Com. 294. See ESTOPPEL IN PAIS.

IN PAPER. In English Practice. A term used of a record until its final enrolment on the parchment record. 3 Bla. Com. 406; 10 Mod. 88; 2 Lilly, Abr. 322; 4 Geo. II.

IN PARI CAUSA (Lat.). In an equal cause. It is a rule that when two persons have equal rights in relation to a particular thing, the party in possession is considered as having the better right: in pari causa possessor potior est. Dig. 50, 17, 128; 1 Bouvier, Inst. n. 852. See MAXIMS; PRESUMPTION.

IN PARI DELICTO (Lat.). In equal fault; equal in guilt. Neither courts of law nor of equity will interpose to grant relief to the parties, when an illegal agreement has been made and both parties stand in pari delicto. The law leaves them where it finds them, according to the maxim, in pari delicto potior est conditio defendentis (or, possidentis). 15 Kan. 157. See MAXIMS; DELICTUM.

IN PARI MATERIA (Lat.). Upon the same matter or subject. Statutes in pari materia are to be construed together; 7 Conn. 456.

IN PATIENDO. In suffering, permitting, or allowing.

IN PECTORE JUDICIS. In the breast of the judge. Latch 180. A term applied to a judgment.

IN PEJOREM PARTEM. In the worst part; on the worst side. Latch 159.

IN PERPETUAM REI MEMORIAM (Lat.). For the perpetual memory or remembrance of a thing. Gilbert, For. Rom. 118.

IN PERPETUUM REI TESTIMONIUM. In perpetual testimony of a matter; for the purpose of declaring and settling a thing forever. 1 Bla. Com. 86.

IN PERSON. A party, plaintiff or defendant, who sues out a writ or other process, or appears to conduct his case in court himself, instead of through a solicitor or counsel, is said to act and appear in person. Any suitor, but one suing in forma pauperis, may do this.

IN PERSONAM (Lat.). A remedy where the proceedings are against the person, in contradistinction to those which are against specific things, or in rem (q. v.).

See JUDGMENT RENDERED IN PERSONAM.
See JUDGMENT IN REM.

IN PIOS USUS. For pious uses; for religious purposes. 3 Bla. Com. 305.

IN PLENO COMITATU. In full county court. 3 Bla. Com. 36.

IN PLENO LUMINE. In public; in common knowledge; in the light of day.

IN PLENO VITA. In full life. Yearb. P. 18 Hen. VI. 2.

IN POSSE (Lat.). In possibility; not in actual existence: used in contradistinction to in esse.

IN POTESTATE PARENTIS. In the power of a parent. Inst. 1, 8, pr.; id. 1, 9; 3 Bla. Com. 498.

IN PREMISSORUM FIDEM. In confirmation or attestation of the premises. A notarial phrase.

IN PRESENTI (Lat.). At the present time: used in opposition to in futuro. A marriage contracted per verba de presenti is good: as, I take Paul to be my husband, is a good marriage; but words of in futuro would not be sufficient, unless the ceremony was followed by consummation. 4 La. Ann. 347; 6 Binn. 405.

IN PRENDER (L. Fr.). In taking. Such incorporeal hereditaments as a party entitled to them was to take for himself were said to be in prender. Such was a right of common. 2 Steph. Com. 15.

IN PRIMIS. In the foremost place. A term used in argument. Usually written imprimis (q. v.).

IN PRINCIPIO (Lat.). At the beginning. This is frequently used in citations: as, Bacon, Abr. Legacies, in pr.

IN PROMPTU. In readiness; at hand. Usually written inpromptu.

IN PROPRIA PERSONA (Lat.). In his own person; himself: as, the defendant appeared in propria persona; the plaintiff argued the cause in propria persona. Sometimes abbreviated on the printed court lists, P. P.

IN RE (Lat.). In the matter: as, in re A B, in the matter of A B. In the headings of legal reports these words are used more especially to designate proceedings in bankruptcy or insolvency, or the winding up of estates or companies.

IN REBUS (Lat.). In things, cases, or matters.

IN REM (Lat.). A technical term used to designate proceedings or actions instituted against the thing, in contradistinction to personal actions, which are said to be in personam.

Proceedings in rem include not only those instituted to obtain decrees or judgments against property as forfeited in the admiralty or the English exchequer, or as prize, but also suits against property to enforce a lien or privilege in the admiralty courts, and suits to obtain the sentence, judgment, or decree of other courts upon the personal status or relations of the party, such as marriage, divorce, bastardy, settlement, or the like. 1 Greenl. Ev. § 625, 541; 2 Bish. Mar. Div. & Sep. 14, 24.

Courts of admiralty enforce the performance of a contract, when its performance is secured by a maritime lien or privilege, by seizing into their custody the very subject of hypothecation. In these suits, generally, the parties are not personally bound, and the proceedings are confined to the thing in specie; Brown, Civ. & Adm. Law 98. See Bened. Ad. 270, 362; 2 Gall. 200; 3 Term 269.

There are cases, however, where the remedy is either in personam or in rem. Seamen, for example, may proceed against the ship or freight for their wages, and this is the most expeditious mode; or they may proceed against the master or owners; 4 Burr. 1944; 2 Bro. Civ. & Adm. Law, 306. See, generally, 1 Phill. Ev. 264; 1

Stark. Ev. 228; Dane, Abr.; Serg. Const. Law 202, 212; Pars. Marit. Law; Bened. Adm. 503. No action in rem lies for damages incurred by loss of life: 145 U. S. 835. A contract for launching a vessel carried some distance up the beach by a storm, is a maritime contract, for which the vessel is liable in rem; 48 Fed. Rep. 569. See ADMIRALTY; BOTTOMRY; LIEN. JUDGMENT IN REM.

IN RENDR. A thing in a manor is said to lie in render when it must be rendered or given by the tenant, e. g. rent; to lie in prender, when it may be taken by the lord or his officer when it chance. West, Symbol. pt. 3, Fines, § 126.

IN REBUM NATURA (Lat.). In the nature (or order) of things; in existence. Not in rerum natura is a dilatory plea, importing that the plaintiff is a fictitious person.

In Civil Law. A broader term than in rebus humanis: e. g. before quickening, an infant is in rerum natura, but not in rebus humanis; after quickening, he is in rebus humanis as well as in rerum natura. Calvinus, Lex.

IN SCRINIO JUDICIS. In the writing-case of the judge; among the judge's papers. "That is a thing that rests in scrinio judicis, and does not appear in the body of the decree." Hardr. 51.

IN SEPARALI. In several; in severalty. Fleta 2, c. 54, 20.

IN SIMILI MATERIA. Dealing with the same or a kindred subject-matter.

IN SIMPLICI PEREGRINATIONE. In simple pilgrimage. Bract. fol. 838. A phrase in the old law of essoins. See IN GENERALI PASSAGIO.

IN SOLIDUM, IN SOLIDO (Lat.). In Civil Law. For the whole; as a whole. An obligation or contract is said to be in solidum or in solidum when each is liable for the whole, but so that a payment by one is payment for all: i. e. it is a joint and several contract. 1 W. Bla. 388.

Possession is said to be in solidum when it is exclusive. "Duo in solidum precario habere non magis possunt, quam duo in solidum vi possidere aut clam; nam neque justae neque injustae possessiones duce concurrere possunt." Savigny, lib. 3, § 11. The phrase is commonly used in Louisiana.

IN SOLO. In the soil or ground. In solo alieno, in another ground. In solo proprio, in one's ground. 2 Steph. Com. 20.

IN SPECIE (Lat.). In the same form: e. g. a ship is said to no longer exist in specie when she no longer exists as a ship, but as a mere congeries of planks. 8 B. & C. 581; Arnould, Ins. 1012. To decree a thing in specie is to decree the performance of that thing specifically. See IN KIND; KIND.

IN STATU QUO (Lat.). In the same situation as: in the same condition as. See STATUS QUO.

IN STIRPES. In the law of descent, according to roots or stocks; by representation as distinguished from succession per capita. More commonly written per stirpes (q. v.).

A term derived from the ancient Roman law of succession, and still frequently applied to cases where, in the distribution of estates, persons take the share which their parent, (the stirpes, stock or root whom they represent), would have done, had he been living. Burrill; 2 Bl. Com. 217. See PER CAPITA.

IN STORE. Personal property received by a corporation for use either as stock or equipment in its business; is not received "in store," within the meaning of a statute, so as to authorize the corporation to issue warehouse receipts therefor. 100 Ky. 7, 50 S. W. 2, 20 R. 1684.

IN TANTUM. In so much; so much; so far; so greatly. Reg. Orig. 97, 106.

IN TERMINIS TERMINANTI-BUS. In terms of determination; exactly in point. 11 Co. 40 b. In express or determinate terms. 1 Leon. 98.

IN TERROR (Lat.). By way of threat, terror, or warning. For example, when a legacy is given to a person upon condition not to dispute the validity or the dispositions in wills and testaments, the conditions are not, in general, obligatory, but only in terror: if, therefore, there exist probabilis causa litiganda, the non-observance of the conditions will not be a forfeiture. 1 Hill, Abr. 253; 3 P. Wms. 344; 1 Atk. 404. But when the acquiescence of the legatee appears to be a material ingredient in the gift, the bequest is only quousque the legatee shall refrain from disturbing the will; 2 P. Wms. 52; 2 Ventr. 332. See DURESS.

IN TERROR POPULI (Lat.) to the terror of the people).

A technical phrase necessary in indictments for riots. 4 C. & P. 373.

Lord Holt has given a distinction between those indictments in which the words in terror populi are essential, and those wherein they may be omitted. He says that, in indictments for that species of riots which consists in going about armed, etc., without committing any act, the words are necessary, because the offence consists in terrifying the public; but in those riots in which an unlawful act is committed, the words are useless; 11 Mod. 116; 10 Mass. 518.

IN TESTIMONIUM. In witness or in evidence whereof. The first words of the attestation clause of certain legal instruments.

IN TOTIDEM VERBIS (Lat.). In just so many words: as, the legislature has declared this to be a crime in totidem verbis.

IN TOTO (Lat.). In the whole; wholly; completely: as, the award is void in toto. In the whole the part is contained; in toto et pars continetur. Dig. 50. 17. 123.

IN TRAJECTU. In the passage over; on the voyage over. 8 C. Rob. A dm. 338.

IN TRANSITU (Lat.). During the transit, or removal from one place to another. See STOPPAGE IN TRANSITU.

IN VACUO (Lat.) in what is empty. Without concomitants or coherence. Whart.

IN VADIO (Lat.). In pledge; in gage.

IN VENTRE SA MERE (L. F.). In his mother's womb. It is written indifferently in this form, or en ventre sa mere (q. v.).

See POSTHUMOUS CHILD; CURTESY; DOWER; INFANT; INJUNCTION.

IN VINCULIS. In chains; in actual custody. Gibb. For. Rom. 97.

Applied also, figuratively, to the condition of a person who is compelled to submit to terms which oppression and his necessities impose on him; 1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 302.

IN VIRIDI OBSERVANTIA. Present to the minds of men, and in full force and operation.

IN WITNESS WHEREOF. These words, which, when conveynancing was in the Latin language, were in cujus rei testimonium, are the initial words of the concluding clause in deeds: "In witness whereof the said parties have hereunto set their hands," etc.

INADEQUATE PRICE. A term applied to indicate the want of a sufficient consideration for a thing sold, or such a price as, under ordinary circumstances, would be considered insufficient.

Inadequacy of price is generally connected with fraud, gross misrepresentations, or an intentional concealment of defects in the thing sold. In these cases it is clear that the vendor cannot compel the buyer to fulfil the contract; 1 Bro. P. C. 187; L. R. 12 Eq. 320; 6 Johns. 110; 8 Cra. 270; 2 Yerg. 508; 11 Vt. 315; 1 Metc. Mass. 93; 20 Me. 462; 1 Brown, Ch. 440.

In general, however, inadequacy of price is not sufficient ground to avoid an executed contract, particularly when the property has been sold by auction; 7 Ves. 30, 35, n.; 8 Bro. Ch. 228; 104 Mass. 420; if there is no fraud and the parties deal at arm's length, upon their independent judgment, it will be held good; 19 Ala. 765; 102 Mass. 60; 75 Mo. 681; 81 Fed. Rep. 889. But if an uncertain consideration, as a life annuity, be given for an estate, and the contract be executory, equity, it seems, will enter into the adequacy of the consideration; 7 Bro. P. C. 184; 1 Bro. Ch. 156. See Sugd. Vend. 149; 1 B. & B. 165; 1 M'Ord, Ch. 383; 4 Des. Ch. 651; 97 Mass. 180. And if the price be so grossly inadequate and given under such circumstances as to afford a necessary presumption of fraud or imposition, a court of equity will grant relief; 6 Ga. 515; 49 Miss. 582; 8 B. Monr. 11; 2 Harr. & G. 114; 11 N. H. 9; 1 Metc. Mass. 93; 8 McLean 332; 19 How. 303; 68 Ill. 191; 110 id. 390; 20 Fla. 157; 71 Iowa 428; 50 Me. 438; 113 U. S. 89. Story, Eq. Jur. § 244; Leake, Contr. 1150. As to cases of sales of their interests by heirs and reversioners for inadequate price, see CATCHING BARGAIN; EXPECTANCY. See CONSIDERATION; POST ORBIT; MACEDONIAN DECREE; JUDICIAL SALE.

INADMISSIBLE. What cannot be received. Parol evidence, for example, is ordinarily inadmissible to contradict a written agreement.

INADVERTENTLY. By the expression "inadvertently" drawn, mistake is intended, and may be understood. 1 J. J. Mar. (Ky.) 87.

INALIENABLE. A word denoting the condition of those things the property in which cannot be lawfully transferred from one person to another. Public highways and rivers are inalienable. There are also many rights which are inalienable, as the rights of liberty or of speech.

INAUGURATION. A word applied by the Romans to the ceremony of dedicating a temple, or raising a man to the priesthood, after the augurs had been consulted.

It was afterwards applied to the installation of emperors, kings, and prelates, in imitation of the ceremonies of the Romans when they entered the temple of the augurs. It is applied in the United States to the installation of the chief magistrate of the republic, and of the governors of the several states.

INBLAURA. Profit or product of the ground. Cowel.

INBORH. A security, pledge, or hypotheca, consisting of the chattels of a person unable to obtain a personal "borg" or surety.

A pledge for persons going in. Inborh & outborh; a pledge for persons going in and out. Burrill; Blount.

Englishmen in ancient times called an entry and forecourt or gate-house, "in-borow." Tomlin; Cowell.

INCAPACITY. The want of a quality legally to do, give, transmit, or receive something.

In general, the incapacity ceases with the cause which produces it. If the idiot should obtain his senses, or the married woman's husband die, their incapacity would be at an end. See LIMITATIONS, STATUTE OF.

INCASTELLARE. To make a building serve the purpose of a castle. Jacob.

INCAUSTUNO OR ENCAUSTUNO. Ink. Fleta, l. 2, c. 27, § 5.

INCENDIARY. (Lat. incendium, a kindling). One who maliciously and wilfully sets another person's building on fire; one guilty of the crime of arson. See ARSON; BURNING.

INCEPTION. The commencement; the beginning. In making a will, for example, the writing is its inception. 8 Co. 315; Plowd. 343.

INCERTÆ PERSONÆ. Uncertain persons as posthumous heirs, a corporation, the poor, a juristic person, or persons who cannot be ascertained until after the execution of a will. Sohm. Inst. Rom. L. 104, 458.

INCEST. The carnal copulation of a man and a woman related to each other in any of the degrees within which marriage is prohibited by law. 1 Bish. Marr. & D. 112, 376, 442. It involves the assent of both parties; 39 Mich. 124; but it is held that it may exist as to the man although without the consent of the woman; 58 N. W. Rep. (Ia.) 1090; 99 Cal. 359. It is punished by fine and imprisonment, under the laws of most, if not all, of the states, but seems not at common law to be an indictable offence; 4 Bla. Com. 64; 78 N. C. 469. See 81 Tex. Cr. R. 186.

Preparations for an attempted incestuous marriage have been held not indictable; 14 Cal. 159. A man indicted for rape may be convicted of incest; 2 Met. 193; 1 Bish. Cr. Proc. § 419. See Daus, Abr. Index; 6 Conn. 446; 11 Ga. 53; 1 Park. Cr. 344. See 20 Or. 437. And as to whether the crime is rape or incest may be left to the jury; 96 Mich. 449. Proof of one commission of the offence is sufficient for conviction; 18 S. W. Rep. (Ky.) 360.

INCESTUOSI. Those offspring incestuously begotten. Mack. Rom. L. § 143.

INCH (Lat. uncia). A measure of length, containing one-twelfth part of a foot; originally supposed equal to three grains of barley laid end to end.

INCHOATE. That which is not yet completed or finished. Contracts are considered inchoate until they are executed by all the parties. During the husband's life, a wife has an inchoate right of dower; 2 Bla. Com. 180; so with the right of an unborn child to take by descent; 2 Paige, Ch. 85; and a covenant which purports to be tripartite, and is executed by only two of the parties, is incomplete, and no one is bound by it; 2 Halst. 142. See LOCUS PŒNITENTIE.

INCIDENT. This term is used both substantively and adjectively of a thing which, either usually or naturally and inseparably depends upon, appertains to, or follows another that is more worthy. For example, rent is usually incident to a reversion. 1 Hill. R. P. 243; while the right of alienation is usually incident to a fee-simple at common law, and cannot be separated by a grant; 1 Washb. K. P. 54. So a court baron is inseparably incident to a manor, in England; Kitch. 86; Co. Litt. 151. All nominate contracts and all estates known to common law have certain incidents which they draw with them and which it is not necessary to reserve in words. So the costs incurred in a legal proceeding are said to be incidental thereto. See Jacob, Law Dict.

INCIPIERE (Lat.). In Practice. This word, which means "it is begun," signifies the commencement of the entry on the roll on signing judgment, etc. The custom is no longer necessary in England, and was unknown here. But see 3 Steph. Com. 566, n.

INCLOSURE. The extinction of common rights in fields and waste lands. 1 Steph. Com. 655.

The separation and appropriation of land by means of a fence, hedge, etc., together with such fence or hedge. 86 Wis. 44; 64 id. 672; 89 Vt. 831; 63 Ind. 530; 8 Hun 269; where, in a will, the executors were directed to inclose with an iron fence meeting-house grounds, school-house grounds, and burial ground, it was held that the intention was clear to inclose each of the grounds on all sides; 113 Pa. 52.

A paper or letter inclosed with another in an envelope.

The act of freeing land from rights of common, commonable rights, and generally all rights which obstruct cultivation and the productive employment of labour on the soil, by vesting it in some person as absolute owner. Inclosure may be effected in three ways: (1) In the case of manorial wastes (a) by the lord of the manor alone under his right of approvement; (b) by the lord under a special custom enabling him, with the consent of the homage, to grant parcels of the waste, to be held of him by copy of court-roll; (c) by the tenants themselves under various special customs; (d) by encroachments, or unauthorised inclosures legalised by lapse of time. (2) By agreement between the commoners and the owner of the soil. (3) By Act of Parliament. (For the latter, see title INCLOSURE COMMISSION ACT. Byrne.

INCLOSURE ACTS. English statutes regulating the subject of inclosure. The most notable was that of 1801, 41 Geo. III. c. 109.

INCLOSURE COMMISSION ACT, 1845. The statute 8 and 9 Vict. c. 118, establishing a board of commissioners for England and Wales and empowering them, on the application of persons interested to the amount of one-third of the value of the land, and provided the consent of persons interested to the amount of two-thirds of the land and of the lord of the manor (in case the land be waste of a manor) be ultimately obtained, to inquire into the case and to report to parliament as to the expediency of making the inclosure. 1 Steph. Com. 655.

INCLUDE (Lat. in claudere to shut in, keep within). In a legacy of "one hundred dollars including money trusted" at a bank, it was held that the word "including" extended only to a gift of one hundred dollars; 132 Mass. 218; but in a bequest of a sum of money inclusive of a note of the legatee, it was held that the note was included in the legacy; 154 Pa. 340. In a contract to furnish a street paving machine, exclusive of patterns which were to be furnished by defendant, such patterns were found to be defective and incomplete, and on a second bid, where plaintiff agreed for increased cost to build the machine "including revised patterns and drawings," these words were held not to change the contract so as to require the plaintiffs to furnish a machine that would "work satisfactorily, as a machine," but that it only required the parts designed and constructed by them to be suitable for the intended purpose and all the machinery and workmanship to be good; 160 Pa. 317.

INCLUDING. The words "and including" following a description do not necessarily mean "in addition to," but may refer to a part of the thing described. 221 U. S. 425.

INCLUSIVE. Comprehended in computation. In computing time, as ten days from a particular time, the last day is generally to be included and the first excluded. See EXCLUSIVE; TIME; 154 Pa. 340, as to its use in a legacy.

INCOLA (Lat. from incolere, to inhabit). An inhabitant of a place, not a native. English.

A dweller or resident. Properly, one who has transferred his domicile to any country. Burrill. One who comes from abroad, and takes up his abode in a place, with the view of residing there. The peculiar sense of the word seems to be derived from the component particle in, having the sense of into, or entry. Domicil made a person an "incola," as birth made him "civis" (q. v.). Id.; Cod. 10. 40. 7; Phil. on Dom., 25, 26.

In Old English Law. A subject. Id.; Stat. Marlbr. pr.

INCOME. The gain which proceeds from property, labor, or business; it is applied particularly to individuals. The income of the state or government is usually called revenue. The word is sometimes considered synonymous with "profits," the gain as between receipts and payments; 4 Hill 23; "rent, and profits," "income," and "net income" of the estate are equivalent expressions; 5 Me. 203; it may mean "money" or the expectation of receiving money; 14 Blatch. 71; 15 Wall 68; and a note is ground for expecting income, and in the sense of a statute taxing incomes the amount thereof is to be returned when paid; Id. 1. See 14 La. Ann. 815; 30 Barb. 637; 16 Fed. Rep. 14. In the ordinary commercial sense "income" especially when connected with the word "rent," may mean clear or net income. "Produce" or "product" as a substituted word may relieve a will from obscurity; 100 Pa. 481; 44 id. 347. In a gift of the income, etc., of shares of stock, it is not synonymous with increase, and while it will include dividends from the stock, will not embrace the sum by which the stock has increased; 62 Conn. 62. As to when dividends are to be considered as income, see 31 A. & E. Corp. Cas. 386, n.; 136 Pa. 43; DIVIDEND.

It has been held that a devise of the income of land is in effect the same as a devise of the land itself; 9 Mass. 372; 80 N. Y. 320; 92 Pa. 254; 3 C. 2 Am. Prob. Rep. 196; 73 Me. 109; and a gift of the income of a fund is a gift of the fund; 1 Johns. Ch. 494; 32 N. J. Eq. 591; and the income of property is a gift of the property; 53 Conn. 259; 105 Pa. 441; 2 Rop. Leg. 371.

Income, within the meaning of the Corporation Tax Law of 1909, includes the proceeds of ores mined by a corporation from its own premises. 231 U. S. 399.

Gain derived from capital, from labor, or from both combined, provided it be understood to include profit gained through a sale or conversion of capital assets. 255 U. S. 517, quoting 252 U. S. 207, in turn quoting 231 U. S. 399, and 247 U. S. 179. Income shall also include gains derived from interest, rent, dividends, securities, or the transaction of any lawful business carried on for gain or profit. 257 U. S. 168. Not everything in the form of a dividend must be treated as income, but that which is derived in the way of dividends. 257 U. S. 169. See TAXABLE INCOME.

Under Income Tax of 1913. For income taxable to a domestic corporation under the Income Tax Act of 1913, see 251 U. S. 345.

Converted Capital not Income. Accumulations that accrued to corporation through surplus earnings or appreciation in property value prior to the Act of 1913, regarded as capital and not income. 247 U. S. 335.

Income from Exports. Net income of a corporation derived from exporting goods from States and selling them abroad is part of "entire net income arising or accruing from all sources" under § 11, Act of 1913. 247 U. S. 165.

Under Corporation Tax of 1909. Income employed in natural and obvious sense, as importing something distinct from principal or capital, and conveying idea of gain or increase from corporate activities. 247 U. S. 185.

Conversion of Preexisting Capital not Income. While conversion of capital may result in income, in sense of Act of 1909, where proceeds include increment of value, such is not the case where increment existed when Act took effect. Id. 179.

INCOME TAX. See TAX.

INCOMMUNICATION. In Spanish Law. The condition of a prisoner who is not permitted to see or to speak with any person visiting him during his confinement.

A person accused cannot be subjected to this treatment unless it be expressly ordered by the judge, for some grave offence, and it cannot be continued for a longer period than is absolutely necessary. Art. 7. Reglamento de 30 Septiembre, 1888.

This precaution is resorted to for the purpose of preventing the accused from knowing beforehand the testimony of the witnesses, or from attempting to corrupt them and concert such measures as will efface the traces of his guilt. As soon, therefore, as the danger of his doing so has ceased, the interdiction ceases likewise. Ex parte.

INCOMPATIBILITY. Incapability of existing or being exercised together.

Thus the relations of landlord and of tenant cannot exist in one man at the same time in reference to the same land. Two offices may be incompatible either from their nature or by statutory provisions. See U. S. Const. art. 6, § 3, n. 5, art. 1, § 6, n. 2; 4 S. & R. 277; 17 id. 219; 46 How. Pr. 170; 9 S. C. 179; OFFICE.

Incompatibility is ordinarily not a ground for divorce; 13 La. Ann. 882; 6 Am. L. Reg. o. s. 740; 4 Greene 324; though in some states it is. See DIVORCE.

INCOMPATIBLE. Legally inconsistent; that cannot be legally united in the same person.

INCOMPETENCY. Lack of ability or fitness to discharge the required duty.

At Common Law. Judges and jurors are said to be incompetent from having an interest in the subject-matter. A judge is also incompetent to give judgment in a matter not within his jurisdiction. See JURISDICTION. With regard to the incompetency of a judge from interest, it is a maxim in the common law that no one should be a judge in his own cause (aliquis non debet esse iudex in propria causa); Co. Litt. 141 a. See 4 Com. Dig. 6; 43 La. Ann. 924; 31 Fla. 594. The greatest delicacy is constantly observed on the part of judges, so that they never act when there is the possibility of doubt whether they can be free from bias; and even a distant degree of relationship has induced a judge to decline to sit; 1 Knapp 376. Where one has acted as counsel, he cannot, subsequently, sit in judgment on the matter in which he has given his advice; 30 Fla. 505; 31 Tex. Cr. R. 440; 111 Mo. 526. The slightest degree of pecuniary interest is considered an insuperable objection. But at common law interest forms the only ground for challenging a judge. It is not a ground of challenge that he has given his opinion before; 2 Binn. 454. See 4 Mod. 226; 13 Mass. 340; Cox 180; 3 Ohio 289; 3 Cow. 125; 12 Conn. 88; 1 Penning. N. J. 185; 4 Yeates 460; 4 Tex. Civ. App. 648; 69 Tex. 300; 88 Ga. 151; Salk. 396; Bac. Abr. Courts (B). In New York it is held that a conviction of larceny, when one of the members of the trial court is related to the prisoner within the sixth degree, is void; 142 N. Y. 130. See JUDGE; JURY; COMPETENCY; INTEREST.

In Evidence. A witness may be at common law incompetent on account of a want of understanding, a defect of religious belief, a conviction of certain crimes, infamy of character, or interest; 1 Phill. Ev. 15. The last ground of incompetency is removed to a considerable degree in most states; and the second is greatly limited in modern practice. See WITNESS.

In French Law. Inability or insufficiency of a judge to try a cause brought before him, proceeding from lack of jurisdiction.

INCONCLUSIVE. Not finally decisive. Inconclusive presumptions are capable of being overcome by opposing proof.

INCONSULTO. In the Civil Law. Unadvisedly; unintentionally. Dig. 28, 4, 1.

INCONTINENCE. Impudicity; indulgence in unlawful carnal connection.

INCONTINENT. Forthwith; immediately; without any interval; incontinently. Burrill; Bract. fol. 163 b. In the civil law, this word did not always import instantaneous succession, but admitted of the existence of a moderate interval. Id.; Calv. Lex.

INCORPORALIS. Incorporal; not material; not having a body or substance.

INCORPORATED. See INCORPORATION.

INCORPORATED LAW SOCIETY. A society of attorneys and solicitors whose function it is to carry out the acts of parliament and orders of court with reference to articulated clerks; to keep an alphabetical roll of attorneys and solicitors; to issue certificates to persons duly admitted and enrolled, and to exercise a general control over the conduct of solicitors in practice, and to bring cases of misconduct before the judges. 3 Steph. Com. 217.

A society, known as the "Law Society," was formed in 1825, and received a charter of incorporation in 1831. In 1845, it received a further royal charter in which it is referred to as "The Society of Attorneys, Solicitors and Proctors, and others, not being barristers, practising in the Courts of Law and Equity of the United Kingdom." In 1843, the Society was made registrar of attorneys and solicitors: the custody of the roll of solicitors, which previously had been with the Clerk of the Petty Bag, was transferred to it in 1888. Since 1877 no person can be admitted as a solicitor unless he has obtained from the Society a certificate that he has passed certain examinations: it issues the annual certificate without which a solicitor cannot practice. Under the act of 1888, the committee of the Society investigated complaints against solicitors, and in a suitable case brought the matter before the Court in order to have the solicitor struck off the roll; and now, under the act of 1919, the committee, in addition to investigating, can itself strike off the roll, the offender being, however, given a right of appeal to the Court. Byrne.

INCORPORATION. The act of creating a corporation; that which is incorporated. A legal or political body formed by the union of individuals under certain conditions, rules, and laws, and having certain privileges and partial or perpetual succession.

In Civil Law. The union of one domain to another.

INCORPORATION BY REFERENCE. The bringing into one document in legal effect, of the contents of another by referring to the latter in such manner as to adopt it.

INCORPORA L. Having no body, or corpus; not material, or tangible; not an object of sense, but existing only in contemplation of law.

INCORPORA L CHATTELS. The incorporeal rights or interests growing out of personal property, such as copyrights and patent rights, stocks and personal annuities. 2 Sandf. 552, 559; 2 Steph. Com. 9.

INCORPORA L HEREDITAMENT. Anything, the subject of property, which is inheritable and not tangible or visible. 2 Woodd. Lect. 4. A right issuing out of a thing corporate (whether real or personal) or concerning or annexed to or exercisable within the same. 2 Bla. Com. 20; 80 Wis. 222; 1 Washb. R. P. 10; Chal. R. P. 47; 18 Colo. 298.

Their existence is merely in idea and abstract contemplation, though their effects and profits may be frequently the object of the bodily senses; Co. Litt. 9 a; Pothier, Traite des Choses § 2. According to Blackstone, there are ten kinds of incorporeal hereditaments: viz. advowsons, tithes, commons, ways, offices, dignities, franchises, corodies, annuities, and rents. 2 Bla. Com. 20. In the United States there are no advowsons, tithes, dignities, nor corodies, commons are rare, offices rare or unknown, and annuities have no necessary connection with land. 3 Kent 402, 454. And there are other incorporeal hereditaments not included in this list, as remainders and reversions dependent on a particular estate of freehold, easements of light, air, etc., and equities of redemption; 1 Washb. R. P. § 11.

Incorporeal hereditaments were said to be in grant; corporeal, in feoffment; since a simple deed or grant would pass the former, of which livery was impossible, while livery was necessary to a transfer of the latter. But this distinction is now done away with, even in England. See 8 & 9 Vict. c. 106, § 2; 1 Washb. R. P. 10; Will. R. P. 270, 364, 370; 18 Mass. 488.

INCORPOREAL PROPERTY. In Civil Law. That which consists in legal right merely. The same as choses in action at common law.

INCORRIGIBLE. Incapable of being corrected, amended, or improved.

Under the statute 17 Geo. II. c. 5, incorrigible rogues were subjected to two years' imprisonment in the house of correction, and for escaping from confinement therein were made felons and liable to transportation for seven years. A similar breach and escape by a vagabond or rogue constituted him an incorrigible rogue; 4 Bla. Com. 169.

INCORRUPTIBLE. That which cannot be affected by immoral or debasing influences, such as bribery or the hope of gain or advancement.

INCREASE. That which grows out of land or is produced by the cultivation of it. 23 Tex. 27. As to increase of risk in an insurance policy, see RISKS AND PERILS.

INCREASE, COSTS OF. See COSTS DE INCREMENTO; ACCRETION; INCOME; PROFIT.

INCRIMINATION. The 5th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States declares that no person shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself. The meaning of the constitutional provision is not merely that a person shall not be compelled to be a witness against himself in a criminal prosecution against himself; but its object is to insure that a person shall not be compelled, when acting as a witness in any investigation, to give testimony which may tend to show that he himself has committed a crime. 142 U. S. 547. The manifest purpose of the constitutional provision is to prohibit the compelling of testimony of a self-incriminating kind from a party or a witness. Id. The seizure or compulsory production of a man's private papers to be used in evidence against him is equivalent to compelling him to be a witness against himself. 116 U. S. 616.

INCUPLICATE. To accuse of crime; to impute guilt to; to bring or expose to blame; to censure. Webster.

INCUMBENT. In Ecclesiastical Law. A clerk resident on his benefice with cure; he is so called because he does, or ought to, bend the whole of his studies to his duties. In common parlance, it signifies one who is in possession of an office; as, the present incumbent. One does not become the incumbent of an office, until legally authorized to discharge its duties, by receiving his commission and taking the official oath; 11 Ohio St. 46.

INCUMBRANCE. Any right to, or interest in, land which may subsist in third persons, to the diminution of the value of the estate of the tenant, but consistently with the passing of the fee. 2 Greenl. Ev. § 242; 4 Mass. 629; 113 N. Y. 81.

A public highway; 2 Mass. 97; 3 N. H. 835; 10 Conn. 431; 12 La. Ann. 541; 27 Vt. 739; 13 So. Rep. (Ala.) 545; 47 Ill. App. 278 (but see 40 Pa. 232; 16 Ind. 142; 22 Wis. 628; 87 Ala. 220; 58 N. W. Rep. (La.) 1081); a private right of way; 15 Pick. 68; 5 Conn. 497; an easement which is open, visible, and well known; 113 N. Y. 81; a claim of dower; 4 Mass. 630; 23 Ala. n. s. 616; though inchoate only; 2 Me. 22; 22 Pick. 447; 8 N. J. 260; an outstanding mortgage; 5 Me. 94; 30 id. 892; 133 U. S. 610; (other than one which the covenantee is bound to pay; 2 N. H. 458; 12 Mass. 304; 11 S. & R. 109; 4 Halst. 189; see 88 Mich. 94; 68 Vt. 53); a liability under the tax laws; 30 Vt. 665; 5 Ohio St. 271; 5 Wis. 407; see 148 Mass. 102; (but no tax or assessment can exist so as to be an incumbrance, until the amount is ascertained or determined; 113 N. Y. 444); an attachment resting upon land; 48 Conn. 129; 116 Mass. 392; a condition, the non-performance of which by the grantees may work a forfeiture of the estate; 4 Metc. Mass. 412; a paramount title; 8 Cush. 809; restriction as to the kind of building which may be erected on land; 75 Hun 70; a mechanic's lien; 51 Wis. 293; have been held incumbrances within the meaning of the covenant against incumbrances, contained in conveyances; Warv. Vend. 994. The term does not include a condition on which an estate is held; 8 Gray 515; 6 id. 572.

The vendor of real estate is bound in England to disclose incumbrances, and to deliver to the purchaser the instruments by which they were created or on which the defects arise; and the neglect of this is to be considered fraud; Sudg. Vend. 6; 1 Ves. Sen. 96. See 6 Ves. 193; 10 id. 470; 1 Sch. & L. 227; 7 S. & R. 73.

The interest on incumbrances is to be kept down by the tenant for life; 1 Washb. R. P. 95, 257, 573; 5 Johns. Ch. 482; 5 Ohio 28; to the extent of rents accruing; 31 E. L. & Eq. 345; Tudor, Lead. Cas. 60; and for any sum paid beyond that he becomes a creditor of the estate; 2 Atk. 463; 1 Bail. Eq. 397.

When the whole incumbrance is removed by a single payment, the share of the tenant for life is the present worth of an annuity for the life of the tenant equal to the annual amount of the interest which he would be obliged to pay; 1 Washb. R. P. 93, 573. The rule applies to estates held in dower; 10 Mass. 315, n.; 10 Paige, Ch. 71, 158; 3 Md. Ch. Dec. 324; 7 H. & J. 367; in courtesy; 1 Washb. R. P. 142; in tail only in special cases; 1 Washb. R. P. 80; Tudor, Lead. Cas. 613; 3 P. Wms. 229. See COVENANT AGAINST INCUMBRANCES.

INCUR. To have liabilities cast upon one by act or operation of law, as distinguished from contract, where the party acts affirmatively. 15 How. Pr. 58.

Men contract debts, they incur liabilities. In the one case, they act affirmatively; in the other, the liability is incurred or cast upon them by act or operation of law. Incur means something beyond contracts,—something not embraced in the word debts. Id.

A bond to indemnify plaintiff against "all costs, charges, and expenses which he shall incur," is not broken by his merely becoming liable for costs, etc.; but he must first be damaged by their payment. Id.; 14 Barb. 202.

INDEBITATUS ASSUMPSIT (Lat.). In Pleading. That species of action of assumpsit in which the plaintiff alleges, in his declaration, first a debt, and then a promise in consideration of the debt to pay the amount to the plaintiff.

It is so called from the words in which the promise is laid in the Latin form, translated in the modern form, being indebted he promised. The promise so laid is generally an implied one only. See 1 Chitty, Pl. 334; Steph. Pl. 318; 4 Co. 92 b. This form of action is brought to recover in damages the amount of the debt or demand; upon the trial the jury will, according to evidence, give verdict for whole or part of that sum; 3 Bla. Com. 155; Selw. N. P. 68.

Indebitatus assumpsit is in this distinguished from debt and covenant, which proceed directly for the debt, damages being given only for the detention of the debt. Debt lies on contracts by specialty as well as by parol, while indebitatus assumpsit lies only on parol contracts, whether express or implied; Bro. Aot. at Law 317.

For the history of this form of action, see 3 Reeve, Hist. Com. Law; 2 Comyns, Contr. 549; 1 H. Bla. 530; 3 Bla. Com. 164; Yelv. 70; Papers by J. B. Ames, 2 Harv. L. Rev. 1, 53, 377. See ASSUMPSIT.

INDEBITI SOLUTIO (Lat.). In Civil Law. The payment to one of what is not due to him. If the payment was made by mistake, the civilians recovered it back by an action called condictio indebiti; with us, such money may be recovered by an action of assumpsit.

INDEBTEDNESS. The state of being in debt, without regard to the ability or inability of the party to pay the same. See 1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 43; 2 Hill, Abr. 421.

But in order to create an indebtedness there must be an actual liability at the time, either to pay then or at a future time. If, for example, a person were to enter and become surety for another, who enters into a rule of reference, he does not thereby become a debtor to the opposite party until the rendition of the judgment on the award; 1 Mass. 184. As to indebtedness of a municipality, see MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS.

INDECENCY. An act against good behavior and a just delicacy. 2 S. & R. 91.

The law, in general, will repress indecency as being contrary to good morals; but, when the public good requires it, the mere indecency of disclosures does not suffice to exclude them from being given in evidence; Tayl. Ev. 816.

The following are examples of indecency: the exposure by a man of his naked person on a balcony, to public view; or bathing in public; 2 Campb. 89; 3 Day 103; 1 D. & B. 208; 18 Vt. 574; 5 Barb. 203; see 46 N. J. L. 16; or in the house of another in the presence of a young girl; 128 Mass. 52; or the exhibition of bawdy pictures; 2 Chitty, Cr. Law 42; 2 S. & R. 91. This indecency is punishable by indictment. See 1 Kebl. 620; 2 Verg. 482, 669; 1 Mass. 8; 1 Russ. Cr. 302; 4 Bla. Com. 65, n.; Burn, Just. Levdness. And an ordinance making such exposure an offence without reference to the intent which accompanies the act, is a valid exercise of police power; 93 Mich. 135.

INDECENT ASSAULT. See ASSAULT.

INDECENT EXHIBITION. Any exhibition contra bonos mores, as the taking a dead body for the purpose of dissection or public exhibition. 2 T. R. 734.

INDECENT EXPOSURE. See EXPOSURE OF PERSON.

INDECENT LIBERTIES. See ASSAULT.

INDECENT PUBLICATIONS. Statutes forbidding the keeping, exhibiting, or sale of indecent books or pictures, and providing for their destruction, if seized, are within the police power of a state, and are constitutional. Cooley, Const. Lim. 748. See OBSCENITY; MAIL.

INDECIMABLE. Not tithable.

INDECOROUS. "Indecorous," as commonly understood, means impolite, or a violation of good manners or proper breeding. It is broad enough to cover the slightest departure from the most polished politeness to conduct which is vulgar and insulting.

It does not necessarily, or indeed generally, involve an insult. The latter assumes superiority, and offends the self-respect of the person to whom it is offered; while the former excites pity or contempt for the one guilty of it. A word or act may be both indecorous and insulting, but yet it often lacks the essential elements of an insult. 85 Ky. 312, 3 S. W. 530.

INDEFEASIBLE. That which cannot be defeated or undone. This epithet is usually applied to an estate or right which cannot be defeated.

INDEFEASIBLE TITLE IN FEE SIMPLE. A bond to make an "indefeasible title in fee simple," such as the State makes, demands a deed with general warranty. 3 Bibb. (Ky.) 317.

INDEFENSUS (Lat.). One sued or impleaded who refuses or has nothing to answer.

INDEFINITE. See DEFINITE; FAILURE OF ISSUE.

INDEFINITE FAILURE OF ISSUE. See FAILURE OF ISSUE.

INDEFINITE NUMBER. A number which may be increased or diminished at pleasure.

When a corporation is composed of an indefinite number of persons, any number of them consisting of a majority of those present may do any act, unless it be otherwise regulated by the charter or by-laws.

INDEFINITE PAYMENT. That which a debtor who owes several debts to a creditor makes without making an appropriation: in that case the creditor has a right to make such appropriation.

INDEFINITE TIME. Held that "an indefinite time" as applied to an intent to reside, meant that no end to such time was then contemplated. 232 U. S. 619.

INDEFINITUM (L. Lat.). Indefinite; undefined; without specification, or particular designation.

INDEMNIFY. To secure or save harmless against loss or damage, of a specified character, which may happen in the future.

To compensate or reimburse one for a loss previously incurred; L. R. 14 Eq. 479. See 14 Minn. 467.

To indemnify is said to be synonymous with "to save harmless." 1 Root 292.

Indemnification is the act of indemnifying or making good a loss. Indemnificatus, indemnified. Indemnitas (formerly indemnitas), without damage; harmless. Indemnitor, one who enters into a contract of indemnity for the benefit of another; indemnitate, one who is to be benefited by such a contract.

INDEMNITY. That which is given to a person to prevent his suffering damage. 2 M'Cord 279.

It is a rule established in all just governments that when private property is required for public use, indemnity shall be given by the public to the owner. This is the case in the United States. See EMINENT DOMAIN.

Contracts made for the purpose of indemnifying a person for doing an act for which he could be indicted, or an agreement to compensate a public officer for doing an act which is forbidden by law, or for omitting to do one which the law commands, are absolutely void. But when the agreement with an officer was not to induce him to neglect his duty, but to test a legal right, as to indemnify him for not executing a writ of execution, it was held to be good; 1 Bouvier, Inst. n. 780.

In general, a mere promise of indemnity to a third person is not within the statute of frauds; (1894) 2 Q. B. 885, aff. 8 B. & C. 728; 19 L. R. Eq. 198; 8 T. L. R. 668; 30 S. W. Rep. (Ky.) 406; 145 N. Y. 446; 62 N. W. Rep. (Mich.) 1000; and this rule applies to a promise to indemnify the surety on a liquor-dealer's bond; 64 Conn. 264; to a contract of agency, by which the agent agrees to be responsible for the non-payment of debts which may thereafter become due by others; 69 L. T. n. s. 354; to a promise to indemnify one if he will indorse K.'s notes, so that K. can have them discounted; 145 N. Y. 446; and to a verbal promise of A to B to indemnify him if he will become surety for C for a debt of the latter to D; 41 Neb. 516. But it is held in Illinois, that a guarantee of indemnity to a surety is within the statute; 45 Ill. App. 155; 41 N. E. Rep. (Ill.) 164; aff. 49 Ill. App. 509. See GUARANTY; SURETYSHIP; INSURANCE.

INDEMNITY INSURANCE. See INSURANCE.

INDEMNITY LANDS. Those lands which are, by the grant in aid of a railroad, allowed to be selected in lieu of parcels lost by previous disposition or reservation for other purposes, and the title to which accrues only from the time of their selection. 117 U. S. 232; 133 id. 518.

Title to indemnity lands does not vest in a railroad company until they are actually selected and the selection approved by the secretary of the interior; 141 U. S. 358.

INDENT (Lat. in, and dens, tooth). To cut in the shape of teeth.

Deeds of indenture were anciently written on the same parchment or paper as many times as there were parties to the instrument, the word chirographum being written between, and then the several copies cut apart in a zigzag or notched line (whence the name), part of the word chirographum being on either side of it; and each party kept a copy. The practice now is to cut the top or side of the deed in a waving or notched line; 2 Bla. Com. 295.

To bind by indentures; to apprentice; as, to indent a young man to a shoemaker. Webster, Dict.

In American Law. An indented certificate issued by the government of the United States at the close of the revolution for the principal or interest of the public debt. Ramsay, Hamilton, Webster; Eliot, Funding System 85; 5 McLean 178; Acts of April 30, 1790, sess. 2, c. 9, § 14, and of March 3, 1825, sess. 2, c. 65, § 17. The word is no longer in use in this sense.

INDENTURE. A formal written instrument made between two or more persons in different interests, as opposed to a deed poll, which is one made by a single person, or by several having similar interests.

Its name comes from a practice of indenting or scalloping such an instrument on the top or side in a waving line. This is not necessary in England at the present day, by stat. 8 & 9 Vic. c. 106, § 5, but was in Lord Coke's time, when no words of indenture would supply its place; 5 Co. 20. In this country it is a mere formal act, not necessary to the deed's being an indenture. See Bac. Abr. Leases, etc. (E 2); Com. Dig. Fait (C, and note d); Littleton § 370; Co. Litt. 143 b, 229 a; Cruise, Dig. t. 32, c. 1, s. 24; 2 Bla. Com. 294; 2 Washb. R. P. 587; 1 Steph. Com. 447; Will. R. P. 177. The ancient practice was to deliver as many copies of an instrument as there were parties to it. And as early as King John it became customary to write the copies on the same parchment, with the word chirographum, or some other word written between them, and then to cut them apart through such word, leaving part of each letter on either side the line, which was at first straight, afterwards indented or notched; 1 Reeve, Hist. Eng. Law 89; Du Cange; 2 Washb. R. P. 587. See INDENT.

INDENTURE OF A FINE. Indentures made and engrossed at the chirographer's office and delivered to the cognizor and the cognizee, usually beginning with the words: "Hæc est finalis concordia." And then reciting the whole proceedings at length. 2 Bla. Com. 351; Moz. & W.

Indentures of the conclusion of a fine including the whole matter, reciting the parties, day, year, and place, and before whom the fine was acknowledged or levied. 2 Bl. Com. 351.

INDEPENDENCE. A state of perfect irresponsibility to any superior. The United States are free and independent of all earthly power.

Independence may be divided into political and natural independence. By the former is to be understood that we have contracted no ties except those which flow from the three great natural rights of safety, liberty, and property. The latter consists in the power of being able to enjoy a permanent well-being, whatever may be the disposition of those from whom we call ourselves independent. In that sense a nation may be independent with regard to most people, but not independent of the whole world. See DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE.

Questions as to the power of municipalities to appropriate money for the celebration of the anniversary of the Declaration of Independence have arisen. It has been held that no such power exists; 2 Denio 110; 22 Conn. 522; Allen 103.

INDEPENDENT CONTRACTOR.

One who, exercising an independent employment, contracts to do a piece of work according to his own methods, and without being subject to the control of his employer, except as to the result of his work. 88 Tenn. 892.

The term is also defined to denote one who has the right to select, employ, and control the action of the workmen; 40 N. Y. Sup. Ct. Rep. 104; 66 Cal. 509; 80 Ill. App. 185; one who is subject to his employer as to the results of his work only. 7 Lea 367.

A still broader definition has been given as follows:—"Where a person is employed to perform a certain kind of work, in the nature of repairs or improvements to a building, by the owner thereof, which requires the exercise of skill and judgment as a mechanic, the execution of which is left entirely to his discretion, without any restriction as to its exercise, and no limitation as to the authority conferred in respect to the same, and no provision is especially made as to the time in which the work is to be done, or as to the payment for the services rendered, and the compensation is dependent upon the value thereof, such person does not occupy the relation of servant under the control of the master, but is an independent contractor." 101 N. Y. 377.

Any one who follows a recognized independent calling has been held to be an independent contractor; as a slater; 71 Me. 318; an architect; 30 Md. 179; a horse trainer; 11 Bradw. 39; a manufacturer of shingles; 46 Wis. 188; a builder; 11 Bush 464; a licensed public carman; 2 Daly 271; or drayman; 2 Mich. 868; or drover; 12 Ad. & El. 737; a plumber; 6 Phila. 256; and a stevedore; 19 Fed. Rep. 928; 88 Pa. 269; 6 L. R. C. P. 24; 11 Hun 354; 29 La. Ann. 791; and the mode of payment and the fact that materials are furnished by the employer have been held to have but little weight in determining whether the employee is an independent contractor or not; 15 Fed. Rep. 875; 61 Miss. 581. The rule is that where a person is under the entire direction and control of another he is to be considered his servant, no matter who pays him; 6 M. & W. 497; 5 B. & C. 560. The test to determine whether one who renders service to another does so as a contractor or not is to ascertain whether he renders the service in the course of an independent occupation representing the will of his employer only as to the result of his work and not as to the means by which it was accomplished; 101 N. Y. 385.

In cases of an independent contract, the employer is not responsible; 3 Gray 349; 103 Mass. 194; 30 Barb. 229; 5 N. Y. 48; 20 Hun 391; 86 Pa. 153; 103 id. 32; 25 Ill. 438; 83 id. 354; 88 Ala. 591; 39 Ohio St. 466; 66 Cal. 509; 28 La. Ann. 943; 7 H. & N. 826; 4 Exch. 244; 2 C. P. Div. 369; 57 Vt. 252; 19 Neb. 620; 61 Miss. 581; 11 Wis. 180. In 1 Bos. & P. 404, the rule was laid down that not only was the employer liable for the negligence of a contractor, but for that of a servant of a sub-contractor. This decision was followed in some of the earlier English and American cases, but the weight of authority in both countries has overruled it, the question of its authority having been decisively settled in each country, in what have become leading cases; 4 Exch. 244; 3 Gray 349. But see 6 H. & N. 488, and 2 Black 418, with the criticism of these cases in 87 Va. 711.

A like rule governs the question of the liability of the employer and the contractor for the negligence and torts of the sub-contractor or his servants; 7 H. & N. 826; 11 C. E. 867; 2 C. P. Div. 369; 80 Pa. 102; 64 N. Y. 138.

If he undertakes to provide the material, he is liable for an injury caused by his failure to provide it; 5 Bosw. 447; and generally, he is liable if the contract reserves to him such a power of supervision or control of the work as will destroy the free agency of the contractor, whether the supervision be exercised by himself or by persons designated by him; 92 N. Y. 10; 39 Ohio St. 466; 87 Pa. 374; 111 Pa. 316; 80

Wis. 365; 61 Ill. 481; 7 La. Ann. 321; 9 Col. 554; but not if the power of supervision reserved is not such as to interfere with the discretion of the contractor in the manner of executing the work, but is confined to seeing that the intended result is produced; 41 Ill. 502; 124 Ind. 876. A recent case accurately expresses the exact rule as to supervision to be that the employer, through its chief engineer, may reserve the right to criticize the work but not to control it; 87 Va. 711.

The employer will be held liable if the injurious act complained of was contemplated by the contract; 26 Minn. 156; 46 Wis. 138; 26 Ill. App. 263; if the contract work is necessarily dangerous or harmful; 84 Ala. 469; 41 Ohio St. 465; 19 W. Va. 523; 103 Mo. 172; 3 L. R. H. L. 330; and when work is per se dangerous and the employer does not stipulate that the contractor shall use proper precautions to avoid injury to others, the employer is liable; 2 Duv. 137; 6 Daly 469; or when the work contracted for becomes or occasions a public nuisance, unless it be due solely to the negligence of the contractor; 44 Ia. 27; 111 Ind. 195; 116 N. Y. 588; 83 Ill. 854; 111 Pa. 316; 112 Mass. 96; or when the contractor is incompetent; 80 Hun 60; 35 N. J. L. 17; and that the employer was ignorant of such incompetency will not excuse him; id.; but see 114 Mo. 55; 4 E. D. Smith 281. But it was held that when the defendants employed a carpenter and bridge builder of experience to build a bridge, it was not enough for the plaintiff to show that the work was unskillfully done; it must appear that the defendants were guilty of negligence in selecting him; that they either knew, or with proper diligence ought to have known, his incompetency; and the law presumes they made a proper selection; hence the burden of showing the contrary rests upon those who assert it; 91 Pa. 185, 191.

After acceptance of the contract work, the employer will be liable for an injury caused by a defect in it; 125 Mass. 232; 15 Minn. 304; 118 Pa. 362; 123 Id. 220; 92 N. Y. 10; 29 Cal. 243; 51 Tex. 503; 18 Kan. 84; and, if ratified by him, for the tortious acts of the contractor; 102 Mass. 211; 81 Ga. 387.

As to the liability of a municipal corporation it has been held that such a corporation cannot rid itself of responsibility for the acts of an independent contractor; 66 N. Y. 181; as he is acting under the authority of the district or city council, and without such authority, he would be a trespasser on the streets; 74 L. T. Rep. 69; and notwithstanding the nature of the work to be performed, it is the duty of the municipality to see that the streets are in a safe condition for travel; 14 Bush 87; 49 Ga. 316; 53 Md. 110; 41 Barb. 381; 2 Mo. App. 871; 9 Humph. 760; contra, 4 Pa. 213; or, as recently held in England, so to construct its sewers as not to injure the gas mains or other underground conveniences, and the municipality was held liable even when there was an independent contractor for the injury caused by an explosion in a private house because of an escape of gas from a main broken by the negligence of the contractor; [1896] 1 Q. B. 385.

And this rule is to be applied even though the contractor has stipulated that he will be responsible for all damages that may be caused in the execution of the work; 49 Me. 119; 42 Mo. App. 392; 116 N. Y. 538; 18 Ore. 426; contra, 63 Barb. 629. It has been held that where there is a statutory requirement that the contract be given to the lowest bidder, the municipality was not liable; 6 Cal. 528. See 61 Am. L. Reg. n. s. 352; 29 Am. L. Rev. 229; 8 Alb. L. J. 261. See MASTER AND SERVANT; MUNICIPAL CORPORATION; NEGLIGENCE.

One who contracts to produce a specified result, the will of the employer being represented only in the result of the work, and not in the means by which it was accomplished. 148 U. S. 622. The constant right or supervision by the employer, and the continuing duty of the contractor of satisfying the judgment of the employer do not alter the status of the contractors as independent. Id.

INDEPENDENT COVENANT.

An "independent covenant" is where a covenant goes only to a part of the consideration on both sides, and a breach of such covenant may be compensated in damages, and an action may be maintained for a breach, without averring a performance of the other conditions. 163 Ky. 599, 174 S. W. 25. See COVENANT.

INDEPENDENT PROMISES. Those made in a contract or agreement upon which one party has a right of action against the other for any injury sustained by him by reason of a breach of the covenants or promises in his favor, and where an allegation of non-performance of his covenant by the plaintiff is no defence to such action.

When the performance of one depends or is conditional on the prior performance of the other, the agreements or covenants are said to be dependent. 4 Rawle 26; 5 Wend. 496. Where performance of each is dependent or conditional upon performance of the other, they are mutually dependent.

Where there are promises on both sides in an agreement,—executory considerations,—it always becomes a question whether one party is bound to perform his before the opposite party shall be required to perform those on his side. When the agreements are dependent, neither party is bound actually to perform his part of the agreement to entitle him to an action for a breach by the other; it is enough that he was able to perform his part and offered to do so; 14 Conn. 479; 14 Me. 476; 15 La. Ann. 675.

Where the consideration is executory, technically speaking, the promise and not the performance is the consideration, and hence the obligation of one may be independent of the performance of the other. Upon examination and proper construction of mutual promises, it may appear "that the obligation of the one promise is made expressly or impliedly conditional upon the due performance of the other; and then the performance of the promise, constituting the executory consideration, is a condition precedent to the liability to perform the other promise; in the latter case the mutual promises are called dependent, and in the former they are called independent." Leake, Cont. 344.

In Jones v. Barkley, 2 Dougl. 684, Lord Mansfield thus classified mutual promises: "There are three kinds of covenants. 1. Such as are called mutual and independent, where either party may recover damages from the other for the injury he may have received by a breach of the covenants in his favor, and where it is no excuse for the defendant to allege a breach of the covenants on the part of the plaintiff. 2. There are covenants which are conditions and dependent, in which the performance of one depends on the prior performance of another, and, therefore, till this prior condition is performed, the other party is not liable to an action on his covenants. 3. There is also a third sort of covenants, which are mutual conditions to be performed at the same time; and, in these, if one party was ready, and offered, to perform his part, and the other neglected, or refused, to perform his, he who was ready and offered has fulfilled his engagement, and may maintain an action for the default of the other; though it is not certain that either is obliged to do the first act." In this case, it was clearly laid down that the criterion by which it is determined whether promises are dependent or not, is the intention of the parties, and this is to be determined from the whole contract; id.; 3 W. & S. 227; 4 id. 527; 13 How. 307; 8 Bing. n. s. 355; 29 L. J. C. P. 253; 30 id. 65; or as Lord Kenyon aptly says, "It must depend on the good sense of the case." 6 Term 870. The rule was clearly stated in a recent case: "The question whether covenants are dependent or independent must be determined in each case upon the proper construction to be placed on the language employed by the parties to express their agreement. If the language is clear and unambiguous it must be taken according to its plain meaning as expressive of the intention of the parties, and, under settled principles of judicial decision, should not be controlled by the supposed inconvenience or hardship that may follow such construction. If the parties think proper, they may agree that the right of one to maintain an action against another shall be conditional or dependent upon the plaintiff's performance of covenants entered into on his part. On the other hand, they may agree that the performance by one shall be a condition precedent to the performance by the other. The question in each case is, which intent is disclosed by the language employed in the contract; 153 U. S. 564, 576; and the intention is to be discovered from the order of time in which the acts are to be done, rather than from the construction of the agreement or the arrangement of the words; 4 Wash. C. C. 714; 6 Harr. & J. 85. See also 11 Pick. 151; 2 Cush. 287; 26 Conn. 176; 6 Gray 407.

It is said that the dependency may be expressed or implied, as the condition is expressed or implied, and that the doctrine of implied dependency was introduced by Lord Mansfield, in Kingston v. Preston, cited in 2 Dougl. 684, before which, if there was no expressed dependency, a breach by one party was no defence to an action by the other and only gave him a cross-action; Harr. Cont. 153.

What is meant by implied dependency may be briefly stated: From the definition of dependency it is clear that the term is used to describe certain conditions which necessarily belong only to bilateral contracts. As these conditions must originate in the intention of contracting parties, if expressed in the contract, they are governed by the law of conditions generally. In the absence of precise expression, the law imputes an intention, which creates an implied condition. The principles which regulate these conditions constitute the law of implied dependency and they are peculiar to the subject; Langd. Sum. Cont. 134.

The question of dependency is so much a matter of intention that there is much truth in the remark "that arbitrary rules are useless"; Harr. Cont. 153. Nevertheless certain rules of construction have been generally agreed upon and applied in the interpretation of contracts, with respect to this subject.

A note to Pordage v. Cole, 1 Wms. Saund. 319, termed by Pollock "the classic on the subject." Poll. Cont. 386, gives the five rules of Mr. Serjeant Williams which are most referred to (Langd. Sel. Cas. Cont. 641, n. 5). These rules are adopted, in a different order, in Leake, Cont. 345-7, and substantially the same general principles have been grouped in four rules; 1 Bouv. Inst. 701; Platt, Cov. 80. These classifications are extremely interesting as affording a good illustration of what is practically an early codification of the principles governing an important branch of the law of contract, and, while the first is accessible, their repetition here is proper, as they must necessarily be referred to in connection with the brief statement which present limitations permit, of the rules of construction generally accepted.

The rules of Mr. Serjeant Williams are: 1. If a day be appointed for payment of money or part of it, or for doing any other act, and the day is to happen, or may happen, before the thing which is the consideration of the money or other act is to be performed, an action may be brought for the money, or for not doing such other act before performance; for it appears that the party relied upon his remedy, and did not intend to make the performance a condition precedent; and so it is where no time is fixed for performance of that which is the consideration of the money or other act. 2. But when a day is appointed for the payment of money, etc., and the day is to happen after the thing which is the consideration of the money, etc., is to be performed, no action can be maintained for the money, etc., before performance. 3. Where a covenant goes only to part of the consideration on both sides, and a breach of such covenant may be paid for in damages, it is an independent covenant, and an action may be 4, 1869, with the Bannock Indians, whose reservation was within the limits of what is now the State of Wyoming, that "they shall have the right to hunt upon the unoccupied lands of the United States so long as game may be found thereon," etc., does not give them the right to exercise this privilege within the limits of that state in violation of the laws: 163 U. S. 504.

The act of February 8, 1887, provides for the allotment of lands to Indians in severalty. By it Indians receiving allotments thereby have the benefit of, and are subject to, the laws both civil and criminal of the state or territory in which they reside. Every Indian born in the United States to whom an allotment shall have been made by this act, or under any law or treaty, and any Indian born within the United States who has voluntarily taken up his residence therein apart from any Indian tribe and adopted the habits of civilized life, is made a citizen of the United States, without impairing his right to tribal property.

An Indian woman who marries a citizen of the United States, voluntarily resides apart from her tribe, and adopts the habits of civilized life, becomes a citizen of the United States and of the state in which she resides; 57 Fed. Rep. 959; but in a few states, marriages between white persons and Indians are forbidden by statute; Tiff. Pers. & Dom. Rel. 28. See CITIZENS; INDIAN TRIBE.

INDIAN COUNTRY. The term "Indian country" as used in §§ 2145, 2146, Rev. Stats., is not confined to lands to which the Indians retain their original right of possession, but includes those set apart out of the public domain as reservations for, and not previously occupied by, the Indians. 228 U. S. 244.

INDIAN DEPREDACTIONS ACTS. As early as May 19, 1796, an act was passed by the United States congress, providing an eventual indemnification to citizens of the United States for depredations committed by Indians in taking or destroying their property; 1 St. L. 472. Other acts of a similar character were passed from time to time. By the act of March 3, 1891, congress conferred on the court of claims "jurisdiction and authority to inquire into and finally adjudicate all claims for property of citizens of the United States taken or destroyed by Indians belonging to any band, tribe, or nation in amity with the United States, without just cause or provocation on the part of the owner or agent in charge, and not returned or paid for;" this embraced cases theretofore examined and allowed by the Interior Department, and cases authorized to be examined under the act of congress making appropriations for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the year ending June 30, 1886, approved March 3, 1885, and under subsequent acts. See 1 Sup. Rev. Stat. 918.

INDIAN RESERVATIONS. See INDIAN COUNTRY.

INDIAN TRIBE. A separate and distinct community or body of the aboriginal Indian race of men found in the United States.

Such a tribe, situated within the boundaries of a state, and exercising the powers of government and sovereignty, under the national government, is deemed politically a state,—that is, a distinct political society, capable of self-government; but it is not deemed a foreign state in the sense of the constitution. It is rather a domestic dependent nation. Such a tribe may properly be deemed in a state of pupillage; and its relation to the United States resembles that of a ward to a guardian; 5 Pet. 1, 16; 20 Johns. 193; 3 Kent 308; Story, Const. § 1096; 118 U. S. 384; 4 How. 567; 1 McLean 254; 6 Hill 546; 8 Ala. N. S. 48. "They were and always have been regarded as having a semi-independent position when they preserved their tribal relations; not as states, not as nations, not as possessed of the full attributes of sovereignty, but as a separate people with the power of regulating their internal and social relations, and thus far not brought under the laws of the Union or of the state within whose limits they resided;" 118 U. S. 375. See 168 id. 84. Their local self-government is subject to the supreme legislative authority of the United States; 135 U. S. 641.

The United States has power to pass such laws as may be necessary to their full protection and to punish all offences committed against them or by them within their reservation; 151 U. S. 577. No state can, either by its constitution or other legislation, withdraw the Indians within its limits from the operation of the laws of congress regulating trade with them; notwithstanding any rights it may confer on them as electors or citizens; 3 Wall. 407; 5 id. 737, 761. See 53 Minn. 354; nor can it authorize leases of Indian lands; 82 Hun 396. Several Indian tribes within the limits of the United States have an organized government. See CHOCTAW NATION; CHICKASAW NATION; CHEROKEE NATION. The pueblo Indians of New Mexico are not an Indian tribe within the meaning of the acts of congress; 94 U. S. 614. The Indians residing in Maine, whose tribal organizations have ceased to exist, are not "Indian Tribes," within the treaty-making power of the federal government; 84 Me. 465. The policy of congress is to vest in the courts of the Cherokee nation jurisdiction of all controversies between Indians, or in which a member of the nation is the only party; 141 U. S. 107. See IN AMITY; INDIAN.

INDIANA. The name of one of the states of the United States.

This state was admitted into the Union by virtue of a resolution of congress, approved December 11, 1816.

The boundaries of the state are defined, and the state has concurrent jurisdiction with the state of Kentucky on the Ohio river, and with the state of Illinois on the Wabash. As to the soil, the southern boundary of Indiana is low-water mark on the Ohio river.

The first constitution of the state was adopted in the year 1816.

INDICARE. In the Civil Law. To show or discover. To fix or tell the price of a thing. Calv. Lex.

INDICATE. See SHOW.

INDICATIF. An abolished writ by which a prosecution was in some cases removed from a court-christian to the Queen's Bench. Encyc. Lon.

INDICATION. In the Law of Evidence. A sign or token; a fact pointing to some inference or conclusion. Bur. Circ. Ev. 251, 263.

That which points to or gives direction to the mind; may be merely a symptom. Differs from "show" which means to make apparent or clear by evidence, to prove. 16 A. & E. Ency. 2nd ed. p. 239; 104 Pa. St. 133.

INDICATIVE EVIDENCE. This is not evidence so called, but the mere suggestion of evidence proper, which may possibly be secured if the suggestion is followed up. Brown.

INDICAVIT. A writ or prohibition that lay for a patron of a church where the clergyman presented by him to a benefice is made defendant in an action of tithes commenced in the ecclesiastical court of another clergyman, where the tithes in question extended to the fourth part of the benefice; for in this case the suit belonged to the king's court (i. e. the common law court) by the Stat. Westm. 2, c. 5. Cowel. The person sued might also avail himself of this writ. Toml.

INDICIA (Lat.). Signs; marks. Conjectures which result from circumstances not absolutely certain and necessary, but merely probable, and which may turn out not to be true, though they have the appearance of truth.

The term is much used in the civil law in a sense nearly or entirely synonymous with circumstantial evidence. It denotes facts which give rise to inferences, rather than the inferences themselves. However numerous indicia may be, they only show that a thing may be, not that it has been. An indicium can have effect only when a connection is essentially necessary with the principal. Effects are known by their causes, but only when the effects can arise only from the causes to which they are attributed. When several causes may have produced one and the same effect, it is, therefore, unreasonable to attribute it to any particular one of such causes.

The term is much used in common law of signs or marks of identity: for example, in replevin it is said that property must have indicia, or ear-marks, by which to distinguish it from other property of the same kind. So it is much used in the phrase "indicia of crime," in a sense similar to that of the civil law.

INDICT. To accuse by the finding or presentment of a grand jury; to find an indictment against.

INDICTABLE. Capable of being indicted; liable to be indicted; as, an indictable offender.

That forms a subject or ground of indictment; as, an indictable offence. Encyc. Dict.

INDICTED. Having had an indictment found against him.

INDICTEE. One who is indicted. See INDITEE.

INDICTION. The space of fifteen years.

It was used in dating at Rome and in England. The institution of indiction dates from the time of Constantine I., Sept. 1, or, according to some authorities, Sept. 15, 312; but the first instance of their use is mentioned in the Theodosian Code, under the reign of Constantius II. The papal court adopted computation by indictions about 800, the commencement of the first indiction being referred to Jan. 1, 313. The first year was reckoned the first of the first indiction, and so on till the fifteen years afterwards. The sixteenth year was the first year of the second indiction; the thirty-first year was the first year of the third indiction, etc.

INDICTMENT. In Criminal Practice. A written accusation against one or more persons of a crime or misdemeanor, presented to, and preferred upon oath or affirmation by, a grand jury legally convoked. 4 Bla. Com. 299; Co. Litt. 126; 2 H. L. Pl. Cr. 153; Bac. Abr.; Com. Dig.; 1 Chitty, Cr. Law 168.

An accusation at the suit of the crown, found to be true by the oaths of a grand jury (q. v.).

A written accusation of a crime presented upon oath by a grand jury.

The word is said to be derived from the old French word indire, which signifies to indicate, to show, or point out. Its object is to indicate the offence charged against the accused. Ray, des Inst. F. Angl. tome 2, p. 347.

A presentment and indictment differ; 2 Inst. 739; Comb. 225. A presentment is properly that which the grand jurors find and present to the court from their own knowledge or observation. Every indictment which is found by the grand jurors is presented by them to the court; and therefore every indictment is a presentment, but not every presentment is an indictment; 9 Gray 291; Story, Const. § 1784.

The essential requisites of a valid indictment are,—first, that the indictment be presented to some court having jurisdiction of the offence stated therein; and the indictment must allege specifically that the crime was committed within its jurisdiction; 22 Neb. 418; 25 Tex. App. 453, 454; 87 W. Va. 812; second, that it appear to have been found by the grand jury of the proper county or district; third, that the indictment be found a true bill, and signed by the foreman of the grand jury; fourth, that it be framed with sufficient certainty; for this purpose the charge must contain a certain description of the crime or misdemeanor of which the defendant is accused, and a statement of the facts by which it is constituted, so as to identify the accusation; Corp. 682; 2 Hale, Pl. Cr. 167; 4 S. & R. 194; 4 Bla. Com. 301; 4 Cra. 167; 26 Tex. App. 540; it should set out the material facts charged against the accused; 7 Nev. 153; 148 U. S. 197; 124 id. 483; but need not specify the statute on which founded; 89 Ga. 384. An indictment may charge a statutory offence in the language of the statute without greater particularity when, by that means, all that is essential to constitute the offence is stated fully and directly, without uncertainty or ambiguity; 17 Or. 358; 100 N. C. 449; 89 Kan. 132; 40 La. Ann. 170; fifth, the indictment must be in the English language. But if any document in a foreign language, as a libel, be necessarily introduced, it should be set out in the original tongue, and then translated, showing its application; 6 Term 163.

The formal requisites are,—first, the venue, which at common law should always be laid in the county where the offence has been committed, although the charge be in its nature transitory, as a battery; Hawk. Pl. Cr. b. 2, c. 25, s. 35. See 74 Cal. 94. The venue is stated in the margin thus: "City and county of —, to wit." Second, the presentment, which must be in the present tense, and is usually expressed by the following formula: "the grand inquest of the commonwealth of —, inquiring for the city and county aforesaid, upon their oaths and affirmations present." See, as to the venue, 1 Ark. 171; 9 Yerg. 357; 6 Metc. 225; 92 Cal. 277. Third, the name and addition of the defendant; but in case an error has been made in this respect, it is cured by the plea of the defendant; Bac. Abr. Misnomer (B), Indictment (G 2); 2 Hale, Pl. Cr. 175; 1 Chitty, Pr. 202; Russ. & R. 489. Where the defendant's name is stated differently in different parts of the indictment, it is fatally defective; 21 Tex. App. 348; or where it fails to state his given name, or aver that it is not known, a plea of misnomer in abatement should be sustained; 40 Ill. App. 17; 25 Tex. App. 402; or where it gives a wrong name; 60 Ga. 95. See IDEM SONANS. Fourth, the names of third persons, when they must be necessarily mentioned in the indictment, should be stated with certainty to a common intent, so as sufficiently to inform the defendant who are his accusers. When, however, the names of third persons cannot be ascertained, it is sufficient, in some cases, to state "a certain person or persons to the jurors aforesaid unknown." 2 East, Pl. Cr. 651, 781; 2 Hale, Pl. Cr. 181; Plead. 85; 6 C. & P. 773. Fifth, the time when the offence was committed should, in general, be stated to be on a specific year and day. In some offences, as in perjury, the day must be precisely stated; 2 Wash. C. C. 328; but although it is necessary that a day certain should be laid in the indictment, yet, in general, the prosecutor may give evidence of an offence committed on any other day previous to the finding of the indictment; 5 S. & R. 316. See 11 S. & R. 177; 1 Chitty, Cr. Law 217, 224; 17 Wend. 475; 2 Dev. 507; 6 Miss. 14; 4 Dana 495; 1 Cam. & N. 369; 1 Hawks 460; 84 Ky. 52; 147 Mass. 539; 80 Tex. App. 480; 131 N. Y. 478; 140 U. S. 118. It is not material, except where time is of the essence of the offence, to charge in an indictment the true day on which an offence was committed, or to prove the day as charged; 97 N. C. 462. Sixth, the offence should be properly described. This is done by stating the substantial circumstances necessary to show the nature of the crime, and next, the formal allegations and terms of art required by law. Steph. Cr. Proc. 156. An omission of matter of substance in an indictment is not aided or cured by verdict; 124 U. S. 463. An indictment charging a crime "on or about" a certain date is not defective, these words being surplusage, the real date being that specifically charged; 44 La. Ann. 823. As to the substantial circumstances. The whole of the facts of the case necessary to make it appear judicially to the court that the indictors have gone upon sufficient premises should be set forth; but there should be no unnecessary matter, nor anything which on its face makes the indictment repugnant, inconsistent, or absurd. And if there is no necessary ambiguity, the court is not bound, it has been observed, to create one by reading the indictment in the only way which will make it intelligible. It is a clear principle that the language of an indictment must be construed by the rules of pleading, and not by the common interpretation of ordinary language; for nothing indeed differs more widely in construction than the same matter when viewed by the rules of pleading and when construed by the language of ordinary life; 16 Q. B. 846; 1 Ad. & E. 448; 2 Hale, Pl. Cr. 183; Bac. Abr. Indictment (G 1); Com. Dig. Indictment (G 3); 2 Leach 660; 2 Stra. 1226. Averments of matters not material or necessary ingredients in the offence charged may be rejected as surplusage; 51 N. J. L. 259. An indictment is not insufficient by reason of any defect or imperfection in matter of form only, which shall not tend to the prejudice of the defendant; 152 U. S. 211. All indictments ought to charge a man with a particular offence, and not with being an offender in general: to this rule there are some exceptions, as indictments against a common barrator, a common scold, and a keeper of a common bawdy-house: such persons may be indicted by these general words; 1 Chitty, Cr. Law 230, and the authorities there cited. The offence must not be stated in the disjunctive, so as to leave it uncertain on what it is intended to rely as an accusation: as, that the defendant erected or caused to be erected a nuisance; 2 Gray 501; 6 D. & R. 143; 2 Stra. 900; 2 Rolle, Abr. 31.

There are certain terms of art used, so appropriated by the law to express the precise idea which it entertains of the offence, that no other terms, however synonymous they may seem, are capable of filling the same office: such, for example, as traitorously (q. v.), in treason; feloniously (q. v.), in felony; 84 Ky. 354; 112 N. C. 848; 115 Mo. 389; burglariously (q. v.), in burglary; maim (q. v.), in mayhem, etc.

Seventh, the conclusion of the indictment should conform to the provision of the constitution of the state on the subject, where there is such provision: as in Pennsylvania; Const. art. 5, s. 11, which provides that all "prosecutions shall be carried on in the name and by the authority of the commonwealth of Pennsylvania, and conclude against the peace and dignity of the same"; see 35 W. Va. 280; it is not necessary that each count should so conclude; 31 Tex. Cr. R. 264. As to the necessity and propriety of having several counts in an indictment, see 1 Chitty, Cr. Law 248; Steph. Cr. Proc. 153; COUNT; as to joinder of several offences in the same indictment, see 1 Chitty, Cr. Law 253; Archb. Cr. Pl. 60; in one count, see 9 Lawy. Rep. Ann. 182, note. A count in an indictment may refer to allegations in other counts to avoid repetition; 5 Park. Cr. R. 134; 63 Hun 579; 153 U. S. 308. Several defendants may, in some cases, be joined in the same indictment; Archb. Cr. Pl. 69; as where one is charged with assault with intent to kill, and another as accessory before the fact; 65 N. H. 284; 155 Mass. 224.

At common law an indictment cannot be amended by the court. It was said by Lord Mansfield in Rex v. Wilkes: "Indictments are found upon the oaths of a jury, and ought only to be amended by themselves;" 4 Burr. 2527. The rule has been continuously adhered to; Hawk. P. C. b. 2, c. 25, § 97; Stark. Cr. Pl. 287; Whart. Cr. Pl. & Pr. § 90; 3 Cush. 278; 8 Hawks 184. "It is a well-settled rule of law that the statute respecting amendments does not extend to indictment;" Shaw, C. J., in 13 Pick. 200; 3 Hawks 184; and "an amendment cannot be allowed even with the consent of the prisoner;" 16 Pick. 120; 4 Park. Cr. Rep. 387. The caption, however, may be amended, being, as it is said, no part of the indictment itself; 2 McCord 801; 42 N. J. L. 504; 5 Wis. 387.

In England the rule forbidding an amendment of an indictment has been changed by stat. 14 and 15 Vict. c. 100. In this country the subject does not rest on the common law, but there is also to be considered the constitutional guaranty to an accused of a trial, "on a presentment or indictment by a grand jury." It was settled by the United States Supreme Court that in the federal courts an indictment cannot be amended by the court, both by reason of the common-law rule and the constitutional provision; 121 U. S. 1. The question whether the rule could be changed by statute was not actually involved, but it would seem to be settled in the negative by the reasoning of the opinion in that case. The question had been considered in some state courts, and it has been held that without amendment of the state constitution, the legislature may authorize amendment of indictments by the court, not changing the offence; 53 Miss. 408; 55 id. 484, 528; in other cases it was held that the legislature might dispense with or regulate matter of form; 29 Mich. 282; 7 Nev. 157; but they could not "dispense with such allegations as are essential to reasonable particularity and certainty in the description of the offence;" 45 Ind. 388.

It is said by Bishop that "if a statute should authorize a material amendment to be made in an indictment for an offence which, by the constitution of the state was punishable only by indictment, the statutory direction would be a nullity." Bish. Cr. Proc., 2d ed. § 97; 26 Am. L. Reg. n. s. 446.

An indictment may be quashed at common law for such deficiency in body or caption as will make a judgment given on it against the defendant erroneous, but it is a matter of discretion; Bac. Abr. Indictment, K; 1 Chitty, Cr. Law 298; Archb. Cr. Pl. 66.

After verdict in a criminal case, it will be presumed that those facts without proof of which the verdict could not have been found were proved, though they are not distinctly alleged in the indictment; provided it contains terms sufficiently general to comprehend them in reasonable intentment; 1 Den. Cr. Cas. 858; 2 C. & K. 988; 1 Tayl. Ev. § 78; Steph. Cr. Proc. 171. After verdict, defective averments in the second indictment may be cured by reference to sufficient averments in the first count; 2 Den. Cr. Cas. 840. A single good count in an indictment is sufficient to sustain a verdict of guilty and judgment thereon; 58 N. J. L. 801; 94 Ala. 55.

It is not error to join distinct offences in one indictment, in separate counts, against the same person; 155 U. S. 484.

In an indictment for a statutory offence, while it is doubtless true that it is not always sufficient to use simply the language of the statute in describing the offence, yet, if such language is, according to the natural import of the words, fully descriptive of the offence, then it ordinarily is sufficient; 155 U. S. 488.

The fact that a grand jury has ignored an indictment is not a bar to the subsequent finding of a true bill for the same offence; 50 Fed. Rep. 918. The finding of an indictment must appear from the order book of the court in which defendant was indicted; if it does not so appear, a verdict against him will be set aside; 89 Va. 156; 29 Fla. 511. The fact that the foreman of the grand jury in signing his name to the indorsement of "a true bill" used his initials instead of his full Christian name, is not ground for quashing the indictment; 4 Ind. App. 568; 106 Mo. 111. One cannot be convicted of a higher degree of offence than that charged in the indictment; 183 Ind. 427; but there may be a conviction of a lesser offence; 12 So. Rep. (Fla.) 640.

INDICTOR. He who causes another to be indicted. The latter is sometimes called the indictor.

INDIFFERENT. To have no bias or partiality. 7 Conn. 229. A juror, an arbitrator, and a witness ought to be indifferent; and when they are not so they may be challenged. See 9 Conn. 42.

INDIGENA (Lat. from indu, old form of in, in, and geno, gigno, to beget). A native; born or bred in the same country or town. Ainsw. A subject born, or naturalized by act of parliament. Opposed to alienigena. Bymer, to. 15, p. 87; Co. Litt. 8 a.

INDIGENT. The needy, the poor, those who are destitute of property and the means of comfortable subsistence. 16 A. & E. Ency. 2nd ed., 239; 75 Va. 62.

A gift "to aid indigent young men" of a certain town or state "in fitting themselves for the evangelical ministry," is not void for uncertainty. The words "indigent" and "evangelical" are sufficiently definite, within ordinary intelligence. "They describe a man who is without sufficient means of his own, and whom no person is bound and able to supply, to enable him to prepare himself for preaching the Gospel." Anderson; 54 Conn. 352.

INDIGENT INSANE. In a statute providing for the care of the indigent insane, it was held that the term "indigent insane" meant all those who had no income over and above what was sufficient to support those who might be legally dependent on the estate. 16 A. & E. Ency. 2nd ed., 239; 119 N. C. 359.

INDIRECT EVIDENCE. Evidence which does not prove the fact in question, but one from which it may be presumed.

Inferential evidence as to the truth of a disputed fact, not by testimony of any witness to the fact, but by collateral circumstances ascertained by competent means. 1 Stark. Ev. 15; Wills, Circ. Ev. 24; Best, Ev. 21, § 27, note; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 13.

INDITEE (L. Fr.). In Old English Law. A person indicted. Mirr. c. 1, § 3; 9 Coke.

INDIVIDUUM (Lat.). In the Civil Law. That cannot be divided. Calv. Lex.

INDIVISIBLE. That cannot be separated.

The effect of the breach of a contract depends in a large degree upon whether it is to be regarded as indivisible or divisible; i. e. whether it forms a whole, the performance of every part of which is a condition precedent to bind the other party or is composed of several independent parts, the performance of any one of which will bind the other party pro tanto. This question is one of construction, and depends on the circumstances of each case; and the only test is whether the whole quantity of the things concerned, or the sum of the acts to be done, is of the essence of the contract. It depends, therefore, in the last resort, simply upon the intention of the parties; 68 Md. 47; 110 N. C. 261. See 9 Q. B. D. 648; 69 N. Y. 348; 151 Pa. 584; 47 N. J. L. 290; 40 N. J. Eq. 613; 115 U. S. 188; 143 Mass. 1; 12 R. I. 82; 103 N. Y. 366.

When a consideration is entire and indivisible, and it is against law, the contract is void in toto; 11 Vt. 592; 2 W. & S. 285. When the consideration is divisible, and part of it is illegal, the contract is void only pro tanto. In such case, it has been said, the connection between the different contracts is physical, not legal. See, generally, Harriman, Cont. 183-186; 1 Wall. 221.

To ascertain whether a contract is divisible or indivisible is to ascertain whether it may or may not be enforced in part, or paid in part, without the consent of the other party. See ENTIRETY; INDEPENDENT PROMISES.

INDIVISIBLE PROPERTY. Property in which the several parts after a division would not be worth as much as the property would be as a whole, or in an undivided state 145 Ky. 19, 139 S. W. 1096.

INDIVISUM (Lat.). That which two or more persons hold in common without partition; undivided.

INDORSAT. In Old Scotch Law. Indorsed. 2 Pitc. Crim. Tr. 41.

INDORSE. To write on the back. Bills of exchange and promissory notes are indorsed by a party's writing his name on the back. See INDORSEMENT. Writs in Massachusetts are indorsed in some cases by a person's writing his name on the back, in which case he becomes liable to pay the costs of the suit.

INDORSEE. The person or party to whom a bill of exchange is indorsed, or transferred by indorsement. See INDORSEMENT.

INDORSEE IN DUE COURSE. An indorsee in due course is one who, in good faith, in the ordinary course of business, and for value, before its apparent maturity or presumptive dishonor, and without knowledge of its actual dishonor, acquires a negotiable instrument duly indorsed to him, or indorsed generally, or payable to the bearer. Civil Code, Cal. § 3123.

INDORSEMENT. In Commercial Law. That which is written on the back of an instrument in writing and which has relation to it.

Writing one's name on the back of a promissory note or other negotiable instrument. 20 Vt. 499.

Written on the back of an original instrument, or on an "allonge" attached thereto, if there be not sufficient space on the original paper. 141 Ill. 461. It need not appear that it was physically impossible to indorse on the instrument. It may be on another paper when necessity or convenience requires it; 16 Wis. 616.

An indorsement is generally made primarily for the purpose of transferring the rights of the holder of the instrument to some other person. It has, however, various results, such as rendering the indorser liable in certain events; and hence an indorsement is sometimes made merely for the purpose of additional security. This is called an accommodation indorsement when done without consideration.

A blank indorsement is one in which the name of the indorser only is written upon the instrument. It is commonly made by writing the name of the indorser on the back; 18 S. & R. 315; but a writing across the face may answer the same purpose; 18 Pick. 63; 16 East 12. Its effect is to make the instrument thereafter payable to bearer; Byles, Bills *151.

A conditional indorsement is one made subject to some condition without the performance of which the instrument will not be or remain valid. 4 Taunt. 30. A bill may be indorsed conditionally, so to impose on the drawee who afterwards accepts a liability to pay the bill to the indorsee or his transferees in a particular event only; Byles, Bills *150. An indorsement on a note, making it payable on a contingency does not affect its negotiability; 15 Wend. 562.

An indorsement in full, or a special indorsement, is one in which mention is made of the name of the indorsee. Chitty, Bills 170. The omission of the words "or order" is not material, for the indorsee takes it with all its incidents, including its negotiable quality; Byles, Bills *151. The omission of the words "or order" in a special indorsement will not restrain the negotiability of a bill; 2 Burr. 1216; 1 Stra. 557.

A qualified indorsement is one which restrains, or limits, or qualifies, or enlarges the liability of the indorser, in any manner different from what the law generally imports as his true liability, deducible from the nature of the instrument. Chitty, Bills 201; 7 Taunt. 160. The words commonly used are sans recours, without recourse; 2 Mass. 14. An indorsement without recourse, or at the indorsee's "own risk," will not expose the indorser to any liability; 30 Mo. 196; 12 Wis. 639; 2 Allen 434; 46 Pa. 140; 1 Cow. 512. But such an indorsement warrants the genuineness of all prior signatures; 18 Ohio St. 516; that the indorser has title to the note; 6 Leigh 230; that the note is valid between the original parties, and not illegal, or without consideration; 58 Me. 437; 22 Kan. 157; and that the parties were competent to contract; id. The assignment without recourse leaves the assignor liable as vendor; 40 Ill. App. 108.

A restrictive indorsement is one which restrains the negotiability of the instrument to a particular person or for a particular purpose; 1 Rob. La. 222. Such are "Pay A. B. or order, for my use," or "for my account," or "only."

By the law merchant, bills and notes payable to order can be transferred only by indorsement; 16 Mass. 314; 73 Ill. 485; 68 Ga. 880; 101 U. S. 68; 17 Fed. Rep. 575; Sto. From. N. § 120; 34 Kan. 223. Indorsement is not complete before delivery of the note; 24 Conn. 333; 15 Colo. 445; hence the word indorsee in a declaration on a bill imports a delivery; Wood's Byles, Bills § 153.

An instrument promising to pay a sum certain with interest, as per annexed coupons, reciting that note and coupons were secured by mortgage, was negotiable; but an indorsement, "for value received, we hereby assign and transfer the within bond, together with all our interest in, and rights under the same, without recourse," was not a commercial indorsement, but a mere assignment passing an equitable interest subject to the defenses of the makers, and the negotiability of the instrument was thereby destroyed, and the subsequent indorsement of the transferee did not make him liable for payment in the absence of any independent contract; 59 Fed. Rep. 853.

When, by such an assignment, the legal title is left in the payee, the equitable interest merely passing to the transferee, it necessarily follows that the negotiable character of the instrument is destroyed; 39 Mich. 171. And a subsequent indorsement by the transferee does not, in the absence of a special contract, render him liable; Dan. Neg. Inst. 666; 4 Watts 400; 44 Pa. 454; 126 id. 194. The indorsement of a non-negotiable note without proof of a special contract to become responsible means nothing and creates no liability; 1 Greene (La.) 834; Dan. Neg. Inst. 709. See also 6 Kan. 480; 52 Mich. 535; 71 Mo. 827. The person making such indorsement guarantees the note to be genuine, and that it is what it purports to be; nothing more. He does not guaranty its payment, although he might do this by independent contract expressed in the contract or otherwise; 1 Greene (La.) 834.

The effect of the indorsement of a negotiable promissory note or bill of exchange is to transfer the property in the note to the person mentioned in the indorsement when it is made in full; 80 S. C. 856; or to any person to whose possession it may lawfully come thereafter even by mere delivery, when it is made in blank, so that the possessor may sue upon it in his own name at law, as well as if he had been named as the payee; 11 Pet. 80; 2 Hill N. Y. 80; 34 Neb. 803; 1 Misc. Rep. 91; 6 C. C. App. 428.

Any person who has possession of the instrument is presumed to be the legal bona fide owner for value, until the contrary is shown; 60 Ill. 289.

The payee of a note can restrain its negotiability, but a subsequent indorser can revive its negotiable quality; 1 Bay 160.

The parties are presumed to stand to each other in the relations in which their names appear. Where the holder has knowledge, the facts may be shown as between him and the other parties; 42 N. H. 9.

An indorsement on the last day of grace is good; 86 N. H. 278; contra, 11 Gray 88. An indorsement is presumed to be of the same date as the instrument; 16 Ind. 245; 28 Ill. 897; or at least to have been made before maturity; 53 Tex. 136; 94 U. S. 753.

An indorsement may be made before the bill or note itself, and so render the indorser liable to all subsequent parties; Byles, Bills *167; 30 Md. 364. A blank indorsement upon a blank piece of paper, with intent to give a person credit, is, in effect, a letter of credit; if a promissory note is afterwards written on the paper, the indorser cannot object; Dougl. 496; 8 Cra. 142; but if the holder had notice of any fraud he cannot fill in the blanks; 8 Q. B. D. 648.

When the indorsement is made before the note becomes due, the indorser and all subsequent holders are entitled to recover the face of the note against the maker, without any right on his part to offset claims which he may have against the payee; or, as it is frequently stated, the indorser takes it free of all equities between the antecedent parties of which he had no notice; 8 M. & W. 504; 8 Conn. 505; 13 Mart. La. 150; 16 Pet. 1. The indorser of a promissory note before maturity without recourse is responsible thereon if the note is fraudulent, fictitious, or forged; 32 Neb. 773.

An indorsement admits the signatures and capacity of every prior party; Byles, Bills *155.

The blank indorsement of a non-negotiable bill has been held to operate as the drawing of a bill payable to bearer; 33 L. J. Q. B. 209. The indorsement of a non-negotiable note by a payee operates to assign the payee's rights to the indorser, who takes the former's place; 33 Wis. 427.

After a bill is due, the indorsee takes it on the credit of the indorser and subject to all equities; 4 M. & G. 161; as was said by Lord Ellenborough, "it comes disgraced to the indorsee;" 1 Campb. 18. But the maker can only set up such defenses as are connected with the note, not those arising out of an independent transaction; 35 Mo. 99; 3 H. & N. 891; such as set-off as against the holder; 15 Ia. 79; 10 Exch. 572. It is otherwise as to a check, which may be transferred by indorsement after it is payable; Byles, Bills *171; but taking a check six days old is a circumstance from which the jury may infer fraud; 9 B. & C. 388. A note payable on demand is not to be taken as overdue without some evidence of demand of payment and refusal; 4 B. & C. 327; although it is several years old and no interest has been paid on it; Byles, Bills *171; a promissory note payable on demand is intended to be a continuing security; 9 M. & W. 15; but it has been held to be overdue and dishonored after a reasonable time; 2 Mich. 401; so after three months; 41 N. Y. 581 (but see 42 Barb. 50); after ten months; 41 Vt. 24.

A bill or note cannot be indorsed for part of the amount due the holder, as the law will not permit one cause of action to be cut up into several, and such an indorsement is utterly void as such, but when it has been paid in part, it may be indorsed as to the residue; 36 Tex. 305.

Indorsers, also, unless the indorsement be qualified, become liable to pay the amount demanded by the instrument upon the failure of the principal, the maker of a note, or the acceptor of a bill, upon due notification of such failure, to any subsequent indorsee who can legally claim to hold through the particular indorser; Story, Bills § 224.

The indorsement of a draft to a fictitious indorsee is usually treated as making it payable to bearer; see FICTITIOUS PAYEE; 140 N. Y. 556; but it is said not to be so unless the maker knows the payee to be fictitious and actually intends the paper to be made payable to a fictitious person; 36 S. W. Rep. (Tenn.) 387; 126 N. Y. 318; 46 Ohio St. 512; contra, 26 Kan. 691.

In most of the cases a person not a party to the instrument who writes his name on the back of it before delivery is in many states considered an original promisor; 36 Me. 147; 9 Mass. 314; 30 Mo. 225; 14 Tex. 275; 20 Vt. 555; but in Pennsylvania one who indorses before the payee is not liable to the payee, though he is to a subsequent indorser; and it cannot be shown by parol that he was a guarantor to the payee; 59 Pa. 144. The cases on the effect of irregular indorsements are very numerous and conflicting in different states. See Wood's Byles, Bills 150, note 7, where they are collected.

A plaintiff, in suing the first indorsee may omit to state in his declaration all the indorsements but the first indorsement in blank, and aver that the first blank indorser indorsed directly to himself; but in such case all the intervening indorsements must be struck out; Byles, Bills *155; 20 La. Ann. 377.

An indorsement by an officer of a corporation, where the fact appears on the instrument, does not render him individually liable; 39 La. Ann. 818.

An indorsement by one of several executors will not transfer the property; 2 C. & K. 37; 9 Mass. 320; contra, in case of administrators; 6 J. J. Mar. 446; and see 9 Cow. 84. An executor cannot complete his testator's indorsement by delivering the instrument, which has already been signed by the testator; Wood's Byles, Bills 68; 1 Exch. 32.

By the general law merchant, the indorser of a negotiable instrument is bound instantly, and may be sued after maturity, upon demand and notice of non-payment. But by the statutes of some of the states the maker must first be sued and his property subjected; 1 Col. 385; 54 Ill. 849, 473; 43 Miss. 46.

The effect of acceptance upon a bill is to remove the acceptor to the head of the list as principal, while the drawer takes his place as first indorser.

A recent course of decisions with respect to restrictive indorsement has given rise to much discussion, resulting in so general a change in clearing-house rules as to amount to a revolution in banking methods.

The litigation arising from the relations between a bank, its depositor, and the indorsee of a check or draft commences with the early English case of Price v. Neal, followed in England and this country, in which it was held by Lord Mansfield that if the drawee pays a bill which he afterwards finds to be forged, he has no recourse against an innocent indorser; 3 Burr. 1354; nor has a bank which paid a forged check; Taunt. 76; 1 Binn. 27. See also 10 Wheat. 333; 59 Hun 495. The precise principle on which the doctrine of Price v. Neal was founded, has been a subject of varying opinion and the different theories concerning it, as also a voluminous citation of the cases, will be found in an article by Professor J. B. Ames in 4 Harv. L. Rev. 297. An extended review and discussion of the cases will also be found in Keener, Quasi-Cont. 154, note 1. While it is true that a bank pays a forged check at its own peril, if the depositor be free from negligence; 126 N. Y. 319; it was held that no title passed through a forged indorsement, and hence payment by a bank made on the faith of it may be recovered from an indorsee even if bona fide for value; 1 Hill 290.

A late decision has had a very far-reaching effect with respect to the effect of restrictive indorsements.

What has been characterized as "the doctrine, newly announced by the courts," has been thus stated: "Where a draft is indorsed to a bank for collection or for account of the indorser, the form of indorsement carries notice to the bank of payment that the bank to whom the paper is thus indorsed is a mere agent of the indorser to collect, having no proprietary interest in the paper; hence if the paper turns out to be forged (i. e. raised in amount, or payee's indorsement forged), the agent bank's own indorsement is not a guaranty of genuineness, and it is under no liability to repay the amount collected, after it has paid the same over to its principal." 13 Banking L. J. 75.

The first case was Park National Bank v. Seaboard National Bank, 114 N. Y. 28, and this, it was said at a convention of bankers, "proved a revelation to many of us, and pointed out the great danger which lurked in checks and other paper having restrictive indorsements," and the second case, National City Bank of Brooklyn v. Westcott, 118 N. Y. 468, was said "to have opened the eyes of banks, heretofore unacquainted with the decision (of the Seaboard Bank case), to the real status of liability in case of restrictive indorsement;" address of S. G. Nelson, 13 Bkg. L. J. 445. The same doctrine was followed in other cases, so that it is fully established in New York and some other states and in the Federal circuit court; 46 Fed. Rep. 337; 70 id. 232; 129 N. Y. 647; 70 Mo. 648; 90 Hun 285; 62 N. W. Rep. (Minn.) 327; 17 S. W. Rep. (Mo.) 982; and the basic principle of these decisions was already approved by the United States supreme court, which held that "the words 'for collection' evidently had a meaning. That meaning was intended to limit the effect which would have been given to the indorsement without them, and warned the party that, contrary to the purpose of a general or blank indorsement, this was not intended to transfer the ownership of the note or its proceeds." 1 Wall. 166, 173; which was followed in a case of indorsement "for collection"; 148 U. S. 50; and as to an indorsement "for account," it was said, "It does not purport to transfer the title of the paper, or the ownership of the money when received;" 102 U. S. 558. In one state the contrary view has been taken and the bank of deposit of a draft with a forged indorsement, although a mere "indorsee for collection," was held liable to refund to its correspondent bank which had paid the money; 8 Colo. 49. See 64 Fed. Rep. 703.

The result of the decisions cited was the general adoption of a rule by most of the clearing-house associations, substantially like that of New York, excluding, from the exchanges, paper having a qualified or restricted indorsement, such as "for collection" or "for account of," unless the same was guaranteed. In Chicago such paper was absolutely excluded. The result has been to make the question, what is a restrictive indorsement, one of vital importance and the judicial opinion is not uniform. The following have been held to be restrictive: "for collection"; 1 Wall. 166, 173; 26 Md. 520; "for account"; 102 U. S. 558; "for my use"; 5 Mass. 548; "credit my account"; 1 Bond 387; "Pay to P. or order only"; 4 Call 411; "for deposit"; 50 Fed. Rep. 647 (contra, 77 Ala. 168); "for deposit to the credit of"; 87 Ga. 45; contra (by a divided court), 79 Md. 192; but while the presumption is that it is restrictive, the bank may show by extrinsic evidence that it was not so, either by reason of a special agreement; 50 Fed. Rep. 647; or because the proceeds were passed to the depositor's credit and subject to check before collection; 89 Ga. 109.

Where a bank to which a forged check was sent for collection credited the person sending it with the amount, without actually remitting the money, it could, on discovering the forgery, charge back the amount; 15 So. Rep. (Ala.) 440. See articles critically reviewing the cases, in the latter of which the conclusion is reached that an indorsement for deposit is restrictive; 13 Banking L. J. 361, 429; and see also Norton, Bills & N. 123; Daniel, Neg. Instr. §§ 636-7, 698.

In Criminal Law. An entry made upon the back of a writ or warrant.

When a warrant for the arrest of a person charged with a crime has been issued by a justice of the peace of one county, which is to be executed in another county, it is necessary, in some states, that it should be indorsed by a justice of the county where it is to be executed: this indorsement is called backing. See IN FULL.

INDORSER. The person who makes an indorsement.

The indorser of a bill of exchange, or other negotiable paper, by his indorsement undertakes to be responsible to the holder for the amount of the bill or note, if the latter shall make a legal demand from the payer, and, in default of payment, give proper notice thereof to the indorser. But the indorser may make his indorsement conditional, which will operate as a transfer of the bill if the condition be performed; or he may make it qualified, so that he shall not be responsible on non-payment by the payer; Chitty, Bills 179, 180.

To make an indorser liable on his indorsement to parties subsequent to his own indorsement, the instrument must be commercial paper; for the indorsement of a bond or single bill will not, per se, create a responsibility; 18 S. & R. 311. See STORY, Bills 202; 11 Pet. 80.

When there are several indorsers, the first in point of time is generally, but not always, first responsible; there may be circumstances which will cast the responsibility, in the first place, as between them, on a subsequent indorser; 5 Munt. 252; 69 Md. 352; 72 Mich. 393.

The fact that an indorsee, when he puts his name on a draft, did not think it would render him liable as an indorser, will not relieve him; 52 N. W. Rep. (Ia.) 559. Where the owner and holder of a promissory note after maturity sells and indorses the note, signing his name after that of the original payee, he is an indorser and not a joint maker; 44 Kan. 594. See INDORSEMENT.

One who transfers the title to negotiable paper and assumes a conditional liability thereon by an indorsement; and also, in a less exact sense, one who by a writing upon the paper assumes the liability of an indorser without transferring the title. 4 A. & E. Ency. 2nd ed., 257; Chalmers, Bills of Exch., 5th Eng. ed., 6.

INDUCEMENT. In Contracts. The benefit which the promisor is to receive from a contract is the inducement for making it.

In Criminal Law. The motive. Confessions are sometimes made by criminals under the influence of promises or threats. When these promises or threats are made by persons in authority, the confessions cannot be received in evidence. See CONFESSION.

In Pleading. The statement of matter which is introductory to the principal subject of the declaration or plea, and which is necessary to explain or elucidate it. Such matter as is not introductory to, or necessary to elucidate the substance or gist of, the declaration, plea, etc., nor collaterally applicable to it, is surplusage.

An inducement is, in general, more a matter of convenience than of necessity, since the same matter may be stated in the body of the declaration; but by its use confusion of statement is avoided; 1 Chitty, Pl. 259.

But in many cases it is necessary to lay a foundation for the action by a statement by way of inducement, of the extraneous or collateral circumstances which give rise to the plaintiff's claim. For instance, in an action for a nuisance to property in the possession of the plaintiff, the circumstances of his being possessed of the property should be stated as inducement, or by way of introduction to the mention of the nuisance; 1 Chitty, Pl. 292; Steph. Pl. 257; Bac. Abr. Pleas, etc. (I 2).

When a formal traverse is adopted, it should be introduced with an inducement, to show that the matter contained in the traverse is material; 1 Chitty, Pl. 39. See TRAVERSE; INVENDO; COLLOQUIUM.

In an indictment there is a distinction between the allegation of facts constituting the offence, and those which must be averred by way of inducement. In the former case, the circumstances must be set out with particularity; in the latter, a more general allegation is allowed. An "inducement to an offence does not require so much certainty." Com. Dig. Indictment (G 5). In an indictment for an escape, "debito modo commissus" is enough, without showing by what authority; and even "commissus" is sufficient; 1 Vent. 170. So, in an indictment for disobedience to an order of justices for payment of a church-rate, an averment, by way of inducement, that a rate was duly made as by law required, and afterwards duly allowed, and that the defendant was by it duly rated, was held sufficient, without setting out the facts which constituted the alleged due rating, etc., although in the statement of the offence itself it would not have been sufficient; 1 Den. Cr. Cas. 222.

INDUCIÆ (Lat.). In Civil Law. A truce; cessation from hostilities for a time agreed upon. Also, such agreement itself. Calv. Lex. So in international law; Grotius, de Jure Belli, lib. 3, c. 2, § 11; Huber, Jur. Civit. p. 743, § 22.

In Old Practice. A delay or indulgence allowed by law. Calvinus, Lex.; Du Cange; Bract. fol. 352 b; Fleta, lib. 4, c. 5, § 8. See Bell. Dict.; Burton, Law of Scotl. 581. So used in old maritime law; e. g. an induciæ of twenty days after safe arrival of vessels was allowed in case of bottomry bond, to raise the principal and interest; Locceivus, de Jure Marit. lib. 2, c. 6, § 11.

INDUCIÆ LEGALES (Lat.). In Scotch Law. The days between the citation of the defendant and the day of appearance; the days between the teste day and day of return of the writ.

INDUCTIO. In the Civil Law. Obliteration, by drawing the pen or stylus over the writing. Dig. 28, 4; Calv. Lex.

INDUCTION. In Ecclesiastical Law. The giving a clerk, instituted to a benefice, the actual possession of its temporalities, in the nature of livery of seisin. Ayliffe, Parerg. 299.

INDULGENCE. Forbearance (q. v.); delay in enforcing a legal right.

As to the effect on the discharge of a surety of giving indulgence to a debtor, see SURETSHIP.

INDULTO. In Spanish Law. The condonation or remission of the punishment imposed on a criminal for his offence. L. 1, t. 32, pt. 7. This power is exclusively vested in the king.

The right of exercising this power has been often contested, chiefly as impolitic for the reason set forth in the following Latin verses:—

"Plus saepe nocet patientia regis
Quam rigor: ille nocet paucis; hæc incitat omnes, Dum se ferre suos sperant impune reatus."

INDUSTRIAL INSURANCE. See INSURANCE.

INDUSTRIAL AND PROVIDENT SOCIETIES. Societies formed in England for carrying on any labor, trade, or handicraft, whether wholesale or retail, including the buying and selling of land, and also (but subject to certain restrictions) the business of banking (I. and P. Soc. Act, 1876, 6). Such a society (which must consist of seven persons at least) when registered under the act becomes a body corporate with limited liability, and with the word "limited" as the last word in its name (id. 7, 11), and is regulated by rules providing for the amount of the shares, the holding of meetings, the mode in which the profits are to be applied, etc.; id. 9.

In English Law. These are societies which are regulated by the English Industrial and Provident Societies Acts, 1893 to 1913. The Act of 1893, which repealed, re-enacted, and amended the previous legislation on the subject, defines an industrial and provident society which may be registered under that act as "a society for carrying on any industries, businesses or trades specified in or authorized by its rules, whether wholesale or retail, and including dealings of every description with land," and provides that no member, other than another such registered society, may have an interest exceeding £200 in the shares of such society, and that the business of banking is to be carried on subject to the provisions of the act. Such a society (which must consist of seven persons at least), when registered under the act becomes a body corporate with limited liability, and with the word "limited" as the last word in its name and is regulated by rules, providing for the holding of meetings, the appointment of officers, the mode in which the profits are to be applied, etc. Down to 1918 such societies, subject to compliance with certain conditions, were exempted from income tax, but by the Income Tax Act of 1918, became taxable.

Industrial and provident societies originated in the adoption of the principle of co-operation by working men for the purpose of buying goods for their own consumption at wholesale prices and selling them among themselves at a price sufficient to pay the expenses and realize a small profit. Many such societies also offer inducements for saving, by having the capital divided into shares of a small amount payable by weekly or monthly instalments. Sometimes part of the profits is applied in paying interest at a certain rate on the shares, and the balance for any purpose authorized by the Friendly Societies Acts. Sometimes also the shares are not transferable, but the investment of each member is accumulated for the benefit of his family. Byrne.

INDUSTRIAM, PER (Lat.). A qualified property in animals feræ nature may be acquired per industriam, i. e. by a man's reclaiming and making them tame by art, industry, and education; or by so confining them within his own immediate power that they cannot escape and use their natural liberty. 2 Steph. Com. 5. By exertion or labor. Anderson.

INE, LAWS OF. The earliest laws of the Kingdom of Wessex. They were probably promulgated between 688 and 694. Here are some of them: "If any one within the borders of our Kingdom commits an act of robbery or seizes anything with violence, he shall restore the plunder and pay a fine of 60 shillings." "The wergild of a Welsh horseman who is in the King's service and can ride on his errands shall be 200 shillings," etc. Byrne. The full text of the laws, with an English translation, will be found in "The Laws of the Earliest English Kings," edited by F. L. Attenborough (1922), at p. 36.

INEBRIATE. See HABITUAL DRUNKARD.

INEBRIETY. See DIPSOMANIA DRUNKENNESS.

INELIGIBILITY. The incapacity to be lawfully elected; disqualification to hold an office if elected or appointed to it. 28 Wis. 99.

This incapacity arises from various causes; and a person may be incapable of being elected to one office who may be elected to another; the incapacity may also be perpetual or temporary.

Among perpetual disabilities may be reckoned, the inability of women to be elected to certain public offices; and of a citizen born in a foreign country to be elected president of the United States.

Among the temporary disabilities may be mentioned, the holding of an office declared by law to be incompatible with the one sought; the non-payment of the taxes required by law; the want of certain property qualifications required by the constitution; the want of age, or being too old.

As to the effect on an election of the candidate having the highest number of votes being ineligible, see ELECTION. See also ELIGIBILITY.

INEVITABLE ACCIDENT. A term used in the civil law, nearly synonymous with fortuitous event. 10 Miss. 572.

Any accident which cannot be foreseen and prevented. Though used as synonymous with act of God (q. v.), it would seem to have a wider meaning, the act of God being any cause which operates without aid or interference from man; 4 Dougl. 287, 290, per Lord Mansfield; 21 Wend. 198; 8 Blackf. 223; 2 Ga. 349; 10 Miss. 572. In Story on Bailments § 489, the two phrases are treated as synonymous, but in a later edition, the editor, Judge Bennett, notes the distinction just mentioned and considers the phrase inevitable accident one of wider significance. See 41 Pa. 379, where this and similar expressions are discussed and distinguished; Webb, Poll. Torts 160.

Inevitable accident is a relative term and must be construed not absolutely but reasonably with regard to the circumstances of each particular case, and where having reference to a collision, it may be regarded as an occurrence which the party charged with the collision could not possibly prevent by the exercise of ordinary care, caution, and maritime skill: 2 Wall. 560; 2 E. L. & E. 559. With reference to this subject Chief Justice Drake said that inevitable accident occurs only when the disaster happens from natural causes, without negligence or fault on either side; and when both parties have endeavored, by every means in their power, with due care and caution, and with a proper display of nautical skill, to prevent the occurrence of the accident: 12 Ct. Cl. 491; 24 How. 807.

Where a rat made a hole in a box where water was collected in an upper room, so that the water trickled out and flowed on the plaintiff's goods in a lower room; L. R. 6 Ex. 317; where pipes were laid down with plugs, properly made, to prevent the pipes bursting, and a severe frost prevented the plugs from acting and the pipes burst and flooded the plaintiff's cellar; 11 Ex. 781; where a horse took fright without any default in the driver or any known propensity in the animal, and the plaintiff was injured; 8 Esp. 533; where a horse, travelling on the highway, became suddenly frightened at the smell of blood; 80 Wisc. 257; where a horse, being suddenly frightened by a passing vehicle, became unmanageable and injured the plaintiff's horse; 1 Bingham. 13; where a mill dam, properly built, was swept away by a freshet of unprecedented violence; 8 Cow. 175; it was held that no action would lie; otherwise when the falling of the tide caused a vessel to strand, as this could have been foreseen; 42 Cal. 227. A bailee is exempt from liability for loss of the consigned goods arising from inevitable accident; he may, however, enlarge his liability by contract; 150 U. S. 812.

INFAMISTATUS. In Old English Law. Exposed upon the sands, or seashore. A species of punishment mentioned in Hengham. Cowell.

INFAMIA (Lat.). Infamy; ignominy or disgrace.

By infamia juris is meant infamy established by law as the consequence of crime; infamia facti is where the party is supposed to be guilty of such crime, but it had not been judicially proved. 17 Mass. 515, 541.

INFAMIS (Lat.). In Roman Law. One who, in consequence of the application of a general rule, and not by virtue of an arbitrary decision of the censors, lost his political rights but preserved his civil rights. Savigny, Droit Rom. § 79.

INFAMOUS CRIME. A crime which works infamy in one who has committed it.

The fifth amendment of the constitution of the United States declares that, with certain exceptions not here material, "no person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a grand jury." A similar provision is contained in many of the state constitutions, although in some later ones there is a tendency to abridge the common-law strictness of requiring indictment by a grand jury.

It is settled that the provision of the federal constitution above quoted restricts only the United States so that a state may authorize an offence—capital or infamous—to be prosecuted by information; 21 La. Ann. 574; this rule of construction has been uniformly applied to the general restrictions contained in the first eight amendments; 7 Pet. 243; 2 Cow. 815; 3 id. 686; 12 S. & R. 220; Pom. Const. L. § 231-8.

It was said by Mr. Justice Miller, "There has been great difficulty in deciding what was meant a hundred years ago by the phrase infamous crime, which is used in this constitutional amendment. That difficulty is not diminished by the fact of the obscurity of the language itself as construed by what is known of the laws and usages of our ancestors at that time, in connection with the fact that both state and federal legislation in regard to crime may have made that infamous since, which would not have been so considered then;" Miller, Const. U. S. 504. The question was not authoritatively decided by the supreme court until 1885, when in Ex parte Wilson the theory that the true test is the nature of the crime, as understood at common law, was distinctly negatived, and it was said by Mr. Justice Gray for the court: "When the accused is in danger of being subjected to an infamous punishment, if convicted, he has the right to insist that he shall not be put upon his trial except on the accusation of a grand jury;" and the fifth amendment, declaring in what cases a grand jury should be necessary, practically affirmed the rule of the common law. This was that information were not allowed for capital crimes nor for any felony, i. e. an offence which caused a forfeiture; 4 Bla. Com. 94, 95, 310; thus the requirement of an indictment depended upon the consequences of the conviction, and it was concluded that the constitutional substitution of the words "a capital or otherwise infamous crime" for capital crimes or felonies, "manifestly had in view that rule of the common law, rather than the rule on the very different question of the competency of witnesses. The leading word capital describing the crime by its punishment only, the associated words or otherwise infamous crime must, by an elementary rule of construction, include crimes subject to any infamous punishment, even if they should be held to include also crimes infamous in their nature, independently of the punishment affixed to them."

Having determined that the character of the punishment was to be the criterion applied in such cases, the court discussed the question what punishment would be considered infamous, and carefully confining the decision to the requirements of the case, continued thus: "Deciding nothing beyond what is required by the facts of the case before us, our judgment is that a crime, punishable by imprisonment for a term of years at hard labor, is an infamous crime, within the meaning of the Fifth Amendment of the constitution;" 114 U. S. 417, 428, 429.

This decision was followed by a number of others which adhered to the same doctrine and decided that imprisonment in a state prison or a penitentiary with or without hard labor was an infamous punishment; 117 U. S. 348; 131 id. 1; id. 281; 128 id. 393; 134 id. 160; 135 id. 263; 140 id. 200.

Before this decision there had been a tendency on the part of the courts towards the doctrine that the question of infamy was to be determined by the nature of the crime and not at all by the character of the punishment.

Prior to the independence of the United States there were understood to be two kinds of infamy,—one based upon the opinion of the people respecting the mode of punishment, and the other having relation to the future credibility of the offender; Eden, Penal L. ch. 75. Because the legal bearing of the subject was mainly if not entirely with respect to the settlement of rules determining what crimes would disqualify the perpetrator from testifying. Accordingly the classification of crimes other than treason or felony, which were held to be infamous, were naturally those the commission of which would tend to cast discredit upon the veracity of the criminal,—denominated generally by the term crimen falsi. The manifest purpose of the constitutional provision under consideration was the incorporation into fundamental law of one of the great guarantees of liberty. And it was said by Foster, J., in the Maine supreme judicial court: "A mere reference to the history and adoption of this provision into the federal constitution is sufficient to show that it was not a question of competency or incompetency to testify that the framers of our government were considering, but rather in consequences to the liberty of the individual in securing him against accusation and trial for crimes of great magnitude, without the previous interposition of a grand jury;" 84 Me. 25.

As was said by Shaw, C. J., in an opinion quoted with approval in Ex parte Wilson, "The state prison for any term of time is now by law substituted for all the ignominious punishment formerly in use; and, unless this is infamous, then there is now no infamous punishment other than capital."

It is said in a case subsequent to that in which the supreme court settled the principle, under the laws of the United States, an infamous crime is one for which the statutes authorized the courts to award an infamous punishment. Its character as being infamous does not depend on whether the punishment ultimately awarded is an infamous one, but whether it is in the power of the courts to award an infamous punishment, or whether the accused is in danger of being subjected to an infamous punishment; 40 Fed. Rep. 71; 114 U. S. 417; 84 Me. 25.

The authoritative settlement of this question by the supreme court renders it unnecessary to refer to the earlier decisions of the federal courts, which in some cases supported a different view. Many of them are referred to in the opinion of the supreme court, and the theories on which they are based are expressly disapproved. In some of the state courts the same conclusion was reached; 108 N. C. 598; 97 Mo. 668; 84 Me. 25.

It has also been held that a crime to the conviction and punishment of which congress has superadded a disqualification to hold office, is thereby made infamous; 112 U. S. 76; 114 id. 417. The course of decisions cited renders the cases as to particular crimes of little value, but of those held to be infamous under the principle stated are, larceny; 3 N. M. 367; 40 Fed. Rep. 71; assault with intent to kill; id. 81; selling liquors without paying a revenue tax; 35 id. 411; 135 U. S. 263; refusing to register voters; 43 Fed. Rep. 570; counterfeiting United States securities; 114 U. S. 417; embezzlement and making false entries by an officer of a national bank; 128 id. 393; 121 id. 1; 140 U. S. 200. When a state authorizes prosecution by information, one accused of grand larceny before its admission as a state cannot be so prosecuted; 10 Mont. 587. See 3 Cr. L. Mag. 77; 12 Myer, Fed. Dec. 795; INFAMY; INDICTMENT; INFORMATION.

"The Construction of the Fifth Amendment to the Constitution is this: An infamous crime is one that carries infamous punishment; the test does not depend upon the punishment that ultimately happens to be inflicted, but upon the punishment the court has power to inflict."

It has been decided that a crime takes on the quality of infamy if it be one punishable by imprisonment at hard labor or in a penitentiary, and must be proceeded against upon presentment or indictment of a grand jury. 114 U. S. 417; 117 U. S. 348; 255 U. S. 433; 263 U. S. 10.

INFAMOUS PUNISHMENT. Imprisonment at hard labor, whether in a penitentiary or elsewhere, is an infamous punishment within the meaning of the Fifth Amendment, and prosecution for a crime so punishable must be by indictment or presentment by a grand jury. 162 U. S. 228; 114 U. S. 417; 178 U. S. 304; 258 U. S. 433. See INFAMOUS CRIME.

INFAMY. That state which is produced by the conviction of crime and the loss of honor, which renders the infamous person incompetent as a witness, or juror. The loss of character or position which results from conviction of certain crimes, and which formerly involved disqualification as a witness and juror.

When a man was convicted of an offence inconsistent with the common principles of honesty and humanity, the law considered his oath of no weight, and excluded his testimony as of too doubtful and suspicious a nature to be admitted in a court of justice to deprive another of life, liberty, or property; Tayl. Ev. 1187; 2 Bulstr. 154; 1 Phill. Ev. 25; Bull. N. P. 291; 67 Pa. 386; 8 Wash. C. C. 99.

The statutory abolition of this disqualification, see infra, has rendered the subject obsolete in England; Stark. Ev. (Sharsw. ed.) 118; and equally so in the United States as a question of evidence, but the constitutional guarantee against conviction of an infamous crime, otherwise than by indictment, has to a considerable extent involved the discussion of the common-law definition of such crimes. As to this branch of the subject, see INFAMOUS CRIME.

The crimes which at common law rendered a person incompetent were treason; 5 Mod. 16, 74; felony; 2 Bulstr. 154; Co. Litt. 6; 1 T. Raym. 369; larceny; 62 Ala. 164; even petit larceny at common law; 5 Mod. 75; 71 Ala. 17, 271; but not if reduced to a misdemeanor; 80 Va. 287; 3 Tex. App. 114; receiving stolen goods; 7 Metc. 500; 5 Cush. 287; see 8 Clark 290; all offences founded in fraud, and which come within the general notion of the crimen falsi of the Roman Law; Leach 496; as perjury and forgery; Co. Litt. 6; Post. 209; 3 Ohio St. 229; piracy; 2 Rolle, Abr. 886; swindling, cheating; Post. 209; barratry; 2 Salk. 690; conspiracy; 1 Leach 442; subornation of perjury; 2 G. & B. 145; suppression of testimony by bribery or by a conspiracy to procure the absence of a witness, or other conspiracy to accuse one of a crime and barratry; 1 Leach 442; bribing a witness to absent himself from a trial in order to get rid of his evidence; Post. 208. From the decisions, Greenleaf deduces the rule "that the crimen falsi of the common law not only involves the charge of falsehood, but also is one which may injuriously affect the administration of justice, by the introduction of falsehood and fraud;" 1 Greenl. Ev. § 373.

But the attempt to procure the absence of a witness, not amounting to a conspiracy; 8 Vt. 57; keeping a gaming house; 1 R. & M. N. P. 270; a bawdy house; 14 Mo. 348; adultery; 39 N. H. 505; maliciously obstructing railroad cars; 8 Cush. 384; deceptions in false weights, etc.; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 373; false pretences; 33 Fed. Rep. 544; 68 Mo. 458; embezzlement under some conditions of the law; 67 Pa. 386; conspiracy to cheat and defraud creditors; 33 id. 468; were held not infamous. The test has been said to be "whether or not the crime shows such depravity or such a disposition to pervert public justice in the courts as creates a violent presumption against the truthfulness of the offered witness,—the difficulty being in the application of this test." 1 Bish. New Cr. L. 974. By statute in England and in most of the United States, the disqualification of infamy is removed, but a conviction may usually be proved to affect credibility; 99 Mass. 420; 58 N. Y. 208; 21 Mich. 561; 50 N. H. 242. But the difference in statutory regulations is such as to preclude general statement and to require reference to the local law in particular cases.

In Alabama one convicted of an infamous crime cannot execute the office of executor, administrator, or guardian, and conviction extinguishes all private trusts not susceptible of delegation, and also disqualifies him from holding office or voting; 83 Ala. 84. Other disabilities have been created by statute in other states. See 15 Am. Dec. 322.

As the law was administered prior to the statutory removal of the disability to testify, it was the crime not the punishment which rendered the offender unworthy of belief; 1 Phill. Ev. 25; but that is not now recognized as the true test by which to determine what, in the sense of the American constitutional law, is an infamous crime. See that title.

In order to incapacitate the party the judgment must have been pronounced by a court of competent jurisdiction; 2 Stark. 183; 1 Sid. 51. The disqualification came only from the final judgment of the court; Bull. N. P. 392; 48 Me. 327; 69 N. Y. 107; and not from the crime; 1 McMull. 494; or mere conviction, or the infamous nature of the punishment; 1 Bish. New Cr. L. § 975. The proof of the crime was by the record of conviction; 5 Gray 478.

It has been held that a conviction of an infamous crime in another country, or another of the United States, does not render the witness incompetent on the ground of infamy; 17 Mass. 515; 11 Metc. 304; contra, 8 Hawks 898; though this doctrine appears to be at variance with the opinions entertained by foreign jurists, who maintain that the state or condition of a person in the place of his domicile accompanies him everywhere; Story, Conf. Laws § 620, and the authorities there cited; Fœlix, Traité de Droit Intern. Privé 81; Merlin, Répert. Loi, 8, n. 6. In some states such a record has the same effect as a domestic one; 15 Nev. 64; 10 N. H. 22; in some it is admitted only on the question of credibility; 9 Pick. 496; and again it has been held that the full faith and credit, required to be given to records of other states, does not extend to enforcing in one state personal disabilities imposed upon a person convicted of crime in another state; 75 N. Y. 466; reversing 12 Hun 231, and expressly disapproving 10 N. H. 24 and 3 Hawks 393. The question is to be determined by the law of the forum, and therefore the record should set forth a copy of the indictment; 9 Wis. 140. In some states the record is rejected altogether; 7 Gratt. 706; 23 Ala. 44. See 2 Harr. & McH. 120, 380; 1 id. 572; 1 Jones N. C. 526; 63 N. C. 294.

The competency of such a witness was restored by pardon; 2 Cra. C. C. 528; 39 N. H. 388; 41 Ala. 405; unless the disability is annexed to the conviction, by statute; 24 Ill. 298; whether granted before sentence; 4 Wall. 332; or after it has been complied with; 2 Whart. 451. See 142 U. S. 450; 144 id. 261; 21 Tex. App. 1. But the completion of the sentence does not remove the disability; 4 Cra. C. C. 607; 16 La. Ann. 273; contra, 7 id. 379. A pardon does remove it even if it contains a clause declaring that it is intended to relieve from imprisonment and not from legal disabilities incident to conviction, such clause being held repugnant; 8 Johns. Cas. 333; but after a pardon the conviction is admissible to affect credibility; 5 Hill 196; 50 N. H. 242.

The judgment for an infamous crime, even for perjury, did not preclude the party from making an affidavit with a view to his own defence; 2 Salk. 461; 2 Stra. 1148; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 374. He might, for instance, make an affidavit in relation to the irregularity of a judgment in a cause in which he was a party; for otherwise he would be without a remedy. But the rule was confined to defence; and he could not, at common law, be heard upon oath as complainant; 2 Salk. 461; 2 Stra. 1148. When the witness became incompetent from infamy of character, the effect was the same as if he were dead; if he had attested any instrument as a witness, previous to his conviction, evidence might be given of his handwriting; 2 Stra. 833; Stark. Ev. pt. 2, § 193, pt. 4, p. 723.

A person infamous cannot be a juror, if indeed the disqualification of infamy does not extend to more crimes in jurors than in witnesses; 1 Bish. New Cr. L. § 977; 1 Co. Litt. 6 b.

See INFAMOUS CRIME.

INFANCY. The state of an infant; nonage, or minority; the state of being under age, or under the age of twenty-one years. 4 Bl. Com. 22.

INFANGENETHEF, INFANG-THEF. The right of the lord of the manor to sit in judgment on the thief caught on his own land.

The jurisdictional powers granted in the charters of the thirteenth century frequently included this right, which extended to the hanging of the thief so caught, and, for this purpose, the manorial gallows was erected on the land of the lord. The privilege of ufangenethef, more rarely given, conferred the right of hanging the thief, wherever caught, if he had upon his person the stolen goods, and if he were prosecuted by the loser of the goods; 1 Poll. & Maitl. 564. See GALLOWES.

INFANS. In the Civil Law. A child under the age of seven years; so called "quasi impos fandi" (as not having the faculty of speech). Cod. Theodos. 8, 18, 8.

Infans non multum a furioso distat. An infant is not far removed from (not very unlike) a madman. Burrill; Inst. 3, 20, 9.

INFANT. One under the age of twenty-one years. Co. Litt. 171.

But he is reputed to be twenty-one years old, or of full age, the first instant of the last day of the twenty-first year next before the anniversary of his birth; because, according to the civil computation of time, which differs from the natural computation, the last day having commenced, it is considered as ended. Savigny, Dr. Rom. § 182; 6 Ind. 447. Accordingly, a man is held entitled to vote on the day before the twenty-first anniversary of his birth; 3 Harring. 507. See AGE.

If, for example, a person were born at any hour of the first day of January, 1810 (even a few minutes before twelve o'clock of the night of that day), he would be of full age at the first instant of the thirty-first of December, 1830, although nearly forty-eight hours before he had actually attained the full age of twenty-one years, according to years, days, hours, and minutes, because there is in this case no fraction of a day; 1 Sid. 162; 1 Kelt. 520; 1 Salk. 44; Raym. 84; 1 Bia. Com. 403, 404; 1 Lilly Reg. 57; Comyns, Dig. Infant (4); Savigny, Dr. Rom. § 383, 384. See FULL AGE; FRACTION OF A DAY.

A curious case occurred in England of a young lady who was born after the house-clock had struck, while the parish clock was striking, and before St. Paul's had begun to strike, twelve, on the night of the fourth and fifth of January, 1805; the question was whether she was born on the fourth or fifth of January. Mr. Coventry gives it as his opinion that she was born on the fourth because the house-clock does not regulate anything but domestic affairs, that the parochial clock is much better evidence, and that a metropolitan clock ought to be received with "implicit acquiescence." Coventry, Ev. 182. It is conceived that this can only be prima facie; because if the facts were otherwise, and the parochial and metropolitan clocks should both have been wrong, they would undoubtedly have had no effect in ascertaining the age of the child.

The sex makes no difference at common law; a woman is, therefore, an infant until she has attained the age of twenty-one years; Co. Litt. 161. It is otherwise, however, in some of the United States; 18 Ill. 209; 4 Ind. 464. In Idaho, act 1884, females come of age at the age of eighteen. The same rule exists in Vermont, Ohio, Illinois, Iowa, Minnesota, Kansas, Nebraska, Maryland, Missouri, Arkansas, California, Colorado, Oregon, Nevada, and Washington; see 18 Ill. 209; 65 Ga. 400; 90 Vt. 41; 24 Minn. 194; 21 Neb. 680; 4 Colo. 263. Before arriving at full age, an infant may do many acts. A male at fourteen is of discretion, and may consent to marry; and at that age he may disagree to and annul a marriage he may before that time have contracted; he may then choose a guardian, and if his discretion be proved, may, at common law, make a will of his personal estate; he may act as executor at the age of seventeen years. A female at seven may be betrothed or given in marriage; at nine she is entitled to dower; at twelve she may consent or disagree to marriage; and, at common law, at seventeen she may act as executrix. Considerable changes of the common law have taken place in many of the states. In New York and several other states an infant is now deemed competent to be an executor; in Pennsylvania, Massachusetts, and other states, if an infant is named as executor in the will, administration with the will annexed will be granted during his minority, unless there shall be another executor who shall except, when the minor on arriving at full age may be admitted as joint executor; Tyler, Inf. & Cov. 133.

In general, an infant is not bound by his contracts, unless to supply him necessities; Selw. N. P. 137; Bacon, Abr. Infancy, etc. (13); 9 Viner, Abr. 391; 1 Comyns, Contr. 150, 151; 3 Rawle 351; 1 South. 87; but see 6 Cra. 226; 3 Pick. 492; 1 N. & M'C. 197; or unless, by some legislative provision, he is empowered to enter into a contract; as, with the consent of his parent or guardian, to put himself apprentice, or enlist in the service of the United States; 4 Binn. 487; 30 Vt. 357; but a contract of enlistment is not voidable like other contracts of an infant; 137 U. S. 157. A dwelling-house is not within the definition of necessities, so as to render an infant liable on a contract for its erection; 78 Hun 603.

At common law, contracts for articles other than necessities made by an infant, after full age might be ratified by him, and would then become in all respects binding. In England Lord Tenterden's Act, 9 Geo. IV. c. 14, § 5, required the ratification to be in writing. But now by the Infants' Relief Act, 1874, 37 & 38 Vict. c. 62, "All contracts entered into by infants for the repayment of money lent, or to be lent, or for goods supplied, or to be supplied (other than contracts for necessities), and all accounts stated shall be absolutely void," and "no action shall be brought whereby to charge any person upon any promise made after full age to pay any debt contracted during infancy, or upon any ratification made after full age of any promise or contract made during infancy, whether there shall or shall not be any new consideration for such promise or ratification after full age."

Contracts made with him may be enforced or avoided by him on his coming of age; 20 Ark. 600; 12 Ind. 76; 4 Sneed 118; 13 La. Ann. 607; 32 N. H. 345; 24 Mo. 541; 154 Mass. 458; 39 Kan. 495; but must be avoided within a reasonable time; 15 Gratt. 329; 29 Vt. 465; 25 Barb. 399; 156 Pa. 91. See 148 Ill. 357. But to this general rule there may be an exception in case of contracts for necessities; because these are for his benefit. See NECESSARIES. 2 Head 93; 13 Ill. 63; 13 Md. 140; 32 N. H. 345; 11 Cush. 40; 14 B. Monr. 232; but an infant is not liable upon a bill of exchange at the suit of an indorsee of the bill, although it was accepted for the price of necessities; [1891] 1 Q. B. 413; bills and notes of an infant, whether negotiable or not, are voidable; 8 Ala. 725; 43 N. H. 413; 23 Me. 517; 63 Ind. 567. The privilege of avoiding a contract on account of infancy is strictly personal to the infant, and no one can take advantage of it but himself; 3 Green, N. J. 343; 2 Brev. 438; 6 Jones, N. C. 494; 23 Tex. 252; 30 Barb. 641; 31 Miss. 393; 94 Ala. 223. See 48 Fed. Rep. 810. When the contract has been performed, and it is such as he would be compellable by law to perform, it will bind him; Co. Litt. 172 a. And all the acts of an infant which do not touch his interest, but take effect from an authority which he has been trusted to execute, are binding; 3 Burr. 1794; Fombl. Eq. b. 1, c. 2, § 5, note c. The contracts of an infant, when not intrinsically illegal, are voidable, not void, and may be ratified by him upon arriving at maturity; 17 Colo. 506.

The contract cannot be avoided by an adult with whom the infant deals; 29 Barb. 160; 12 Ind. 76; 5 Sneed 659; 53 Mich. 238; 47 N. J. L. 457; 73 Me. 252; or by a third person in a collateral proceeding; 56 Me. 527; 96 N. Y. 201; 129 Mass. 29. See 136 U. S. 519.

The doctrine of estoppel is inapplicable to infants; 5 Sand. 228; 26 Cal. 147; 92 Ky. 500. Even where an infant fraudulently represented himself as being of full age, he was not estopped from setting up a defence of infancy to a contract entered into under the fraudulent representation; 11 Cush. 40; 10 N. H. 184; contra, 17 Tex. 341. But an infant cannot retain the benefits of his contract, and thus affirm it, after becoming of age, and yet plead infancy to avoid the payment of the purchase money; 33 N. Y. 326; 1 App. D. C. 359; but see 154 Mass. 458; 36 Neb. 51.

A conveyance of land by a minor without consideration is void; 90 Tenn. 705. The deed of an infant is not void but voidable only; 85 Ky. 288; and so is a mortgage; 66 N. C. 45; 43 N. H. 413; 33 Md. 128; but the deed may be ratified after reaching his majority, either expressly or impliedly; 84 Va. 509; but see 86 Ala. 442; 86 Ky. 572; and not before; 83 Ind. 182; 50 Mo. 82; 102 U. S. 300.

An infant is not competent to appoint an agent; 85 Wis. 504; his property is not liable to a mechanic's lien for material purchased by him during infancy; 96 Neb. 51. When avoiding an executory contract relating to his personal property, he need not refund the money received, where he has squandered it; 68 Hun 669.

The protection which the law gives an infant is to operate as a shield to him, to protect him from improvident contracts, but not as a sword to do injury to others; 7 Mont. 171. An infant is, therefore, responsible for his torts, as for slander, trespass, and the like; 29 Barb. 218; 29 Vt. 465; 2 Misc. Rep. 236; but he cannot be made responsible in an action ex delicto, where the cause arose on a contract; 3 Rawle 351; 15 Wend. 283; 9 N. H. 441; 10 Vt. 71; 5 Hill, S. C. 391. But see 6 Cra. 226; 15 Mass. 359; 4 M'Cord 387. It is well settled that an infant bailee of a horse is liable in an action ex delicto for every tortious wilful act causing injury or death to the horse, the same as though he were an adult; 3 Wend. 137; 50 N. H. 235; Field, Inf. 32.

With regard to the responsibility of infants for crimes, the rule is that no infant within the age of seven years can be guilty of felony or be punished for any capital offence; for within that age an infant is, by presumption of law, doli incapax and cannot be endowed with any discretion; and against this presumption no averment shall be received. The law assumes that this legal incapacity ceases when the infant attains the age of fourteen years, but subjects this assumption to the effect of proof; 40 Vt. 585. Between the age of seven and fourteen years an infant is deemed prima facie to be doli incapax; but in this case the maxim applies, malitia supplet aetatem; malice supplies the want of mature years; 1 Russ. Cri. 2, 3; 31 Ala. n. s. 323; 45 La. Ann. 1172; and the question whether such a child is capable of committing an assault with intent to murder, is for the jury; 15 So. Rep. Ala. 438. See 56 N. W. Rep. Ia. 403; 1 Bishop, N. Cr. L. § 368.

Infant defendants are not properly before the court when not served with summons, and there is no appointment of a guardian ad litem to represent them; 36 S. C. 354. Where infant defendants have no special or separate defence, no separate answer is necessary, but joinder in the general answer of defendants is sufficient; 94 Cal. 54. See GUARDIAN AD LITEM.

As to liability for necessities, see 12 L. R. A. 859; 35 Cent. L. J. 203; 2 id. 763; 22 Am. L. Reg. n. s. 607; 25 id. 698; 29 Sol. J. 42. As to the duty of the divorced father of an infant, see 19 Cent. L. J. 35; as to contracts of infants, generally, see 22 Am. L. Reg. n. s. 273; 24 Ir. L. T. 523; 2 Cent. L. J. 320; to marry; 20 Am. L. Reg. 447, 459; marriage settlement; 26 Ir. L. T. 694; power of attorney; 31 Cent. L. J. 104; partnership; 26 Am. L. Reg. n. s. 713; 27 id. 528.

INFANTICIDE. In Medical Jurisprudence. The murder of a new-born infant. It is thus distinguishable from abortion and feticide, which are limited to the destruction of the life of the fetus in utero.

The crime of infanticide can be committed only after the child is wholly born; 5 C. & P. 329; 6 id. 249. But the destruction of a child in ventre sa mère is a high misdemeanor; 1 Bla. Com. 129. See 2 C. & K. 784; 7 C. & P. 850.

This question involves an inquiry, first, into the signs of maturity, the data for which are—the length and weight of the fetus, the relative position of the centre of its body, the proportional development of its several parts as compared with each other, especially of the head as compared with the rest of the body, the degree of growth of the hair and nails, the condition of the skin, the presence or absence of the membrana pupillaris, and in the male the descent or non-descent of the testicles; Dean, Med. Jur. 149; Tayl. Med. Jur. 84.

Second, was it born alive? The second point presents an inquiry of great interest both to the legal and medical professions and to the community at large. In the absence of all direct proof, what organic facts proclaim the existence of life subsequent to birth? These facts are derived principally from the circulatory and respiratory systems. From the former the proofs are gathered—from the character of the blood, that which is purely fetal being wholly dark, like venous blood, and forming coagula much less firm and solid than that which has been subjected to the process of respiration. From the condition of the heart and blood-cessals. The circulation anterior and subsequent to birth must necessarily be entirely different. That anterior, by means of the foetal openings—the foramen ovale, the ductus arteriosus, and the ductus venosus—is enabled to perform its circuit without sending the entire mass of the blood to the lungs for the purpose of oxygenation. When the extra-uterine life commences, and the double circulation is established, these openings usually close; so that their closure is considered probable evidence of life subsequent to birth; 1 Beck, Med. Jur. 478; Dean, Med. Jur. 148. From the difference in the distribution of the blood in the different organs of the body. The two organs in which this difference is most perceptible are the liver and the lungs, especially the latter. The circulation of the whole mass of the blood through the lungs stops and fills them with blood, so that their relative weight will be nearly doubled, and any incision into them will be followed by a free effusion.

From the respiratory system proofs of life subsequent to birth are derived. From the thorax: its size, capacity, and arch are increased by respiration. From the lungs: they are increased in size and volume, are projected forward, become rounded and obtuse, of a pinkish-red hue, and their density is inversely as their volume; Dean, Med. Jur. 149 seq. The fact of the specific gravity of the lungs being diminished in proportion to their diminution in density gives rise to a celebrated test,—the hydrostatic,—the relative weight of the lungs with water; 1 Beck, Med. Jur. 489 et seq. The rule is that the lungs which have not respired are specifically heavier than water, and if placed within it will sink to the bottom of the vessel. If they have respired, their increase in volume and decrease in density render them specifically lighter than water, and when placed within it they will float. There are several objections to the sufficiency of this test, or example lungs which have never respired may become so distended with putrefactive gases as to float, and, on the other hand, lungs which have respired may be the seat of congestion or inflammation, which would cause them to sink; but it is fairly entitled to its due weight in the settlement of this question; Dean, Med. Jur. 154 et seq. From the state of the diaphragm: prior to respiration it is found high up in the thorax. The act of expanding the lungs enlarges and arches the thorax, and by necessary consequence, the diaphragm descends.

The fact of life at birth being established, the next inquiry is, how long did the child survive? The proofs here are derived from three sources. The foetal openings, their partial or complete closure. The more perfect the closure, the longer the time. The series of changes in the umbilical cord. These are—1, the withering of the cord; 2, its desiccation or drying, and, 3, its separation or dropping off, occurring usually four or five days after birth; 4, cicatrization of the umbilicus,—occurring usually from ten to twelve days after birth. The changes in the skin, in the process of exfoliation of the epidermis, which commences on the abdomen, and extends thence successively to the chest, groin, axillae, scapular space, limbs, and, finally, to the hands and feet.

As to the modes by which the life of the child may have been destroyed. The criminal modes most commonly resorted to are—1, suffocation; 2, drowning; 3, cold and exposure; 4, starvation; 5, wounds, fractures, and injuries of various kinds; a mode not unfrequently resorted to is the introduction of sharp-pointed instruments in different parts of the body; also, luxation and fracture of the neck, accomplished by forcibly twisting the head of the child, or pulling it backwards; 6, strangulation; 7, poisoning; 8, intentional neglect to tie the umbilical cord; and, 9, causing the child to inhale air deprived of its oxygen, or gases positively deleterious. All these modes of destroying life, together with the natural or accidental ones, will be found fully discussed by the writers on medical jurisprudence. 1 Beck, Med. Jur. 500; Dean, Med. Jur. 179; Ryan, Med. Jur. 137; Dr. Cummins, Proof of Infanticide Considered; Storer & Heard, Criminal Abortion; Brown, Infanticide; Toulmouche, Etudes sur l'infanticide.

INFANZON. In Spanish Law. A person of noble birth, who exercises within his domains and inheritance no other rights and privileges than those conceded to him.

INFEOFFMENT. The act or instrument of feoffment. In Scotland it is synonymous with saisine, meaning the instrument of possession; formerly it was synonymous with investiture. Bell, Dict. The word as used in Scotch law was infeftment, which was, in its proper sense, the whole feudal right, but, afterwards, the instrument or attestation of a notary that possession was actually given. Ersk. Prin. 138.

INFERENCE. A conclusion drawn by reason from premises established by proof.

A deduction or conclusion from facts or propositions known to be true. 44 Wis. 386.

It is the province of the judge who is to decide upon the facts to draw the inference. When the facts are submitted to the court, the judges draw the inference; when they are to be ascertained by a jury, the jury must do so. The witness is not permitted, as a general rule, to draw an inference and testify that to the court or jury. It is his duty to state the facts simply as they occurred. Inferences differ from presumptions.

INFERIOR CIVIL COURTS. See COURTS OF ENGLAND.

INFERIOR COURTS. An inferior court is a court of special and limited jurisdiction, and it must appear on the face of its proceedings that it has jurisdiction, and that the parties were subjected to its jurisdiction by proper process, or its proceedings will be void. Cooley, Const. Lim. 508. Another distinction between superior and inferior courts is: in the latter case, a want of jurisdiction may be shown even in opposition to the recitals contained in the record; id. 509; citing 5 N. Y. 431, 497; 26 Conn. 273; this is the general rule, though there are apparent exceptions of those cases where the jurisdiction may be said to depend upon the existence of a certain state of facts, which must be passed upon by the courts themselves, and in respect to which the decision of the court once rendered, if there was any evidence whatever on which to base it, must be held final and conclusive in all collateral inquiries, notwithstanding it may have erred in its conclusions; Cooley, Const. Lim. 509; citing 1 B. & B. 432; Freeman, Judg. § 523; 10 Wis. 16; 16 Mich. 225.

INFERRED. Derived from the Latin inferre, compounded of "in" from, and "ferre" to carry or bring, and its strict meaning is to bring a result or conclusion from something back of it, that is, from some evidence or data from which it may be logically deduced. 46 Conn. 385. Cf. PRESUME.

INFICIATIO (Lat.). In Civil Law. Denial. Denial of fact alleged by plaintiff. —especially, a denial of debt or deposit. Voc. Jur. Utr.; Calvinus, Lex.

INFIDEL. One who does not believe in the existence of a God who will reward or punish in this world or that which is to come. Willes 550. One who professes no religion that can bind his conscience to speak the truth. 1 Greenl. Ev. § 368. One who does not recognize the inspiration or obligation of the Holy Scriptures, or generally recognized features of the Christian religion. 37 N. Y. 580.

This term has been very indefinitely applied. Under the name of infidel, Lord Coke comprises Jews and heathens; Co. 2d Inst. 506; Co. 3d Inst. 165; and Hawkins includes among infidels such as do not believe either in the Old or New Testament; Hawk. Pl. Cr. b. 2, c. 46, s. 148.

The objection to the competency of witnesses who have no religious belief is removed in England and in most of the United States by statutory enactments; 1 Whart. Ev. § 395.

It has been held that at common law it is only requisite that the witness should believe in the existence of a God who will punish and reward according to desert; 1 Atk. 21; 2 Cow. 431; 5 Mas. 18; 13 Vt. 362; 26 Pa. 274; that it is sufficient if the punishment is to be in this world; 14 Mass. 184; 4 Jones, No. C. 25; contra, 7 Conn. 66. And see 17 Wend. 460; 2 W. & S. 262; 10 Ohio 121. A witness's belief is to be presumed till the contrary appear; 2 Dutch. 463, 601; and his disbelief must be shown by declarations made previously, and cannot be inquired into by examination of the witness himself; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 370, n.; 17 Me. 157; 14 Vt. 535. See 17 Ill. 541; 80 Ky. 248; 53 N. H. 55. See Tayl. Ev. 1178.

INFILTH (Sax.). An assault upon an inhabitant of same dwelling. Gloss. Anc. Inst. & Laws of Eng.

INFIRM. Weak, feeble.

When a witness is infirm to an extent likely to destroy his life, or to prevent his attendance at the trial, his testimony de bene esse may be taken at any age. 1 P. Wms. 117. See WITNESS.

INFIRMATIVE. Weakening. Webster, Dict. Tending to weaken or render infirm; disprobabilizing. 3 Benth. Jud. Ev. 13, 14. Excusatory is used by some authors as synonymous. See Wills, Circ. Ev. 120; Best, Pres. § 217.

INFLUENCE. Most frequently used in connection with "undue," and refers to persuasion, machination, or constraint of will presented or exerted to procure a disposition of property, by gift, conveyance, or will. Anderson, L. Dict.

The influence which is undue in cases of gifts inter vivos differs from that which is required to set aside a will. In testamentary cases, undue influence is always defined as coercion or fraud, but, inter vivos, no such definition is applied. Where parties occupy positions in which one is more or less dependent upon the other, courts of equity hold that the weaker party must be protected, and they set aside his gifts if he had not proper advice independently of the other. Anderson; 34 N. J. E. 575.

Influence, to vitiate an act, must amount to force and coercion destroying free agency; it must not be the influence of affection or attachment; not the mere desire of gratifying the wishes of another. There must be proof that the act was obtained by coercion, by importunity which could not be resisted; that it was done merely for the sake of peace; so that the motive was tantamount to force or fear. Id.; 59 Cal. 561.

Undue influence is often defined by the courts to be "a fraudulent and controlling influence." In any application, the phrase savors of what is meant by fraud. Id.; 89 N. C. 383.

When a person, from infirmity and mental weakness, is likely to be easily influenced by others, a transaction entered into by him, without independent advice, will be set aside, if there is any unfairness in it. Thus, where there is a great weakness of mind in a grantor, arising from age, sickness, or other cause, though not amounting to absolute disqualification, and the consideration is grossly inadequate, a court of equity, upon proper and reasonable application of the person injured, his representatives or heirs, will set the conveyance aside. In such case, it is sufficient to show: great mental weakness, not amounting to insanity or extreme imbecility; and inadequacy of consideration. Id.; 94 U. S. 511-12.

Influence obtained by modest persuasion and arguments addressed to the understanding or by mere appeal to the affections, cannot be termed "undue"; but influence obtained by flattery, importunity, superiority of will, mind, or character, or by what art soever that human thought, ingenuity, or cunning may employ, which would give dominion over the will of the testator to such an extent as to destroy free agency or constrain him to do, against his will, what he is unable to refuse, is "undue." Id.; 58 Mich. 106.

The undue influence for which a deed or will will be annulled must be such that the party making it has no free will but stands in vinculis. "It must amount to force or coercion, destroying free agency." The ground upon which courts of equity grant relief is that one party by improper means has gained an unconscionable advantage over another. Each case must be decided on its own merits. Id.; 118 U. S. 127.

Where a testator embraced spiritualism as practiced by his beneficiary, and became possessed by it, and this belief was used by the beneficiary to alienate him from his only child, his will was set aside. Id.; 14 F. R. 902.

INFORMALITY. Want of customary or legal form.

INFORMATION. In French Law. The act or instrument which contains the depositions of witnesses against the accused. Pothier, Proc. Civ. sect. 2, art. 5.

In Practice. A complaint or accusation exhibited against a person for some criminal offence. 4 Bla. Com. 308.

An accusation in the nature of an indictment, from which it differs only in being presented by a competent public officer on his oath of office, instead of a grand jury on their oath. 1 Bish. Cr. Proc. § 141.

It differs in no respect from an indictment in its form and substance, except that it is filed at the mere discretion of the proper law officer of the government, ex officio, without the intervention of a grand jury; 4 Bla. Com. 308. The process has not been formally put in motion by congress for misdemeanors, but is common in civil prosecutions for penalties and forfeitures; 3 Story, Const. 659. The information is usually made upon knowledge given by some other person than the officer called the relator. "It comes from the common law without the aid of statutes; 5 Mod. 459; it is a concurrent remedy with indictment for all misdemeanors except misprision of treason, but not permissible in any felony." Bish. Cr. Pr. § 14; 5 Mass. 257; 9 Leigh 665.

As to the power of a legislature to dispense with indictment, see INFAMOUS CRIME.

Under United States laws, informations are resorted to for illegal exportation of goods; 1 Gall. 3; in cases of smuggling; 1 Mas. 482; and a libel for seizure is in the nature of an information; 9 Wash. C. C. 464; 1 Wheat. 9; 9 id. 381. The provisions of the U. S. constitution which provide that no person shall be held to answer for a capital or otherwise infamous crime, unless on presentment, etc., of a grand jury, have been held to apply only to the proceedings in the federal courts; Whart. Cr. Pl. & Cr. Pr. 83; 24 Ala. 672; 8 Vt. 57.

An information is sufficiently formal if it follows the words of the statute; 9 Wheat. 381; 14 Conn. 487; but enough must appear to show whether it is found under the statute or at common law; 3 Day 103. It must, however, allege the offence with sufficient fulness and accuracy; 10 Ind. 404; and must show all the facts demanding a forfeiture, as in a penal action, when it is to recover a penalty; 4 Mass. 462; 10 Conn. 461. Where it is for a first offence, the fact need not be stated; 9 Conn. 560; otherwise, where it is for a second or subsequent offence for which an additional penalty is provided; 2 Metc. Mass. 408. It need not show that there has been a preliminary examination or a waiver thereof; 48 Kan. 752. It cannot be amended by adding charges; 1 Dana 466; contra, that it can be amended before trial; 12 Conn. 101; 38 N. H. 314; 1 Salk. 471. By the common law a mistake in an information may be amended at any time; 64 Vt. 372. The information charging a statutory offence cannot be amended after verdict so as to include another offence found by the jury; 88 Mich. 359. It must be signed by the officer before filing; 15 Kan. 404; but not necessarily in Texas; 1 Tex. App. 664; and must conclude with "against the peace and dignity of the state;" 27 Tex. App. 538. In England, a verification was not required; but it is usually otherwise by statute in America; 4 Ind. 524; 1 McArthur. 466.

A part of the defendants may be acquitted and a part convicted; 1 Root 226; and a conviction may be of the whole or a part of the offence charged; 4 Mass. 137. In some states it is a proceeding by the state officer, filed at his own discretion; 9 N. H. 468; 6 Ind. 281; 4 Wis. 567; in others, leave of court may be granted to any relator to use the state officer's name, upon cause shown; 7 Halst. 84; 2 Dall. 112; 1 McCord 55, 62. See 45 La. Ann. 26. In England, the right to make an information was in the attorney-general, who acted without the interference of the court; 3 Burr. 2089. In former times the officer proceeded upon any application, as of course; 4 Term 385; but by an act passed in 1692, it was provided that leave of court must be first obtained and security entered; see 2 Term 190. It is said to be doubtful whether leave of court is necessary in this country; 1 Bish. Cr. Pr. § 144. A prosecuting officer may, on his own motion, present a bill to the grand jury, without presenting an affidavit charging the offence, if he deems it necessary for the public good; and his action in doing so will be disturbed only in case of abuse of discretion; 20 S. E. Rep. (S. C.) 1010.

See INDICTMENT; GRAND JURY; INFAMOUS CRIME. See NO KNOWLEDGE OR INFORMATION.

INFORMATION OF INTRUSION. A proceeding instituted by the state prosecuting officer against intruders upon the public domain. See 3 Pick. 234; 6 Leigh 588.

INFORMATION IN THE NATURE OF A QUO WARRANTO. A proceeding against the usurper of a franchise or office. See QUO WARRANTO.

INFORMATUS NON SUM (Lat.). In Practice. I am not informed: a formal answer made in court or put upon record by an attorney when he has nothing to say in defence of his client. Styles, Reg. 372.

INFORMER. A person who informs or prefers an accusation against another, whom he suspects of the violation of some penal statute.

When the informer is entitled to the penalty or part of the penalty, upon the conviction of an offender, he is or is not at common law a competent witness, according as the statute creating the penalty has or has not made him so; 1 Phill. Ev. 97; Ros. Cr. Ev. 107; 5 Mass. 57; 1 Dall. 63; 1 Saund. 262, c. See 16 Pet. 213; 4 East 180. The court is not bound to instruct the jury that the testimony of such a witness is to be received with great caution and distrust, since the credibility of witnesses is for the jury, and counsel are permitted to argue the question to them; 15 R. I. 1.

INFORTIATUM (Lat.). In Civil Law. The second part of the Digest or Pandects of Justinian. See DIGEST.

This part, which commences with the third title of the twenty-fourth book and ends with the thirty-eighth book, was thus called because it was the middle part, which, it was said, was supported and fortified by the two others. Some have supposed that this name was given to it because it treats of successions, substitutions, and other important matters, and, being more used than the others, produced greater fees to the lawyers.

INFRA (Lat.). Below, under, beneath, underneath. The opposite of supra, above. Thus, we say, primo gradu est—supra, pater, mater, infra, filius, filia: in the first degree of kindred in the ascending line, above is the father and the mother, below, in the descending line, son and daughter. Inst. 3. 6. 1.

In another sense, this word signifies within: as, infra corpus civitatis, within the body of the country; infra præsidia, within the guards. So of time, during: infra furor, during the madness. This use is not classical. The sole instance of the word in this sense in the Code, infra anni spatium, Code, b. 3, tit. 9, § 2, is corrected to infra anni spatium, in the edition of the Corpus Jur. Civ. of 1833 at Leipsic. The use of infra for intra seems to have sprung up among the barbarians after the fall of the Roman empire.

INFRA ÆTATEM (Lat.). Within or under age.

INFRA ANNUM LUCTUS (Lat.). Within the year of grief or mourning. 1 Bla. Com. 457; Cod. 5. 9. 2. But intra anni spatium is the phrase used in the passage in the Code referred to. See Corp. Jur. Civ. 1833, Leipsic. Intra tempus luctus occurs in Novella 23, c. 40. This year was at first ten months, afterwards twelve. 1 Beck, Med. Jur. 612.

INFRA BRACHIA (Lat.). Within her arms. Used of a husband de jure as well as de facto. Co. 2d Inst. 317. Also, inter brachia. Bracton, fol. 148 b. It was in this sense that a woman could only have an appeal for murder of her husband inter brachia sua. Woman's Lawyer, pp. 332, 335.

INFRA CORPUS COMITATUS (Lat.). Within the body of the county.

The common-law courts have jurisdiction infra corpus comitatus: the admiralty, on the contrary, has no such jurisdiction, unless, indeed, the tide-water may extend within such county. 5 How. 441, 451. See ADMIRALTY; FAUCES TERRÆ.

INFRA DIGNITATEM CURIÆ (Lat.). Below the dignity of the court. Example: in equity a demurrer will lie to a bill on the ground of the triviality of the matter in dispute, as being below the dignity of the court. See 4 Johns. Ch. 183; 4 Paige, Ch. 364.

INFRA HOSPITIUM (Lat.). Within the inn. When once a traveller's baggage comes infra hospitium, that is, in the care and under the charge of the innkeeper, it is at his risk. See GUEST; INNKEEPER.

INFRA PRÆSIDIA (Lat.) within the walls. A term used in relation to prizes, to signify that they have been brought completely in the power of the captors; that is, within the towns, camps, ports, or fleet of the captors. Formerly the rule was, and perhaps still in some countries is, that the act of bringing a prize infra præsidia changed the property; but the rule now established is that there must be a sentence of condemnation to effect this purpose. 1 C. Rob. 134; 1 Kent 104; Chitty, Law of Nat. 98; Abbott, Shipp. 14; Hugo, Droit Romain § 90.

INFRACTION (Lat.) infrango, to break in upon). The breach of a law or agreement; the violation of a compact. In the French law this is the generic expression to designate all actions which are punishable by the Code of France.

INFRINGEMENT. In Patent Law. A word used to denote the act of trespassing upon the incorporeal right secured by a patent or copyright. Any person who, without legal permission, shall make, use, or sell to another to be used, the thing which is the subject-matter of any existing patent, is guilty of an infringement, for which damages may be recovered at law by an action on the case, or which may be remedied by a bill in equity for an injunction and an account.

The manufacture, sale, or use of an invention protected by letters patent, within the area and time described therein by a person not duly authorized to do so. Robt. Pat. § 890.

Infringement is a mixed question of law and fact; 118 U. S. 609. Whether a device is an infringement is determined by the claims of the patent, and not by the actual invention; 9 Blatchf. 383; 5 Fish. 285. There is no infringement unless the invention can be practised completely by following the specifications. An infringement is a copy made after, and agreeing with, the principle laid down in the patent; and if the patent does not fully describe everything essential to the thing patented, no infringement will take place by the fresh invention of processes which the patentee has not communicated to the public; 1 Fish. 298. Where the same advantages are gained by substantially the same means, there is infringement; 12 Fed. Rep. 790. The test is whether the defendant uses anything which the plaintiff has invented; 7 Fed. Rep. 199, 204.

However different, apparently, the arrangements and combinations of a machine may be from the machine of the patentee, it may in reality embody his invention, and be as much an infringement as if it were a servile copy of his machine. According to the Patent Law, if the machine complained of involves substantial identity with the one patented, it is an infringement. If the invention of the patentee be a machine, it is infringed by a machine which incorporates, in its structure and operation, the substance of the invention,—that is, an arrangement which performs the same service, or produces the same effect, in the same way, or substantially the same way; 8 Blatchf. 535. And a device may be an infringement though it be itself a new invention; 16 Fed. Rep. 589. To obtain the same result by the same mode of operation constitutes infringement; 30 Fed. Rep. 69; and so does a mere formal change; 11 Fed. Rep. 880; or variations in size, form, and degree; 27 Fed. Rep. 684; 13 id. 456.

An invention limited to certain forms is infringed only by the use of those forms; 31 Fed. Rep. 918.

Where the same result is accomplished, the same function performed, and the mode of operation is the same, a mere difference in the location of parts will not avoid infringement; 42 O. G. 297.

An improvement may be an infringement; 12 Fed. Rep. 621. An improvement and its original are separate inventions, and the inventor of one infringes by the use of the other; 29 Fed. Rep. 358; 15 id. 448. It is, however, presumed that use under one patent does not infringe another; 1 MacArthur 459; and the grant of a second patent is prima facie evidence that the inventions are different, and that the later patented invention is not an infringement of the former; 1 Bann. & A. 428; 3 Blatch. 190.

To experiment with a patented article for scientific purposes, or for curiosity, or amusement, is said not to constitute infringement; 4 Blatchf. 493; but this cannot be invariably true. To make and exhibit a device at a fair, but not for use or sale, is not an infringement; 15 Fed. Rep. 370; nor is mere exposure for sale; 4 A. & E. 251; nor advertising an invention; 19 O. G. 727; but the latter is strong evidence of infringement; 19 O. G. 727. To make an article for sale abroad is an infringement; 8 Fed. Rep. 586.

An infringement may be committed by repairing as well as making the invention, if it involves reconstruction either in whole or in part; 3 Bann. & A. 471. To make a part with intent to use it, or to sell it to be used, in connection with the other parts of the invention, is infringement; 30 Fed. Rep. 437.

One who makes and sells one element of a patented combination with the intention and for the purpose of bringing about its use in such a combination, is guilty of infringement; 80 Fed. Rep. 712; 132 U. S. 425; but not where the article made by the alleged infringer was not separately patented and was of a perishable nature (sheets of toilet paper); id. It has been held that replacing broken or worn-out parts is not necessarily infringement; 77 Fed. Rep. 739; 75 id. 1009. See 77 id. 283, citing many cases.

No act of making, use, or sale can be an infringement of a patented invention unless it is performed during the life of the patent; 128 U. S. 605; 37 Fed. Rep. 354; see 163 U. S. 55. An infringement may be committed by the use, after the patent issues, of a device constructed before the creation of the monopoly, notwithstanding the good faith of its purchaser or maker and his belief that it will never be protected by a patent; 3 Rob. Pat. § 907; 34 Fed. Rep. 789.

One who buys a patented article of manufacture from one authorized to sell it at the place where it is sold, becomes possessed of an absolute property in it, unrestricted in time or place; 157 U. S. 859; whether a patentee may protect himself and his assignees by special contracts brought home to the purchasers was not decided in the case. A licensee of a patent for Michigan sold pipes to be laid in Connecticut, where he had no patent right; it was held that he was not liable for infringement; 149 U. S. 355; see 17 Wall. 453.

A re-issue is not infringed by an act committed before the surrender of the original patent; 2 Rob. Pat. § 698. A re-issue with a broader claim is not infringed by the use of devices made before the original patent, though they are covered by the new claim; 11 Fed. Rep. 510; 20 Blatchf. 833. A device which does not infringe the original cannot infringe the re-issue, if the scope of the original is measured by its description and not by its claims alone; 4 Bann. & A. 159.

A patent for a combination of old elements is not infringed by using less than all the elements, where the two combinations are not the same in operation; 3 Fed. Rep. 456. A claim for a combination of three elements is not infringed by the use of two only, though the third is useless, for the patentee must stand by his claim; 1 Bann. & A. 78. A combination is not infringed where one essential element is omitted and another is substituted accomplishing the same result in a different way; 12 Fed. Rep. 563.

A patent for a manufacture is infringed in whatever way the article is made; 30 Fed. Rep. 487; 3 Bann. & A. 235.

Where a product is patented as the result of a certain process it is infringed only when made by that process; 111 U. S. 203.

A patent for a composition of matter is infringed if the new element does the same thing as the one for which it is substituted, though otherwise it is different; 5 Fish. 357. A composition of matter is not infringed, if elements are substituted producing different results; 27 Fed. Rep. 69.

One is not liable in damages as an infringer if the patentee put his invention on the market unstamped, unless he had notice of the patent; 21 Fed. Rep. 122; 152 U. S. 244; 155 id. 584. The burden is on the complainant to prove actual or constructive notice; 152 U. S. 244.

Speaking in the general sense, it is doubtless true that the test of infringement in respect to the claims of a design-patent is the same as in respect to a patent for an art, machine, manufacture, or composition of matter; but it is not essential to the identity of the design that it should be the same to the eye of an expert. If in the eye of an ordinary observer, giving such attention as a purchaser usually gives, two designs are substantially the same; if the resemblance is such as to deceive such an observer and sufficient to induce him to purchase, one supposing it to be the other, the one first patented is infringed by the other; 5 Fed. Rep. 359; 14 Wall. 511.

That the United States government, when it grants letters patent for a new invention or discovery in the arts, confers upon the patentee an exclusive property in the patented invention, which cannot be appropriated or used by the government itself without just compensation, any more than it can appropriate or use without compensation land which has been patented to a private purchaser, we have no doubt. The constitution gives to congress power to "promote the progress of science and useful arts by securing for limited times to authors and inventors the exclusive right to their respective writings and discoveries,"—which could not be effected if the government had a reserved right to publish such writings or to use such inventions without the consent of the owner; 104 U. S. 858.

The United States is liable, under its contract, for the use of a patented article, but it is not liable in tort; 158 U. S. 552. While it has no right to use a patented device, yet no suit will lie against it without its consent; 161 U. S. 10; jurisdiction to recover royalties or compensation under a contract is in the court of claims; 128 U. S. 262. It is doubtful whether a government official who uses an invention solely for the benefit of the government can be sued for infringement, and whether the case is not one solely for the court of claims; 104 U. S. 356. Where an officer of the United States uses, in his official capacity, a patented device made and used by the United States, the patentee is not entitled to an injunction, and cannot recover profits, if the only profit is a saving to the United States; but such officers, although acting under its orders, are personally liable to be sued for their own infringement of a patent; 161 U. S. 10; see 163 id. 49. A city is liable for an infringement by its officers for its benefit; 3 Fed. Rep. 335; 5 Bann. & A. 486.

The managing officers of an infringing corporation may be made co-defendants and individually enjoined; 80 Fed. Rep. 123. An officer of a corporation acting for it in renting machines is a proper party defendant with such users, in a bill for an injunction; 7 Blatchf. 5.

It would be a great hardship if the directors of a railway or manufacturing corporation were bound, at their personal peril, to find out that every machine that the company uses is free of all claim of monopoly. No case precisely in point has been cited; but the practice certainly is to ask for damages only against the corporation. Joiner in equity for purposes of discovery and injunction is another matter; but I have not known damages to be asked for against the directors of a corporation, excepting in one case, which did not come to trial, but was discontinued as to the directors. I am of opinion that the only persons who can be held for damages are those who should have taken a license, and that they are those who own or have some interest in the business of making, using, or selling the thing which is an infringement; and that an action at law cannot be maintained against the directors, shareholders, or workmen of a corporation which infringes a patented improvement; 18 Fed. Rep. 392. But it has also been held that all who join in an infringement are liable for damages, though some are mere officers of corporations; 19 Fed. Rep. 514. In a suit against a corporation for infringement of a patent, officers of the company, who are simply employees receiving a fixed salary, not dependent upon the sale of the alleged infringing article, and who have not personally been guilty of infringement, are neither necessary nor proper parties defendant; 73 Fed. Rep. 212.

Expert evidence is admissible in determining a question of identity between two devices; 1 Fish. 298.

State statutes of limitations formerly applied; 155 U. S. 610; by act of congress, March 8, 1897, the period is six years.

INFUSION. In Medical Jurisprudence. A pharmaceutical operation, which consists in pouring a hot or cold fluid upon a substance whose medical properties it is desired to extract. The product of this operation. An infusion differs from a decoction in that the latter is produced by boiling the drug.

Although infusion differs from decoction, they are said to be ejusdem generis; and in the case of an indictment which charged the prisoner with giving a decoction, and the evidence was that he had given an infusion, the difference was held to be immaterial; 8 Campb. 74.

INGENIUM (Lat. of middle ages). A net or hook. Du Cange; hence, probably, the meaning given by Spelman of artifice, fraud (engin). A machine, Spelman, Gloss., especially for warlike purposes; also, for navigation of a ship. Du Cange.

INGENUI (Lat.). In Civil Law. Those freemen who were born free. Vicat. Vocab.

They were a class of freemen, distinguished from those who, born slaves, had afterwards legally obtained their freedom: the latter were called, at various periods, sometimes liberti, sometimes libertini. An unjust or illegal servitude did not prevent a man from being ingenuus.

INGRESS, EGRESS, AND REGRESS. These words are frequently used in leases to express the right of the lessee to enter, go upon, and return from the lands in question.

INGRESSU (Lat.). An ancient writ of entry, by which the plaintiff or complainant sought an entry into his lands. Abolished in 1833. Tech. Dict.

INGROSSING. In Practice. The act of copying from a rough draft a writing in order that it may be executed: as ingrossing a deed.

INHABITANT (Lat. in, in, habeo, to dwell). One who has his domicile in a place; one who has an actual fixed residence in a place. As used in the federal jurisdiction act of 1789, it means citizen. 145 U. S. 444.

A man's intention to remove to a place will not make a man an inhabitant of such place, although, as a sign of such intention, he may have sent his wife and children to reside there; 1 Ashm. 126. Nor will his intention to quit his residence, unless consummated, deprive him of his right as an inhabitant; 1 Dall. 158, 480. See 10 Ves. 839; 14 Vin. Abr. 420; 6 Ad. & E. 153.

"The words 'inhabitant,' 'citizen,' and 'resident,' as employed in different constitutions to define the qualifications of electors, mean substantially the same thing; and one is an inhabitant, resident, or citizen at the place where he has his domicile or home;" Cooley, Const. Lim. 755 and note; 16 S. E. Rep. (W. Va.) 535. But the terms "resident" and "inhabitant" have also been held not synonymous, the latter implying a more fixed and permanent abode than the former, and importing privileges and duties to which a mere resident would not be subject; 40 Ill. 197; 5 Sandf. 44; 1 Bradf. 69; 2 Gray 484; 23 N. J. L. 517. Where a question was to be submitted to the "inhabitants" of a municipality it has been held to mean legal voters; 103 U. S. 683. When relating to municipal rights, powers, or duties, the word inhabitant is almost universally used as signifying precisely the same as domiciled; 132 Mass. 98. See 17 Pick 231.

The inhabitants of the United States are native or foreign born. The natives consist, first, of white persons, and these are all citizens of the United States, unless they have lost that right; second, of the aborigines, and these are not, in general, citizens of the United States, nor do they possess any political power; third, of negroes, or descendants of the African race; fourth, of the children of foreign representatives, who are citizens or subjects as their fathers are or were at the time of their birth.

Inhabitants born out of the jurisdiction of the United States are, first, children of citizens of the United States, or of persons who have been such; they are citizens of the United States, provided the father of such children shall have resided within the same; Act of Congress of April 14, 1802, § 4; second, persons who were in the country at the time of the adoption of the constitution; these have all the rights of citizens; third, persons, who have become naturalized under the laws of any state before the passage of any law on the subject of naturalization by congress, or who have become naturalized under the acts of congress, are citizens of the United States, and entitled to vote for all officers who are elected by citizens, and to hold any office except those of president and vice-president of the United States; fourth, children of naturalized citizens, who were under the age of twenty-one years at the time of their parents being so naturalized, or admitted to the rights of citizenship, are, if then dwelling in the United States, considered as citizens of the United States, and entitled to the same rights as their respective fathers; fifth, persons who resided in a territory which was annexed to the United States by treaty, and the territory became a state; as, for example, a person who, born in France, moved to Louisiana in 1806, and settled there, and remained in the territory until it was admitted as a state, it was held that, although not naturalized under the acts of congress, he was a citizen of the United States; Desbois' Case, 2 Mart. La. 185; sixth, aliens or foreigners, who have never been naturalized, and these are not citizens of the United States, nor entitled to any political rights whatever.

Property conveyed to the inhabitants of a town as a body politic and corporate vests in the town as a corporation; 45 N. H. 87. See ALIEN; CITIZEN; DOMICIL; NATURALIZATION; HOME.

INHABITED HOUSE DUTY. See HOUSE DUTY, INHABITED.

INHANING OF MONEY. See INREASING OF MONEY.

INHERENT POWER. An authority possessed without its being derived from another. A right, ability, or faculty of doing a thing, without receiving that right, ability, or faculty from another.

INHERITABLE BLOOD. Blood of an ancestor which, while it makes the person in whose veins it flows a relative, will also give him the legal rights of inheritance incident to that relationship. See 2 Bla. Com. 254, 255. Descendants can derive no title through a person whose blood is not inheritable. Such, in England, are persons attainted and aliens. But attainer is not known in this country. See 4 Kent 413, 424; 1 Hill, R. P. 148; 2 id. 190.

INHERIT. To take by inheritance; to take as heir, on the death of the ancestor.

INHERITANCE. A perpetuity in lands to a man and his heirs; the right to succeed to the estate of a person who dies intestate. Dig. 50. 16. 24. The term is applied to lands.

It includes all the methods by which a child or relation takes property from another at his death, except by devise, and includes as well succession as descent; as applied to personal property, it can mean nothing else than to signify succession; 83 N. J. L. 413.

The property which is inherited is called an inheritance.

The term inheritance includes not only lands and tenements which have been acquired by descent, but every fee-simple or fee-tail which a person has acquired by purchase may be said to be an inheritance, because the purchaser's heirs may inherit it; Littleton § 9. This would now be called an estate of inheritance; 1 Steph. Com. 231. See ESTATES.

In Civil Law. The succession to all the rights of the deceased. It is of two kinds: that which arises by testament, when the testator gives his succession to a particular person; and that which arises by operation of law, which is called succession ab intestat. Heineccius, Lec. El. §§ 484, 485.

INHERITANCE ACT. The English statute of 8 & 4 Will. IV. c. 106, regulating the law of inheritance. 2 Chitty, Stat. 670; 2 Bla. Com. 37; 1 Steph. Com. 388; Will. R. P. 119.

INHERITANCE TAX. An "inheritance tax" is not one on property by devise or descent. It is the creature of the law, and not a natural right or privilege; and, therefore, the authority which confers it may impose conditions upon it. 130 Ky. 101, 113 S. W. 61. See DEATH DUTIES.

INHIBITION. In Civil Law. A prohibition which the law makes or a judge ordains to an individual. Halifax, Anal. p. 126.

In English Law. The name of a writ which forbids a judge from further proceeding in a cause depending before him: it is in the nature of a prohibition. Termes de la Ley; Fitzh. N. B. 39. Also a writ issuing out of a higher court christian to a lower and inferior, upon an appeal; 2 Burn, Ec. L. 839. In the government of the Protestant Episcopal church, a bishop can inhibit a clergyman of his diocese from performing clerical functions.

In Scotch Law. A personal prohibition which passes by letters under the signet, prohibiting the party inhibited to contract any debt or to do any act by which any part of the heritable property may be aliened or carried off, in prejudice of the creditor inhibiting. Erskine, Pr. b. 2, tit. ii. a. 2. See DILIGENCE.

INHIBITION AGAINST A WIFE. In Scotch Law. A writ in the sovereign's name, passing the signet, which prohibits all and sundry from having transactions with a wife or giving her credit. Bell, Dict.: Erskine, Inst. 1. 6. 26.

INITIAL (from Lat. initium, beginning). Beginning; placed at the beginning. Webster. Thus, the initials of a man's name are the first letters of his name: as, G. W. for George Washington. Initials are no part of a name; 147 U. S. 47. A middle name or initial is not recognized by law; 1 Hill, N. Y. 102; 4 Watts 829; 26 Vt. 599; 26 N. H. 561; 8 Tex. 376; Wharton, Am. Cr. Law 68; 87 W. Va. 665; 3 N. Dak. 295; 63 Ga. 322. But see 1 Pick. 388; but the first initial is, and a variance therein is fatal to an indictment; 30 Tex. App. 470. In an indictment for forgery, an instrument signed "T. Tupper" was averred to have been made with intent to defraud Tristram Tupper, and it was held good; 1 McMull. 236. Signing of initials is good signing within the Statute of Frauds; 12 J. B. Moore 219; 1 Campb. 513; 3 Mood. & R. 221; Add. Contr. 46, n.; 1 Den. 471. But see Erskine, Inst. 3. 2. 8. When in a will the legatee is described by the initials of his name only, parol evidence may be given to prove his identity; 3 Ves. 148. The fact that the foreman of the grand jury in signing his name to the indorsement of "a true bill" on the indictment, used only the initials of, instead of his full Christian name, is not ground for quashing the indictment; 4 Ind. App. 583. As to the use of an initial in a ballot, see ELECTION. See, generally, NAME.

INITIALIA TESTIMONII (Lat.). In Scotch Law. A preliminary examination of a witness to ascertain what disposition he bears towards the parties whether he has been prompted what to say, whether has received a bribe, and the like. It resembles in some respects an examination ou voir dire in English practice.

INITIATE. Commenced.

A husband was, in feudal law, said to be tenant by the curtesy initiate when a child who might inherit was born to his wife, because he then first had an inchoate right as tenant by the curtesy, and did homage to the lord as one of the parces curties (peers of the court); whence curtesy. This right became consummated on the death of the wife before the husband. See 2 Bla. Com. 127; 1 Steph. Com. 247.

INITIATE TENANT BY CURTESY. A husband becomes tenant by curtesy initiate in his wife's estate of inheritance upon the birth of issue capable of inheriting the same. The husband's estate by curtesy is not said to be consummated till the death of the wife. 2 Bla. Com. 127, 128; 1 Steph. Com. 365, 366.

INITIATIVE. In French Law. The name given to the important prerogative conferred by the charte constitutionnelle, art. 16, on the king to propose, through his ministers, projects of laws. 1 Toullier, n. 39. See VERO.

INJUNCTION. A prohibitory writ, issued by the authority and generally under the seal of a court of equity, to restrain one or more of the defendants or parties, or quasi parties, to a suit or proceeding in equity, from doing, or from permitting his servants or others who are under his control to do, an act which is deemed to be inequitable so far as regards the rights of some other party or parties to such suit or proceedings in equity. Eden, Inj. c. 1; Kerr, Inj. 2; Jeremy, Eq. Jur. b. 3, c. 2, § 1; Story, Eq. Jur. § 861; Will. Eq. Jur. 841; 2 Green, Ch. 186; 1 Madd. 126.

The writ of injunction may be regarded as the correlation of the writ of mandamus, the one enjoining the performance of an unlawful act, the other requiring the performance of a lawful or neglected act; Beach, Inj. § 9.

Under the present practice in England, injunction is not by writ, but the order of the court has the same effect.

The interdict of the Roman law resembles, in many respects, our injunction. It was used in three distinct but cognate senses. 1. It was applied to signify the edicts made by the praetor, declaratory of his intention to give a remedy in certain cases, chiefly to preserve or to restore possession; this interdict was called edictal: edictale, quod praetor edictis proponitur, ut sciant omnes ea forma posse implorari. 2. It was used to signify his order or decree, applying the remedy in the given case before him, and was then called decretal: decretale, quod praetor re nata implorantibus decrevit. It is this which bears a strong resemblance to the injunction of a court of equity. 3. It was used, in the last place, to signify the very remedy sought in the suit commenced under the praetor's edict; and thus it became the denomination of the action itself. Livingston on the Batture case, 5 Am. Law Jour. 271; 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 863.

Mandatory injunctions command the defendant to do a particular thing. Preventive commands him to refrain from an act. The former are resorted to rarely and are seldom allowed before a final hearing; 40 N. Y. 191; 64 Pa. 370; 10 Ves. 192; 20 Am. Dec. 389; 45 N. J. Eq. 178.

Preliminary or interlocutory injunctions are used to restrain the party enjoined from doing or continuing to do the wrong complained of, either temporarily or during the continuance of the suit or proceeding in equity in which such injunction is granted, and before the rights of the parties have been definitely settled by the decision and decree of the court in such suit or proceeding.

Final or perpetual injunctions are awarded, or directed to be issued, or the preliminary injunction already issued is made final or perpetual, by the final decree of the court, or when the rights of the parties so far as relates to the subject of the injunction are finally adjudicated and disposed of by the order or decree of the court; 2 Freem. Ch. 106; 4 Johns. Ch. 69; 3 Yerg. 866; 1 Bibb. 184; Kerr, Inj. *12.

In England, injunctions were divided into common injunctions and special injunctions; Eden, Inj. 178, n.; Will. Eq. Jur. 842; Sartin, Ch. 504. The common injunction was obtained of course when the defendant in the suit in equity was in default for not entering his appearance, or for not putting in his answer to the complainant's bill within the times prescribed by the practice of the court; Eden, Inj. 59, 68, 93, n.; Story, Eq. Jur. § 892; 19 Ves. 523; Jeremy, Eq. Jur. Special injunctions were founded upon the oath of the complainant, or other evidence of the truth of the charges contained in his bill of complaint. They were obtained upon a special application to the court or to the officer of the court who was authorized to allow the issuing of such injunction, and usually upon notice of such application given to the party whose proceedings were sought to be enjoined; Story, Eq. Jur. § 892; 4 Eden, Inj. 78, 290; Jeremy, Eq. Jur. 339; 3 Mer. 475; 18 Ves. 522. By the Judicature Act of 1873, no proceeding at any time pending in the high court of justice, or before the court of appeal, shall be restrained by injunction, and any court may issue injunctions of all kinds; Moz. & W.; Brown, Dict. In the United States courts and in the equity courts of most of the states of the Union, the English practice of granting the common injunction has been discontinued or superseded, either by statute or by rules of the courts. And the preliminary injunctions are, therefore, all special injunctions in the courts of this country where such English practice has been superseded.

When used. The injunction is used in a great variety of cases, of which cases the following are some of the most common: to stay proceedings at law by the party enjoined; Story, Eq. Jur. §§ 51, 874; Jeremy, Eq. Jur. 339; R. M. Charlt. 93; 6 Gill & J. 123; 1 Sumn. 89; 4 Johns. Ch. 17; 28 How. 500; 37 Conn. 579; 4 Jones, Eq. 82; 5 R. L. 171; 23 Ga. 139; see 1 Beas. 323; 13 Cal. 596; 20 Tex. 661; 35 Miss. 77; 128 Ill. 293; 123 U. S. 241; to restrain the transfer of stocks, of promissory notes, bills of exchange, and other evidences of debt; Story,

Eq. Jur. §§ 908, 955; 1 Russ. 412; 2 Vern. 133; 3 Bro. Ch. 476; 9 Wheat. 738; 4 Jones, Eq. 257; 134 Ind. 442; 45 La. Ann. 120; to restrain the transfer of the title to property; 1 Beasl. 252; 14 Md. 69; 7 La. 83; 6 Gray 583; 37 Fed. Rep. 12; or the parting with the possession of such property; Story, Eq. Jur. § 953; 3 V. & B. 168; 4 Cow. 440; to restrain the party enjoined from setting up an unequitable defence in a suit at law; Story, Eq. Jur. § 903; Mitf. Eq. Pl. 184; to restrain the collection of illegal taxes; 97 Mo. 300; 85 Ky. 557; 74 Mich. 692; or taxes imposed in contravention of the U. S. constitution; 149 U. S. 184; to restrain the infringement of a patent; Story, Eq. Jur. § 930; 2 Blatchf. 39; 4 Wash. C. C. 259, 514, 534; 1 Paine 441; 36 Fed. Rep. 582; 35 id. 206; or a copyright, or the pirating of trade-marks; 17 Ves. 424; 1 Hill, N. Y. 119; 2 Bosw. 1; 44 N. J. Eq. 394; 118 Ind. 105; 37 Fed. Rep. 360; to restrain a party from passing off his goods as those of another by means of simulating his labels, packages, etc.; 138 U. S. 537; to prevent the removal of property; 3 Jones, Eq. 253; or the evidences of title to property, or the evidences of indebtedness, out of the jurisdiction of the court; to restrain the committing of waste; 4 Kent 161; 2 Johns. It lies to prevent a threatened breach of trust in the diversion of corporate funds by illegal payment out of its capital or profits; 157 U. S. 429; at the suit of a private person to prevent the publication of his picture (but not where the person is of public reputation); 64 Fed. Rep. 280; but not to restrain the publication of a biography of the complainant or of a member of his family; 57 Fed. Rep. 434; but see 15 N. Y. Supp. 787. But equity will enjoin the publication of a picture of a deceased member of complainant's family, where the respondent had not observed the conditions under which he obtained it; 57 Fed. Rep. 484. Equity will enjoin the construction of a street railway over a part of a turnpike road, the fee of which is owned by the complainant; 6 D. R. Pa. 269; at the suit of a wife, whose title is not disputed, will enjoin her husband's creditors from selling her property for payment of his debts; 18 C. C. R. Pa. 580; and will enjoin a hardware store situated in a populous district from keeping and selling dynamite, and from overloading its building with a stock of hardware, when it thereby becomes a menace to passers-by; 8 Kulp, Pa. 433.

An injunction will be granted to restrain a company in voluntary liquidation from distributing its assets among its shareholders without providing for future liabilities under a lease; 32 Ch. D. 41; to restrain a husband from going to his wife's house settled to her separate use, in a case where proceedings are pending between them for divorce or a judicial separation, and they are living apart; 24 Ch. 848; to enjoin a husband from dealing with his property where alimony is claimed; [1893] P. 284; [1896] P. 36, but see [1896] P. 35; against trades unionists who maliciously induce employer's contractees to break their contracts; [1893] 1 Q. D. 374; to restrain the publication of any valuable information, e. g. of prices communicated to a limited public for a limited purpose; [1896] 1 Q. B. 147; to restrain the sale of a volume of letters; 2 Atk. 841; to restrain the publication of confidential information obtained during service; 19 Q. B. D. 629; such as drawings; [1892] 2 Ch. 518; advertisements; [1898] 1 Ch. 218; to restrain the vendor of a good will from soliciting his former customers; [1896] App. Cas. 7; or a photographer who had taken a negative likeness of a lady in order to supply her with copies for money, from selling or exhibiting copies; 40 Ch. D. 345; to restrain a nuisance; De G. & S. 323; or to prevent a fraudulent transfer or removal from the jurisdiction of a debtor's property, in aid of an execution; 136 N. Y. 252.

An injunction will not be granted, as a rule, to take property out of the possession of one party and put it into that of another whose title has not been established by law; 144 U. S. 119; 40 W. N. C. Pa. 121; nor to restrain a defendant in a case pending for the infringement of letters patent, from issuing circulars alleging that the plaintiff's patent in suit is invalid; 29 Fed. Rep. 96; 28 id. 773; (contra, 34 id. 46; 65 Ga. 453; and it lies in England by statute; 14 Ch. Div. 788; 28 Fed. Rep. 774; L. R. 7 Eq. 488); nor to restrain a patentee who has begun, and is proceeding with, a suit on his patent, from notifying a manufacturer's customers, in a courteous way, that he intends to enforce his rights; 58 Fed. Rep. 577; nor to restrain defendant from falsely representing that a patentee's invention is an infringement of his, and thus deterring purchasers; 119 Mass. 484.

It is necessary to the obtaining an injunction, as to other equitable relief, that there should be no plain, adequate, and complete remedy at law; 30 Barb. 549; 5 R. I. 472; 121 N. Y. 45; 31 Pa. 387; 32 Ala. N. S. 728; 37 N. H. 264; 61 Hun 140; 145 U. S. 469; but where there is adequate remedy at law one will not be granted; 141 Ill. 572; 49 Fed. Rep. 517; 97 id. 67; 84 id. 357; 139 Md. 464; 109 N. C. 21; 68 Wis. 426; 115 Mo. 618. An injunction will not be granted while the rights between the parties are undetermined, except in cases where material and irreparable injury will be done; 3 Bosw. 607; 1 Beasl. 247, 542; 15 Md. 22; 18 Cal. 156, 180; 6 Wis. 690; 16 Tex. 410; 28 Mo. 210; 24 Fla. 542; but where it is irreparable and of a nature which cannot be compensated, and where there will be no adequate remedy, an injunction will be granted; 39 N. H. 182; 12 Cush. 410; 37 Ga. 499; 1 McAll. 271; 54 Fed. Rep. 1005; 64 Vt. 643. A preliminary injunction against the infringement of a patent will not be granted in case of doubt as to the infringement; 37 Fed. Rep. 691; 38 id. 112; 38 id. 691; where defendant confessedly intends to regain possession of certain premises by force, such act being punishable as a breach of the peace, he will not be restrained by injunction; 45 id. 721.

The owner of a dwelling-house, called for 60 years "Ashford Lodge," is not entitled to an injunction restraining the proprietor of an adjoining house known as "Ashford Villa" for 40 years from changing its name to "Ashford Lodge"; 10 Ch. D. 294. An injunction will not lie to prevent a club from carrying out the decision of the members when acting under their rules, unless it be shown that the rules are contrary to natural justice, or that what has been done is contrary to the rules, or that there has been bad faith in a decision; 5 Eq. 68; 13 Ch. D. 346; 17 Ch. D. 615. A bill in equity for an injunction against a crime or misdemeanor does not lie; but equity will interfere if the alleged criminal acts go further and operate to the destruction or diminution of value of property. A member of an incorporated club has a standing in equity for an injunction to restrain the club from carrying out its declared purpose of committing an act which, if found to be criminal, will imperil the charter of the club; 177 Pa. 224.

Where there was a conspiracy to prevent workmen by intimidation or persuasion, from entering into or continuing in the plaintiff's employment, an injunction was granted to restrain the maintenance of a patrol of two men in front of the plaintiff's premises, placed there in furtherance of such conspiracy; 44 N. E. Rep. Mass. 1077; but a corporation is not entitled to an injunction against persons or organizations, on the ground that they have conspired to exterminate it by compelling its members to leave it; 43 Pac. Rep. Col. 451. See BOYCOTT.

Where a city had power to build water-works, the fact that by so doing it would violate contract rights of an existing water company does not give an individual property owner the right to enjoin the city on the ground that his taxes would be increased thereby; 60 Fed. Rep. 961.

Equity will not enjoin a municipal corporation in the exercise of its lawful powers, unless the proposed act is ultra vires and would work irreparable injury; 48 Fed. Rep. 308; but a resident taxpayer and real estate owner is entitled to bring a suit to enjoin the execution of a municipal contract illegally awarded, whatever may be alleged to be his ulterior purpose; 8 D. R. Pa. 266; 137 Pa. 561.

Where a statute creates a new offence and neglects the penalty, the ancillary remedy of injunction may be claimed as well as the penalty; Brett, L. C. Mod. Eq. 327.

An injunction against a newspaper to restrain it from copying literary matter from another newspaper will not be refused because such is the practice of newspapers; [1892] 3 Ch. 499, where the cases are collected. An injunction will not lie to restrain the publication of an encyclopedia of the same name as complainant's, except as to copyright articles, where defendant has used no means to lead the public to believe that its publication is that of complainant; 44 Fed. Rep. 798.

In England, equity, in special cases of contracts for personal services, will restrain the violation of the contract, whenever the legal remedy of damages would be inadequate and the contract is of such a kind that its negative specific enforcement is possible. This rule was at first applied to contracts which were in form expressly negative, but has since been extended to affirmative contracts which imply negative stipulations: Pom. Eq. Jur. § 1343; 1 De G., M. & G. 804; L. R. 16 Eq. 149; 1 McCra. 558, 565; 1 Holmes 353. But where there was a contract for personal service containing a stipulation by the employed that he will "act exclusively for" his employer, the employed will not be restrained by injunction from entering the employ of another person in the absence of a negative covenant in the contract, express or implied, which is clear and definite; 75 L. T. Rep. 536; 47 N. J. Eq. 270.

The American cases are said to have usually either refused to follow the English decisions or have considerably modified them: see 53 Cal. 201; 8 Baxt. 54, 242; 42 Md. 460. Equity will restrain a breach of his contract by a baseball player who had contracted to play with the plaintiff; 8 C. C. R. 57; contra, 8 C. C. R. 337; see also 42 Fed. Rep. 198.

An injunction will lie where the remedy at law, though there be one, is inadequate; thus: to protect an innocent purchaser of the stock and good-will of a business by enjoining the sale thereof by the sheriff, where the damages recoverable would be only for the value of the stock, without compensation for the loss of business; 138 U. S. 271; to prevent the illegal sale of a church-pew under an attachment, upon the ground that it would be an outrage to the owners' religious feelings; 27 Weekly Law Bull. (Ohio) 20; to prevent the illegal issue of corporate bonds; 113 Ind. 22; 5 Wall. 74; to prevent the destruction of ornamental trees on the plaintiff's grounds; 7 Md. 408; to restrain the cutting off of the supply of natural gas furnished under a contract; 50 N. W. Rep. (Ia.) 283; where the redress at law would be inadequate by reason of the defendant's insolvency; 133 N. Y. 499. An injunction will lie to enjoin a public nuisance if it be continuous and peculiarly injures the plaintiff or his property; 135 N. Y. 239. An injunction will not be granted on the application of a private person, to protect purely public rights; Beach, Inj. § 13; 139 Ill. 419; nor, except in a great emergency, to interfere with public improvements; 40 N. J. Eq. 350; nor to restrain the abuse of a public trust, unless the complainant can show some peculiar interest therein; 102 Ill. 379; nor to compel the lessees of an opera house to allow the plaintiff to use the house under a contract therefor, where the effect would be to compel the lessee to break a contract with an innocent third party; 43 Fed. Rep. 831; nor to prevent the maintenance of a nuisance on a highway where it could be abated by indictment; 49 N. J. Eq. 11. Where a criminal prosecution is threatened under color of an invalid statute for the purpose of compelling the relinquishment of a property right, an injunction will lie; 80 Fed. Rep. 218.

Criminal acts may be restrained by injunction if they are of such a nature as to constitute a public nuisance; 147 Mass. 550. This recent development of equity jurisdiction is well settled. Its efficiency has been in preventing the evils of strikes. See Judge Taft's Address, Report of Amer. Bar Assn., 1895, p. 265; 8 L. R. Eq. 551; 51 Fed. Rep. 260; 54 Fed. Rep. 730; 60 Fed. Rep. 908; 63 Fed. Rep. 810; 62 Fed. Rep. 824; 158 U. S. 564; 18 Chic. L. News 306; 82 S. W. Rep. (Mo.) 1106; 33 Am. L. Reg. n. s. 609. An injunction has also been granted to restrain a prize fight; 28 L. R. A. 727; 35 Am. L. Reg. (n. s.) 100; an injunction will lie to restrain railroad employees from acts of violence and intimidation and from enforcing rules of labor unions resulting in irreparable injury to the company and the public, such as those requiring an arbitrary strike without cause; 54 Fed. Rep. 746; and also to restrain a railroad company and its employees from refusing to interchange interstate commerce, freight, and traffic facilities with a connecting line of railway; 54 Fed. Rep. 780.

The granting of an injunction is not limited to a case where damages could not be recovered in an action at law; 27 Abb. N. C. 387; but as a general rule it will not be granted where the party may be compensated in damages; 99 N. C. 11.

Injunctions are used by courts of equity in a great number and variety of special cases; and in England and in the United States this writ was formerly used by such courts as the means of enforcing their decisions, orders, and decrees. But subsequent statutes have in most cases given to courts of equity the power of enforcing their decrees by the ordinary process of execution against the property of the party; so that an injunction to enforce the performance of a decree is now seldom necessary.

Injunctions may be used by courts of equity, in the United States as well as in England, to restrain the commencement or the continuance of proceedings in foreign courts, upon the same principles upon which they are used to restrain proceedings at law in courts of the same state or country where such injunction is granted, the jurisdiction in this class of cases, however, being purely in personam; 3 Myl. & K. 104; Story, Eq. Jur. § 899; High, Inj. § 103; Bisph. Eq. 424. But a state court will not grant an injunction to stay proceedings at law previously commenced in one of the United States courts. But it is otherwise when the state court has first acquired jurisdiction; 9 C. E. Green 238; 15 Wisc. 401; 53 N. Y. (s. c.) 76. Nor will a United States court grant an injunction to stay proceedings at law previously commenced in a state court, except where such injunction may be authorized by any law relating to proceedings in bankruptcy; 4 Cra. 179; 96 U. S. 340; Rev. Stat. § 720; High, Inj. § 109. See generally 37 Cent. L. J. 4. And upon the ground of comity, as well as from principles of public policy, the equity courts of one state of the Union will not grant an injunction to stay proceedings previously commenced in a court of a sister state, where the courts of such sister state have the power to afford the party applying for the injunction the equitable relief to which he is entitled; 2 Paige, Ch. 401; 31 Barb. 364; 84 Ill. 20; but in a proper case, the equity courts of one state can restrain persons within their jurisdiction from the prosecution of suits in another state; 133 U. S. 107. A very strong case should be made out to warrant a court of equity in interfering with a judgment at law; 76 Ga. 9; 51 Ark. 841; but it will enjoin a judgment at law if the matters set up in the bill, as a ground of relief, constitute equities unavailable as a defence in the action at law; 128 U. S. 374; no injunction against proceedings at law will issue where the plaintiff has a good defence at law; 40 Fed. Rep. 517. An injunction will lie to restrain a multiplicity of suits; 54 Fed. Rep. 40.

In the United States, an injunction bill is usually sworn to by the complainant, or is verified by the oath of some other person who is cognizant of the facts and charges contained in such bill, so far at least as relates to the allegations in the bill upon which the application for the preliminary injunction is based. And an order allowing such injunction is thereupon obtained by a special application to the court, or to some officer authorized by statute, or by the rules and practice of the court, to allow the injunction, either with or without notice to the party enjoined and with or without security to such party, as the law or the rules and practice of the court may have prescribed in particular classes of cases; 1 W. & M. 280. Unless a preliminary injunction is to be applied for, a bill ordinarily need not be sworn to.

The bill must disclose a primary equity in aid of which this secondary remedy is asked; 4 Jones, Eq. 29; 28 Ga. 585; 14 La. Ann. 106; 12 Mo. 815.

Where the plaintiff has slept on his rights and allowed the alleged wrong to exist for a long time, he is not entitled to an injunction; 145 U. S. 817; 143 id. 224, 568; 62 Tex. 206; as where the plaintiff had permitted the completion of the building which he sought to enjoin; 143 Pa. 487; and where the plaintiff who was the owner of land bounded by a highway permitted a railway to be built on the highway; 23 S. W. Rep. (Mo.) 616. But it is otherwise where the plaintiff seeks the aid of an injunction for the protection of his legal rights, there being laches, but nothing to constitute an estoppel; 22 N. Y. Supp. 321. But delay in bringing suit is not a defence if it appear that matters still remain in statu quo; 2 Sim. n. s. 78. An injunction in a patent case will not be granted where, by reason of the plaintiff's delay, the defendant would be subjected to special hardship; 56 Fed. Rep. 152; nor where the plaintiff has been guilty of misrepresentations as to his goods, covered by a trade-mark; 108 U. S. 213; 29 Mass. 477; 96 Cal. 518. An injunction will not be granted when the plaintiff's right is doubtful; 54 Fed. Rep. 214; 26 id. 884; nor, it has been held, where the right on which it is claimed is, as a matter of law, unsettled; 29 N. J. Eq. 299; 43 id. 71.

Formerly the plaintiff could not obtain relief by injunction until his rights had been settled at law; 2 Johns. Ch. 162; but this doctrine is not now maintained.

Injunctions are not granted where complainant's rights are not clear, and where an injury more or less irreparable is not likely to result unless defendants are enjoined; 21 Ohio L. J. 390; 45 N. J. Eq. 50.

An injunction is ordinarily preventive, and will not be granted to correct a wrong already done or restore to a party rights of which he has been deprived; 43 Ill. App. 25; 58 Mich. 286.

There must be at least a reasonable probability of injury to the plaintiff in order to justify an injunction; 122 N. Y. 505; 96 Cal. 243; a mere threat of injury is not ordinarily a sufficient ground for an injunction; 107 N. C. 139; 35 Fed. Rep. 487. There must be a well-grounded apprehension of immediate injury; 83 Mich. 285; 25 Fla. 656; 4 Nev. 142. It is not necessary to prove that a wrong has actually been committed; where rights had been infringed, and the party has good reason to believe they will be infringed, an injunction will issue; 4 Blatch. 184. A bill will lie for an injunction, if a patent right has been admitted, upon the well-grounded proof of an intention to violate the right; 3 Story 749. A bill in equity will lie for an injunction to prevent an anticipated infringement of a patent, no infringement having actually occurred; 35 Fed. Rep. 149; where there was no proof of actual sales, but the defendant had exhibited his lamps at a fair, and distributed circulars to the public and otherwise advertised his lamps for sale, it was held that if sales had not actually been made, such a wrong was threatened, and that was sufficient to call for an injunction; 10 id. 291. Where the defendant had formerly been engaged in infringing, the mere fact that since the commencement of the suit he had ceased to do so and did not threaten to renew his sales, is not an answer to an application for a preliminary injunction to restrain the continuance or renewal of such infringement. Perhaps as safe a criterion of what is to be apprehended from defendant as can be obtained, is to look at that which he has done, and in his answer justified the right to do, rather than to look to the fact of his having discontinued the alleged injury and his declaration of want of intention of renewing the same; 3 Fish. Pat. Cas. 112. See Rob. Pat. § 1191.

An injunction should contain upon its face sufficient to inform the party enjoined of what he is restrained from doing or from permitting to be done by those who are under his control, without the necessity of his resorting to the complainant's bill on file to ascertain what he is to refrain from doing or from permitting to be done; 10 Cal. 347. Where a preliminary injunction is needed, the complainant's bill should contain a proper prayer for such process; 2 Edw. Ch. 188; 4 Paige, Ch. 229, 444; 3 Sim. 273. The order granting an injunction is to be construed in the light of the prayer for the same; 81 Ga. 567. Damages for breach of covenant may be decreed in conjunction with relief by injunction; 160 Pa. 529. A court of equity may impose any terms in its discretion as a condition of granting or continuing an injunction; 120 U. S. 206.

The remedy of the party injured by the violation of an injunction by the party enjoined is by an application to the court to punish the party enjoined for his contempt in disobeying the process of the court; Hill. Inj. 173; 78 Hun 154; 61 Fed. Rep. 494.

Where an injunction had issued against cutting timber, the agent of the party enjoined who had cut timber in breach of the injunction was held guilty of contempt; 11 Beav. 180. Where trustees of a friendly society who had been enjoined from distributing certain funds, resigned, and their successors, with notice of the injunction, proceeded to make the forbidden distribution, both sets of trustees were held to be in contempt and were committed; 51 L. J. Ch. 414. See 66 L. T. Ch. D. 287. To render a person amenable to an injunction, it is neither necessary that he be a party to the suit or served with a copy of it, so long as he appears to have had actual notice; 166 U. S. 548.

Equity will restrain the commission of injuries outside of its territorial jurisdiction, by a decree in personam, where it has acquired jurisdiction over the defendants. Such are suits for the specific performance of contracts, for the enforcement of trusts, for relief on the ground of fraud, for settling partnership accounts; Pom. Eq. Jur. § 1518. Penn. v. Lord Baltimore, 1 Ves. Sen. 144; 100 Mass. 267; 66 Mo. 563; 53 Ga. 514; 16 Pet. 25; a defendant may be enjoined from committing waste upon property situated abroad; 32 Fed. Rep. 124. But where the suit is strictly local, the subject-matter is specific property, and the relief such that, if granted, it must act directly upon the subject-matter, and not upon the person of the defendant, the jurisdiction must be exercised in the place where the subject-matter is situated, as a suit to abate a nuisance; Pom. Eq. Jur. § 1318; 2 Black 485.

In the United States courts special injunctions are granted only on notice, but in cases of danger of irreparable injury an order may issue (R. S. § 718) restraining the threatened act till the motion can be heard; and such order may be with or without security. Injunctions shall not be granted to restrain proceedings in the state courts except in bankruptcy proceedings; R. S. § 720; nor suit for the purpose of restraining the assessment or collection of any taxes; R. S. § 8224. Injunction in a state court in cases afterwards removed to a federal court, remain in full force until dissolved or modified; 18 Stat. L. 470. See 84 Fed. Rep. 481; 46 id. 546.

Under the new equity rules in Pennsylvania evidence on a motion for a preliminary injunction is taken in open court.

An injunction, when granted, will usually not be modified or dissolved except by the judge who granted it; 35 Fed. Rep. 98.

By the federal practice a motion to dissolve an injunction should always, when practicable, be addressed to the judge who granted it; and, in case of his death, it would seem advisable that two judges should hear the motion to dissolve; 77 Fed. Rep. 783.

The sole object of a preliminary injunction is to preserve the status quo until the merits can be heard. The status quo is the last actual peaceable uncontested status which preceded the pending controversy, and a wrongdoer cannot shelter himself behind a sudden or recently changed status, though made before the chancellor's hand actually reached him; 180 Pa. 572.

As to injunctions in particular cases, see the title of the particular subject to which the remedy is to be applied.

In Equity. A writ remedial, issuing by order of a court of equity, (and in some cases by courts of common law in the exercise of equitable jurisdiction), and commanding a defendant to perform some act, or restraining a defendant from the commission or continuance of some act. Wm. Joyce on Injunctions, 1, cited by Bispham, Prin. of Eq. 634.

See MANDATORY INJUNCTION; PERPETUAL INJUNCTION; PRELIMINARY INJUNCTION; PROVISIONAL INJUNCTION.

INJURED. Obstructing access to property, or the drainage therefrom, is within a statutory provision requiring compensation for property injured; 111 Pa. 854; 124 id. 580; 151 id. 80.

INJURIA (Lat.). Injury; wrong; the privation or violation of right. 3 Bl. Com. 2.

INJURIA ABSQUE DAMNO (Lat.). Wrong without damage. Wrong done without damage or loss will not sustain an action. The following cases illustrate this principle: 6 Mod. 46; 1 Show. 64; Willes 74, n.; 1 Ld. Raym. 940, 948; 2 B. & P. 86; 5 Co. 72; 9 id. 113; Bull. N. P. 120.

INJURIES TO THE PERSON.

Action for. The phrase "an action for an injury to the person" of the plaintiff refers to those cases where the personal injury is the gist of the action, such as actions for assault and battery, and the like. 110 S. W. 891.

INJURIOUS WORDS. In Louisiana. Slander, or libellous words.

INJURY (Lat. in, negative, jus, a right). A wrong or tort.

Absolute injuries are injuries to those rights which a person possesses as being a member of society.

Private injuries are infringements of the private or civil rights belonging to individuals considered as individuals.

Public injuries are breaches and violations of rights and duties which affect the whole community as a community.

Injuries to personal property are the unlawful taking and detention thereof from the owner; and other injuries are some damage affecting the same while in the claimant's possession or that of a third person, or injuries to his reversionary interests.

Injuries to real property are ousters, trespasses, nuisances, waste, subtraction of rent, disturbances of right of way, and the like.

Relative injuries are injuries to those rights which a person possesses in relation to the person who is immediately affected by the wrongful act done.

It is obvious that the divisions overlap each other, and that the same act may be, for example, a relative, a private, and a public injury at once. For many injuries of this character the offender may be obliged to suffer punishment for the public wrong and to recompense the sufferer for the particular loss which he has sustained. The distinction is more commonly marked by the use of the terms civil injuries to denote private injuries, and of crimes, misdemeanors, etc., to denote the public injury done; though not always; as, for example, in case of a public nuisance which may be also a private nuisance.

Injuries arise in three ways: first, by non-feasance, or the not doing what was a legal obligation, or duty, or contract, to perform; second, misfeasance, or the performance in an improper manner of an act which it was either the party's duty or his contract to perform; third, malfeasance, or the unjust performance of some act which the party had no right or which he had contracted not to do.

The remedies are different as the injury affects private individuals or the public.

When the injuries affect a private right and a private individual, although often also affecting the public, there are three descriptions of remedies: first, the preventive, such as defence, resistance, recaption, abatement of nuisance, surety of the peace, injunction, etc.; second, remedies for compensation, which may be by arbitration, suit, action, or summary proceedings before a justice of the peace; third, proceedings for punishment, as by indictment, or summary proceedings before a justice. When the injury is such as to affect the public, it becomes a crime, misdemeanor, or offence, and the party may be punished by indictment, or summary conviction for the public injury, and by civil action at the suit of the party for the private wrong. But in cases of felony the remedy by action for the private injury is generally suspended until the party particularly injured has fulfilled his duty to the public by prosecuting the offender for the public crime; and in cases of homicide the remedy is merged in the felony; 1 Chitty, Pr. 10; Ayliffe, Pand. 592.

There are many injuries for which the law affords no remedy. In general, it interferes only when there has been a visible physical injury inflicted, while it leaves almost totally unprotected the whole class of the most malignant mental injuries and sufferings, unless in a few cases where, by a fiction, it supposes some pecuniary loss, and sometimes affords compensation to wounded feelings. A parent, for example, cannot sue, in that character, for an injury inflicted on his child, and when his own domestic happiness has been destroyed, unless the fact will sustain the allegation that the daughter was the servant of her father, and that by reason of such seduction he lost the benefit of her services; but the proof of loss of service has reference only to the form of the remedy. And when the action is sustained in point of form, damages may be given not only for the loss of service, but also for all that the plaintiff can feel from the nature of the injury; 20 Pa. 354; 9 N. W. Rep. 599; 14 Cent. L. J. 12. Another instance may be mentioned. A party cannot recover damages for verbal slander in many cases: as, when the facts published are true; for the defendant would justify, and the party injured must fail. Nor will the law punish criminally the author of verbal slander imputing even the most infamous crimes, unless done with intent to extort a chattel, money, or valuable thing. The law presumes, perhaps unnaturally enough, that a man is incapable of being alarmed or affected by such injuries to his feelings. See 1 Bish. Cr. L. § 591; Cl. Cr. L. 347.

The true and sufficient reason for these rules would seem to be the uncertain character of the injury inflicted, the impossibility of compensation, and the danger, supposing a pecuniary compensation to be attempted, that injustice would be done under the excitement of the case. The sound principle, as the experience of the law amply indicates, is to inflict a punishment for crime, but not put up for sale, by the agency of a court of justice, those wounded feelings which would constitute the ground of the action.

The rule as indicated above has its limitations, however, in particular cases; 71 Me. 227. Thus, it has been held that, when bodily pain is caused, mental pain follows necessarily, and the sufferer is entitled to damages for the mental pain as well as for the bodily; 29 Conn. 390; 13 Cal. 599; 63 Pa. 290; 62 Barb. 484; but damages for the mental suffering of one person, on account of physical injury to another, are too remote to be given by court or jury; 2 C. & P. 292.

There is a material distinction between damages and injury. Injury is the wrongful act or tort which causes loss or harm to another. Damages are allowed as an indemnity to the person who suffers loss or harm from the injury. The word injury denotes the illegal act, the term damages means the sum recoverable as amends for the wrong; 103 Ind. 319.

In Civil Law. A delict committed in contempt or outrage of any one, whereby his body, his dignity, or his reputation is maliciously injured. Voet, Com. ad Pand. 47, t. 10, n. 1.

A real injury is inflicted by any act by which a person's honor or dignity is affected: as, striking one with a cane, or even aiming a blow without striking; spitting in one's face; assuming a coat of arms, or any other mark of distinction proper to another, etc. The composing and publishing defamatory libels may be reckoned of this kind; Ersine, Fr. 4. 4. 45.

A verbal injury, when directed against a private person, consists in the uttering contumelious words, which tend to injure his reputation by making him little or ridiculous. Where the offensive words are uttered in the heat of a dispute and spoken to the person's face, the law does not presume any malicious intention in the utterer, whose resentment generally subsides with his passion; and yet even in that case the truth of the injurious words seldom absolves entirely from punishment. Where the injurious expressions have a tendency to blacken one's moral reputation or fix some particular guilt upon him, and are deliberately repeated in different companies, or handed about in whispers to confidants, the crime then becomes slander, agreeably to the distinction of the Roman law; Dig. 15, § 12 de Injur.

See IRREFRAGABLE INJURY; PERSONAL INJURY; ACTION FOR INJURY, etc.

INLAGARE, INLEGIARE. To restore to protection of law. Opposed to utlagare. Bract. lib. 3, tr. 2, c. 14, § 1; Du Cange.

INLAGATION. Restoration to the protection of law.

INLAGH. A man who is under the protection of the law, and not outlawed. Cowel.

INLAND. Within the same country. The demesne reserved for the use of the lord. Cowel. Inland, or domestic, navigation is that carried on in the interior of the country, and does not include that upon the great lakes; 24 How. 1; 10 Wall. 577. As to what are inland bills of exchange, see BILLS OF EXCHANGE.

INMATE. One who dwells in a part of another's house, the latter dwelling at the same time in the said house. Kitch. 45 b; Com. Dig. Justices of the Peace (B) 85; 1 B. & C. 578; 2 M. & R. 227; 2 Russ. Cr. 937; 1 M. & G. 63; 28 Cal. 545. See LODGER.

INN. A house where a traveller is furnished with everything he has occasion for while on his way. Bac. Abr. Inns (B): 3 B. & Ald. 283; 9 B. Monr. 72. A public house of entertainment for all who choose to visit it. 5 Sandf. 247; 93 Cal. 253; 84 Ala. 451. A coffee-house or a mere eating-house is not an inn. To constitute an inn there must be some provision for the essential needs of a traveller upon his journey, namely, lodging as well as food; per Brown, U. S. D. J., in 13 Rep. 299, citing 34 Barb. 316. See INNKEEPER; HOTEL.

INNAVIGABLE. A term applied in foreign insurance law to a vessel not navigable, through irremediable misfortune by a peril of the sea. The ship is relatively innavigable when it will require almost as much time and expense to repair her as to build a new one. Targa. 256, 256; Emerigon, to. 1, 577, 591; 3 Kent 323, n.

INNINGS. Lands gained from the sea by draining. Cunningham, Law Dict.; Callis, Sewers 38.

INNKEEPER. The keeper of a common inn for the lodging and entertainment of travellers and passengers, their horses and attendants, for a reasonable compensation. Bac. Abr. Inns, etc.; Story, Bailm. § 475. Any one who makes it his business to entertain travellers and passengers, and provide lodging and necessaries for them, their horses and attendants, is an innkeeper. Edw. Bailm. § 450; even though the house is situated on enclosed grounds; 93 Cal. 253. But one who entertains strangers occasionally, although he may receive compensation for it, is not an innkeeper; 2 D. & B. 424; 7 Ga. 298; 1 Morr. 184. See GUEST; BOARDER. It is not necessary that he should furnish accommodations for horses and carriages; 3 B. & Ald. 283; the keeper of a tavern; id.: and of a hotel is an innkeeper; 2 Chitty 484. So is one who keeps a hotel on what is called the European plan, furnishing lodging to guests, and keeping an eating-house where they may purchase meals at their option; 3 Daly 200. But the keeper of a mere restaurant is not an innkeeper if he only furnishes meals to his guests; 1 Hilt. 193; 13 Rep. 399. Nor is the keeper of a coffee-house, or of a boarding house, or lodging-house; 8 Co. 33; 9 E. & B. 144; 100 Mass. 495; 35 Wisc. 118. One who receives lodgers and boards them under a special contract for a limited time, or who lets rooms to guests by the day or week, and does not furnish them entertainment, is not an innkeeper; 3 Daly 15. See 87 Cal. 468. Where the plaintiff attended a ball given by an innkeeper, stabled his horse at the inn, drank and paid for liquors, and paid for his ticket of admission to the ball, it was held that the relationship of innkeeper and guest did not exist; 17 Hun 126. Where one boarded with his family at a hotel in New York, paying a specified amount for his rooms, and an additional amount for board if he took his meals regularly, and if not, paying for whatever he ordered at the restaurant attached to the hotel, it was held that the innkeeper was liable for personal property stolen from the plaintiff's room; 17 Hun 279 (criticized in 20 Alb. L. J. 64, citing many cases); and see 23 Minn. 468. Where one merely leaves his horse with an innkeeper, the relation of innkeeper and guest does not exist; 68 Me. 489; so where he leaves goods at the inn without indicating any intention to become a guest; 60 Hun 406. So when a guest paid his bill and left the inn, having deposited money with a clerk to be kept till his return; 2 Lea 312; but it terminates where the guest delivers his baggage to a porter to be checked for safe keeping, the porter having no authority to receive it, and pays his bill, and in his absence the baggage is stolen, the innkeeper is not liable therefor; 93 Ala. 342.

He is bound to take in and receive all travellers and wayfarers persons, and to entertain them, if he can accommodate them, for a reasonable compensation; Wand. Inns, 46; 3 B. & Ald. 285; 7 C. & P. 213; 4 Exch. 367. See 89 Cal. 156. For a refusal to do so he is liable civilly and criminally; 7 C. & P. 213. It is no defence that the traveller did not tender the price of his entertainment, or that the guest was travelling on Sunday, or that the innkeeper had gone to bed, or that the guest refused to tell his name, otherwise if the guest was drunk, or was behaving in an improper manner; Edw. Bailm. § 471; 34 Pa. 86; 7 C. & P. 213. The innkeeper may demand prepayment; 9 Co. 87. He may not exclude persons from entering the inn and going into the public room on lawful business; 8 N. H. 523. He must guard their goods with proper diligence. He is liable only for the goods which are brought within the inn; 8 Co. 32; 58 N. W. Rep. (S. Dak.) 555. A delivery of the goods into the personal custody of the innkeeper is not, however, necessary in order to make him responsible; for, although he may not know anything of such goods, he is bound to pay for them if they are stolen or carried away, even by an unknown person; Wand. Inns 100; Dig. 4, 9, 1; 8 B. & Ald. 283; 1 Holt N. P. 209; 1 Bell Comm. 469; 1 Sm. L. C. 47; 14 Barb. 193; 8 Co. 33; 93 Cal. 258; 2 Ind. App. 303; 54 Mo. App. 567; 1 Hayw. 41; 14 Johns. 175; 23 Wend. 642; 7 Cush. 114; 62 Pa. 367; 27 Miss. 668. Thus, when a guest's luggage was, at his suggestion, taken to the commercial room, 8 B. & C. 9; and when a lady's reticule with money in it was left for a few minutes on a bed in her room; 2 B. & Ald. 803; the innkeeper was held liable; and if he receive the guest, the custody of the goods may be considered as an accessory to the principal contract, and the money paid for the apartments as extending to the care of the box and portmanteau; Jones, Bailm. 54; Story, Bailm. § 470; 1 Bla. Com. 430; 2 Kent 468. The particular responsibility of an innkeeper does not extend to goods lost or stolen from a room occupied by a guest for a purpose of business distinct from his accommodation as guest, such as the exhibition of samples of merchandise; 121 U. S. 383. The liability of an innkeeper is the same in character and extent with that of a common carrier; 7 Cush. 417; 9 Humphr. 740; 1 Cal. 221; 6 B. & C. 9; 58 Me. 163; 8 Blackf. 585. Even where the plaintiff's horse and wagon containing goods of value were destroyed in the night by fire, the cause of which was unknown, it was held that the innkeeper was liable; 83 N. Y. 571; contra, 30 Mich. 259; s. c. 18 Am. Rep. 127, n. See 6 L. R. A. 483, n. In a recent English case in the Luton county court against the proprietor of the George Hotel, Luton, an innkeeper was held liable for the loss of a bicycle, lost while the owner was at luncheon in the hotel.

He is responsible for the acts of his domestics and servants, as well as for the acts of his other guests, if the goods are stolen or lost; 7 Cush. 417; 5 Barb. 560; 54 Mo. App. 567; but he is not responsible for any tort or injury done by his servants or others to the person of his guest, without his own co-operation or consent; 8 Co. 82. The innkeeper will be excused whenever the loss has occurred through the fault of the guest, the act of God, or of the public enemy; 4 M. & S. 306; 1 Stark. 251, n.; 27 Tex. 547; 98 U. S. 218; 87 Pa. 376; 184 id. 262. An omission on the part of the guest to lock his door will not necessarily prevent his recovery; 6 H. & N. 265; 2 Sweeny 705. See 14 Daly 114. Where a guest was given a room temporarily and in his absence his baggage was placed in the hall, the innkeeper was held liable for its loss; [1891] 2 Q. B. 11. When the guest misleads the innkeeper as to the value of a package and thus throws him off his guard, it has been held that he cannot recover; Edw. Bailm. § 466. See 48 N. Y. 266. The failure of a guest to inform an innkeeper that his valise placed in the cloak or baggage room, contains valuables, is not negligence; 2 Ind. App. 308; 83 Ga. 606. It has been held that a guest who does not confide his goods to the innkeeper cannot recover; Schoull., Bailm. 302; 1 Yeates 34; but the guest may retain personal custody of necessary wearing apparel and jewelry worn daily, for which the innkeeper becomes liable; 93 Cal. 253; a guest may recover for the loss of goods brought into the inn in the usual manner; 27 Miss. 657; 37 Ga. 242. An innkeeper may make reasonable regulations as to the manner in which he will receive and keep goods; 9 Wend. 85, 114. He must furnish reasonable accommodations. See 8 M. & W. 269. When the proprietor of a hotel employs a servant to receive and keep the property of guests while at meals, his liability for the default of this servant in the custody of property so received is not affected by the fact that he has also provided a check-room for the safekeeping of such property; 54 Mo. App. 567.

The innkeeper is entitled to a just compensation for his care and trouble in taking care of his guest and his property; and, to enable him to obtain this, the law invests him with some peculiar privileges, giving him a lien upon the goods brought into the inn by the guest, and, it has been said, upon the person of his guest (contra, 3 M. & W. 248), for his compensation; 3 B. & Ald. 287; see 61 N. Y. 34; 1 Rich. 213; 26 Vt. 335; 3 M. & W. 248; 13 Or. 432; and this though the goods belong to a third person, if the innkeeper was ignorant of the fact; Schoull., Bailm. 326; 12 Q. B. 197; 23 Pa. 193; 11 Barb. 41; 99 N. C. 523; 27 Wis. 202; 52 Minn. 516; a lien was also held to attach upon the goods of the wife; 25 Q. B. Div. 491. Sewing machines were sent by his principal to a commercial traveller while he was at an inn, to be used in the course of business for sale to customers in the neighborhood. The innkeeper had express notice that they were the property of the employer but he received them as the baggage of the traveller, who left the inn without paying his bill; the English Court of Appeal held that the innkeeper had a lien on the goods for the amount of the bill;

[1895] 2 Q. B. 501, affirming id. 78. The court below considered that the question of knowledge was immaterial, because "the goods in question were of a kind which a commercial traveller would in the ordinary course carry about with him to the inns at which he put up as part of the regular apparatus of his calling, and which the innkeeper would consequently be bound to receive into his inn and to take care of while they were there. Here it is true that the goods were not brought by G— to the inn—they were sent to him while he was staying there. But that can make no difference. The defendant was bound to receive them and take care of them as a part of his duty towards his guest. It follows that the lien attached to them."

At common law this lien could be enforced only by legal proceedings, and not by a sale; 11 Barb. 41; Edw. Bailm. § 476. This has been changed in New York by statute. As to detaining the horse of a guest, see 25 Wend. 634; 9 Pick. 280. The landlord may also bring an action for the recovery of his compensation. Where an innkeeper owes his guest for labor more than the guest owes for board, he has no lien; 3 Col. App. 519. An innkeeper's lien does not attach to goods in possession of one who is received as a boarder and not as a guest or traveller; 52 Minn. 516.

An innkeeper in a town through which lines of stages pass has no right to exclude the driver of one of these lines from his yard and the common public rooms where travellers are usually placed, who comes there at proper hours, and in a proper manner, to solicit passengers for his coach and without doing any injury to the innkeeper; 8 N. H. 323. The common-law liability of innkeepers has been changed in England and in most of the states by statute which provides that the innkeeper shall not be liable for money, etc., if he provides a safe for safe-keeping, and duly notifies his guests thereof. It has been held that a hotel-keeper, in whose safe a regular boarder deposits money for safe-keeping, is no more than a bailee for him, and when the money is stolen from the safe by his night clerk, is not liable therefor, in the absence of any proof of want of ordinary care in employing him; 62 N. W. Rep. (Mich.) 716.

INNOCENCE. The absence of guilt. See PRESUMPTION OF INNOCENCE.

INNOCENT. The law presumes the defendant innocent until proven guilty beyond a "reasonable doubt." (q. v.) 120 U. S. 439.

INNOCENT AGENT. One who does the forbidden thing, moved thereto by another person, yet incurs no legal guilt, because either not endowed with sufficient mental capacity or not acquainted with the necessary facts. Bish. Cr. L. § 310; 21 Tex. App. 107.

INNOCENT CONVEYANCES. In English Law. A technical term used to signify those conveyances made by a tenant of his leasehold which do not occasion a forfeiture: these are conveyances by lease and release, bargain and sale, and a covenant to stand seised by a tenant for life. 1 Chitty, Pr. 243.

INNOMINATE CONTRACTS. In Civil Law. Contracts which have no particular names, as permutation and transaction. Inst. 2. 10. 13. There are many innominate contracts; but the Roman lawyers reduced them to four classes, namely, do ut des, do ut facias, facio ut des, facio ut facias. Dig. 2. 14. 7. 2.

INNOMIA. In Old English Law. A close or inclosure (clausum inclausura). Spel. Glos.

INNOTESCIMUS (Lat.). In English Law. An epithet used for letters patent, which are always of a charter of feoffment, or some other instrument not of record, concluding with the words Innotescimus per presentes, etc. Tech. Dict.

INNOVATION. In Scotch Law. The exchange of one obligation for another, so that the second shall come in the place of the first. Bell, Dict. The same as NOVATION.

INNOXIARE. To purge one of a fault and declare him innocent. Toml.

INNS OF COURT. Voluntary non-corporate legal societies seated in London having their origin about the end of the 13th and the beginning of the 14th century. Encyc. Brit. They consist of the Inns of Court and Chancery.

The four principal Inns of Court are the Inner Temple and Middle Temple (formerly belonging to the Knights Templar), Lincoln's Inn, and Gray's Inn (anciently belonging to the earls of Lincoln and Gray). The other inns are the two Serjeants' Inns, one of which also called Faryndon Inn is in Chancery Lane, and the other in Fleet Street. The Inns of Chancery were probably so called because they were once inhabited by such clerks as chiefly studied the forming of writs, which regularly belonged to the cursitors, who are officers of chancery. These are Thavie's Inn, the New Inn, supposed to have been formed on the old foundation of St. George's Inn, Symond's Inn, Clement's Inn, Clifford's Inn, Staple's Inn, Lion's Inn, Furnival's Inn, and Barnard's Inn. These are connected with the respective Inns of Court. There were other inns, such as Chester Inn, Strand or Strode Inn, and Scrope Inn.

Of the origin of the Inns of Court Inderwick says: "The fixture of a certain court for the trial of civil causes in London also encouraged the calling or profession of advocacy, and led to the institution of the Inns of Court, where students of the law could congregate as at a University, hear lectures on the Roman law and the laws of their country, and prepare themselves for their future duties." King's Peace 91. "Each inn is self-governing, and quite distinct from all others, all, however, possessing equal privileges; but latterly they have joined in imposing certain educational tests for the admission of students. It is entirely in the discretion of an inn of court to admit any particular person as a member, for no member of the public has an absolute right to be called to the bar, there being no mode of compelling the inn to state its reasons for refusal. But practically, no objection is ever made to the admission of any person of good character. Each inn has also the power of disbarring its members, that is, of withdrawing from them the right of practising as counsel. This right has been rarely exercised, but of late years there have been examples of persons abusing their profession, and indulging in dishonest practices; in such cases, the inn has its own mode of inquiring into the facts affecting the character of a member, and is not bound to make the investigation public. By this high controlling power over its members, a higher character is supposed to be given to the bar as a body, than if each individual was left to his own devices, unchecked, except by the law." Int. Cyc. See also Encyc. Brit.

INNUENDO (Lat. innuere, to nod at, to hint at; meaning. The word was used when pleadings were in Latin, and has been translated by "meaning").

In Pleading. A clause in the declaration, indictment, or other pleading containing an averment which is explanatory of some preceding word or statement.

An averment of the meaning of alleged libellous words. 152 Pa. 187. The defamatory meaning which the plaintiff sets on words complained of, in an action for libel; its office is to show how they came to have that defamatory meaning and how they relate to him. 84 Wis. 120.

It derives its name from the leading word by which it was always introduced when pleadings were in Latin. It is mostly used in actions of slander, and is then said to be a subordinate averment, connecting particular parts of the publication with what has gone before, in order to elucidate the defendant's meaning more fully. 1 Stark. Sland. 431.

It is the office of an innuendo to define the defamatory meaning which the plaintiff sets on the words, to show how they come to have that meaning, and also to show how they relate to the plaintiff, whenever that is not clear on the face of them; Odg. Lib. & Sl. *100. See COLLOQUIUM. It may be used to point to the plaintiff as the person intended in the defendant's statement. It may show that a general imputation of crime is intended to apply to the plaintiff;

Heard, Sland. § 226; 1 H. L. Cas. 687; 2 Hill, N. Y. 282; but it cannot be allowed to give a new sense to words where there is no such change; 8 Q. B. 825; 7 C. B. 280. See 47 Minn. 278.

Where a defamatory meaning is apparent on the face of the libel itself, no innuendo is necessary, though often inserted; 98 Mich. 119; 8 Col. App. 568; where the words prima facie are not actionable, an innuendo is essential to the action; Odg. Lib. & Sl. *99.

It may point to the injurious and actionable meaning, where the words complained of are susceptible of two meanings; 8 Q. B. 841; Moore & S. 727; and generally explain the preceding matter; 7 C. B. 281; 15 id. 360; 1 M. & W. 245; 12 Ad. & E. 817; but cannot enlarge and point the effect of language beyond its natural and common meaning in its usual acceptation; Heard, Sland. § 219; Newell, Def. Sland. & L. 619, 620; 6 B. & C. 154; 9 Ad. & E. 282; 15 Pick. 335; 19 D. C. 534; unless connected with the proper introductory averments; 1 Cr. & J. 143; 1 C. B. 728; 6 id. 239; 2 Pick. 320; 16 id. 1; 11 Metc. 473; 8 N. H. 240; 12 Vt. 51; 11 S. & R. 343; 6 Johns. 211. These introductory averments need not be in the same count; 2 Wils. 114; 2 Pick. 329. Where the language of an alleged libel was ambiguous, the innuendo should be attached to the words complained of, are proper; 63 Hun 628.

For the innuendo in case of an ironical libel, see 7 Dowl. 210; 4 M. & W. 446.

If not warranted by preceding allegations, it may be rejected as superfluous; Heard, Sland. § 225; but only where it is bad and useless,—not where it is good but unsupported by evidence, even though the words would be actionable without an innuendo; Newell, Def. Sland. & L. 629; 3 H. L. Cas. 395; 1 Cr. & M. 875; 1 Ad. & E. 558; 2 Bingh. N. C. 402; 4 B. & C. 655; 3 Campb. 461; 9 East 93; Cro. Car. 512; Cro. Eliz. 609. See 3 Misc. Rep. 314.

In the case of words not per se actionable, the innuendo must be pleaded and proved; 51 Mo. App. 102.

INOFFICIOSUS (Lat.) In Civil Law. Inofficious; contrary to natural duty or affection. Used of a will of a parent which disinherited a child without just cause, or of that of a child which disinherited a parent, and which could be contested by querela inofficiosi testamenti; designated by Blackstone as remarkable on the ground "that the testator had lost the use of his reason;" 1 Com. 447; 2 id. 502; 2 Steph. Com. 589; Dig. 2. 5. 3, 13; Paulus, lib. 4, tit. 5, § 1. Even a brother or sister could set aside such a testament if the person actually instituted heir was turpis or infamous. The old writ de rationabili parte bonorum, in the English law, resembled in some respects the querela inofficiosi testamenti; but there is nothing which corresponds to it in the English law at the present day; Moz. & W.

INOFFICIOUS TESTAMENT. In Civil Law. A testament contrary to the natural duty of the parent, because it totally disinherited the child, without expressly giving the reason therefor. See next title.

INOFICIOCIDAD. In Spanish Law. Every thing done contrary to a duty or obligation assumed, as well as in opposition to the piety and affection dictated by nature: inoficiosum dicitur id omne quod contra pietatis officium factum est. The term applies especially to testaments, donations, dower, etc., which may be either revoked or reduced when they affect injuriously the rights of creditors or heirs.

INOPS CONSILII (Lat.). Destitute of or without counsel. In the construction of wills a greater latitude is given, because the testator is supposed to have been inops consilii.

INORDINATUS. An intestate.

INPENY and OUTPENY. Money which by the custom of some manors is paid by an incoming and an outgoing tenant. Spelm.: Holth.

INQUEST. A body of men appointed by law to inquire into certain matters: as, the inquest examined into the facts connected with the alleged murder. The grand jury is sometimes called the grand inquest.

The judicial inquiry itself by a jury summoned for the purpose, is called an inquest. The finding of such men, upon an investigation, is also called an inquest, or an inquisition.

The most familiar use of the word is to designate the inquiry by a coroner (q. v.) into the causes of death, whether sudden, violent, or in prison. To justify an inquest it is not necessary that a death should be both sudden and violent; either is sufficient: 2 Grant, Pa. 262. The authority to hold an inquest extends to bodies brought into the county: 105 N. Y. 146; and when a person died in one county and was buried in another it was held that the inquest should be held by the coroner of the latter. After the verdict is returned the duty is completed and a second inquest cannot be held unless the first is quashed by a competent court: 3 El. & El. 137; 4 Park. Cr. Rep. 519. No inquest can be held in any case except upon view of the body: this is jurisdictional and can be waived by no one: 1 Witth. & Beck. Med. Jur. 341; 3 B. & A. 260; if buried it may be exhumed, but must be reburied: id. 260; 2 Hawk. P. C. 77. A post-mortem examination may be ordered: 3 Pa. 462; 4 id. 269; but it should not be made before the jury have viewed the body: 1 Witth. & Beck. Med. Jur. 336; nor should it be in the presence of the jury, but they are to be instructed by the testimony of the physicians designated to make it: 105 N. Y. 146.

In holding an inquest the coroner acts judicially: 3 Gray 463; 44 Cal. 452; 32 Mo. 375; 1 Witth. & Beck. Med. Jur. 333. No person is entitled by reason of being suspected of causing the death, to be present, or to have counsel, or cross-examine the witnesses or produce others: 2 Hawk. P. C. 77; 20 How. Pr. 111; 11 Abb. Pr. 406; 81 N. Y. 622, aff. 15 Hun 200. The coroner may select and summon the jurors of inquest and fine any who are absent for non-attendance: T. U. P. Charl. 310; they must be sworn: 3 B. & A. 260; and this must appear in the certificate or be proved alunde: 22 Wend. 187; they are the sole arbiters of the facts; but the coroner may instruct them in the law: id.; and compel the attendance of witnesses, for which purpose he has common-law powers: 11 Phila. 387.

After hearing the evidence the jury should retire to deliberate upon their verdict, without the presence of the coroner, and, when agreed upon, it should be put in writing and is final, and the inquisition should be signed by the coroner and jury: 6 C. & P. 179, 602; the jury may sign by marks: 27 La. Ann. 297; and if several bear the same Christian and surname they need not be distinguished in the caption by abode or otherwise: 7 C. & P. 536.

The effect of the inquisition is to authorize the arrest and commitment of the person charged by it, and upon his arrest he may make his own statement and have it returned with the inquisition, but he cannot be discharged until his case is passed upon by the grand jury: 11 Abb. Pr. 406; 20 How. Pr. 111; except of course after hearing by a judge upon habeas corpus.

The testimony of a witness, not charged with crime, given at the inquest may be used against him, if afterwards accused; he must claim his privilege if he wishes to protect himself: 29 Pa. 102; 7 Neb. 820; but if at the time of inquest he is in custody on suspicion, he cannot be examined as a mere witness, but only as an accused party in the same manner as if brought before a committing magistrate: 108 N. Y. 211; the doctrine that silence gives consent does not apply to a coroner's inquest:

92 id. 20. These rules were settled by the New York court of appeals as the result of a series of cases: 13 id. 18; 15 id. 884; 41 id. 7; 108 id. 311; 91 id. 241.

Preventing a coroner from holding an inquest over a dead body, when it is required by law, is indictable: 18 Q. B. D. 881; 7 Mod. 10. Where the captain of a man-of-war, mistaking his legal duty, had prevented the coroner from holding an inquest on the body of a man hanged on his ship, the court, granting an information, refused to proceed also against his boatwain, who had participated in the transaction under his order: Andr. 281; but, adds Bishop, "an information is in a measure discretionary with the court, and perhaps on an indictment the boatwain would have been deemed liable;" 1 Bish. N. Cr. L. § 688 (3).

In Massachusetts there is now no coroner, but an inquest is held in such cases by a justice of certain designated courts, after an examination by regular medical examiners and a report that the death was caused by violence, or without such report upon the direction of the prosecuting officer: Pub. Stat. c. 26. See CORONER.

INQUEST OF OFFICE. An inquiry made by the king's officer, his sheriff, coroner, or escheator, either virtute officii, or by writ sent to him for that purpose, or by commissioners specially appointed, concerning any matter that entitles the king to the possession of lands or tenements, goods or chattels. It is done by a jury of no determinate number, either twelve, or more, or less: 8 Bla. Com. 258; Finch, Law 823. An inquest of office was bound to find for the king upon the direction of the court. The reason given is that an inquest concluded no man of his right, but only gave the king an opportunity to enter, so that he could have his right tried: 8 Bla. Com. 260; 4 Steph. Com. 61; F. Moore 730; 8 Hen. VII. 10; 2 Hen. IV. 5. An inquest of office was also called, simply, "office." As to "office" in the United States, see OFFICE.

INQUEST OF SHERIFFS. A general inquiry (1170) into the methods in which the sheriffs had been conducting the local government of the country. 1 Holdsw. Hist. E. L. 21. In the 12th century the power of the sheriffs was very great in England. It is clear from this inquest that the crown was already viewing them with some suspicion. Id., 3rd ed., 82, 313.

INQUIRY, WRIT OF. A writ sued out by a plaintiff in a case where the defendant has let the proceedings go by default, and an interlocutory judgment has been given for damages generally, where the damages do not admit of calculation. It issues to the sheriff of the county in which the venue is laid, and commands him to inquire, by a jury of twelve men, concerning the amount of damages. The sheriff thereupon tries the cause in his sheriff's court, and some amount must always be returned to the court. But the return of the inquest merely informs the court, which may, if it chooses, in all cases assess damages and thereupon give final judgment. 2 Archb. Pr., Waterman ed. 952; 8 Bla. Com. 398; 8 Chitty, Stat. 495, 497.

INQUISITION. In Practice. An examination of certain facts by a jury impanelled by the sheriff for the purpose. The instrument of writing on which their decision is made is also called an inquisition. The sheriff or coroner, and the jury who make the inquisition, are called the inquest.

An inquisition on an untimely death, if omitted by the coroner, may be taken by justices of gaol delivery andoyer and terminator, or of the peace; but it must be done publicly and openly; otherwise it will be quashed. Inquisitions either of the coroner or of the other jurisdictions are traversable: 1 Burr. 18, 19.

INQUISITOR. A designation of sheriffs, coroners super visum corporis, and the like, who have power to inquire into certain matters.

In Ecclesiastical Law. The name of an officer who is authorized to inquire into heresies, and the like, and to punish them. A judge.

INROLMENT ENROLMENT (Law Lat. inrolatio). The act of putting upon a roll.

Formerly, the record of a suit was kept on skins of parchment, which, best to preserve them, were kept upon a roll or in the form of a roll: what was written upon them was called the inrolment. After, when such records came to be kept in books, the making up of the record retained the old name of inrolment. Thus, in equity, the inrolment of a decree is the recording of it, and will prevent the rehearing of the cause, except on appeal to the house of lords or by bill of review. The decree may be enrolled immediately after it has been passed and entered unless a caveat has been entered: 2 Freem. 179; 4 Johns. Ch. 199; 14 Johns. 501. And before signing and inrolment a decree cannot be pleaded in bar of a suit, though it can be insisted on by way of answer: 3 Atk. Ch. 809; 2 Ves. 377; 4 Johns. Ch. 199. See Saunders, Ord. in Ch. Inrolment.

Transcribing upon the records of a court deeds, etc., according to the statutes on the subject. See 1 Chitty, Stat. 425, 426; 2 id. 69, 76-78; 3 id. 1497. Placing on file or record generally, as annuities, attorneys, etc.

INSANE DELUSION. An "insane delusion" is an idea or belief which springs spontaneously from a diseased or perverted mind without reason or without foundation in fact; it is distinguishable from a belief which is founded upon prejudice or aversion no matter how unreasonable or unfounded the prejudice or aversion may be. If it is the product of a reasoning mind, no matter how slight the evidence upon which it is based, it cannot be classed as an "insane delusion." 160 Ky. 420, 169 S. W. 852.

The fact that one believes in spiritualism is not an evidence of an unsound mind, and will not be held an "insane delusion" sufficient to invalidate the will of one so believing. 148 Ky. 118, 146 S. W. 400.

An "insane delusion" is the spontaneous production of a diseased mind leading to a belief in the existence of something which either does or does not exist, or does not exist in the manner believed. 156 Ky. 350, 160 S. W. 1071.

INSANE PERSON. This includes every one who is: (1) An "idiot,"—from a person destitute of ordinary intellectual powers from any cause, and dating from any time; but, in common use, a person without understanding from birth. (2) "Lunatic"—A person of any form of unsoundness of mind other than idiocy; mental derangement, with intermittent, strictly periodically intermittent, lucid intervals. (3) "Non compos," which embraces "idiot" and "lunatic." (4) "Deranged," which embraces all the natural born idiots. Code W. Va. p. 124; 36 W. Va. 568.

INSANITY. In Medical Jurisprudence. The prolonged departure, without any adequate cause, from the states of feeling and modes of thinking usual to the individual in health.

Insanity is such a deprivation of reason that the subject is no longer capable of understanding and acting with discretion in the ordinary affairs of life. 142 Ill. 80.

Legal insanity, which exonerates from crime or incapacitates from civil action, is a mental deficiency with reference to the particular act in question and not a general incapacity. It is the latter only as the result of judicial ascertainment that a person is non compos mentis, by inquisition in lunacy, or similar statutory proceeding, and this only results in a general civil disability and not, proprio vigore, in immunity from punishment for crime.

It results that there can be no general definition of legal insanity. It is a state or condition which must be noted with reference to each class of actions to which it is applied.

In criminal law it "is any defect, weakness, or disease of the mind rendering it incapable of entertaining, or preventing its entertaining in the particular instance, the criminal intent which constitutes one of the elements in every crime." 1 Bish. N. Cr. L. § 381.

As a cause of civil incapacity it is such defect or weakness as prevents rational assent to a contract or due consideration of the facts properly and naturally entering into the testamentary disposition of one's estate. It is a want of due proportion in quality or quantity, or both,—between the mental capacity and power and the particular act, civil or criminal, as to which the inquiry arises.

The legal and the medical ideas of insanity are essentially different, and the difference is one of substance. The failure to keep it in mind has been the fruitful cause of confusion in trials involving the question of mental capacity for crime or contract, and has tended to render valueless and often absurd the testimony of witnesses called as experts. Many of these have testified without any conception of the real nature and definition of the insanity, which alone could have relation to the case.

The distinction between the medical and the legal idea of insanity has, perhaps, not been better stated than by Ray, who is quoted by Ordonnau, and again by Wittmaus & Becker: "Insanity in medicine has to do with a prolonged departure of the individual from his natural mental state arising from bodily disease." "Insanity in law covers nothing more than the relation of the person and the particular act which is the subject of judicial investigation. The legal problem must resolve itself into the inquiry, whether there was mental capacity and moral freedom to do or abstain from doing the particular act." 1 Wittm. & Beck. Med. Jur. 181; 35 Fed. Rep. 730.

Of late years this word has been used to designate all mental impairments and deficiencies formerly embraced in the terms lunacy, idiocy, and unsoundness of mind. Even to the middle of the last century the law recognized only two classes of persons requiring its protection, the sane and the insane, viz.: lunatics and idiots. The former were supposed to embrace all who had lost the reason which they once possessed and their disorder was called dementia accidental; the latter, those who had never possessed any reason, and this deficiency was called dementia naturalis. Lunatics were supposed to be insane by the loss of reason, and another prevalent notion respecting them was that in a very large proportion there occurred lucid intervals, when reason shone out, for a while, from behind the cloud that obscured it, with its natural brightness. It may be remarked, in passing, that lucid intervals were introduced by the law, as they were once supposed to be, and that the restoration is not so complete as the descriptions of the older writers would lead us to infer. In modern practice, the term lucid interval signifies merely a remission of the disease, an abatement of the violence of the morbid action, a period of comparative calm; and the proof of its occurrence is generally drawn from the character of the act in question. It is hardly necessary to say that this is an unjustifiable use of the term, which should be confined to the genuine lucid interval that does occasionally occur.

It began to be held at last that a large class of persons required the protection of the law, who were not idiots, because they had reason once, nor lunatics in the ordinary signification of the term, because they were not violent, exhibited no very notable derangement of reason, were independent of lunar influences, and had no lucid intervals. Their mental impairment consisted in a loss of intellectual power, of interest in their usual pursuits, of the ability to comprehend their relations to persons and things. A new term—unsoundness of mind—was therefore introduced to meet this exigency; but it has never been very clearly defined.

The law has never held that all lunatics and idiots are absolved from all responsibility for their civil or criminal acts. This consequence was attributed only to the severest grades of these affections,—to lunatics who have no more understanding than a brute, and to idiots who cannot "number twenty pence nor tell how old they are." Theoretically the law has changed but little, even to the present day; but practically it exhibits considerable improvement; that is, while the general doctrine remains unchanged, it is qualified, in one way or another, by the courts, so as to produce less practical injustice.

Insanity implies the presence of disease or congenital defect in the brain, and though it may be accompanied by disease in other organs, yet the cerebral affection is always supposed to be primary and predominant. It is to be borne in mind, however, that bodily diseases may be accompanied, in some stage of their progress, by mental disorder which may affect the legal relations of the patient. To give a definition of insanity not congenial, or, in other words, to indicate its essential element, the present state of our knowledge does not permit. Most of the attempts to define insanity are sententious descriptions of the disease, rather than proper definitions. For all practical purposes, however, a definition is unnecessary, because the real question at issue always is, not what constitutes insanity in general, but wherein consists the insanity of this or that individual. Neither sanity nor insanity can be regarded as an entity to be handled and described, but rather as a condition to be considered in reference to other conditions. Men vary in the character of their mental manifestations, inasmuch that conduct and conversation perfectly proper and natural in one might in another, differently constituted, be indicative of insanity. In determining, therefore, the mental condition of a person, he must not be judged by any arbitrary standard of sanity or insanity, nor compared with other persons unquestionably sane or insane. He can properly be compared only with himself. When a person, without any adequate cause, adopts notions he once regarded as absurd, or indulges in conduct opposed to all his former habits and principles, or changes completely his ordinary temper, manners, and disposition,—the man of plain practical sense indulging in speculative theories and projects, the miser becoming a spendthrift and the spendthrift a miser, the staid, quiet, unobtrusive citizen becoming noisy, restless, and boisterous, the gay and joyous becoming dull and disconsolate even to the verge of despair, the careful, cautious man of business plunging into hazardous schemes of speculation, the discreet and pious becoming shamefully reckless and profligate,—no stronger proof of insanity can be had. And yet not one of these traits, in and by itself alone, disconnected from the natural traits of character, could be regarded as conclusive proof of insanity. In accordance with this fact, the principle has been laid down, with the sanction of the highest legal and medical authority, that it is the abrupt departure, without any adequate cause, from the states of feeling and modes of thinking usual to the individual when in health, which is the essential feature of insanity. Gooch, Lond. Quart. Rev. xliii. 353; Combe, Ment. Derang. 196; Meldway v. Croft, 3 Curt. Eccl. 671.

Insanity produced by alcoholism is of two kinds: Delirium tremens, caused by the breaking down of the person's system by long continued or habitual drunkenness, and brought on by abstinence from drink, and called "settled insanity," to distinguish it from "temporary insanity," or drunkenness, directly resulting from drink; 31 Tex. Cr. R. 318. See DRUNKENNESS.

Criminal Responsibility. There is a concurrence in the law of civilized countries in absolving persons mentally unsound from criminal responsibility. In France, Germany, and Austria the rule is in substance that if a person is unconscious of the nature of his act, or his will is affected or the character of the act is not perceived, there is no crime; 1 Wittm. & Beck. Med. Jur. 181; Krafft-Ebing, Ger. Psycho-Path.

That insanity, in some of its forms, annuls all criminal responsibility, and, in the same or other forms, disqualifies its subject from the performance of certain civil acts, is a well-established doctrine of the common law. In the application of this principle there has prevailed, for many years, the utmost diversity of opinion. The law as expounded by Hale, who divided insanity into partial insanity as to certain subjects, partial as to degree, and total insanity, was that partial insanity was not sufficient to excuse a person in the committing of any capital offence; 1 Hale, P. C. 30; and his doctrine was received without question until the beginning of the present century; 8 How. St. Tr. 322; 16 id. 764; 19 id. 647.

This ancient doctrine received its first serious shock in Hadfield's case, 27 id. 1281, 1311, in which Erskine, for the defense, admitted the language used by Coke and Hale as to requiring deprivation of memory and understanding to absolve from crime, but contended that, if taken literally, the words would apply to idiosyncrasy alone. He insisted that "of all the cases that have filled Westminster Hall with complicated considerations, the insane persons have not only had the most perfect knowledge and recollection of all the relations in which they stood towards others, and of the acts and circumstances of their lives, but have, in general, been remarkable for subtlety and acuteness; and that delusion of which the criminal act in question was the immediate unqualified offspring, was the kind of insanity which should rightly exempt from punishment." These views prevailed and Lord Kenyon held that the prisoner was deranged immediately prior to the act and that it was unlikely that he had meanwhile recovered, though, strictly speaking, proof might be required of his condition at the very moment of the shooting; accordingly the prisoner was acquitted with the approbation of the court. Subsequently, in Bellingham's case, 1 Collinson, Lun. 636; Shelf, Lun. 462, Lord Mansfield held that it must be proved that the prisoner was incapable of judging between right and wrong; that at the time of the act he did not consider that murder was a crime against the laws of God and nature; and that there was no other proof of insanity which would excuse crime. Similar language was used in Parker's case, Collin. Lun. 477; Higginson's case, 1 C. & K. 129; Stokes' case, 8 C. & K. 185, and so for about a generation the law of England was practically as settled by Hadfield's and Bellingham's cases, though there were occasional variations from it. The special feature of the law of that period was that, to make a person responsible for crime, there must be a knowledge of right and wrong in the abstract. But the tendency of the cases was towards the modification of the test, so as to make the knowledge of right and wrong refer solely to the act in question; 5 C. & P. 168; 9 id. 525; 1 Cox, Cr. Cas. 80; 3 id. 275. This was formally pronounced to be the law by the English judges, in their reply to the questions propounded by the House of Lords on the occasion of the McNaghten trial, 10 Cl. & F. 200, where it was said by Tindal, C. J., for himself and the other judges: "To establish a defence on the ground of insanity, it must be clearly proved that at the time of committing the act, the party accused was laboring under such a defect of reason, from disease of the mind, as not to know the nature or quality of the act he was doing; or, if he did know it, that he was not aware he was doing what was wrong." Most of the English cases will be found in 1 Russ. Cr., Sharpe, ed. 14, and in the notes will be found a collection of American cases.

The test laid down in McNaghten's case has been generally applied in England and this country. In the former it has been definitely recognized as the law, and in the latter it has been generally adopted, though with frequent variations as will appear infra.

In Coleman's case, in New York, Davis, J., charged the jury that the "test of the responsibility for criminal acts, when insanity is asserted, is the capacity of the accused to distinguish between right and wrong at the time and with respect to the act which is the subject of inquiry." He left it to the jury to determine "whether or not at the time the accused committed the act she knew what she was doing, and knew that in shooting him she was doing a wrongful act." 1 N. Y. Cr. Rep. 1. With variations of expression this is the prevailing doctrine of the American courts; 15 Wall. 590; 62 Cal. 60; 5 Harring. 512; 1 Houst. Cr. Cas. 166, 371; 45 Ga. 57, 190, 225; 57 Me. 574; 25 Kan. 192; 81 Fed. Rep. 134; 85 id. 730; 11 Gray 303; 56 Miss. 269; 63 id. 167; 38 Mich. 482; 10 Minn. 223; 74 Mo. 199, 247; 11 Neb. 637; 14 id. 572; 21 N. J. L. 196; 8 Jones, N. C. 463; 40 Tex. 60; 3 Helak. 348; 109 Ill. 635; 80 S. C. 74; 1 Brewst. 856; 4 Pa. 264; 6 McLean 121; 4 Denio 9; 88 N. Y. 88; 2 Ohio St. 70; 10 id. 599. In many of the cases it is difficult to distinguish with certainty between what the court intends for a statement of the law and what is rather in the nature of practical suggestions addressed to the jury. In a New Hampshire case it was held that no one of the circumstances ordinarily relied upon is, as a matter of law, a test of mental disease, but that all symptoms and all tests of mental disease are purely matters of fact to be determined by the jury; 49 N. H. 399; and the same doctrine has been followed in other states; 31 Ill. 385; 81 Ind. 492, 495. Very similar were the remarks addressed to the jury by the Lord Justice Clerk in a Scotch Justiciary case: "The question is one of fact, that matter of fact being whether when he committed this crime the prisoner was of an unsound mind. The counsel for the crown very properly said that this was entirely for you. It is not a question of medical science, neither is it one of legal definition, although both may materially assist you. It is a question for your common and practical sense." 3 Couper 16.

It was said that mental unsoundness, to render one free from criminal liability, must be such on the particular subject out of which the acts charged as an offence are claimed to have sprung, as to render him incapable of discerning the wrong of committing the same; 35 Fed. Rep. 730; 11 Colo. 238. Occasionally the court has thought it sufficient for the jury to consider whether the prisoner was sane or insane, — of sound memory and discretion, or otherwise; see State v. Cory, State v. Prescott, in Ray, Med. Jur. 35. The capacity to distinguish between right and wrong has been held not to be a safe test in all cases; 25 Ia. 27, per Dillon, C. J.; 15 Wall. 580. See also 78 Pa. 122. In Whart. & St. Med. Jur. § 120, this test is said to be generally satisfactory, but not to cover all cases. An instruction has been sustained, where there was a defence of insanity, that the defendant was not responsible unless he was conscious of his act at the time it was committed; 91 Cal. 35.

The definition of insanity, in the trial of a case involving that issue, is for the court; Whart. & St. Med. Jur. § 112; see 1 F. & W. 87.

The rule already stated as to partial insanity applies equally to delusions, which as has been stated were first brought within the law of mental irresponsibility for crime by Hadfield's case, supra. In McNaghten's case, supra, the question as to delusions was answered thus: "That if a person was acting under an insane delusion, and was in other respects sane, he must be considered in the same situation as to responsibility as if the facts with respect to which the delusion exists were real. That is to say, that the acts of the criminal should be judged as if he had really been in the circumstances he imagined himself to be in. For example, if, under the influence of delusion, he supposes another man to be in the act of attempting to take his life, and he kills him, as he supposes, in self-defence, he would be exempt from punishment. If his delusion was that the deceased had inflicted an injury upon him in character and fortune, and he killed him in revenge for such supposed injury, he would be liable to punishment." In the Guiteau case, the jury were charged by Cox, J., on this subject, as follows: "An insane delusion is never the result of reasoning and reflection. It is not generated by them and it cannot be dispelled by them. . . . Whenever convictions are founded on evidence, on comparison of facts and opinions and arguments, they are not insane delusions. The insane delusion does not relate to mere sentiments or theories, or abstract questions of law, politics, or religion. All these are the subject of opinions, which are beliefs founded on reasoning and reflection. These opinions are often absurd in the extreme, and result from naturally weak or ill-trained reasoning powers, hasty conclusions from insufficient data, ignorance of men and things, credulous dispositions, fraudulent imposture, and often from perverted moral sentiments. But still, they are opinions, founded upon some kind of evidence, and liable to be changed by better external evidence or sounder reasoning. But they are not insane delusions." 10 Fed. Rep. 161. Following this opinion it was said that: "An insane delusion is an incorrigible belief, not the result of reasoning in the existence of facts which are either impossible absolutely or impossible under the circumstances of the individual." 20 Neb. 333.

It is a logical result of the nature of delusion and its legal relations as shown by these definitions that it will be of no avail as a defence unless, if true, the facts supposed to exist would have excused the crime; id.; 32 id. 224; 138 N. Y. 398; 55 Ark. 259. This rule is well illustrated by a case in which it was held that an instruction that "defendant would not be responsible if he killed deceased under an insane delusion that deceased was trying to marry defendant's mother, and that this delusion caused the killing," was properly refused; 34 Ark. 588.

In order that delusion may be a defence it must be connected with the crime, and if a person has an insane delusion upon any one subject, but commits a crime not connected therewith, he is equally guilty as if he were in all respects sane; 13 Minn. 341; 30 Miss. 600; 21 Mo. 464. "A man whose mind squints, unless impelled to crime by this very mental obliquity, is as much amenable to punishment as one whose eye squints." Gibson, C. J., in 4 Pa. 264. See also Alison, Cr. L. 647; Ray, Insan. 106, 135, 227; 3 Couper 357; 71 Mo. 538; 1 Bish. N. Cr. L. 304.

"Where a defendant is acting under an insane delusion as to circumstances which, if true, would relieve the act from responsibility, such delusion is a defence;" Whart. & St. Med. Jur. § 125; but such delusions must involve an honest mistake as to the object to which the crime is directed; id. § 127; 3 F. & F. 839. The term delusion as applied to insanity, does not mean a mere mistake of fact, or being induced by false evidence to believe that a fact exists which does not exist; 45 N. J. Eq. 726.

A disposition to multiply the tests, so as to recognize essential facts in the nature of insanity, has been manifested in this country to a much greater extent than in England.

The existence of an irresistible impulse to commit a crime has been recognized in the law; Steph. Cr. L. 91; and medical authorities are generally in agreement that, as it is put by Bishop, "the mental and physical machine may slip the control of its owner; and so a man may be conscious of what he is doing, and of its criminal character and consequences, while yet he is impelled to it by a power to him irresistible." 1 New Cr. L. 887; 3 With. & Beck. 270, 275; 1 Beck, Med. Jur., 10th ed. 723; Ray, Insan., 3d ed. §§ 17, 18, 22. But the writer last quoted adds: "Whether or not such is truly so must, in the nature of things, be a pure question of fact, it cannot be of law."

In England the courts have refused to recognize this ground of exemption from responsibility and limit the test to ability to distinguish between right and wrong; Clarke, Cr. L. 56; 1 Bish. N. Cr. L. § 887; 3 C. & K. 185; 1 F. & F. 666; 3 id. 772; 3 Cox, C. C. 275.

The American cases are very difficult to classify with reference to this test, as indeed they are on most branches of the subject, nor is such the present purpose; all that is possible being, by reference to a selection of the cases, to illustrate the progress of the law and the direction in which, but not, critically, the precise extent to which, changes have been made since Lord Hale's time, keeping pace with the growth of scientific knowledge.

A full understanding of the scope of the doctrine now under consideration involves the further subject of power of resistance, which enters largely into this class of cases and is also more particularly referred to, infra.

In Roger's case, 7 Metc. 500, the jury were directed to consider, in addition to the test of right and wrong, whether the prisoner, in committing the homicide, acted from an irresistible and uncontrollable impulse; and this case has been much relied on in American courts; Ray, Med. Jur. 58.

In Freth's case, 8 Phila. Pa. 105, Judge Ludlow charged: "If the prisoner was actuated by an irresistible inclination to kill, and was utterly unable to control his will, or subjugate his intellect, and was not actuated by anger, jealousy, revenge, and kindred evil passions, he is entitled to an acquittal," etc.

In the leading case of State v. Harrison it was said by Brannon, J.: "This irresistible-impulse theory test has been recently presented, and while it is supported by plausible arguments, it is rather refined, and introduces what seems to me a useless element of distinction for a test, and is misleading to juries, and fraught with great danger to human life, so much so that even its advocates have warningly said it should be very cautiously applied and only in the clearest cases. What is this irresistible impulse? How shall we of the courts and juries know it? Does it exist when manifested in one single instance, as in the present case, or must it be shown to be habitual, or, at least, to have evinced itself in more than a single instance? . . . I admit the existence of irresistible impulse and its efficacy to exonerate from responsibility, but not as consistent with an adequate realization of the wrong of the act. It is that uncontrollable impulse produced by the disease of the mind, when that disease is sufficient to override judgment and obliterate the sense of right as to the acts done, and deprives the accused of power to choose between them;" 88 W. Va. 729.

For other cases in which irresistible impulse is regarded as a defence, see 31 Ind. 485; 23 Ohio St. 146; 23 Ia. 67; 15 Wall. 580; but it is held that no impulse, however irresistible, is a defence, where there is a knowledge as to the particular act between right and wrong; 5 Jones, N. C. 463; 111 Mo. 542; 31 Tex. Cr. R. 491; 91 Cal. 35; 71 Miss. 345; 86 Ga. 70; 94 Tenn. 106; Tayl. Med. Jur. 720; and that it was a crime morally, and punishable by the laws of the country; 30 S. C. 74; 50 Ark. 511.

As a perfectly natural outgrowth of the doctrine of irresistible impulse, there is to be found in the American cases a tendency more noticeable in late years, to add an additional qualification to the right and wrong test. These cases hold, not merely that the accused, to be considered accountable, must be able to distinguish between right and wrong with respect to the act in question, but must have sufficient mental power to control his impulses.

As the theory of irresistible impulses owes much of its development to the courts of Pennsylvania, so also has this correlative doctrine of the necessity of power to control it received great attention in that state. In Mosler's case, 4 Pa. 264, Gibson, C. J., said: "His insanity must be so great as entirely to destroy his perception of right and wrong; and it is not until that perception is thus destroyed that he ceases to be responsible. It must amount to delusion or hallucination, controlling his will and making the commission of the act, in his apprehension, a duty of overruling necessity. The law is, that, whether the insanity be general or partial, the degree of it must be so great as to have controlled the will of its subject, and to have taken from him the freedom of moral action." And this language is repeated in Ortwein's case, 76 Pa. 414, by Agnew, C. J., who declares it to be the law of the state. The essential relation of power to such cases is thus put, in Haskell's case, 2 Brewst. 49, by Brewster, J.: "A review of all the authorities I have been able to examine satisfies me that the true test in all these cases lies in the word 'power.' Has the defendant in a criminal case the power to distinguish right from wrong, and the power to adhere to the right and avoid the wrong? In these cases has the defendant, in addition to the capacities mentioned, the power to govern his mind, his body, and his estate? If he possess this power over his imagination he will be able to expel all delusive images, and the like control over his will would subdue all homicidal and other monomania. . . . I use the word power with reference to that control which humanity can expect from humanity."

Other cases supporting this view are, 1 Duv. Ky. 224; 7 Metc. 500.

Other cases seem to hold that one mentally disordered, though knowing right and wrong, and that the act is forbidden and punishable, is criminally responsible whether he has power over his conduct or not; 26 Hun 67; 62 How. Pr. 436; 62 N. Y. 407; 102 id. 238; 42 Ga. 9; 45 id. 57; 47 id. 553; 58 id. 296; 62 Cal. 120; 11 Or. 413;

41 Minn. 365; 1 Houst. Cr. Cas. 249; 92 Mo. 800. In a late case it was said, though a crime is committed through lack of sufficient will power to control the conduct, and under an irresistible and uncontrollable impulse, the offender is responsible for the act; 111 Mo. 542. In discussing this class of cases Bishop considers that a doctrine that "our law punishes any man for what he does under a necessity which it is impossible for him to resist," would be an "unprecedented horror." He assumes that the cases which appear to hold it are to be explained upon the theory that the judges do not believe in the existence of an irresistible or uncontrollable impulse. He himself does not assume to know whether as a fact there is, but as the experts assert it, he deems it to be the duty of a judge, where there is evidence tending to support the theory, to submit it to the jury and cast the responsibility upon them. 1 Bish. N. Cr. L. § 383 b, 387.

To this remarkable diversity of views may be attributed, in some measure, no doubt, the actual diversity of results. To any one who has followed with some attention the course of criminal justice in trials where insanity has been pleaded in defence, it is obvious that, if some have been properly convicted, others have just as improperly been acquitted. It must be admitted, however, that the verdict in such cases is often determined less by the instructions of the court than by the views and feelings of the jury and the testimony of experts.

The defence of irresistible impulse has been the subject of legislation in some states, as in New York and Michigan, where by statute a morbid propensity, or uncontrollable impulse to commit a crime, in the mind of one who is conscious of the nature of the act or that it is wrong, or to be incapable of such knowledge, is no defence. See N. Y. Pen. Code § 21; Mich. Pen. Code §§ 19, 20.

What is sometimes called moral insanity, as distinguished from mental unsoundness, is not a defence to a charge of crime; Whart. & St. Med. Jur. §§ 164, 174; Tayl. Med. Jur. 677; 6 Jur. 201; 4 Cox, C. C. 149; 11 Gray 903; 52 N. Y. 467; 4 Cal. 134; 73 id. 222; 2 Ohio St. 184; Guiteau's case, 10 Fed. Rep. 161; 100 N. C. 457; 126 N. Y. 209; 52 id. 469; but see 1 Duv. 224; 4 Metc. Ky. 227; 43 Conn. 514; 6 Bush 268. See also Mann, Med. Jur. of Insan. 68, 120, 135. Morbid religious feelings may be of such a character as to amount to partial insanity, which, though sometimes the basis of delusions affecting criminal cases, is more frequently met with in connection with the subject of undue influence. In a case in which it was alleged that a testator was insane on the subject of spiritualism, it was held that, as an abstract proposition, a belief in spiritualism, though a person may be a monomaniac on that subject or any other form of religion, does not prove insanity; 72 Cal. 556; 32 Wis. 557; 52 id. 543; 3 Wall. Jr. 88; nor belief in the transmigration of souls; 16 Abb. Pr. N. S. 128.

Insanity is not necessarily established by mere eccentricity of mind, manifesting itself in absurd opinions or extravagancies of dress and manners; 21 Barb. 407; 4 McCord 183; Milw. 65; or an irritable temper and an excitable disposition; 82 N. Y. 715; or depression coupled with a monomania or delusion that, by the lands wearing out and buildings going to ruin, starvation and the poorhouse were threatened; 5 Jones L. 157. Insanity produced by continued dissipation is a good defence; 9 Houst. 389; mania d potu is a species of insanity; 3 Harr. 551; and so is delirium tremens; 42 How. Pr. 436; 5 Ohio St. 77; 31 Tex. Cr. Rep. 216; but it must be shown to exist at the time the act is perpetrated, not antecedently; 3 Jones, L. 335. As to drunkenness in its varied forms, see that title. Suicide is not conclusive evidence of insanity, but is admissible to show the absence of a sound and disposing mind; 4 Humph. 491. Epilepsy alone does not establish insanity which will excuse crime; 81 Tex. Cr. Rep. 491; 153 Pa. 535; and in its milder forms, causing temporary fits of insanity, the prima facie presumption is in favor of mental soundness; 7 Ia. 60. See 3 With. & Beck. Med. Jur. 319. Proof that insanity was hereditary was admissible; 61 Ark. 241; but that alone is insufficient when the other evidence clearly shows that defendant knew that he was committing a wrong; 31 Tex. Cr. Rep. 491; 28 Ill. 306.

In reply to a defence of want of criminal capacity proof was admitted that defendant had sometimes feigned insanity; 143 Ind. 289.

As to mental unsoundness produced by or connected with hypnotism, kleptomania, mesmerism, and somnambulism, see those titles.

The effect of the plea of insanity has sometimes been controlled by the instructions of the court in regard to the burden of proof and the requisite amount.

In many of the American states, there has been a tendency towards a relaxation of the rule settled in England, and which formerly prevailed in almost all the states, to treat a plea of insanity as being strictly one in confession and avoidance which must be proved by the defendant either beyond a reasonable doubt or, as was said in many American cases, by a preponderance of evidence. See BURDEN OF PROOF.

The English rule was thus stated in McNaghten's case: "Every man is presumed to be sane, and to possess a sufficient degree of reason to be responsible for his crimes, until the contrary be proved to their satisfaction;" 10 Cl. & F. 200; and it is the settled law of England; 3 C. & K. 186; 4 Cox, C. C. 149; 3 id. 155.

As to whether such proof must be by a preponderance of evidence or beyond a reasonable doubt, the language of the English judges is not entirely free from ambiguity, but it is understood to mean the latter; 14 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 28; 16 id. 454.

In many of the American cases this rule is adhered to; 21 N. J. L. 202; 76 Pa. 414; 145 id. 289; 8 Jones, L. 463; 109 N. C. 780; 5 Bush 382; 92 Ky. 630; 31 Tex. App. 491; 22 id. 379; 63 Ala. 307; 89 id. 150; 54 Ark. 588; 90 Cal. 195; 80 Ga. 650; 84 La. Ann. 186; 47 id. 1088; 57 Me. 574; 7 Metc. 500; 34 Minn. 430; 92 Mo. 310; 23 Ohio St. 349; 24 S. C. 439; 93 Gratt. 807; 11 W. Va. 747; see 36 Am. Rep. 467, n.; but many courts have held the contrary; 35 Fed. Rep. 730; 10 id. 161; 40 Conn. 138; 26 Fla. 11; 183 Ill. 392; 121 Ind. 433; 11 Kan. 32; 32 id. 205; 17 Mich. 9; 56 Miss. 289; 43 N. H. 224; 75 N. Y. 159; 88 id. 81; 91 Tenn. 617; 82 Wis. 295; and the Supreme Court of the United States has accepted this latter doctrine; 160 U. S. 469, where it was held that the jury, to convict, must be "able, upon their consciences, to say that the evidence before them, by whomsoever adduced, is sufficient to show beyond a reasonable doubt the existence of every fact necessary to constitute the crime charged." As to the rule on the subject, applied by the class of cases last referred to, see BURDEN OF PROOF. The cases of the former class, which put the burden on the defendant, in very many instances hold that a preponderance of proof only is required; and in some states the later cases show a virtual abandonment of the rule formerly adhered to by them. As for example in Massachusetts as will appear by the review of cases in that state in 160 U. S. 481-3. It results that it is not practicable to state what might be designated as a prevailing American rule. The subject is very fully discussed by Mr. Justice Harlan in the case last cited. The cases holding different views of the subject will be found collected in the opinion and argument in that case and also in 14 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 25; 16 id. 449; Cl. Cr. L. 56; Mann, Med. Jur. of Insan. ch. iii.; With. & Beck. 506.

In England, under 46 & 47 Vict. c. 38, relating to the trial of lunatics, the jury returns a verdict that the prisoner is "guilty, but insane at the time," whereupon the court records the verdict and orders the prisoner to be imprisoned during the pleasure of the Crown. Under 89 & 40 Geo. III. c. 94, the verdict was "not guilty, on the ground of insanity."

In some states in this country, where the verdict is an acquittal by reason of insanity, the fact must be so returned by the jury, and in such case the court are required to direct the confinement of the prisoner in an insane asylum.

Side by side with this doctrine of the criminal law which makes persons who from a medical point of view are considered insane, responsible for their criminal acts is another equally well authorized, viz.: that a kind and degree of insanity which would not excuse a person for a criminal act may render him legally incompetent for the management of himself or his affairs; Bellingham's case, 5 C. & P. 168. This implies that the mind of an insane person acts more clearly and deliberately, and with a sounder view of its relations to others, when about to commit a great crime than when buying or selling a piece of property. It is scarcely necessary to add that no ground for this distinction can be found in our knowledge of mental disease. On the contrary, we know that the same person who destroys his neighbor, under the delusion that he has been disturbing his peace or defaming his character, may, at the very time, dispose of his property with as correct an estimate of its value and as clear an insight into the consequences of the act as he ever had. If a person is incompetent to manage property, it is because he has lost some portion of his mental power; and this fact cannot be justly ignored in deciding upon his responsibility for criminal acts. Insanity once admitted, it is within the reach of no mortal comprehension to know exactly how far it may have affected the quality of his acts. To say that, possibly, it may have had no effect at all, is not enough; it should be proved by the party who affirms it. See Maudsley, Responsibility in Mental Disease 111.

By the French penal code there can be no crime nor offence if the accused was in a state of madness at the time of the act. Art. 64. The same provision was introduced into Livingston's Code and into the Revised Statutes of New York, vol. 2, § 697. The law of Arkansas provides that a lunatic or insane person without lucid intervals shall not be found guilty of any crime or misdemeanor with which he may be charged; Rev. Stat. 226. In New York, however, in spite of this clear and positive provision of law, the courts have always acted upon the doctrines of the common law, and instructed the jury respecting the tests of that kind of insanity which results in criminal responsibility; 4 Den. 27. In this case, the court declared that the insanity mentioned in the statute means only insanity in reference to the criminal act, and therefore its qualities must be defined.

Civil Incapacity. The general principle governing the civil incapacity of a person of an unsound mind is that any civil act is invalid if the actor was at the time laboring under such mental defect as to render him incapable of performing the act in question, rationally and without detriment to any person affected thereby.

The rule as to contracts is that insanity is such a defect as precludes rational assent, with respect to the nature of the contract, whether marriage, partnership, sale, or the like.

A judicial ascertainment of the insanity of a person is said to deprive him of contractual capacity, as a matter of law, and subsequent contracts are void; 4 Co. 128 b; Bac. Abr. Idioti and Lunatici (F.); 8 N. Y. 368; 128 id. 312; 14 Pick. 280; 31 Pa. 243; but when no conservator was appointed and there was no appearance of incapacity, a purchase was held valid; 85 Ill. 62. See also 5 B. & C. 170; 5 C. & P. 30; 2 Atk. 412; 56 Me. 808; 13 Ired. 106.

Such incapacity is not retroactive; 30 S. C. 377; prior acts are not void but voidable; 2 Cow. 552; but the condition is conclusively presumed to continue, after the finding, until it is superseded; 101 N. Y. 580; 100 id. 215; but see 6 Ohio Cir. Ct. Rep. 481; 89 Ga. 645. A deed or mortgage executed by such person during the period of lunacy, as found, is voidable, the presumption being against validity, but subject to be overcome by proof of sanity; 116 N. Y. 67; and see 49 N. J. Eq. 192; 1 Gr. Ev. § 556.

The marriage of a person insane is void; 12 Mass. 363; 5 Ired. L. 487; 1 Speer. Eq. 569; 18 Kan. 371; 4 Johns. Ch. 343; L. R. 1 P. & D. 335; 22 Ohio St. 271; 1 Edm. Sel. Cas. 344; 21 N. H. 52; 22 id. 553. A marriage contracted while one party was insane from delirium tremens was held void; 3 Rich. L. 93; but mere weakness of mind not amounting to derangement is not sufficient; 29 Ala. 565; 3 Ired. Eq. 91; and for that merely, or intoxication, a court has no power to declare a marriage null and void; 1 Houst. 306. The same degree of mental capacity which enables a person to make a valid deed or will is sufficient to enable him to marry; 46 Me. 510. It was held that a marriage celebrated by a person while insane might be affirmed upon recovery without a new solemnization; 5 Sneed 57.

Other civil contracts made by insane persons are voidable, not void; 53 Md. 65; 34 Ark. 613; 77 Ind. 419; 46 Ia. 62; 9 N. Y. 43; 10 Mo. 277; Ordron. Jud. Asp. Insan. ch. 6; 15 Alb. L. J. 293; 3 Abb. N. C. 274, 280, note; 31 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 35, 670.

With respect to contracts, persons non compos mentis and infants are said to be parallel, both in law and reason; 3 Mod. 301; 11 Pick. 304; 1 J. J. Marsh. 236. A power of attorney made by an insane person is absolutely void; 15 Wall. 9; and a contract executory on both sides cannot be enforced against an insane person; Ewell, L. Cas. Disab. 525, where the cases are collected.

The test of legal capacity to contract, it was said, is that the party is capable of recollecting the property he is about to dispose of, the manner of distributing it, and the object of his bounty; the particular act being attended with the consent of his will and understanding; 82 Va. 863.

Pollock enumerates three different theories as to contracts by insane persons which "have, at different times, been entertained in English courts and supported by respectable authority;" Poll. Cont. 87. These theories, with some of the authorities cited in support of them, are substantially as follows:—1. That it is no ground, whatever, for avoiding a contract; Co. Litt. 2 b; 4 Co. 125 b; Bract. fol. 100 a, 165 a. As to this it is characterized as a frivolous technicality and doubtful whether it was really supported by the authorities Coke had before him; Poll. Cont. 89. 2. If one who contracts is too drunk or insane to know what he is about, his agreement is void for want of the consenting mind; but if his mind is only so confused or weak that he may know what he is about, but not fully understand the terms and effect, and this is known to the other party, the contract will be voidable at his option. The first division of this class would be simply void for want of consent; 2 S. & P. 194; 3 Campb. 33; 37 Ind. 307; 29 N. H. 106; the second would come under the head of fraud; 26 Mich. 249; 12 B. Monr. 55; 33 Conn. 170. 3. The doctrine which has prevailed as already stated that all contracts by insane persons are voidable, not void, see supra.

In some courts what has been termed the Massachusetts doctrine prevails that contracts of insane persons are voidable without any reference to the knowledge of the other party; 11 Pick. 304; in others what is known as the English doctrine (but is supported by more recent English authorities) that they are voidable if the other party knows of the insanity; 130 U. S. 176 and 46 Fed. Rep. 794 (under L. Civ. Code); (1882) 1 Q. B. 590; 73 Pa. 407; and reasonable ground for knowledge is equivalent here to; 53 Vt. 625; and there is still a third doctrine supported by some courts that if the other party was ignorant and the contract reasonable and not capable of rescission, so that the parties could be restored to their original position, the contract will be sustained; 29 N. J. L. 386; 46 N. H. 138; 94 Ind. 535; 64 N. Y. 330; 66 Ia. 73; 62 Pa. 428; 61 Mich. 529.

The cases last cited rest upon Molton v. Camroux, 9 Ex. 487; 4 id. 17, which is considered the cornerstone of the law as to contracts with insane persons; Poll. Cont. 92; Leake, Cont. 246; but has been recently characterized as containing "loose statements" which have given rise to "an anomalous doctrine;" Harr. Cont. 285.

Whatever may be said of it, the case undoubtedly settled the law that such a contract was void, and not void, and this was confirmed inferentially by a later case which held that such a contract might be ratified after the disability had passed; L. R. 8 Ex. 182.

It is generally considered that contracts for necessities for an insane person are binding, if suited to their condition in life; 5 B. & C. 170; 13 Ired. L. 106; 3 J. J. Marsh. 658; 81 Ga. 512; 2 Bradf. Sur. 122; 27 Cal. 376; 17 Miss. 94; and this rule has been extended to other things which were reasonable and proper; 10 Allen 59; but if the other party has knowledge of the insanity the nature of the liability is rather quasi-contractual; 44 Ch. D. 94; 56 Me. 308; 53 N. H. 627; Keener, Quasi-Cont. 20. This liability is not removed by the appointment of a committee, where necessities are furnished in good faith and the committee has failed to provide them; 66 Barb. 452; 63 Vt. 244.

Deeds executed by persons of unsound mind are absolutely void; 51 N. Y. 878; 95 id. 508; 2 Ired. 23; 5 Whart. 871; 3 With. & Beck. Med. Jur. 386. In other cases it has been held that such a deed is voidable only; 6 Metc. 415; 1 Gray 484; 24 Ind. 23; 12 Dana 452. Other cases again hold that want of perfect soundness of mind does not affect the conveyance if there is still capacity for fully comprehending the import of the act; 55 Me. 56; 86 Ill. 109; 44 N. H.

531; 21 Wend. 142; 3 Hill 513; 4 Ired. Eq. 443; see 8 Lea 567; 1 Patt. & H. 307. See 1 Pingr. Mortg. § 349.

As to testamentary capacity as affected by insanity, see WILL; DEMENTIA; UNDOE INFLUENCE.

In most states the statutes of limitation do not run against a person insane, nor does adverse possession ripen into title while the person out of possession is insane; 59 N. W. Rep. (Ia.) 52; but a plaintiff's claim is not affected by the insanity of the defendant's ancestor after the statute had begun to run; 111 N. C. 251. The time of sanity required in order to allow the statute to begin to run is such as will enable the party to examine his affairs and institute an action, and is for the jury; 1 Metc. Ky. 35.

Insanity is not a defence in an action of tort; but damages are compensatory and not punitive; 121 Ill. 680; 3 Barb. 647; 24 Atl. Rep. (N. H.) 902; 54 Fed. Rep. 116; 143 N. Y. 442.

As to lucid intervals and the competency of insane persons as witnesses, see LUCID INTERVALS.

This is a social or legal concept, and is applied to cases where the abnormality is great enough to warrant commitment to an institution. Bridges, Outline Ab. Psych. 127. See AMENTIA; DEMENTIA; IMPULSIVE INSANITY; MENTAL DISEASE; PSYCHIATRY; PSYCHOSIS.

INSCRIPTION. In Civil Law. An engagement which a person who makes a solemn accusation of a crime against another enters into that he will suffer the same punishment, if he has accused the other falsely, which would have been inflicted upon him had he been guilty. Code, 9. 1. 10; 9. 2. 16 and 17.

In Evidence. Something written or engraved.

Inscriptions upon tombstones and other proper places, as rings, and the like, are held to be evidence of pedigree; Bull. N. P. 233; Cowp. 591; 10 East 120; 18 Ves. 145. But their value as evidence depends largely on the authority under which they were made, and the length of time between their establishment and the events they commemorate; 62 Ga. 407; 75 Miss. 258; 22 Mich. 415; 39 Miss. 326; 83 Hun 323; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 106. See DECLARATION; HEARSAY EVIDENCE.

INSCRIPTIONES (Lat.). The name given by the old English law to any written instrument by which anything was granted. Blount.

INSENSIBLE. In Pleading. That which is unintelligible is said to be insensible. Steph. Pl. 378.

INSIDIATOIRES VIARUM (Lat.). Persons who lie in wait in order to commit some felony or other misdemeanor.

INSIMUL COMPUTASSENT (Lat.). They had accounted together. See ASSUMPSIT.

INSINUACION. In Spanish Law. The presentation of a public document to a competent judge, in order to obtain his approbation and sanction of the same, and thereby giving it judicial authenticity.

Insinuatio est ejus quod traditur, sive agitur, coram quocumque iudice in scripturam redactio.

This formality is requisite to the validity of certain donations inter vivos. Escribche, voc. Insinuacion.

INSINUATION. In Civil Law. The transcription of an act on the public registers, like our recording of deeds. It was not necessary in any other alienation but that appropriated to the purpose of donation. Inst. 2. 7. 2; Pothier, Traité des Donations, Entre Vifs, sec. 2, art. 3, § 8; 8 Toullier, n. 198.

INSINUATION OF A WILL. In Civil Law. The first production of it; or, leaving it in the hands of the register in order to its probate. 21 Hen. VIII. c. 5; Jacob, Law Dict.

INSOLIDE (L. Lat.). Solidly; without any separation of possession or ownership.

INSOLVENCY. The condition of a person who is insolvent (q. v.). Inability to pay one's debts.

Bankruptcy, which is one species or phase of insolvency, denotes the condition of a trader or merchant who is unable to pay his debts in the course of business; 2 Bell, Com. 132; 1 M. & S. 338; 5 Dowl. & R. 218; 4 Hill, N. Y. 880; 4 Cush. 154. Insolvency, then, as distinguished from strict bankruptcy, is the condition or status of one who is unable to pay his debts; and insolvent laws are distinguished from strict bankruptcy laws by the following characteristics:

Bankruptcy laws apply only to traders or merchants; insolvent laws, to those who are not traders or merchants. Bankrupt laws discharge absolutely the debt of the honest debtor; 12 Wheat. 330; 4 id. 122, 209; 2 Mas. 161; 2 Blackf. 394; 3 Cal. 154; 36 Wend. 43; 4 B. & Ald. 654; Baldw. 206. Insolvent laws discharge the person of the debtor from arrest and imprisonment, but leave the future acquisitions of the debtor still liable to the creditor; 4 Wheat. 122; 3 H. & J. 61. Both laws contemplate an equal, fair, and honest division of the debtor's present effects among his creditors pro rata. A bankrupt law may contain those regulations which are generally found in insolvent laws, and an insolvent law may contain those which are common to a bankrupt law; per Marshall, C. J., 4 Wheat. 195; 1 W. & M. 115. And insolvent laws quite coextensive with the English bankrupt system have not been unfrequently in our colonial and state legislation, and no distinction was ever attempted to be made in the name between bankruptcies and insolvencies; 3 Sto. Const. 11; Blah. Insolv. Debt. 4.

Under the United States constitution the power to pass a bankrupt law is vested in congress, and this is held to include power to pass an act which provides for voluntary bankruptcy, or, strictly speaking, an insolvent law. So in the absence of congressional action, the states have passed laws which, though called insolvent laws, were in fact bankrupt laws, and their right to do so has been sustained, such laws being held valid; see BANKRUPT; except as limited by the prohibition against impairing the obligation of contracts, which title see; see also 9 Metc. 16; 2 Ind. 463; 5 How. 295; 1 Cush. 430; 14 N. H. 38; 10 Metc. 594; 26 Me. 110; 1 Woodb. & M. 115; 5 Gill 437; 1 Wall. 229; Cooley, Const. Lim. 360; Miller, Const. U. S. 618. So far as the jurisdiction of the state extends, its insolvent laws may have all the essential operation of a bankrupt law, not being limited to a mere discharge of the person of the debtor on surrendering his effects. But a creditor out of a state who voluntarily makes himself a party and accepts a dividend, is bound by his own act, and is deemed to have waived his extra-territorial immunity and right; 4 Wheat. 122; 12 id. 213; 8 Pick. 194; 3 Pet. C. C. 411; 3 Story, Const. 252; 9 Conn. 314; 2 Blackf. 394; Baldw. 296; 9 N. H. 478. See 8 B. & C. 477; 3 Cal. 154; 4 B. & Ald. 654; 26 Wend. 43; 2 Gray 43; 4 Bosw. 450; 32 Miss. 246.

The effect of a discharge upon non-resident creditors is examined at large in 6 Harv. L. Rev. 349, where also may be found what is believed to be a complete list of all adjudications, federal and state, upon the subject. The conclusion reached is that it is the generally accepted doctrine that, in such case, a discharge will be of no effect (even in the courts of the state where the discharge is granted) against a non-resident, unless he becomes a party by voluntary appearance or personal service. The correctness of this conclusion, though it is admitted as established, is seriously challenged on grounds of expediency which are stated at large.

Insolvency may of course be simple or notorious. Simple insolvency is attended by no badge of notoriety. Notorious or legal insolvency, with which the law has to do, is designated by some public act or legal proceeding. This is the situation of a person who has done some notorious act to divest himself of all his property; as, making an assignment, applying for relief, or having been proceeded against in invitum under bankrupt or insolvent laws; Bish. Insolv. Debt. 3, n. 1; 1 Pet. 195; 2 Wheat. 396; 7 Toullier, n. 45; Domat, liv. 4, tit. 5, nn. 1, 2; 2 Bell, Com. 165.

It is with regard to the latter that the insolvency laws (so called) are operative. They are generally statutory provisions by which the property of the debtor is surrendered for his debts; and upon this condition, and the assent of a certain proportion of his creditors, he is discharged from all further liabilities; 9 Mass. 431; 16 id. 53; 2 Kent 821; Ingr. Insolv. 9. This legal insolvency may exist without actual inability to pay one's debts when the debtor's estate is finally settled and wound up. (See definition). Insolvency, according to some of the state statutes, may be of two kinds, voluntary and involuntary. The latter is called the proceeding against the creditor in invitum. Voluntary insolvency, which is the more common, is the case in which the debtor institutes the proceedings, and is desirous of availing himself of the insolvent laws, and petitions for that purpose.

Involuntary insolvency is where the proceedings are instituted by the creditors in invitum, and so the debtor forced into insolvency. The circumstances entitling either debtor or creditors to invoke the aid of the insolvent law are in a measure peculiar to each state. But their general characteristics are as follows:

Proceedings by creditors may usually be taken for fraudulent concealment, conveyance, or collusive attachment, of property; by petition to the designated tribunal, on notice to the debtor; possession of the property is taken by an officer of the courts, usually after proof of the allegations, and a meeting of creditors is called for the choice of an assignee by a vote of creditors, having relation both to number and amount. The assignee becomes practically the owner, in trust, with power to wind up the estate; he acts under the general direction of the court, calling meetings of creditors when required. The right to a discharge varies in different states, in some being conditioned upon payment of a certain percentage or the assent of the majority of creditors or upon more stringent conditions in case of subsequent insolvency. The statutes vary as to the grounds of refusing a discharge for fraud, as in cases of paying or securing debts within a certain time before the application, or when the debtor is insolvent, or has reasonable cause to believe himself so. As to all these details the state statutes should be referred to.

As to American and English bankrupt law proper, see BANKRUPT LAWS; BANKRUPT.

The English act 34 Geo. III. ch. 60, was called an insolvent debtor's act; but the first act of insolvency properly so called was passed in 1826. And the act of 7 & 8 Vict. cap. 70, called "an act for facilitating arrangements between debtor and creditor," is properly an insolvency law. This provided for the discharge of a non-trading debtor if he had a certain concurrence from his creditors. This was one-third, both in value and number, to the initiatory steps. To the discharge, a proportional consent at an initiatory meeting, and, finally, the consent of three-eighths in both number and value, or nine-tenths in value of creditors to the sum of twenty pounds and upwards.

Many of the states have laws for the distribution of insolvent estates, and also laws for the relief of poor debtors. These are not properly called insolvent laws in the sense in which we have used the words, though the latter relieve the debtor's body from restraint upon a surrender of his goods and estate, and leave his future acquisitions still liable. See POOR DEBTORS.

INSOLVENCY, ACT OF. See ACT OF INSOLVENCY; CONTEMPLATION OF INSOLVENCY.

INSOLVENT (Lat. in, privative, solvō, to pay). The condition of a person who is insolvent or unable to pay his debts. 2 Bla. Com. 285, 471; 9 N. Y. 589.

One who is unable to pay his debts as they fall due in the usual course of trade or business. 2 Kent 869; 3 Dowl. & R. 218; 1 M. & S. 838; 1 Campb. 493, n.; Sudeb. Vend. 487; 3 Gray 600; 86 Me. 246;

116 Mo. 226; although his assets in value exceed the amount of his liability; 110 Cal. 488; or the embarrassment is only temporary; 26 So. W. Rep. (Tex.) 255; but it was held that mere liability to pay debts promptly as they mature is not conclusive; 26 id. 509; that one who has sufficient property subject to legal process to satisfy all legal demands is not insolvent; 10 So. Rep. (Ala.) 334; and also that a person who suspended business because of difficulties arising out of the commencement of an action was not necessarily an insolvent; 63 Hun 632.

One who is unable to pay commercial paper in the due course of business is insolvent; 10 Blatchf. 493; 33 Pac. Rep. (Cal.) 884.

A corporation is insolvent when its assets are insufficient for the payment of its debts, and it has ceased to do business, or has taken, or is in the act of taking, a step which will practically incapacitate it from conducting the corporate enterprise with reasonable prospect of success, or its embarrassments are such that early suspension and failure must ensue; 98 Ala. 68.

The clearing house rules, making members responsible for clearances of outside banks, for which they engage to clear, for one day after notice of the termination of their agreement, require payment of checks of such outside bank though known to be insolvent; and a contract for a deposit by the latter of cash and notes as indemnity for such clearances is valid, and the payments are not within a statute forbidding payments by an insolvent corporation made with intent to prefer creditors, and the money and securities held under the aforesaid contract are applicable to the amount of the checks so paid; 40 N. E. Rep. (N. Y.) 871.

An insolvent building association may make an assessment on stock of a borrowing member to cover losses, and thereby equalize the members, so that they may go out on an equal footing at the closing up of the association; 40 N. E. Rep. (Ind.) 694.

The word "insolvent," as used in Rev. Stats., § 3466, and of insolvency therein referred to is limited by the language to cases where "a debtor, not having sufficient property to pay all his debts, makes a voluntary assignment," etc. Mere inability of the debtor to pay all his debts in ordinary course of business is not insolvency within the meaning of the act, but it must be manifested in one of the modes pointed out in the latter part of the statute which defines or explains the meaning of insolvency referred to in the earlier part. 6 Pet. (U. S.) 29, 35; 2 Cranch (U. S.) 358, 390; 10 Pet. (U. S.) 596, 611; 261 U. S. 259.

INSOLVENT ESTATES OF PERSONS DECEASED. See ADMINISTRATION.

INSPECTION (Lat. inspicere, to look into). The examination of certain articles made by law subject to such examination, so that they may be declared fit for commerce. The decision of the inspectors is not final; the object of the law is to protect the community from fraud, and to preserve the character of the merchandise abroad; 8 Cow. 45. See 1 Johns. 205; 13 id. 331; 2 Cal. 812. Quantity is as legitimate a subject of inspection as quality; 40 La. Ann. 465.

In Practice. Examination. As to the right to inspect public records, see RECORDS.

INSPECTION LAWS. The right in the states to enact inspection laws, quarantine and health laws is undoubted and is recognized in the constitution; Story, Const. 515; Cooley, Const. Lim. 780. These may be carried to the extent of ordering the destruction of private property, when infected with disease or otherwise dangerous; id.; 5 How. 632.

Under the general powers reserved by the states in the regulation of its internal commerce and to protect its citizens from fraud, a state may declare that certain articles shall not be sold within its limits without inspection, and charge the cost of the inspection on those offering the article for sale; 52 Fed. Rep. 690. A state cannot, under the guise of exerting its police powers, or of enacting inspection laws, make discrimination against the products and industries of some of the states in favor of the products and industries of its own or of other states; 138 U. S. 78; 141 id. 62.

INSPECTOR. The name given to certain officers whose duties are to examine and inspect things over which they have jurisdiction: as, inspector of bark, one who is by law authorized to examine bark for exportation, and to approve or disapprove of its quality. Inspectors of customs are officers appointed by the general government.

INSPEXIMUS (Lat.). We have seen. A word sometimes used in letters patent, reciting a grant, inspeximus such former grant, and so reciting it verbatim: it then grants such further privileges as are thought convenient. 5 Co. 54.

INSTALLATION, INSTALMENT. The act by which an officer is put in public possession of the place he is to fill. The president of the United States, or a governor, is installed into office, by being sworn agreeably to the requisition of the constitution and laws.

INSTALMENT. A part of a debt due by contract, and agreed to be paid at a time different from that fixed for the payment of the other part. For example, if I engage to pay you one thousand dollars, in two payments, one on the first day of January and the other on the first day of July, each of these payments or obligations to pay will be an instalment.

In such case, each instalment is a separate debt so far that it may be tendered at any time, or the first may be sued for although the other shall not be due; 3 Dane, Abr. 493, 494; 1 Esp. 129, 226; 2 id. 235; 8 Salk. 6, 18; 1 Maule & S. 706.

A debtor who by failing to pay three instalments of rent due on a lease would forfeit his estate, may, in order to save it, tender one instalment to prevent the forfeiture, although there may be two due at the time; and he is not bound to tender both; 6 Toullier, n. 688.

As to sales on instalment, see SALES.

INSTANCE. Literally, standing on, hence, urging, solicitation. Webster, Dict.

In Civil and French Law. In general, all sorts of actions and judicial demands. Dig. 44, 7, 58.

In Ecclesiastical Law. Causes of instance are those proceeded in at the solicitation of some party, as opposed to causes of office, which run in the name of the judge. Halif. Anal. p. 122.

In Scotch Law. That which may be insisted on at one diet or course of probation. Whart.

INSTANCE COURT. In English Law. That branch of the admiralty court which had the jurisdiction of all matters except those relating to prizes. By the Judicature Acts (q. v.) the jurisdiction of the admiralty courts was transferred to the high court of justice.

The term is sometimes used in American law for purposes of explanation, but has no proper application to admiralty courts in the United States, where the powers of both instance and prize courts are conferred without any distinction; 3 Dall. 6; 1 Gall. 563; 3 Kent 355, 378.

See ADMIRALTY.

INSTANCIA. In Spanish Law. The institution and prosecution of a suit from its inception until definitive judgment. The first instance, "primera instancia," is the prosecution of the suit before the judge competent to take cognizance of it at its inception; the second instance, "segunda instancia," is the exercise of the same action before the court of appellate jurisdiction.

tion; and the third instance, "tercera instancia," is the prosecution of the same suit, either by an application of revision before the appellate tribunal, that has already decided the cause, or before some higher tribunal, having jurisdiction of the same.

All civil suits must be tried and decided, in the first instance, within three years; and all criminal, within two years.

As a general rule, three instances are admitted in all civil and criminal cases. Art. 285, Const. 1812.

INSTANTER (Lat.). Immediately; presently. This term, it is said, means that the act to which it applies shall be done within twenty-four hours; but a doubt has been suggested by whom is the account of the hours to be kept, and whether the term instanter as applied to the subject-matter may not be more properly taken to mean "before the rising of the court," when the act is to be done in court, or "before the shutting of the office the same night," when the act is to be done there; 1 Taunt. 343; 6 East, 587; Tidd, Pr., 3d ed. 508, n.; 3 Chitty, Pr. 112. See 3 Burr. 1309; Co. Litt. 157.

INSTANTLY. Immediately; directly; without delay; at once. The word is a frequent occurrence in indictments for murder where the death is charged as having been the immediate result of a wound or blow inflicted. Where the killing has been alleged to have been caused by a battery it is necessary to allege an assault and to specify the time when the mortal stroke was given and the time of the death; the allegation that he "instantly died" is insufficient; 9 Mo. 666; as was an indictment which described the assault and then charges that of the mortal wound inflicted by defendant the deceased "did instantly die;" 65 id. 217; otherwise had the averment been that the deceased "did then and there instantly die;" id. 218.

INSTAR (Lat.). Like; resembling; equivalent; as, instar dentium, like teeth; instar omnium, equivalent to all.

INSTIGATION. The act by which one incites another to do something, as, to injure a third person, or to commit some crime or misdemeanor, to commence a suit, or to prosecute a criminal. See ACCOMPLICE.

INSTITOR (Lat.). In Civil Law. A clerk in a store; an agent.

He was so called because he watched over the business with which he was charged; and it is immaterial whether he was employed in making a sale in a store, or whether charged with any other business. Institor appellatus est ex eo, quod negotio gerendo instaret; nec multum facit taberna sit prepositus, an culibet aliis negotiationibus; Dig. lib. 14, tit. 8, l. 8. Mr. Bell says that the charge given to a clerk to manage a store or shop is called institorial power; 1 Bell, Com. 479, 5th ed.; Erskine, Inst. 3. 8. 46; 1 Stair, Inst. by Brodie, b. 1, tit. 11, §§ 12, 18, 19; Story, Ag. § 8.

INSTITUTE. In Scotch Law. The person first called in the tailzie; the rest, or the heirs of tailzie, are called substitutes; Erskine Pr. 3. 8. 8. See TAILZIE, HEIR OF, SUBSTITUTES.

In Civil Law. One who is appointed heir by testament, and is required to give the estate devised to another person, who is called the substitute.

To name or to make an heir by testament; Dig. 28. 5. 65. To make an accusation; to commence an action.

INSTITUTES. Elements of jurisprudence; text-books containing the principles of law made the foundation of legal studies.

The word was first used by the civilians to designate those books prepared for the student and supposed to embrace the fundamental legal principles arranged in an orderly manner. Two books of Institutes were known to the civil lawyers of antiquity,—Gaius and Justinian.

I. COKE'S INSTITUTES. Four volumes of commentaries upon various parts of the English law.

Sir Edward Coke wrote four volumes of Institutes, as he was pleased to call them, though they have little of the institutional method to warrant such a title. The first volume is a very extensive commentary upon an excellent little treatise of tenures, compiled by Judge Littleton in the reign of Edw. IV. This comment is a rich mine of valuable common-law learning, collected and heaped together from the ancient reports and year-books, but greatly defective in method. The second volume is a comment on many old acts of parliament, without any systematic order: the third, a more methodical treatise on the pleas of the crown; and the fourth, an account of the several species of courts. These Institutes are usually cited thus: the first volume as Co. Litt., or 1 Inst.; the second, third, and fourth as, 2, 3, or 4 Inst., without any author's name. 1 Bla. Com. 72.

II. GAIUS'S INSTITUTES. A tractate upon the Roman law, ascribed to Gaius or Caius.

Of the personal history of this jurist nothing is known. Even the spelling of his name is matter of controversy, and he is known by no other title than Gaius, or Caius. He is believed to have lived in the reign of Marcus Aurelius. The history of Gaius's Institutes is remarkable. In 1810, Niebuhr was sent to Rome by the king of Prussia. On his way thither, he spent two days in the cathedral library of Verona, and at this time discovered these Institutes, which had been lost to the jurists of the middle ages. In 1817, the Royal Academy of Berlin charged Goeschen, Bekker, and Hollweg with the duty of transcribing the discovered manuscript. In 1819, Goeschen gave the first completed edition, as far as the manuscript could be deciphered, to his fellow-jurists. It created an unusual sensation, and became a fruitful source of comment. It formed a new era in the study of Roman law. It gave the modern jurist the signal advantage of studying the source of the Institutes of Justinian. It is believed by the best modern scholars that Gaius was the first original tractate of the kind, not being compiled from former publications. The language of Gaius is clear, terse, and technical,—evidently written by a master of law and a master of the Latin tongue. The Institutes were unquestionably practical. There is no attempt at criticism or philosophical discussion: the disciple of Sabinus is content to teach law as he finds it. Its arrangement is solid and logical, and Justinian follows it with an almost servile imitation.

The best editions of Gaius are Goeschen's 2d ed., Berlin, 1824, in which the text was again collated by Bluhme, and the 3d ed. of Goeschen, Berlin, 1842, edited by Lachmann from a critical revision by Goeschen which had been interrupted by his death. Gneist's edition (1857) is a recension of all the German editions prior to that date. In France, Gaius attracted equal attention, and we have three editions and translations: Boulet, Paris, 1827; Domenget, 1848; and Pellat, 1844.

In 1859, Francesco Lisi, a learned Italian scholar, published, at Bologna, a new edition of the first book of Gaius, with an Italian translation en regard. The edition is accompanied and enriched by many valuable notes, printed in both Latin and Italian.

The reader who may wish to pursue his Gaiian studies should consult the list of some thirty-odd treatises and commentaries mentioned in Mackeldey's Lehrbuch des Röm. Rechts, p. 47, note (b), 13th ed., Wien, 1851; Huschke, Essay Zur Kritik und Interp. von Gaius Inst., Breslau, 1830; Haubold's Inst. Juris Rom. Prev. Line., pp. 151, 152, 505, 506, Lipsitz, 1828; Boecking's Gaius, Preface, pp. 11–18, Lips., 1845; Lisi's Gaius, Preface, pp. x. xi., Bologna, 1859.

The following treatises on Gaius are noted by Vangerow, as of peculiar value: Schrader, under the title "was gewinnt die römische Rechtsgeschichte durch Gai. Institut." Heidel. 1823; Haubold, quantum fructum cepit Rom. juris. e Gaii. inst.; Werke, 1–665; Göschel's ed. of Gaius, giving the history of the discovery and its value; Gans, Scholien zu Gaius, Berlin, 1821; Dupont, disquisitiones, etc., 1822; Brockdorff, Comment, etc., 1824; Heffter, Comment. 1827; Assen, adnotation, etc., 1826; Unterholzner, Conject., etc., 1823; Scheurl, Beiträge, etc.; Puchta, Comm. 1837; Pöschman, Studion, 1854, 1860; Huschke, revised ed. 1861. See a valuable essay in Holzendorff's Rechtslexicon (1870), I. 97, 100. See, also, Abdy and Walker's translation of Gaius, published in 1876, and Foote's translation and commentary, published in 1871.

III. JUSTINIAN'S INSTITUTES are an abridgment of the Code and Digest, composed by order of that emperor and under his guidance, with an intention to give a summary knowledge of the law to those persons not versed in it, and particularly to students. Inst. Proem. § 3.

The lawyers employed to compile it were Tribonian, Theophilus, and Dorotheus. The work was first published on the 21st of November, 533, and received the sanction of statute law by order of the emperor. They are divided into four books: each book is divided into titles, and each title into separate paragraphs or sections, preceded by an introductory part. The first part is called principium, because it is the commencement of the title; those which follow are numbered, and called paragraphs. The work treats of the rights of persons, of things, and of actions. The first book treats of persons; the second, third, and the first five titles of the fourth book, of things; and the remainder of the fourth book, of actions. The method of citing the Institutes should be understood, and is now commonly by giving the number of the book, title, and section, thus: Inst. I. 2. 5.—thereby indicating book I. title 2, section 5. Where it is intended to indicate the first paragraph, or principium, thus: Inst. B. I. 2. pr. Frequently the citation is simply I. or J. I. 2. 5. A second mode of citation is thus: § 5, Inst. or I. I. 2.—meaning book I, title 2, paragraph 5. A third method of citation, and one in universal use with the older jurists, was by giving the name of the title and the first words of the paragraph referred to, thus: § senatusconsultum est I de iure nat. gen. et civil.—which means, as before, Inst. B. I. tit. 2, § 5. See 1 Colquhoun, s. 61.

The first printed edition of the Institutes is that of Schoyffer, fol., 1488. The last critical German edition is that of Schrader, 4to, Berlin, 1832. This work of Schrader is the most learned and most elaborate commentary on the text of Justinian in any language, and was intended to form a part of the Berlin Corpus Juris; but nothing further has been yet published. It is impossible in this brief article to name all the commentaries on these Institutes, which in all ages have commanded the study and admiration of jurists. More than one hundred and fifty years ago one Homberg printed a tract De Multitudine nimia Commentatorum in Institutiones Juris. But we must refer the reader to the best recent French and English editions. Ortolan's Institutes de l'Empereur Justinien avec le texte, la traduction en regard, et les explications sous chaque paragraphe, Paris, 8 vols. 8vo, sixth edition. This is, by common consent of scholars, regarded as the best historical edition of the Institutes ever published. Du Caurroy's Institutes de Justinien traduites et expliquées par A. M. Du Caurroy, Paris, 1851, 8th ed. 2 vols. 8vo. The Institutes of Justinian: with English Introduction, Translation, and Notes, by Thomas Collet Sandars, M. A., London, 1853, 8vo; 2d ed. 1860. This work has been prepared expressly for beginners, and is founded mainly upon Ortolan, with a liberal use of LaGrange, Du Caurroy, Warnkœnig, and Puchta, as well as Harris and Cooper. The English edition of Harris, and the American one of Cooper, have ceased to attract attention.

The most authoritative German treatises on the Pandects are the following: Windscheid, Dr. B., 3d ed., Dusseldorf, 1863; 2 vols.; Vangerow, Dr. K. A., 7th ed., Marburg, 1863; Brinz, Dr. A. B., 2d ed., Erlangen, 1879; Ihering, Dr. R., Jena, 1881. Incomparably the most philosophical exposition of the Roman system of jurisprudence is Savigny's Gesch. des röm. Rechts, coupled with his System des röm. Rechts, the latter published in Berlin in 1840. Of both, French translations have been published by Guenoux. See also Sanders' Justinian, with an introduction by William G. Hammond (1876), and Abdy and Walker's translation of the Institutes (1876).

IV. THEOPHILUS' INSTITUTES. A paraphrase of Justinian, made, it is believed, soon after A. D. 533.

It is generally supposed that in A. D. 534, 535, and 536, Theophilus read his commentary in Greek to his pupils in the law school of Constantinople. He is conjectured to have died some time in A. D. 536. This paraphrase maintained itself as a manual of law until the eighth or tenth century. This text was used in the time of Hexabiblos of Harmenipulus, the last of the Greek jurists. It is also conjectured that Theophilus was not the editor of his own paraphrase, but that it was drawn up by some of his pupils after his explanations and lectures, inasmuch as it contains certain barbarous phrases, and the texts of the manuscripts vary greatly from each other.

It has, however, always been somewhat in use, and jurists consider that its study aids the text of the Institutes; and Cujas and Hugo have both praised it. The first edition was that of Zuichem, fol., Basle, 1531; the best edition is that of Reitz, 2 vols. 4to, 1751, Haag. There is a German translation by Wüsterman, 1823, 2 vols. 8vo; and a French translation by Mons. Illegier, Paris, 1847, 8vo, whose edition is prefaced by a learned and valuable introduction and dissertation. Consult Moreuil, Hist. Du Droit Byzant., Paris, 1843; Smith, Dict. Biog. London, 1849, 3 vols. 8vo; 1 Kent 533; Profession d'Avocat tom. ii. n. 536, page 95; Introd. à l'Etude du Droit Romain, p. 124; Dict. de Jurisp.; Merlin, Répert.; Encyclopédie de l'Allemagne.

INSTITUTION (Lat. instituere, to form, to establish).

In Civil Law. The appointment of an heir; the act by which a testator nominates one or more persons to succeed him in all his rights active and passive. Halifax, Anal. 39; Pothier, Tr. des Donations testamentaires, c. 2, s. 1, § 1; La. Civ. Code, 1598; Dig. 28. 5; 1, 1; 28. 6. 1, 2, § 4.

In Ecclesiastical Law. To become a parson or vicar, four things are necessary, viz.: holy orders, presentation, institution, induction. Institution is a kind of investiture of the spiritual part of the benefice; for by institution the care of the souls of the parish is committed to the charge of the clerk,—previous to which the oath against simony and of allegiance and supremacy are to be taken. By institution the benefice is full: so that there can be no fresh presentation (except the patron be the king), and the clerk may enter on parsonage-house and glebe and take the tithes; but he cannot grant or let them, or bring an action for them, till induction. See 1 Bla. Com. 389; 1 Burn, Eccles. Law 169.

Of Education. A gymnastic association, where regular gymnastic exercises are taught, and a teacher in physical culture is constantly employed, is an "institution of education." 117 Ky. 958, 80 S. W. 201, 25 R. 2105.

In Political Law. A law, rite, or ceremony enjoined by authority as a permanent rule of conduct or of government: as, the Institutions of Lycurgus. Webster, Dict. An organized society, established either by law or the authority of individuals, for promoting any object, public or social. A private school or college may, by courtesy, be called an institution; but in legal parlance it implies foundation by law, by enactment or prescription; one may open and keep a private school, but cannot properly be said to institute it; 50 N. W. Rep. (Wis.) 1108.

In Practice. The commencement of an action: as, A B has instituted a suit against C D to recover damages for trespass.

INSTRUCTIONS. In Common Law. Orders given by a principal to his agent in relation to the business of his agency.

The agent is bound to obey the instructions he has received; and when he neglects so to do he is responsible for the consequences, unless he is justified by matter of necessity; 4 Binn. 361; 1 Liverm. Ag. 368. See AGENT.

In Practice. The statement of a cause of action given by a client to his attorney, and which, where such is the practice, are sent to his pleader to put into legal form of a declaration. Warren, Law Stud. 284.

Instructions to counsel are their indemnity for any aspersions they may make on the opposite party; but attorneys who have a just regard to their own reputation will be cautious, even under instructions, not to make any unnecessary attack upon a party or witness. For such unjustifiable conduct the counsel will be held responsible. Eunom. Dial. 2, § 43, p. 132. For a form of instructions, see 3 Chitty, Pr. 117, 120, n.

Also the written or oral address of the presiding judge, in jury trials, delivered usually at the close of the arguments of counsel to the jury, informing them of the law applicable to the cause at trial, and their duties thereunder. A. & E. Encyclo.

An omission to give instructions is not assignable as error where no request was made therefor in the court below; 112 N. C. 851; 101 id. 153, 188; 26 Tex. App. 706; 69 Tex. 278; 71 id. 156; 75 La. 185; 72 Wis. 234; 77 id. 115; 76 Ga. 3; 123 Pa. 53; 37 Minn. 493; 97 Cal. 459; 138 N. Y. 595; and errors or inaccuracies in charging the jury cannot be considered on appeal unless duly excepted to on the trial; 37 Minn. 351; 130 U. S. 896; 66 Miss. 310; 74 La. 433; 50 Ark. 348; 25 Neb. 75; 101 N. C. 223; a refusal to give instructions not excepted to cannot be complained of on appeal; 126 Ill. 282. Where a charge correctly states the law of the case, a judgment will not be reversed because the charge was abstract; 97 Ala. 47; 111 Mo. 676; but an instruction is wrong which states hypothetically facts as to which there is no evidence; 88 Ga. 784; 45 La. Ann. 48; 48 Mo. App. 263. It is not error to recall a jury and charge them again at their request; 31 Tex. Cr. R. 804. The improper admission of evidence is cured by an instruction not to consider the evidence so admitted; 97 N. C. 223; 98 id. 566; 77 Iowa 54; 97 Mo. 63; 88 Ala. 287. Refusal to give correct instructions is not error if the court has already given them on the same point; 76 La. 105; 76 Cal. 521; 76 Ga. 452; 126 Ill. 408; 115 Ind. 894; 84 Va. 498; or where given in different language; 144 U. S. 408; 143 id. 60; 185 id. 554; 132 id. 172.

The principles governing the subject of peremptory instructions were clearly stated by Harlan, J., in the recent case of Travelers' Ins. Co. v. Randolph, 78 Fed. Rep. 754:

"It is well settled that if, at the close of the plaintiff's evidence, the court refuses to give a peremptory instruction for the defendant, such refusal cannot be assigned for error if the defendant does not stand upon the case made by the plaintiff, but introduces evidence in support of his defence" (citing 103 U. S. 700; 132 id. 537, 590; 144 U. S. 308, 309; 155 U. S. 610, 612; 161 U. S. 91, 96). "But the failure of the defendant, at the close of the plaintiff's evidence, to ask a peremptory instruction will not, of itself, preclude such a motion at the close of the whole evidence." 12, 79.

"A mere scintilla of evidence in favor of one party does not entitle him of right to go to the jury (citing 14 Wall. 443, 448). Nor can it "be withdrawn from the consideration of the jury simply because, in the judgment of the court, there is a preponderance of evidence in favor of the party asking a peremptory instruction. If the facts are entirely undisputed or uncontradicted, or if, upon any issue dependent upon facts, there is no evidence whatever in favor of one party, or what is the same thing, if the evidence is so slight as to justify the court in regarding the proof as substantially all one way, then the court may direct a verdict according to its view of the law arising upon such a case. If a verdict is rendered contrary to the evidence, the remedy of the losing party is a motion for a new trial." 12, 79.

The conclusions were thus stated: "That there must be something more than a scintilla of evidence supporting the case of the party upon whom the burden of proof rests, to require the submission of the case to the jury; that where there is a real conflict of evidence on a question of fact, whatever may be the opinion of the judge who tries the case as to the value of that evidence, he must leave the consideration of it for the decision of the jury; that where there are material and substantial facts which, if credited by the jury, would in law justify a verdict in favor of one party, it is not error for the trial judge to refuse a peremptory instruction to the jury; that it is not a 'proper standard to settle for a peremptory instruction that the court, after weighing the evidence in the case, would, upon motion for a new trial, set aside the verdict; and that the court may, and often should, set aside a verdict, when clearly against the weight of the evidence, where it would not be justified in directing a verdict'; that, upon reason and authority, there is a difference between the legal discretion of the court to set aside a verdict as against the weight of the evidence, and that obligation which the court has to withdraw a case from the jury, or direct a verdict for insufficiency of evidence"; and that "in the latter case it must be so insufficient in fact as to be insufficient in law." 12, 79 (citing 20 C. C. 590, 74 Fed. Rep. 493).

In French Law. The means used and formality employed to prepare a case for trial. It is generally applied to criminal cases, and is then called criminal instruction; it is then defined the acts and proceedings which tend to prove positively a crime or delict, in order to inflict on the guilty person the punishment which he deserves. See VERBAL ADMONITIONS.

INSTRUMENT. A document or writing which gives formal expression to a legal act or agreement, for the purpose of creating, securing, modifying, or terminating a right; a writing executed and delivered as the evidence of an act or agreement.

The writing which contains some agreement, and is so called because it has been prepared as a memorial of what has taken place or been agreed upon. It includes bills, bonds, conveyances, leases, mortgages, promissory notes, and wills, but scarcely accounts, ordinary letters or memoranda. The agreement and the instrument in which it is contained are very different things,—the latter being only evidence of the existence of the former. The instrument or form of the contract may be valid, but a contract itself may be void on account of fraud. See Ayliffe, Parerg. 805; Dun. Adm. Pr. 220. A forthcoming bond is an "instrument for the payment of money." 11 Wis. 72. A bank check payable in confederate currency was held not "an instrument payable in money" under the Alabama Code in relation to commercial paper; 42 Ala. 108.

A statute requiring "any instrument of writing" sued on to be filed, does not apply to a contract signed by both parties and deposited with a third person for safe keeping, it applies only to obligations executed only by the party sued; 55 Mo. 446.

Transferable by Delivery Merely. "Instruments transferable by delivery merely" mean bills of exchange or negotiable paper which the holder takes free of defenses, good between the original parties. 133 Ky. 816, 119 S. W. 188.

INSTRUMENT OF SASINE. An instrument in Scotland by which the delivery of "sasine" (i. e. seisin) is attested. Moz. & W.

INSTRUMENTA (Lat.). That kind of evidence which consists of writings not under seal: as, court-rolls, accounts, and the like. 3 Co. Litt., Thomas ed. 497.

INSTRUMENTALITY. See DANGEROUS INSTRUMENTALITY.

INSUBORDINATION. Continued

disobedience on the part of a pupil in school constitutes "insubordination." 129 Ky. 35, 110 S. W. 346. See DISOBEDIENCE.

INSUFFICIENCY. In Chancery Practice. After filing of defendant's answer, the plaintiff has six weeks in which to file exceptions to it for insufficiency, which is the fault of not replying specifically to specific charges in the bill. Smith, Ch. Pr. 344; Miff. Eq. Pl. 376, note. Sanders, Ord. in Ch., Index; Beach, Mod. Eq. Pr. 413.

Under the Judicature Act, 1875, order xxi., rules 6, 9, 10, interrogatories are to be answered by affidavit, and if the party interrogated answers insufficiently, the party interrogating may apply to the court for an order requiring him to answer further. Moz. & W.

INSULA (Lat. island). A house not connected with other houses, but separated by a surrounding space of ground. Calvinius, Lex.

INSUPER. Moreover; over and above. An old exchequer term, applied to a charge made upon a person in his account. Blount.

INSURABLE INTEREST. Such an interest in a subject of insurance as will entitle the person possessing it to obtain insurance.

It is essential to the contract of insurance, as distinguished from a wager, that the assured should have a legally recognizable interest in the insured subject, the pecuniary value of which may be appreciated and computed or valued. A recent examination of the subject, as connected with life insurance, results in the conclusion from the authorities, that at common law that contract was not one of indemnity, and wagering policies were not unlawful, and therefore that logically, in such policies, an insurable interest should not be required, but that the American courts adopted what has been termed a rule of American common law that all wagers were void on grounds of public policy and, therefore, that there must be an insurable interest; 35 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 65. This rule, it was said, obtains in all the states except New Jersey and Rhode Island; 24 N. J. L. 576; 9 R. I. 354; and see 11 id. 439. The case of Godsall v. Boldero, 9 East 72, was so generally cited and relied on in the American cases that it is not easy to estimate the influence of that case before it was overruled by Dalbly v. I. & L. L. Assurance Company, 15 C. B. 365. It is of special interest to note that the New Jersey case in which the court expressly refused to follow Godsall v. Boldero, was decided about the time of the case which overruled it, but before it was reported in the United States. See also 2 Sm. L. Cas., 9th Am. ed. 1530-64, where both the English cases mentioned are reported, and the authorities in both countries are collected, the conclusion of the American editors being, that as to fire, marine, and life insurance there must be some interest in the insurer. See also Biddle, Ins. § 184, where it is said that wagering policies were not void in England at common law. See WAGER.

Where the subject-matter is property, as in fire and marine insurance, the question whether there is an insurable interest is generally free from difficulty and the rule established by the decisions is comparatively simple. It is not requisite that the insured party should have an absolute property in the insured subject, or that the subject or interest should be one that can be exclusively possessed or be transferable by delivery or assignment. Insurable interest involves neither legal nor equitable title; 1 Pet. 121; 12 La. 287; 1 Sprague 565. The subject or interest must, however, be such that it may be destroyed, lost, damaged, diminished, or intercepted by the risks insured against. The interests usually insured are those of the owner in any species of property, of mortgagor, mortgagee, holder of bottomry or respondentia bond, of an agent, consignee, lessee, factor, carrier, bailee, or party having a lien or entitled to a rent or income, or being liable to a loss depending upon certain conditions or contingencies, or having the certainty or probability of a profit or pecuniary benefit depending on the insured subject; 1 Phill. Ins. c. 3; 11 E. L. & Eq. 2; 28 id. 312; 84 id. 116; 48 id. 292; 11 Pa. 429; 6 Gray 192; 2 Md. 111; 62 N. Y. 47, 54; 20 Am. Dec. 510; 63 Hun 82; 85 Ala. 607; 138 U. S. 387.

It was formerly held that the interest in property insured must exist when the insurance was effected, as well as the time of the loss; 3 Den. 301; 16 Or. 283; 38 Me. 414; Biddle, Ins. § 157. This is not now the rule; Arnold, Ins. 59; and in a case in which the insurance was upon a cargo, "on account of whom it may concern," the author just cited is approvingly quoted by Mr. Justice Swayne to the effect that, "it is now clearly established that an insurable interest, subsisting during the risk and at the time of loss, is sufficient, and the assured need not also allege or prove that he was interested at the time of effecting the policy," and he adds, "This is consistent with reason and justice, and is supported by analogies of the law in other cases." 98 U. S. 528.

It has been held that there is an insurable interest in an attaching creditor; 86 Me. 518; a purchaser in possession under a contract of sale; 63 Fed. Rep. 880; 5 Wash. 278; 21 N. Y. 378; 135 id. 298; 21 Can. S. C. R. 288; a person admitted as a partner, though the consideration was unpaid; 31 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 1100; a husband, in personal property in the name of his wife; id.; a commission merchant in goods consigned to him; 19 La. 364; persons liable by contract, statute, or common law for the safe keeping of property, as bailees; 5 Metc. 386; 36 N. Y. 655; for repair or manufacture; 14 Ala. 325; common carriers; 12 Barb. 585; railroad companies; 113 Mass. 77; warehousemen; 86 S. C. 213; a pipeline company in oil in its tanks; 145 Pa. 347; a sheriff in goods levied on; 26 N. Y. 117; 31 La. 464; one liable as indorser of a mortgage note; 107 Mass. 377; or a trustee liable for the safe-keeping of property; 5 Wall. 509; or who gives bond for its delivery; 13 B. Mon. 311; one in possession for life under a parol agreement to pay repairs, taxes, and insurance; 132 N. Y. 49; a carpenter or builder erecting or repairing a building, to be paid for on completion; 15 B. Mon. 411; a vendor of land before payment in full; 46 N. Y. 421; (but not one paid in full who has not conveyed; 2 N. S. W. L. R. 339); a lessor; 80 Ill. 532; a tenant; id.; or subtenant; 49 Miss. 80; (but not a tenant of glebe land after death of the lessor; 20 U. C. C. P. 170); a tenant by the curtesy; 50 Pa. 341; a simple contract creditor of the estate of a deceased person in lands of the latter, though subject to dower and homestead rights; 101 Ala. 522; a mechanic's lien holder; 12 La. 371; the successful bidder at an execution sale; 5 Sneed 139; the owner of lands, on buildings in process of erection; 71 Hun 369; the grantee of property conveyed in fraud of creditors; 84 Neb. 704; one holding property in trust; 132 N. Y. 133; or who has an equitable interest; 18 Vt. 305; a mortgagee, to the extent of his mortgage interest; 53 Me. 338; 1 Curt. C. C. 193; and a mortgagor, on his interest in the same building; 9 Wend. 405; 10 Pick. 40; but the interests are independent and insurance by the mortgagor cannot be claimed by the mortgagee; 20 Ohio 185; where the mortgagor insures and makes the loss payable to the mortgagee, as his interest may appear, the company is estopped to deny the insurable interest; 46 Wis. 23; a mortgagor who conveys subject to the mortgage, has an insurable interest in the real estate, being liable to the mortgagee for any deficiency; 67 N. W. Rep. (Neb.) 774. A partner may have an insurable interest in a building erected by the partnership on land of the other partner; 10 Cush. 37; and an agent in control may insure the property in his own name; 165 Pa. 65; a master of a ship, his right to prime on freight; 1 Sprague 565; or a half-owner of property in possession, may, if authorized by the other owners, insure all the property in his own name; 55 Ill. App. 275.

A partnership has been held to have no insurable interest in household furniture and wearing apparel of one of the partners; 94 Ga. 630; so also an administratrix in real estate of the intestate; 8 Abb. Pr. 261, note; a charterer, who advances on the personal credit of the owner, who must pay, without regard to the issue of the voyage; 16 Md. 190; a stockholder as an individual, in the property of the corporation; 20 Ohio 174. It was held that an interest in the profit to be derived by the insured from the adventure of laying an Atlantic cable was insurable; though the insured was a shareholder in the company and would derive his profits from dividends; L. R. 2 Exch. 139.

The insurable interest in life insurance rests upon a different basis from that on property. It has been said "that while in fire and marine insurance it is the interest and not the thing that is insured, in life insurance it is the thing and not the interest;" 35 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 79.

With regard to the nature and amount of interest necessary for a policy of life insurance, no definite general principle seems yet to have been established, though the classes of insurable interests have been increasing. Every person has an insurable interest in his own life; 94 U. S. 561; 120 Ill. 121; 98 Mass. 381; 108 Pa. 6; 1 Moo. & Rob. 481. It has been a much mooted question whether the beneficiary must have an interest. It has been held in many cases that a person may insure his own life and pay the premiums, for a beneficiary designated by him; 98 Mass. 381; 120 Ill. 12; 50 Mo. 44; 85 N. Y. 593; Biddle, Ins. § 194; and there are dicta to this effect, frequently referred to, of Sharswood, J., 26 Pa. 189, and Paxson, J., in 108 Pa. 6. To the contrary are, 104 Pa. 74; 122 id. 324; 21 Fed. Rep. 688; and see 40 Mich. 473, and a dictum in 94 U. S. 561. If the beneficiary pays the premiums, it is generally held that he must have an interest; 79 Tex. 638; 111 Ind. 578; 104 Pa. 74; 166 id. 617. See Biddle, Ins. § 194; 35 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 79-87, where the authorities are collected.

It was held that when the policy is caused by the assured to be issued to another, the effect is the same as if issued to the applicant and assigned to the other, and an insurable interest is not required; 64 Hun 350. A member of a beneficial association may change the beneficiary according to the rule and substitute a new one without regard to insurable interest; 22 Wash. L. Rep. 329; and where the policy was for the benefit of the insured unless he sustained a fatal accident, and in that case to a nephew, the latter contingency having happened, the nephew was not required to show an insurable interest; 68 Fed. Rep. 873.

The interest required to support an insurance on the life of another has been found by the courts difficult to define, and indeed as was said they "have left it very much undefined;" 9 R. L. 346. Many attempts to formulate a definition have been made, but they are similar mainly in their vagueness and generality. One of those most quoted was that of Chief Justice Shaw, in 6 Gray 396: "It must appear that the insured has some interest in the life of the cæstui que vie; that his temporal affairs, his just hopes and well-grounded expectations of support, of patronage, and advantages in life will be impaired so that the real purpose is not a wager, but to secure such advantage, supposed to depend on the life of another; such, we suppose, would be sufficient to prevent it from being regarded as a mere wager. . . . We cannot doubt that a parent has an interest in the life of a child, and, vice versa, a child in that of a parent, not merely on the ground of a provision of law that parents and grandparents are bound to support their lineal kindred when they may stand in need of relief, but upon considerations of strong morals and the force of natural affection between near kindred, operating often more efficaciously than those of positive law." The United States Supreme Court quoted this, with approval, in 94 U. S. 457, and in the opinion, Bradley, J., added some observations not more definite: "Precisely what interest is necessary in order to take a policy out of the category of a mere wager has been the subject of much discussion. In marine and fire insurance the difficulty is not so great, because there insurance is considered as strictly an indemnity. But in life insurance the loss can seldom be measured by pecuniary values. Still, an interest of some sort in the insured life must exist. A man cannot take out insurance on the life of a total stranger, nor on that of one who is not so connected with him as to make the continuance of the life a matter of some real interest to him. . . . Indeed, it may be said generally that any reasonable expectation of pecuniary benefit or advantage from the continued life of another creates an insurable interest in such life. . . . The essential thing is, that the policy shall be obtained in good faith, and not for the purpose of speculating upon the hazard of a life in which the insured has no interest." In the same court, later, Field, J., in 104 U. S. 775, says: "It may be stated generally, however, to be such an interest arising from the relations of the party obtaining the insurance, either as creditor or surety for the assured, or from the ties of blood or marriage to him, as will justify a reasonable expectation of advantage or benefit from the continuance of his life. It is not necessary that the expectation of advantage or benefit should be always capable of pecuniary estimation. . . . But in all cases there must be a reasonable ground, founded on the relations of the parties to each other, either pecuniary or of blood or affinity, to expect some benefit or advantage from the continuance of the life of the assured." The last quotation was much approved in 113 Pa. 438.

Notwithstanding the high authority both of these judges and the courts for which they were speaking, their utterances have been characterized as dicta, and such they are technically, but they undoubtedly fairly represent the views of those courts and all others who recognize that the interest may be based upon kinship and need not be pecuniary. Any effort to extract a more precise definition from the American cases is likely to end in the conclusion of another able judge, who said: "The question, what is such an interest in the life of another as will support a contract of insurance upon the life, is one to which a complete and satisfactory answer, resting upon sound principles, can hardly yet be said to have been given." Hoar, J., in 15 Gray 249.

In England a pecuniary interest is required and must be proved; 10 B. & C. 724; [1892] 1 Q. B. 864; with the possible exception that it is presumed in case of a wife who insures the life of her husband; Peake, Add. Cas. 70. The American courts take a less restricted view as shown by the definitions quoted, but no certain rule can be stated and the cases must be referred to, to ascertain whether any given relationship has been held sufficient.

A creditor may always insure the life of the debtor; 143 Pa. 238; 126 Ill. 887; 70 Md. 261; 101 N. C. 122; and in such case it has been termed a contract of indemnity, differing from other life insurance; Sharswood, J., in 4 Big. L. & Ac. Cas. 458; but this would be only as to the creditor; 15 C. B. 365; 79 Tex. 638; 144 U. S. 821; and it is said that there is no further interest after the payment of the debt; id.; 143 Pa. 238; 144 Ill. 223; but the question of interest is determined at the time of insurance and not of loss; see infra; Biddle, Ins. § 189. When the debtor pays the premiums, and assigns the policy as collateral security, the policy is in trust for him, and he is entitled to have it delivered up to him on payment; 2 Giff. 337; L. R. 5 Ch. App. 32; but it is otherwise if the creditor pays the premiums and there is no agreement for redemption; 2 De G. & J. 582; 113 Pa. 438.

In cases other than these of creditors it may be said, in the language of Mr. Justice Bradley, that any reasonable expectation of pecuniary benefit or advantage from the continued life of another creates an insurable interest in such life; 94 U. S. 457; s. c. 16 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 892, n.; 10 Cush. 244; 22 Pa. 65; 122 id. 324; 23 Conn. 244; 22 Barb. 9; 28 Mo. 383; 28 E. L. & Eq. 312; 92 Mich. 584.

It has been held that there was an insurable interest in a tenant, in the life of the landlord who had a life estate; 108 Pa. 6; or of one partner in the life of another; 20 N. Y. 32; whose interest was not fully paid for; 108 U. S. 498; 23 Conn. 244; 24 N. J. L. 576.

When an adequate interest exists at the time of the insurance, it is immaterial if there occur before death a diminution or entire cessation of it; 16 Fed. Rep. 650; 32 Hun 306; 27 N. Y. 282; 94 U. S. 457; and see note by J. D. Brannan on the last case in 18 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 399. But see 16 Or. 283.

On the subject of relationship there is little but confusion. It is said to be only of importance as tending to give rise to a reasonable expectation of pecuniary benefit from the continuance of the life of the insured; May, Ins. § 107; Bliss, Ins. § 31; 122 Pa. 824; 35 La. Ann. 233; or when there is a legal claim on the insured for support or service; id.; 47 Mo. 419; 115 Pa. 446. The interest has been held to exist in the case of a wife in the life of her husband; 128 U. S. 195; Peake, Add. Cas. 70; 28 Mo. 383 (but see 47 id. 419); 46 N. Y. 674; 128 U. S. 195 (and see criticism of this case in 25 Am. L. Rev. 185 and 35 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 171); and the husband in the life of the wife; 41 Ga. 338; 57 Vt. 496; the marriage gives an interest; 115 Pa. 446; 2 Dill. 166; and it has been held that before marriage a feme sole has an interest in the life of her betrothed; 52 Mo. 213; and so, semble, in Pennsylvania; 118 Pa. 438. As to other relations, it has been held that a son has an interest (on different grounds) in the life of his father; 81 Pa. 154; 80 Ill. 35; but not merely as son; id.; 89 Ind. 572; (contra, 50 Hun 50); a father, in that of a minor son; 45 Me. 104; or an adult son; 81 Pa. 154; 128 U. S. 195; 6 Gray 396; 15 Hun 74; (contra, in England, 1 Ch. D. 419); and the interest exists when relationship is by adoption; 76 Ga. 272; as where the relation of father is assumed; 161 Pa. 9; but a stepson has no interest in the life of his stepfather; 122 Pa. 423; nor a son-in-law in the life of the mother-in-law; 22 W. N. C. Pa. 407. A grandmother has an interest in the life of a grandchild; 155 Pa. 295; an old woman who lived with her daughter and the father-in-law of the latter, who had promised to keep her for life, had an interest in his life; 16 Ins. L. J. 682. There is much difference of opinion as to brother and sister, but it is said that the relationship, without more, does not give an interest; Biddle, Ins. § 193; 39 Conn. 100; contra, 94 U. S. 561; however, it has been held that a policy will stand if there is dependence, or indebtedness; 12 Mass. 115; 16 W. N. C. Pa. 188; see 73 N. Y. 480; [1892] 1 Q. B. 864; the last being the case of a stepfather. No interest exists in case of uncle or aunt and nephew or niece; 166 Pa. 617; 66 Mo. 63; but an aunt who stands in loco parentis to a nephew has an insurable interest in his life; 172 Pa. 111.

An insurance procured by a religious society, supported largely by voluntary contributions, on the life of one of its members, is void; 113 N. C. 244. In the absence of any insurable interest, the law will presume that the policy was taken out for the purpose of a wager or speculation; 122 Pa. 324; and wagering contracts in life insurance are not valid; 144 U. S. 621.

The amount of insurable interest is the value of the insured subject as agreed by the policy, or its market value, or the pecuniary loss to which the assured is liable by the risks insured against, though the insured subject—for example, life or health—has not a market value; 13 Barb. 206; 7 N. Y. 530; 24 N. H. 234; 2 Pars. Mar. Law, c. 2, sec. 2.

In insurance cases generally an interest must be averred and some proof thereof be made; Biddle, Ins. § 197, and cases cited; but on fire policies if the application or policy shows an interest, it is generally sufficient, prima facie; id.; and so it was held on a life policy; 89 Conn. 100; and the fact that the policy was made payable to plaintiff made a prima facie case; 26 Mo. App. 511. The facts showing interest are to be determined by the jury; 82 Ia. 421; 80 Ill. 37; 26 W. N. C. Pa. 569.

See, generally, articles by Erskine Hazard Dickson, 35 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 65, 161.

INSURANCE. A contract whereby, for an agreed premium, one party undertakes to compensate the other for loss on a specified subject by specified perils.

"An agreement by which one party, for a consideration (which is usually paid in money either in one sum or at different times during the continuance of the contract of the risk), promises to make a certain payment of money upon the destruction or injury of something in which the other party has an interest." 105 Mass. 149, 160.

An insurance in relation to property is a contract whereby the insurer becomes bound, for a definite consideration, to indemnify the insured against loss or damage, to a certain property named in the policy, by reason of certain perils to which it may be exposed. 29 Atl. Rep. (Del.) 1039.

"In fire insurance and marine insurance the thing insured is property; in life or accident insurance, it is the life or health of a person. In either case neither the time and amounts of payments by the assured, nor the modes of estimating or securing the payment of the sum to be paid by the insurer, affect the question whether the agreement between them is a contract of insurance. All that is requisite to constitute such a contract is the payment of the consideration by the one, and the promise of the other to pay the amount of the insurance upon the happening of injury to the subject by a contingency contemplated in the contract." 105 Mass. 160; 2 S. Dak. 824.

Any one qui juris and capable of contracting generally may be insured, but insurance has been held not to be a necessary for which an infant might contract and be held liable against his option on coming of age; 83 N. H. 345; 53 Mich. 238. In recent years, contracts of insurance by married women have been generally held valid, usually under statutes; 15 R. I. 573; 86 Ala. 424; 52 Ill. 53; 47 Mo. 419.

Any one otherwise capable of contracting may become an insurer, and formerly the business was largely conducted by partnerships, but, with the exception of risks taken at Lloyds (q. v.) and some other large partnerships, the business is now conducted, mainly, by insurance companies (q. v.), though, in England, quasi corporations organized under the Joint Stock Companies Acts insure under the authority of letters patent securing limited liability. See JOINT STOCK COMPANY.

The insurer is sometimes called the underwriter, and the insured, the assured. The agreed consideration is called the premium; the written contract, a policy; the events insured against, risks or perils; and the subject, right, or interest to be protected, the insurable interest. See these several titles. As to insured and assured, see 108 U. S. 504.

The policy is usually issued upon the application (q. v.) of the insured in writing, which contains the statement of facts entering into and forming a part of the contract. See REPRESENTATION; WARRANTY.

Whether facts concealed or misstated in an application are material is a question for the jury; 44 Pac. Rep. (Colo.) 756.

The happening of the event insured against and the consequent damage to the subject-matter, is termed the loss (q. v.).

Where the insurance is on property, an alienation will terminate the contract unless the insurance be transferred with the consent of the underwriter. See ASSIGNMENT. An alienation of part of the property or diminution of the interest of the insured will not, in the absence of an express condition, avoid the policy; 102 Pa.

568; 16 Wend. 885; 16 Fed. Rep. 630; 2 Pick. 849; 58 Mich. 306; 14 U. C. Q. B. 842; 27 id. 84; 18 U. C. C. P. 233; 35 Beav. 444; and the sale of a part does not avoid a policy forbidding merely "sale or transfer;" 10 W. Va. 507; 48 Ohio St. 533.

There is usually a clause, varying in exact terms, forbidding any change in title or possession, and, in such case, the sale of an undivided half interest is within its meaning and avoids the policy; 1 Mich. N. P. 113; but a distinction has been taken between a sale of an interest in property and a sale of the property, and the assignment by a new partner to his firm of his insured property as firm assets was not a forfeiture; 4 Biss. 511; 52 N. Y. 502. Clauses against alienation are conditions precedent; 125 N. Y. 82; 43 Ill. App. 475; and the question usually is whether there is a sale outright or by reason of something in the nature of a defeasance, either in law or by contract, the insured has not wholly parted with the property. As to such cases it is difficult, if not impossible, to lay down any general rule, and each case must be governed by the application of the general principles of the law of contracts and conditions to the particular form of the policy and the facts of the case. If there is, in fact, a total alienation, the opinion or motives of the parties in respect to it is not material; 22 Minn. 183. A conveyance upon a condition to be performed before title vests will not avoid; 20 Vt. 546; so where the owner of an equity of redemption sells with a stipulation for payment of the mortgage by the purchaser and is compelled to take back the title for non-performance; 12 Allen 354; or where, for other reasons, the sale is not carried out and there is a reconveyance before loss; 19 La. 28; but see 71 La. 532.

Policies of insurance also usually contain conditions for forfeiture in case of incumbrance without notice, or in case the property be "levied upon or taken into possession or custody," and such conditions are valid; 29 Atl. Rep. (Del.) 1039. A breach renders the policy void; id.; 82 Hun 380; and the question whether the execution of a mortgage increased the risk is immaterial; 39 N. E. Rep. (Ind.) 757; breach of any promissory warranty avoids the policy irrespective of its materiality; 44 Pac. Rep. (Cal.) 923; nor does it matter that the loss was not produced or contributed to by the breach; 1 N. Y. App. Div. 93. A judgment recovered in in rem is not within such condition; 39 W. Va. 689; but a confession of judgment is; 66 Pa. 227; 122 id. 128; and so was an agreement by one heir to pay the other heirs, in instalments, for property taken under a will; 108 id. 350. A technical seizure where the possession is unchanged is not an avoidance; 63 Hun 82; 80 Pa. 287; 5 Ont. App. 605. A provision for forfeiture for the levy of an execution relates to personality and not to land; 54 N. Y. 595; 54 Wis. 72.

Under these conditions, a breach as to part of the insured property, which is not destroyed or injured, may not avoid the policy as to another part unaffected by the breach. Thus it was held that a recovery, under a live-stock policy, for a cow killed would not be prevented by the existence of incumbrances, in violation of a covenant in the policy, where the property actually lost was not encumbered; 32 Neb. 750. Such contract is severable and any breach of the condition would avoid only such property as was covered by the incumbrance; 102 N. Y. 260; 11 Fed. Rep. 478; 46 U. C. Q. B. 834; 10 Ont. 236; 14 U. C. C. P. 549; 54 Ill. 164. The same principle applies to the defence that the property insured was sold and conveyed; if the contract is severable, a breach as to one part does not operate as a defence with respect to property not included; 33 Neb. 840.

In insurance on manufacturing establishments it is usual to stipulate for avoidance if operations should cease without the consent of the insurer, and such provision is valid and is violated though a watchman was employed and the risk not increased; 29 Atl. Rep. (Del.) 1039; and the same is true of all conditions which are warranties.

As to the distinction between representation and warranty and the law as to both, see those titles; and as to increase of risk, see RISKS AND PERILS.

Insurance on buildings or their contents is usually upon condition that if the former is suffered to be vacant or unoccupied, the policy will be void. In such case the forfeiture does not depend upon the insured's knowledge of the fact of vacancy; 161 Ill. 437; and a purchaser of the house and assignee of the policy is bound by the condition; 67 N. W. Rep. (Mich.) 987. Temporary absence of a tenant will not work a forfeiture; 92 Hun 223; 61 Ark. 108; nor will merely sleeping in the house occasionally and daily visits of the owner's wife to get provisions prevent forfeiture; 82 Md. 88; or visits twice a day by an employee; 16 Misc. Rep. 483. The insurer cannot establish a forfeiture without proving that the premises were unoccupied for any purpose; 2 Mo. App. Rep. 934.

Keeping on hand certain articles is usually prohibited, either specifically or as a class. The breach of a condition against keeping inflammable substances does not prevent recovery, when the use of the particular substance was a necessary and usual incident of the subject insured; 95 Ga. 604; as the use of gasoline, in a silver-plating business, one day's supply only being brought in at once; 170 Pa. 151; or keeping an inflammable substance for sale as was customary where there was a clause, written in ink on the policy, containing the words "merchandise such as is usually kept in a country store;" 44 Pac. Rep. (Cal.) 180; 91 Wis. 158; 35 Atl. Rep. (Vt.) 75; and where a typewritten rider stipulated for insurance on such articles as are usually kept in a painter's shop, it prevailed against a printed condition against keeping benzine on the premises; 35 Atl. Rep. (Vt.) 75.

As to hazardous and extra-hazardous risks, generally, see RISKS AND PERILS.

In order to promote the accurate adjustment of the loss, there is usually included in policies of insurance, on such property as a stock of merchandise, what is known as the "iron safe clause," which, in one form or another, provides that the books of the insured showing all business transactions, and the last inventory of the business, shall be kept in a fireproof safe at night and when the store is not opened for business. Such a clause is an express promissory warranty; 60 Ill. App. 39; 28 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 1027; 29 id. 218; 30 id. 384; 31 id. 321; but a substantial compliance only is required; 36 id. 591; (contra, 34 id. 35.) Keeping the books in the safe at night, does not mean from sunrise to sunset, but from the close of business of the day according to custom; 83 Fed. Rep. 19; and where according to custom the door was locked but customers could get in by knocking, and the clerk who was in the store writing up books was absent for a short time when the fire occurred, the store was "opened for business" and the policy was not void; 54 Ark. 376. But where the insurance was on a stock of liquor in a saloon, it did not excuse the violation of the iron safe clause that the same books were kept for a hotel and the saloon, the latter being opened night and day except Sunday, and the books being needed for constant settlements with the guests in the hotel; 61 Ark. 207; (distinguishing the last two cases.) The clause was held not to have been violated by failure to keep a blotter, containing the record of the sales of the day before, locked in the safe; 35 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 1060 (reversing 34 id. 462); 36 id. 590; and in the United States Circuit Court of Appeals, where a cash sales book covering twenty-one days before the sale was inadvertently left out of the safe and burned, and the books were kept in a primitive manner but showed purchases and credit sales, some cash sales, and an inventory, taken shortly before the fire, it was held that a finding of compliance with the policy was warranted; 68 Fed. Rep. 708; in another case it was said not to be an excuse for violation that through oversight the books were not put in the safe the night before the fire; 48 La. Ann. 238.

Where the bookkeeper, fearing the safe would not stand, took out the books to remove them to a safe place, and some of them fell and were burned, it was held that the covenant was not broken unless he was negligent; 25 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 720.

Where such a provision was inserted by fraud, a verdict for the plaintiff was not disturbed; 84 Ga. 759; and where the application showed in answer to inquiry that the books were kept in a dwelling at night a breach of the condition was not enforced; 13 S. W. Rep. (Ark.) 799.

The insurer must prove that the fire occurred at a time mentioned in the stipulation; 32 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 243.

The character of the safe is not warrantable; 18 So. Rep. (Miss.) 928; and it is sufficient if it be one of a kind ordinarily known as fireproof; 4 Tex. Civ. App. 82. See FIRE-PROOF.

The stipulation in such a clause, that a set of books should be kept, including a record of all business transactions, does not require a book known as a "cash book," or any particular system of bookkeeping; 94 Ga. 785. The lost inventory of the business, within this clause, means the lost inventory of the goods insured; 35 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 722. The clause is complied with, by an inventory made, and books kept from the date of the policy, but an invoice is not an inventory; 71 Miss. 608. The question whether there was reasonable time between the issue of the policy and the fire to make an inventory is for the jury unless the evidence is undisputed; 64 N. W. Rep. (Mich.) 15. Where the inventory was shown to the adjuster after the fire, and afterwards lost, there was a performance of the condition; 13 S. W. Rep. (Ark.) 1108. But where the books do not furnish the necessary data, to verify the accounts rendered, the policy is avoided; id.

Policies of insurance are frequently made available as collateral security to a mortgagee or other lienholder, by what is known as a mortgage clause, which see as to the rights of the several parties thereunder and the effect thereof upon the insurance and the right of action. See also MORTGAGE.

Conditions may be waived and the general principles of the law of waiver (q.v.) are to be applied, but it has been held that a waiver of the condition on one payment cannot be construed to cover violations on another which were not assented to; 29 Atl. Rep. (Del.) 1039.

Though a policy is the usual instrument by which insurance is effected, it is not necessary; 19 N. Y. 805; 25 Ind. 536; 26 La. Ann. 326; and it may be evidenced by a memorandum or note; 25 N. H. 169; 76 L. T. n. s. 228; 3 Grant, Pa. 123; or a letter; 1 Ohio N. P. 71; 14 L. C. Jur. 219. Where the correspondence was held sufficient to create a valid contract for a policy of fire insurance, it was held that, after the property had been destroyed by fire, the insured was entitled to a decree for the amount agreed to be insured, less premium; 94 U. S. 621. In the absence of a statute forbidding it, it may be verbal; 2 Dill. 26; 5 Pa. 339 (though this had been questioned; 4 Yeates 468); 73 Ill. 166; 84 U. S. 574; 21 S. E. Rep. (W. Va.) 854; 31 Ohio St. 633, overruling 16 Ohio 148; 63 Fed. Rep. 383; and when made without specifying any date for the insurance to take effect, commences immediately; id. A usage to show a parol contract was inadmissible; 14 Ins. L. J. (Mass.) 427. In Canada it was held that to recover at law, on a contract of insurance by a corporation, there must be a sealed policy, but on a parol contract the plaintiff may sue for a breach to deliver a policy, or proceed in equity; 16 U. C. Q. B. 477. The agreement to pay a premium is sufficient to support a verbal contract; 20 Fed. Rep. 766. See generally as to verbal contracts, Biddle, Ins. § 138, where the subject is treated historically.

An offer by a newspaper in each issue to pay a sum named to the heirs of one accidentally dying within twenty-four hours from the last issue, provided that the printed slip containing the offer should be found on the person of the deceased, is a contract of insurance; 15 Pa. Co. Ct. Rep. 468.

The usual practice is for the agent, upon the payment of the premium, to issue what is termed a binding receipt, which is, in effect, an executory contract to issue a policy if the risk is accepted by the company, and, meanwhile, the insurance is in force. Such contracts are valid and will be enforced at law and in equity; 9 N. Y. 280; 78 Cal. 216; 11 Paige 547; and a charter provision requiring "all policies or contracts" to be signed by certain officers has been held not to apply to such agreements; 73 Mo. 871; 20 Wall. 560; 19 N. Y. 305; 81 Ohio St. 633. See AGREEMENT FOR INSURANCE.

Where a loss occurs, the ascertainment of the amount due upon the policy is termed adjustment (q. v.). Notice of the loss must be given in accordance with the terms of the condition, which is precedent to recovery; 86 Ala. 558; L. R. 20 Ir. 98; 43 N. H. 621. This is distinct from proof of loss (q. v.), which must be also made as stipulated, or, in default of express provision, in a reasonable time; 128 Pa. 392. See LOSS.

Other insurance may be taken on the same property without restriction unless there be such in the contract; 70 Md. 400; 14 Q. L. R. 298; 9 R. I. 346; and no notice is required unless so stipulated; 2 Wash. C. C. 186; but when the insurance is on property only one indemnity can be collected, and there is a right of contribution among insurers; 18 Ill. 553; 146 Pa. 561; but it is usual to stipulate that each insurer, if there are more than one, shall be liable only pro rata; 9 Fed. Rep. 818. As to excessive insurance on the same property, see DOUBLE INSURANCE.

It is usual in policies to have a time limit requiring an action to be brought within a designated period of the loss. Such condition is precedent to a recovery; 87 Ia. 338; 14 L. C. Jur. 256; and will apply in a forum other than that of the domicile of the insurer; 7 Gray 61. In some courts the time of the limitation is held to be computed from the date of the event which causes the loss; 91 Ill. 92; 47 Fed. Rep. 563; 61 Conn. 17; 19 Nov. Scot. Rep. 372; 18 Ont. 355; in others, from the time the loss was payable; 39 N. Y. 45; 132 Id. 334; 83 Cal. 473; 81 Ia. 135; 17 Fed. Rep. 588.

Efforts have been made both by contract and by statute to limit the right of suit on a policy to a particular jurisdiction; such provisions in a policy or by law have been held illegal; 6 Gray 174, 185, 596; 81 Mo. 518; May, Ins. § 490. Statutes which attempt thus to limit the jurisdiction are strictly construed, and as they generally provide that, after a loss, the directors shall meet and adjust the loss, and if it is not paid in a given time, suit may be brought in a particular court, the limitation is in many states confined to the exact case mentioned, and it is only where the amount has been so determined that it takes effect; 25 N. H. 22; 59 Me. 419; 23 Wis. 516; 4 Metc. 212; 7 Ind. 25; but in other cases the limitation has been enforced without reference to such previous ascertainment of the loss; 18 Ohio St. 455; 6 Id. 599; 17 Vt. 389. See May, Ins. § 491.

So, with respect to the effort to provide in the policy that the law of a certain state should determine its construction, where life policies have been issued in a state other than the same state of the company, it has been held that they are governed by statutory provisions in the state of the insured, although the policies stipulated that the contract was to be governed by the law of the same state. See LEX LOCI.

As to the rights and remedies of and against insurance companies in countries or states other than those of their domicile, and the effect of non-compliance with statutes regulating the manner of doing business, see FOREIGN CORPORATIONS.

It has been held that a provision that where there are several underwriters each is liable pro rata, the assured shall not sue more than one of the underwriters at one time, and that a final decision in any action thus brought shall be decisive of the claim of the assured against each of the underwriters, who agree to abide the event of the suit, is not void as against public policy, but valid as tending to prevent a multiplicity of suits; and in an action to which all the underwriters were made parties defendant, a plea that it was brought in violation of the agreement was sustained; 6 N. Y. App. Div. 540. And under such condition timely service on one of the defendants is sufficient to prevent the running of the statute as against all the underwriters; id.

An insurer is entitled to subrogation (q. v.) in cases where such right would attach under the general principles applying to that subject; as, when payment is made for loss or damage to goods in transit, there is a subrogation to the rights of the owner against the carrier; 81 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 560; 63 Fed. Rep. 84; 165 Pa. 428; 80 Minn. 382. And, on payment by the insurer of a loss which he was not legally bound to pay, he has a right of action against one through whose negligence the property was destroyed; 80 Ark. 325; he becomes entitled pro tanto, and should join the owner as plaintiff in an action for negligent burning; 66 N. W. Rep. (Wis.) 1144. So, an insurer of title who paid off liens prior to a mortgage, as to which the mortgagee was indemnified by bond of the mortgagor, was subrogated to the right of action of the latter on the bond; 87 N. W. Rep. (Minn.) 548.

In a recent English case it was held that, since a policy of fire insurance is a contract of indemnity, the insurer is entitled to recover from the insured not merely the value of any benefit received by him by way of compensation from other sources in excess of his actual loss, but also the full value of any rights or remedies of the insured against third parties which have been renounced by him, and to which, but for that renunciation, the insurer would have a right to be subrogated; [1896] 2 Q. B. 377.

As to subrogation in insurance cases, see 54 Alb. L. J. 109 (credited to Sol. J.); 29 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 42; 18 Id. 787.

Expected profits may be insured, as crops, against hail and frost or other risks, even before they are sown, but the profits must be insured as such; 3 N. & M. 819; 2 East 544; 5 Metc. 391; 2 Johns. Cas. 36; 1 Sandf. 551; 2 Rob. La. 131; or the future profits of one to whom the insured has advanced money to pursue an enterprise; 82 Conn. 244; 10 Cush. 382; 2 E. D. Sm. 168; or a portion of the cargo of a ship expected to arrive, even if the insured has no property in such cargo, but has only purchased, for a specified sum, the right to take such goods for a further specified sum; 16 Pick. 397; but even if the insured has an ownership in the property, if he becomes insolvent before the arrival of the cargo and the goods are intercepted by the vendor, by right of stoppage in transitu, there can be no recovery on the policy; 10 B. & C. 99.

As to reinsurance, see that title.

See, generally, Beach; Biddle; May; Richards; Wood, Insurance; Finch, Dig. 1889-96; Sansum, Dig. 1877.

The several forms of insurance contracts are classified mainly with reference to the character of the perils insured against. See infra.

A contract by which one party, in consideration of a premium, engages to indemnify another against a contingent loss, by making him a payment in compensation if, or when, the event shall happen by which the loss is to accrue. Holland, Jurispr. 12th ed., 308.

See CONCURRENT INSURANCE; EMPLOYERS' LIABILITY INSURANCE.

Accident Insurance. That form of insurance which provides for specified payments in case of an accident resulting in bodily injury or death, as distinguished from casualty insurance, which is a term applied to insurance against loss or damage to property occasioned by accident. 155 Mass. 404. A foreign corporation, although an accident insurance company, has been held authorized to issue "horse or vehicle policies," "elevator policies," "general liability policies," and "outside liability policies;" id.

Accident insurance is intended to furnish indemnity against accidents and death caused by accidental means, and the language of the policy must be construed with reference to that proposition. In case of doubt or uncertainty the construction should be liberal in favor of the insured; 138 Ill. 556, reversing 85 Ill. App. 17.

A form of insurance common in England is against accident caused by vehicles. Under such a policy where the amount of liability was limited to £250 in respect of any one accident and £1,500 in any one year, where forty persons were injured by the overturning of one vehicle, it was held that the injury caused to each person was a separate accident; 60 L. J. R. N. S. 260. An insurance by the owner of a vehicle against damage suffered by him for injuries caused by the vehicle to passengers is termed a third party risk; 29 Scot. L. Rep. 898.

The usual language of such policies insures against death through external, violent, and accidental means. This has been held to cover death from shock and physical strain resulting from being run away with in a covered carriage, where there was no mark of physical injury nor contact with any physical object; 80 Me. 251; and see [1896] 2 Q. B. 248; suicide by an insane man; 120 U. S. 527; death from drowning; 5 H. & N. 211; s. c., on appeal, 6 Id. 839; falling into the water in a fit; 22 L. T. N. S. 820; 6 Q. B. Div. 42; death from inhaling illuminating gas; 112 N. Y. 473; 59 Ill. App. 227; 144 Pa. 78; 84 Va. 52; by taking poison; 133 Ill. 556; or an overdose of medicine; 44 Hun 599; 85 N. Y. 319; 105 Ind. 212; death caused by a piece of beef-steak passing into the windpipe while eating; 94 Ky. 547; death from blood-poisoning, caused by the bite of a mosquito (although poison was expressly excepted); 40 S. W. Rep. (Ky.) 909; falling into the water as the result of a wound; 47 N. Y. 62; falling on a railroad track in a fit and being run over; 7 Q. B. Div. 216; being struck by the handle of a pitchfork while making hay and having peritonitis as a result of it; 69 Pa. 43; spraining the back while lifting a heavy weight; 1 F. & F. 505; being attacked and killed by a highwayman; 99 Ky. 300; 2 Bigelow, L. & Acc. Cas. 738; accidental shooting by a deputy sheriff who did not know at whom he was shooting and did not intend to kill the assured (there being an exception of death from design either of the insured or another person); 85 Mich. 545; hernia resulting from an accidental fall (although the policy excluded hernia); 17 C. B. N. S. 122; rupture of a blood-vessel sustained while exercising with Indian clubs; 8 Biss. 382; falling from the cars while walking in the sleep; 58 Wis. 13.

It has been strongly contended that such cases as those enumerated were not within the ordinary accident policy because there was no extraordinary injury according to the ordinary meaning of the term, but, in reply to this in a leading case of drowning, the court said: "That argument if carried to its extreme length would apply to every case where death was immediate;" 6 H. & N. 839; and in a case of death from the inhalation of gas, the court said: "We think it a sufficient answer that the gas in the atmosphere as an extraordinary cause was a violent agency in the sense that it worked on the intestate so as to cause his death; that death is the result of accident or is unnatural, imports the extraordinary and violent agency of the cause;" 112 N. Y. 473. The view which these courts considered untenable was, however, taken by the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania on a policy exactly similar. The court said: "The object of the company is to insure bodily injuries produced in a certain manner specified, that is, caused by external, violent, and accidental means; not injuries caused by any one of these means, but by all of them combined." 103 Pa. 390; but this language seems to be a dictum, because there was a condition in the policy excepting death or injury caused by the taking of poison, and the point of the case was that an involuntary taking of poison by mistake was within the exception; but in a New York case of death from inhaling gas there was also a proviso excepting death caused by inhaling gas, and the court construed it "to mean a voluntary and intelligent act by the assured and not an involuntary and unconscious act;" 113 N. Y. 473. This case and the Pennsylvania case are therefore in direct opposition on the construction of the condition, and the former was decided after consideration of and with express dissent from the latter.

An exception that if the insured should die by his own hand, sane or insane, the policy should be void, "covers all conscious acts of the insured by which death by his own hand is compassed, whether he was at the time sane or insane, if the act was done for the purpose of self destruction, it matters not that the insured had no conception of the wrong involved in its performance;" 65 Mich. 199. In this case it was held that whether a fall six weeks before the insured shot himself was the cause of the killing was too conjectural to be submitted to the jury as a direct cause of the suicide. See CAUSA PROXIMA.

It has been held that death was not the result of accident within the meaning of the policy where it was occasioned by epilepsy; 31 Fed. Rep. 322; sunstroke; 3 El. & El. 478; rupture caused by jumping from a train where nothing unforeseen happened from the time the insured left the platform to the time he alighted on the ground; 94 Conn. 574; 131 U. S. 100.

Where the insured was assassinated, there could be no recovery under a policy which excepted death or injury inflicted by design of himself or another; 127 U. S. 661; 87 Ky. 300; but where the death was the result of an accident, the fact that the negligence of the assured may have contributed to it is no defence in the absence of an express stipulation in the policy to that effect; 24 Wis. 28; 32 Md. 310; 6 Lans. 71.

Accident policies usually cover the risk incident to a specific occupation, a substantial change of which will, if it increase the risk, render the policy void. Such a stipulation is held to mean engaging in another employment as a usual business; 49 Ill. 180; but it was not such a change for a school teacher while disengaged to be employed in building operations; id.; or for one to engage in pitching hay while visiting his grandfather; 69 Pa. 43; or for a locomotive engineer to climb over the tender to apply the brakes on a car; 32 Md. 310. In all such cases the question what is a substantial change of occupation is to be left to the jury; 34 N. J. L. 371.

The expression "voluntary exposure to unnecessary danger," used in stating the exceptions to the liability of an insurance company upon an accident policy, refers only to dangers of a real and substantial character which the insured recognized, but to which he, nevertheless, purposely and consciously exposed himself, intending at the same time to assume all the risks of the situation. Voluntary riding upon the platform of a rapidly moving railroad car is not, of itself and as a matter of law, a voluntary exposure to unnecessary danger and presents a question of fact for the jury. Where an accident insurance policy exempts the insurer from liability for injuries received while violating rules of a corporation, the question is for the jury as to whether the insured knew of a rule of the corporation which he is alleged to have violated, and the court should charge that in order to bind insured, it must be one which the corporation enforced or used reasonable effort to enforce; 78 Fed. Rep. 734; opinion by Harlan, J., considering all the cases at length; and see 7 Am. L. Rev. 590, where the question whether death from freezing while climbing Mount Blanc was or was not a voluntary exposure to unnecessary danger was discussed with reference to a case in which the point was raised but not settled, the suit being compromised.

In an exception prohibiting exposure to obvious or unnecessary danger and requiring due diligence on the part of the assured, there can be no recovery where death was caused by being struck by a railroad train while running along the tracks in front of it in the night-time for the purpose of getting on a train approaching in an opposite direction on a parallel track; 134 Mass. 175; nor where it was caused by falling from the platform of a railroad car between eleven and twelve o'clock at night when the train was in motion; 15 Blatchf. 216; or from unnecessarily passing on a dark and rainy night over a trestle known to be dangerous with two packages in his hands, although it was the usual route home of the assured and many others; 80 Ga. 541; or where a shop hand of a railway company went on the platform when the train was in motion to leave the train when it should stop to cross over by a switch to another track (the exception not being applicable to the exposure of railway employees in the performance of their duty); 41 Minn. 281; but where the insured by a voluntary act exposed himself to a hidden danger, the existence of which he had no reason to suspect, and thereby lost his life, his death was caused by accident and the company is liable; 102 Pa. 282; a clause prohibiting voluntary exposure to unnecessary danger does not prohibit one from walking or being on a railway bridge or road-bed; 74 Fed. Rep. 457; 39 N. Y. Supp. 912; see also where a passenger is overcome by the heat of the car, or nausea, and goes upon the platform; 39 Fed. Rep. 831; or getting from the platform at a depot upon the cars while in motion at a rate of speed less than that of a man walking; 24 Wis. 28; going to the rescue of a shipwrecked crew, although the policy prohibited the insured from engaging in the business of wrecking; 50 Hun 50; or by falling from the second story of a barn which the insured was having built, in consequence of the breaking of a joist having a secret defect; 34 N. J. L. 371.

The exception against death or injury happening while the insured was intoxicated, or in consequence thereof, prevents a recovery, without reference to the question whether the condition was the cause of the injury or not; 94 Ala. 484; 66 N. Y. 441; as, where the deceased, being under the influence of liquor, was killed by a pistol shot while dining with a friend; id. To be under the influence of intoxicating liquor within the meaning of such exception means to have drunk enough to disturb the action of the mental and physical faculties so that they are no longer in their normal condition; id.; the expression is equivalent to "intoxicated"; 94 Ala. 484.

Where the death was caused by inadvertently taking an overdose of opium which had been prescribed by a physician, it was held within the exception of any death caused wholly or in part by medical treatment for disease; 14 Blatchf. 143.

The question frequently arises what is total disability for which the policy entitles the insured to claim indemnity. In an English case in which this question was much discussed, it was held that a solicitor who had sprained his ankle while riding on horseback and was under the care of a surgeon for six weeks, unable to leave the house or transact business which could not be attended to in the house, but could write letters, read law, and the like while lying on a couch, was not totally disabled; 5 H. & N. 546. This judgment was affirmed in Exchequer Chamber. The provision in this and similar cases is usually for a weekly allowance in case of accident causing any bodily injury of so serious a nature as wholly to disable the insured from following his business. Under such a clause total disability to labor must be shown; 5 Lans. 71; by it is meant disability from doing substantially all kinds of the plaintiff's accustomed labor to some extent, and that the assured must be deprived of the power to do to any extent substantially all the kinds of his usual labor; 8 Am. Law Reg. N. S. 238; where the provision was for total disability there could be no recovery if the assured were able to do some parts of the accustomed work pertaining to his business or, if totally disabled in his own pursuit, he should be able to engage in some other; 46 La. 681.

Where the provision was that the injured must be "wholly disabled to prevent him from the prosecution of any and every kind of business pertaining to his occupation," it was held error to instruct the jury that the defendant was to pay the amount agreed, if by the accident the plaintiff had been disabled in any way from prosecuting the business in which he was engaged, and that the plaintiff was entitled to recover for such time as he was "rendered wholly unable to do his accustomed labor, that is, to do substantially all kinds of his accustomed labor to some extent;" 67 Wis. 174. See, as to total disability, 4 Harv. L. Rev. 176.

It has been held that the meaning of the word accident, as used in a policy, is for the jury, as it is also to determine whether there was exposure to unnecessary danger; 50 Ill. App. 222; or whether the total loss of three fingers and a part of another on the same hand, destruction of the thumb, and a cutting of the hand is a loss of the hand causing "immediate, continuous, and total disability" within the meaning of that clause in an accident insurance policy; 61 N. W. Rep. (Wis.) 292; and see 34 N. Y. Supp. 545, where the plaintiff's hand was cut off a short distance above the knuckles, leaving nearly the whole palm and part of the second joint of the thumb, and it was held to be a loss of the entire hand within the meaning of the policy; overruling 30 id. 881. See REPRESENTATION; ACT OF GOD.

A provision in a policy that the medical adviser of the insurer may examine the body of the insured or attend any post mortem examination which may be held, only authorizes examination of the body unburied and does not warrant exhumation and autopsy, nor does an exception of injuries of which there is no visible mark; 11 Misc. Rep. 36.

Assessment Insurance. That where the benefit to be paid is dependent upon the collection of such assessments as may be necessary for paying the amount insured, it constitutes assessment insurance when the payments are not unalterably fixed by the contract. In old-line policies the amount of the premium is fixed unalterably, and the insurer's liability is definitely fixed. 1 Joyce, Insurance, 2nd ed. 82; 161 Mo. App. 579. A mutual benefit association provides insurance "upon the assessment plan," even though it agrees to pay a definite sum and has fixed rates of assessment which it has authority to receive in advance, where it has no "legal reserve," but only an "emergency fund," and it has the reserved right to increase or lower the rates of assessment. Id.; 83 Wis. 667. In insurance and business circles the words "assessment company," as distinguished from "old-line mutual" company, mean that in such first-named company the money to pay a death loss is collected by an assessment made upon those members who survive the member, the insurance upon whose life is paid. Id.; 85 Va. 643.

Insurance against Birth of Issue. A form of insurance common in England by which the heir presumptive protects his interest against either the birth of an heir apparent or the attainment of majority, or to a particular age by an existing heir apparent. It is also and more commonly practised by tenants for life under settlements, who are entitled to reversions in fee simple subject to estates tail in their own issue by a particular marriage, and who, by this method, are enabled to mortgage their estates without burdening their life interests with premiums on life insurance. In this form of insurance the principal elements to consider are the age and the health of the party and the age at which women will cease to bear children. See Jac. Ch. 585, 586; 4 Hare 124; 5 De G. & S. 226; 10 Beav. 463; 19 id. 505; 12 Jur. 666; 17 id. 342.

Burial Insurance: A contract based upon a legal consideration, whereby the obligor undertakes to furnish the obligee, or one of the latter's near relatives, at death, a burial reasonably worth a fixed sum. It is a valid contract, and constitutes life insurance. 1 Joyce, Insurance, 2nd ed., 87; 171 Ind. 296. Such a contract has, however, been held void as against public policy and in restraint of trade, where the purpose of the association was to provide at their death a funeral and proper burial for the members, and the association was organized on the mutual plan, the members contributing a stipulated sum weekly, and the funeral, certain funeral furnishings and outfit were to be furnished by and through a designated undertaker, or official undertaker. Id.; 80 Ohio St. 181.

Casualty Insurance. A contract by which a person is indemnified against loss or damage to property, occasioned by accident. The term is thus applied in contradistinction to accident insurance by the Massachusetts Supreme Court, in 155 Mass. 404. The question was whether a foreign company licensed to do business in the state, but by statute restricted to one kind or class of business, was authorized to issue policies covering special classes of accidents, involving bodily injury and death. In this connection the court said: "The distinguishing feature of what is known in our legislation as 'accident insurance' is that it indemnifies against the effects of accidents resulting in bodily injury or death. Its field is not to insure against loss or damage to property, although occasioned by accident. So far as that class of insurance has been developed, it has been with reference to boilers, plate-glass, and perhaps to domestic animals and injuries to property by street cars, and is known as 'casualty insurance.'"

The distinction is founded in reason and the terminology is well adapted to the subject. Its precision is in sharp contrast to the vagueness and want of definiteness which characterize the references of text writers and judges to the various forms of insurance which have come into use with the increase in number of perils to life and property.

Among the perils covered by this kind of insurance are included: the loss of horses and cattle, theft of valuables, breakage of plate glass, loss by tornadoes or force of the elements, explosion or bursting of boilers, etc. These policies usually stipulate certain exceptions against which they will not insure, as fire and lightning; but such a policy was held to cover a loss by flood; 37 Atl. Rep. (Pa.) 402.

A carrier may lawfully insure against liability for loss of goods occasioned by the negligence of a servant; 68 N. W. Rep. (Minn.) 132; in such a case the liability of the insured becomes fixed on the happening of the accident, although the amount is contingent, to the extent that the amount which the insured may be adjudged to pay has not yet been ascertained; 82 Md. 535.

A policy against loss or damage to property, and loss of life or injury to employees of the insured or other persons, payable to the insured or the benefit of such persons or their legal representatives, is a contract of indemnity, and a person who is injured by such explosion cannot sue the insurer; 4 N. Y. Supp. 450.

In a policy on live stock the insurer is estopped to deny that the sum named in the policy is the insurable value of the horse; 68 Ill. App. 557. Where the policy covering "two horses" was cancelled as to one, the insured may show that it was cancelled as to a mare covered by the policy; 64 N. W. Rep. (Minn.) 1018. The provision for notice to the insurer by telegram, of the sickness of an animal, did not require such notice of a sickness which lasted only ten minutes and did not recur for seven weeks; 67 N. W. Rep. (Minn.) 215. Where the insured had given notes for the horse, and in his contract for purchase stipulated that in case of the death of the animal within a certain time the vendor should take the insurance and give up the notes, it was not a breach of the stipulation in the policy that the vendee "is the sole, absolute, and unconditional owner;" id. The insurer is not bound by the consent of his agent to kill the horse insured, although suffering from an incurable disease; 59 N. W. Rep. (Ia.) 1.

Where plate glass was insured and the insurer, exercising his option, employed a person with whom he had a contract for that purpose to replace it (the policy providing that the insured should when necessary remove any woodwork, gas fixtures, or other obstruction), the negligent removal of gas pipes by the contractor and a resulting explosion causing a breakage of the new glass, did not render the insurer liable; 88 N. Y. Supp. 773.

Credit Insurance. A contract by which the insured is indemnified against loss by the failure of his customers to pay for goods sold to them. It is insurance against excess loss by the insured, i. e. against a loss which is in excess of a specified percentage of gross sales. It usually limits the losses insured against to a fixed amount by reason of sales to any one person, and limits the sales, covered by the policy, to customers having at least a specified minimum commercial rating by a specified commercial agency.

The insured is frequently termed the "indemnified," and so referred to in the policy.

A contract by which a corporation, though called a guarantee or surety company, undertakes, in consideration of premiums paid, to indemnify the other party to such contract against losses of uncollectable debts, is not a contract of suretyship, but a policy of insurance; 73 Fed. Rep. 95; 68 N. W. Rep. (Wis.) 528.

It is like any other insurance contract and is governed largely by the same rules; id. 68; id. 529; 41 id. 742; 132 N. Y. 540; 165 Mass. 501. It falls within the implied prohibition of a statute authorizing specified forms of insurance, against all not mentioned, and not being authorized by the Massachusetts Insurance Act it is invalid; id. The agent who solicits it is within the purview of a statute making him the agent of the insurer; 66 N. W. Rep. (Wis.) 528.

There is a distinction between this loss and other kinds of insurance with respect to the value of the policy, which has been thus stated: The loss provable on a policy of insurance is ordinarily the reserve value of the policy, or the amount sufficient to re-insure the holder in a solvent company for the same amount, to be paid upon a loss happening on the same conditions and within the same time. Credit insurance is peculiar; there does not appear to be any reserve value to the policies, nor are there any general tables to show the rate of re-insurance, nor any other solvent company in which re-insurance could be obtained. When no losses occurred it may be assumed that the premium is a fair price for the risk, and the loss may be taken to be a proportionate part of the premium. When actual losses have been sustained after the insolvency and before the proof, these losses may be accepted as evidence of the value of the policy. 19 N. J. L. J. 18; s. c. 82 Atl. Rep. (N. J.) 890.

Under a policy of indemnity to the insured, to the extent of $10,000, against losses in excess of one-fourth of one per cent. of their annual sales, twelve per cent. additional to be deducted from the total gross losses, the claim not to exceed $7,500, in any one firm, where there was a loss with one firm of $20,000, the total gross loss from which deductions were to be made was $7,500, and the balance was the indemnity to be paid; 164 Mass. 285.

A policy of credit insurance was terminated by the insolvency of the insured, and the deduction to be made before the "excess" was ascertained was calculated on the amount of sales made up to the time of insolvency and not on the amount stipulated for the term of the policy; 25 Ins. L. J. 842.

A provision in such a policy that amounts realized from other security or indemnity shall be deducted before the adjustment of a loss, does not entitle the insurer to deduct the proceeds of a policy in another company which provides that it shall not cover losses insured by the first company, but shall only attach when that company's policy is exhausted; 78 Fed. Rep. 81. One who is the agent of the insurer for the purpose of soliciting such insurance, transmitting applications, and collecting premiums, and who receives pay therefor, has power to make an additional agreement providing that if the customer is not rated in Dun's and is rated in Bradstreet's, the latter shall be binding on the insurer; 66 N. W. Rep. (Wis.) 528; and to vary details of the policy as to credit rating; id.

Employer's Liability Insurance. A contract by which the company agrees to reimburse an employer for any loss occasioned by his liability for damages to an employee, injured in his service.

The liability of the insurer becomes fixed on the happening of the accident or casualty, even though the amount of such liability is contingent, to the extent that the amount which the insured may be adjudged to pay has not been ascertained; 82 Md. 535.

Under a policy of insurance against damage for which the insured may be liable under an employer's liability act (q. v.) where the workman has recovered damages for injuries in a common-law action, and not under the statute, the insurer will not be liable to reimburse the amount so recovered; 16 Can. S. C., 4th ser. 212; but where the policy contained a clause agreeing to indemnify the insured against damages sustained by the employee while engaged in operations connected with the business of iron work, it was held to cover injuries received by reason of the construction of a building for the use of such business; 67 N. W. Rep. (Wis.) 46.

A policy which provides that the employer shall not settle with an employee without the consent of the insurer, who was to assume control of litigation, is a contract of indemnity against liability, and payment by the employer of a judgment recovered against him is not a condition precedent to the insurer's liability; id.; and a person who is injured cannot sue the insurer; 4 N. Y. Supp. 450. But where the insurer was prohibited from suing until after judgment against him, in which case an action might be brought within thirty days after such judgment, it was held that the contract was not one of indemnity merely, so that an action would lie after judgment was recovered against the employer, though it was paid by him, such payment not being a condition precedent to recovery; 65 N. W. Rep. (Minn.) 358; nor is a discharge of liabilities by the insured, under a clause in the policy promising to pay "all damages with which the insured may be legally charged," such a contract being not one of indemnity alone, but also a contract to pay liabilities; 86 S. W. Rep. (Ark.) 1051. When the insured was required to give immediate notice to the insurer upon the occurrence of an accident and notice of any claim on account of it, the notice under the condition is not required until an accident happens and the employer has received notice of a claim made on account thereof; 66 N. W. Rep. (Minn.) 853.

Such a policy is in no sense a contract between the insurer and the employee, and any sum paid by the company to the employer on account of the death of an employee, whose widow had a right of action, is not an asset of the estate of the deceased; 22 S. W. Rep. (Ga.) 141.

It is generally provided in such policies that the insurer shall have control of the defence of any suits against the employer on claims covered by the insurance, and such a condition is strictly enforced; 15 Can. L. T. 98.

Employers' Liability Insurance. Insurance taken out by an employer to protect him against loss on account of injury to his employees while engaged in his service. 142 Ky. 530, 134 S. W. 577.

Endowment Insurance. A contract evidenced by an instrument styled a policy, by which one party, for a consideration called the premium, promises to pay a specific sum of money at a time stated, or at the payee's death if it occurs earlier than the date fixed for payment. 11 A. & E. Ency. 2d ed., 24; 1 Biddle, Inc. § 5. In its broadest sense it includes tonnage insurance (q. v.) as all tonnage policies are written on the endowment plan combined with the survivorship feature. 13.

Fidelity Insurance. A contract to indemnify the insured against loss by reason of the default or dishonesty of the employee.

Bonds of indemnity given by fidelity insurance companies are analogous to ordinary policies of insurance, and are governed by the same principles of interpretation; 68 Fed. Rep. 459.

All conditions in the policy must be complied with as in other cases of insurance, and where one of them is the prosecution of the person whose action is insured against, before he can recover, against the insurer, it was held, by an equally divided court, that the insured must conform to this condition even if he thereby became liable to an action for damages; 9 Ins. L. J. 160.

A statement in the application as to the frequency of measures usually taken by the employer to secure the fidelity of the employed is a warranty the breach of which will defeat recovery; 28 Scot. L. Rep. 394; but in an application for insurance, declarations of the integrity of a clerk, in answer to questions which manifestly relate to the course of business of the employer, are mere representations and not warranties; 7 Exch. 744. Where the bond provides that answers made to questions asked in the application shall be warranties, and the answers are made on the employer's "best knowledge and belief," mere falsity of the answers is not sufficient to avoid the bond, but the company must show that they are "knowingly false;" 68 Fed. Rep. 459; and if such answers involved no misrepresentation or concealment, the contract could not be affected by loose parol statements, or concealment of facts about which no inquiry was made, or conduct on which no reliance was placed; 63 id. 48.

A representation that the person whose integrity is insured "has never been in arrears or default of his accounts" covers any which may have occurred prior to the time when he entered the service of the insured; 90 U. C. C. P. 860. To charge an embezzling employee with interest on the money embezzled converts the embezzlement into a debt and the insurer is not liable therefor; 66 N. W. Rep. (Wis.) 860.

Leaving money temporarily in an insecurely locked room when there were various means of safe-keeping available, was held a violation of a guarantee of "diligent and faithful performance of his duty," for which an insurer was liable; 6 Leg. N. (Can.) 811; 16 Can. L. J. 384. So allowing a customer to make an overdraft on a bank was held negligence in the bank's agent who permitted it, the agent and the customer being together involved in brokerage transactions; 7 Revue Legale 37; a. c. 14 L. C. Jur. 186.

Where the employer retains the employee in his service after he knows of the latter's dishonesty, and without notice to and assent of the insurer, he cannot recover; 71 N. W. Rep. (Minn.) 261; but this rule will not apply to mere breaches of duty or contract obligation, not involving dishonesty of the servant or fraud and concealment on the part of the master; id.

The employee is bound to reimburse the insurer for the loss sustained through him; 65 N. W. Rep. (Minn.) 351; but, upon the payment of a loss, the insurer is subrogated to the rights of the employer in the prosecution of dishonest employees; 22 Fed. Rep. 68, 689; as to any securities held with respect to the matter insured; 3 Vt. 518. And a stipulation between the insurer and the employee that the evidence of payment by the insurer to the employer should be conclusive evidence against the employee as to the fact and extent of his liability to indemnify the insurer, is void as against public policy; id.

Where the indemnity was for one year, and it was provided that a claim under the bond or any renewal thereof should embrace only acts during its currency, it was held that each renewal was a separate contract, and the discovery, during the term of the renewal of theft committed during the running of the bond under a previous renewal, would not make the company liable therefor, when the discovery was too late to hold the insurer under the bond on the renewal in force when the thefts were committed; 88 S. W. Rep. (Ky.) 828; and when it was provided that any claim under the bond should cover only defaults committed during its currency, and within twelve months prior to its discovery, it was held that it did not cover a default committed more than twelve months prior to such discovery which would have occurred within the year but for the falsification of the books within the year preceding; 71 Fed. Rep. 116, reversing 67 id. 874.

In a recent federal decision on this subject, it was held (1) Where a policy stipulates for a notification of the dishonesty of the employee as soon as practicable after the occurrence of the act, and the evidence as to when the dishonesty was discovered was conflicting, the question what is a reasonable time is for the jury. (2) It is not necessary to give notice of suspicions of dishonesty. (3) The fact that the insured corporation has passed into the hands of a receiver will not absolve the insurer from liability. (4) Where proof of loss under the bond is set forth with reasonable plainness and in a manner which a person of ordinary intelligence cannot fail to understand, a failure to explicitly aver that a loss has been caused is immaterial. (5) The fact that one member of a corporation was cognizant of an employee's dishonesty, and that fraudulent collusion existed between them, cannot make the corporation responsible for a false certificate of character issued by him without the knowledge of other directors; 73 Fed. Rep. 470.

Fire Insurance. A contract by which the insurer, in consideration of a certain premium received by him, either in a gross sum or by annual payments, undertakes to indemnify the insured against all loss or damage which he may sustain to a certain amount, in his property mentioned in the policy, by fire during the time agreed upon.

Fire insurance is said to be in effect a contract of indemnity against loss or damage suffered by an owner or person having an interest in the property insured. 86 Me. 518.

The principles applying to the subject are, in general, those governing marine policies and other kinds of insurance of property against the various perils which attend its use and ownership, and therefore the point to be mainly considered, as applied to fire insurance alone, is the exact definition of the peril insured against. With respect to the nature of the contract as an indemnity, the necessity of an interest in the property, the policy and the application, the effect of warranties and representations, respectively, and the loss and its adjustment, reference should be had to the discussion of the subject generally, supra, and in the various titles referred to.

It has frequently been said that to recover under a fire policy there must be an actual fire or ignition, and that it is not sufficient that there has been an injurious increase of heat which caused damage to the insured property, while nothing had taken fire which ought not to be on fire. The authority usually relied upon, for this general statement, is the early and leading case of Austin v. Drewe, 6 Taunt. 436, but this case has been much criticised; Cushing J., in 10 Cush. 356; 1 Bennett, Fire Ins. Cas. 104, note; 18 Ill. 676; May, Ins. § 402.

A fire in a theatre, caused by the excessive heating of its walls by a fire outside, was held to be covered by the policy; 11 Allen 336; and when a building is blown up by gunpowder to prevent the spreading of fire the insurer against fire is liable if, but for being blown up, it would have been burned; 21 Wend. 367; 3 Phila. Pa. 323; 41 Ill. App. 895; L. R. 3 Exch. 71. These cases are distinguished from explosion, which is not fire, within a fire policy, when it occurs some distance off; 19 C. B. N. S. 126; 15 La. Ann. 217; even though it was caused by fire; id.; and when the explosion is within the building, there must be ignition to bring it within the fire insurance; 11 N. Y. 516; but damage from fire caused by explosion on the premises is covered; 10 Cush. 356; 108 Mo. 595 (unless it is expressly excepted; 3 Phila. Pa. 328); so also if the damage is from explosion caused by fire, as where a steamboat was burned as the result of an explosion of gunpowder; 11 Pet. 213; or when coals were thrown out of the stove; 127 Mass. 346. In this case the policy contained the provision that "if a building shall fall, except as the result of a fire," the insurance should cease; and this was held to apply to inherent defects in the building. And when, under a similar policy "against fire originating in any case," there occurred an explosion and loss, it was held immaterial whether the fire resulted in combustion or explosion; 33 Mo. App. 384.

A loss by reason of fire started by an explosion caused by a fire coming in contact with escaping gas was not within a policy which excepted loss by reason of or resulting from any explosion whatever; 2 Ins. L. J. 190. When damages by explosion are excepted unless caused by fire, the insurer is held liable only for the result of fire and not of the explosion which caused it; L. R. 3 Exch. 71; or by one caused by fire in its course; id.; contra, 2 Fed. Rep. 633; 56 Md. 70.

A fire in a chimney, caused by accidental ignition of soot, or smoke issuing from such fire, is within a policy covering all loss or damage by fire to all goods contained in the building; 166 Mass. 67. So also a loss by spontaneous combustion was held to be within a fire policy; 9 L. C. Q. B. 448; but see a criticism of this case in 65 Md. 162. Where a policy insures against explosion and accident and there was an exception of explosion or loss caused by the burning of the building, a destruction of the property by an explosion caused by raising a cloud of starch dust in an endeavor to extinguish flames was held a fire loss and not within the policy; 57 Fed. Rep. 294, reversing 48 Fed. Rep. 108.

Fire insurance does not cover damage by lightning without combustion; 87 Me. 256; 14 N. H. 841; even when the policy covers "fire, by lightning;" 4 N. Y. 528. It is quite usual to add to a fire policy what is known as a "lightning clause," which covers loss from that cause with or without fire; but a company authorized to take fire risks is not thereby authorized to insure against lightning; 87 Me. 256. A policy of insurance against lightning was held to cover destruction by tornado when the former accompanied the latter; 54 Wis. 433.

Under a lightning clause attached to a fire policy, on horses "contained in" a barn, the insurer was held liable for a brood mare pasturing in a field. The policy against loss by lightning was said to be a contract of insurance of a peculiar kind, which must be construed in a reasonable, common-sense view, and so as not to reduce the contract to an absurdity; 114 Pa. 481; 20 W. N. C.

Pa. 370; in these cases the insurance was on horses alone, and, on that ground, they were distinguished in a later case, in which the policy embraced also property kept in a barn, other than live stock, and the company was held not liable for a horse killed by lightning while in pasture; 130 Pa. 113.

Where an insurance policy excepts loss caused directly or indirectly by fire it is an accident, and not a fire, policy, and the complaint must show that the loss was not caused directly or indirectly by fire; 51 Fed. Rep. 155.

When the insurance was against loss by "fire or storm," it did not cover damage by a freshet caused by melting snow with prevailing south winds and rain; 3 Phila. Pa. 38.

The exception of "loss by fire occasioned by mobs or riots," does not extend to a loss from the burning of a bridge by military authorities in time of war; 50 Pa. 341; or of the risks of this class, usurped power is not an ordinary mob but a rebellious one or one having political purpose; 2 Wilson 363; it is "rebellion conducted by authority;" Lord Mansfield in Langdale v. Mason, 2 Marsh. Ins. 792; but it is not necessary that the destruction be commanded by a superior officer; 42 Mo. 156; insurrection is "a seditious rising against the government, a rebellion, a revolt;" 1 Jones, N. C. 126; and a riot is "where three or more persons actually do an unlawful act, either with or without a common cause . . . the intention with which the parties assemble, or at least act, being unlawful;" id.; but in another case it was held that the destruction of property in a riot is within the exception even if the rioters assembled originally for a lawful purpose; 5 La. Ann. 482.

The exemption of loss "by explosion of any kind, by means of invasion," etc., means by explosion and invasion, etc., not explosion caused by invasion; 14 W. Va. 33. See CIVIL COMMOTION; INSURRECTION; INVASION; MOB; RIOT; USURPED POWER.

Losses caused by the effort made to prevent the destruction of property by fire must be borne by the insurers and not by the insured; 3 Phila. Pa. 193; as by water; 19 La. Ann. 297; 10 Gray 158; or theft; 34 Pa. 96; 49 Me. 200; 30 Mo. 180; unless expressly excluded; 17 La. Ann. 131; or removal when required by due diligence, according to the circumstances; 11 Mich. 425; 13 Ill. 876 (but see 3 Pa. 407); or falling of walls after an interval of a day; 7 Sc. Sess. Cas., 1st ser. 52; but the fire must be the proximate cause; 37 Mo. 429. See 10 Gray 15.

Insurance against fire covers a loss by the negligence of the insured not amounting to fraud; 58 Pa. 419. The contract of fire insurance is to be construed with reference to the laws of the state in which the property is situated and the policy issued; 164 Mass. 291; 33 Atl. Rep. (N. H.) 731.

An insane person cannot be held, in setting fire to his property, to have had such a fraudulent or wrongful design as to defeat the insurance thereon, though his estate may afterwards be called upon to respond for the act; 20 N. Y. S. 344; 35 Hun 475.

Guaranty Insurance. This term has sometimes been used to express indiscriminately the classes of insurance herein entitled Credit, Fidelity, and Title insurance, (q. v.). The latter designations are conceived to be better adapted to the subject-matter, and their employment is not only the better usage but undoubtedly leads to a clearer understanding of the varied subject-matter now involved in the law of insurance.

The expression "Guaranty Insurance" has, however, an extended use in England and Canada, and is there used to designate insurance of the integrity of employees, the phrase "policy of guaranty" being in frequent use by the courts; 7 Jur. N. S. 1109; 80 U. C. C. P. 860; 16 Can. L. J. 384; 14 L. C. Jur. 186.

The term is also used in a few English cases involving the guaranty of merchants against losses in business from the bankruptcy, insolvency, or assignment with preference of their customers; 7 H. & N. 5.

In an American case of a date long prior to the use of these modern forms of insurance, an action of debt was sustained upon a policy of insurance guaranteeing to the bearer the payment of a note, and it was held that there was authority to issue such a policy under charter powers such as were at that time conferred upon insurance companies generally, and it was also held that the policy passed by delivery; 8 G. & J. 166.

Indemnity Insurance. See EMPLOYER'S LIABILITY INSURANCE, supra. See PAID UP LIFE POLICY; TRAVELER.

Industrial Insurance. Except where otherwise defined by statute, an insurance upon life, for a small or limited amount in consideration of a premium payable in small instalments and collectible weekly, or at some other short periodical interval. It includes both adult and child insurance, and amounts in fact to burial insurance (q. v.).

A policy of contract is industrial, and not accident, insurance where it contains the limitation above stated, and also the provision that in the event of death from accident within six months from date of the policy "the full amount of insurance named in the first schedule will be paid." It is not the giving of direct affirmative benefits of a special kind on account of the accident. It constitutes simply an exception of this class of cases from the ordinary rights of an insured person, which limitation was established to prevent fraud of a kind bearing no relation to deaths by accident. 1 Joyce, Insurance 2nd ed., 85, 86; 208 Mass. 386.

Life Insurance. The insurance of the life of a person is a contract by which the insurer, in consideration of a certain premium, either in a gross sum or periodical payments, undertakes to pay the person for whose benefit the insurance is made, a stipulated sum, or annuity equivalent, upon the death of the person whose life is insured, whenever this shall happen, if the insurance be for the whole life, or in case this shall happen within a certain period, if the insurance be for a limited time.

An agreement by the insurer to pay to the insured or his nominee a specified sum of money, either on the death of a designated life, or at the end of a certain period, provided the death does not occur before, in consideration of the present payment of a fixed amount, or of an annuity till the death occurs or the period of insurance is ended. Biddle, Ins. § 2. Bunyon's definition varies little, as does that of Park, but the latter elaborates the consideration which is described as "a certain sum proportioned to the age, health, profession, and other circumstances of the person whose life is the object of insurance. Park, Ins. ch. xxii. In a leading case it was said by Parke, B., to be "a mere contract to pay a certain sum of money on the death of a person, in consideration of the due payment of a certain annuity for his life, the amount of the annuity being calculated, in the first instance, according to the probable duration of the life; and when once fixed, it is constant and invariable;" 15 C. B. 365.

A mutual contract by which the insurer, on the one hand, comes under an obligation to pay a certain sum of money upon the death of the insured, who, on the other hand, becomes bound to pay certain sums, either annually or otherwise, in the name of premiums, and these obligations are counterparts of one another. 8 Can. S. C. 4th ser. 1078.

This form of insurance, it has been said, "is substantially the purchase by the insured from the insurer of a reversionary interest for a present sum of money;" Biddle, Ins. § 4.

The person whose life is insured is frequently termed the "life."

The sum to be paid in case of loss depends entirely upon the stipulation in the policy, and not at all upon the amount of the pecuniary interest in the life; 23 Conn. 244.

It is settled that there must be an insurable interest, as to which see that title.

A large proportion of life insurance is now effected through the medium of beneficial associations (q. v.); they are generally formed under state incorporation laws and are subject to their own rules and regulations so far as they are consistent with the general or statutory law of the state. The benefits and advantages conferred by these associations are held to be insurance, and subject to regulation by the insurance laws of the state; 41 N. W. Rep. (Ia.) 4; 67 Md. 117. While the rules and regulations enter into and become a part of the contract of insurance, the usage of the association will not bind courts in construing the contract, if the latter be clear and unambiguous; and words having a fixed meaning, either general or technical, will be interpreted according to that meaning as in other cases; 31 Fed. Rep. 122. See INSURANCE COMPANY.

Some of the conditions of policies of life insurance are peculiar to this class of insurance. Among the most important of these are those relating to self-destruction and insanity, as to which see SUICIDE.

Entering the military service is also usually stipulated against, but death at the hands of a roving band of thieves and robbers, while engaged as an engineer in building a bridge, under the direction of a military commander, is not within such a stipulation; 48 N. Y. 34; but even an involuntary entrance will defeat a recovery; 44 Ga. 119; as also, serving on the staff of a general, although the insured received no commission; Mitchell v. Mutual Life Ins. Co. of New York, cited in Bliss, Ins. 643. The receipt of the premium by the insurer, after a known violation of the condition against residence abroad, is a waiver of the right to a forfeiture; 23 Conn. 244; whether the knowledge be actual or constructive; 5 De G. M. & G. 265; L. R. 11 Eq. 197. Where a condition against absence from home beyond a stipulated time is violated, the insured will be excused if he be detained by reason of illness occurring within the time specified; 3 Bosw. 530; but not where the illness occurs after the limits of the stipulation; 5 R. I. 38. Where the contract restricts the insured to the settled limits of the United States, it covers all regions within the boundaries of the country, whether inhabited or not; 22 N. Y. 427; and a permission to travel by sea in "a first rate vessel" will cover any mode of travel whether by cabin or steerage; 13 Gray 434.

The weight of decision has been in favor of the view, that the contract of life insurance between citizens of different states is not dissolved, but only suspended, by a war between the states; 46 N. Y. 54; 9 Blatchf. 234; 9 Ann. Rep. 169; 10 id. 535; 13 Wall. 159; but, contra, 41 Conn. 272; 98 U. S. 24. Lloyd's Insurance. See LLOYD'S INSURANCE.

Marine Insurance. A contract of indemnity by which one party, for a stipulated premium, undertakes to indemnify the other, to the extent of the amount insured, against all perils of the sea, or certain enumerated perils, to which his ship, cargo, and freight, or some of them, may be exposed during a certain voyage or fixed period of time.

A contract of indemnity (not perfect but approximate; 1 H. L. Cas. 287; 4 App. Cas. 755); against all losses accruing to the subject-matter of the policy from certain perils during the adventure. This subject-matter need not be strictly a property in the ship, goods, or freight; 2 B. & P. N. R. 269; L. R. 7 Q. B. 803; any reasonable expectation of pecuniary profit from the preservation of the subject-matter is insurable as a marine risk; as, where the joint owners of a vessel and cargo engaged in a joint adventure have a lien for their several interests and for advancements, each part-owner had an insurable interest in the joint venture: 124 Pa. 61.

The insured must have a lawful interest at the time of the loss. See INSURABLE INTEREST.

The contract is one recognized by the general law and usage of nations, and therefore either native or alien may be insured. It was settled in England after much judicial discussion (and some temporary legislation) that the insurance of enemy's property is illegal: 4 East 396; 13 Ves. 64; see 3 Kent 354. The same rule was recognized by continental jurists: id. 255, note (b); Val. Com. ii. 32; and in this country: 16 Johns. 438, where the subject was extensively discussed, and it is said that "it may be considered the established law of this country." 3 Kent 356. Such contracts, made before the outbreak of war, are annulled by it: Snow, Lect. Int. L. 101.

It may also be in favor of A, or whom it may concern, but those general words will only apply to a person with an interest in the subject and who was in the contemplation of the contract; 2 Wash. C. C. 391; 98 U. S. 528; 6 Paige 483; 129 N. Y. 237; if such person has authorized or adopted it; 44 N. H. 238. The intention of the insurer need not have fastened upon the very person, who seeks to take the benefit; an intention covers a person who takes such relation to the insurer as brings him within the clauses of the policy; 129 N. Y. 237. See 40 Me. 181; 5 Bosw. 369. The insurance "on advances" is distinct from the ship itself; 1 U. S. App. 183.

As to who may be insurers in a marine policy there is no special rule.

An insurance on a ship named makes the latter a part of the contract and no other can be substituted, but a cargo may be changed from one ship to another; 3 Kent 237; and the master may be changed; 12 Johns. 138. An insurance on the ship includes everything appurtenant to it; Boulay-Paty iii. 379; 1 Term 611, note. An insurance on goods need not name the ship, but may be "on any ship or ships;" Emer. i. 173; 2 H. Bla. 343.

Marine policies in England and this country usually contain the words "lost or not lost," and in such case they cover losses already accrued as well as future ones; 27 N. J. L. 645. It is so without the words in other foreign countries; Roccus de Ass. n. 51; 3 Kent 259; and it was said by Story, J., that "it would be so without reference to the words;" 2 Summ. 397.

The most perfect good faith is required in this contract with respect to representations, warranties, and concealment, as to all of which see the several titles.

The insured is required both to pay the premium, and to represent fully and fairly all the circumstances relating to his subject-matter of the insurance, which may influence the determination of the underwriters in undertaking the risk or estimating the premium. A concealment of such facts amounts to a fraud, which avoids the contract; 1 Marsh. Ins. 464; Park. Ins.; 8 Kent 282-7 and notes.

Where a policy covers a loss by perils of the sea or other perils, the insured may recover for a loss occasioned by the negligence of the master or crew or other persons employed by him; 11 Pet. 213; 2 Metc. 432; 14 How. 351; L. R. 4 C. P. 117; 117 U. S. 823. As to the perils insured against generally, see PERILS OF THE SEA; RISKS AND PERILS; and as to the different kinds of marine policies, see POLICY.

If, before the termination of the adventure, the assured has parted with all interest in the subject-matter of the insurance, he cannot recover on any loss subsequent to his transfer of the property; 11 M. & W. 10; L. R. 7 Q. B. 802; and the insurer can take nothing by subrogation but the rights of the assured; 1 Pet. 193; 12 How. 498; 17 Id. 152; 13 Wall. 367; 105 U. S. 620; 111 Id. 584; 108 Mass. 219.

Insurance on Profits. See INSURANCE, Rental Insurance.

Rent Insurance; Rent Guaranty Insurance: Rent insurance is that class of underwriting which offers indemnity or a guarantee to the lessor, against loss of rents resulting from fire rendering the property untenable; or against loss to a tenant, where his lease does not exempt him therefrom, by reason of an obligation to pay rent while the premises, as the result of fire, remain untenable (155 Cal. 521); or to vendors, against loss of rentals in case the vendee fails to make certain improvements on realty and complete certain buildings within a specified time. 1 Joyce, Insurance, 2nd ed., 110, 111; 228 Pa. 373. Insurance against loss of rentals is in the nature of or analogous to insurance on profits, (38 Ins. L. J. 491), and also to a valued policy. Id.; 155 Cal. 521.

Strike Insurance: A contract whereby, for a consideration, the insurer agrees to indemnify and guarantee firms, corporations or other persons carrying on manufacturing, against damage or loss, directly or indirectly, resulting from any interference with, or suspension or interruption of business or the use and operation, wholly or partly of a manufacturing establishment by reason of employees strike. 1 Joyce, Insurance, 2nd ed., 111; 83 Conn. 393.

Title Insurance. A contract to indemnify the owner or mortgagee of real estate from loss by reason of defective titles, liens, or incumbrances.

Answers to questions in applications for such policies are held to amount to a warranty and the question of materiality cannot be raised; 50 Minn. 429.

Where a title insurance company undertook to defend the interest of insured in the premises against a lien, it was bound to protect him through all stages of the proceeding to enforce the lien, as well after as before judgment therein, or notify him that it could not do so, and furnish him necessary information of the status of the proceeding in time to enable him to protect himself; and if, after giving such notice, the company defended the proceeding, but thereafter abandoned the defence, it was necessary for it to give insured another such notice; 66 N. W. Rep. (Minn.) 844.

Where an insurer agrees to indemnify a mortgagee against loss not exceeding $2,200 by reason of incumbrances, and to defend the land against such claims, a loss occurring by reason of the negligence of the insurer is not limited to the $2,200; 62 N. W. Rep. (Minn.) 287.

Under a title insurance policy, the fact that the conveyancing was done, not by the insurer but by the conveyancer of the insured, was held no defence, and the right of the insurer to do conveyancing, draw deeds, write wills, or the like, was denied, and their action in assuming such right, unwarranted by their charter, was declared to be a usurpation on the commonwealth; 9 Pa. Co. Ct. Rep. 634.

In cases of defective title, or an incumbrance requiring removal, the insured would be entitled, in an action on the policy, to recover the costs and expenses incurred in curing the defect or removing the incumbrance; but in case of total loss of title the value of the property lost is the measure of damages, and where the insured had been compelled to pay more than the amount of the policy to get a good title, judgment was entered for that sum; id.

When the title was insured under a policy to the mortgagee and the latter bought in the property at a foreclosure sale, the purchase did not cancel the mortgage so as to annul the policy, but the insurer was liable to redeem the property from a sale under prior mechanic's liens; 70 Fed. Rep. 194.

See LIEN; MORTGAGE; TITLE; WARRANTY.

Tontine. A system of insurance which under various forms is based upon the idea of a loan or investment of property for the benefit of a number of persons, the income at first being divided among all and the shares of members who die passing not to their own legal representatives but to increase the interest of the surviving member, until, at last, after the number of members has gradually diminished by successive deaths, the last survivor takes the whole income, or, if such be the terms agreed upon, the whole principal. The system took its name from Lorenzo Tonti, an Italian of the seventeenth century, who first conceived the idea and put it in practice. Merlin, Repert.; Dalloz, Dict.; 5 Watts 351.

A policy of this character was the subject of litigation in the Massachusetts Supreme Court in a case in which the system is illustrated. It was to continue ten years if the insured should so long live, but in case of his death before that time, the dividends would not inure to the benefit of his estate, but be held by the company for the benefit of other policy holders and forfeited by him. The estate of the deceased received only the amount of the policy, which, however, would be forfeited for non-payment of premiums during the tontine term; policies of this character are kept in classes of ten, fifteen, or twenty years, called respectively the tontine periods, and accounts are kept with the funds of each class to ascertain the amount due upon each policy at the expiration of its tontine term, at which time the surplus profits are apportioned equitably among such policies as complete the term; 145 Mass. 56. Under such an insurance the failure of the company to place all dividends accruing upon a policy in a reserve fund in accordance with the terms of the policy did not excuse the non-performance of his contract by the insured, and a suit by such policy holder for an accounting by the company cannot be maintained on the ground of the failure to keep and invest the fund accruing from the dividends separately; 101 N. Y. 828. No trust relation exists between the company and the insured but it is simply one of contract measured by the terms of the policy; 50 N. Y. 610; 78 Id. 114; 98 Id. 637. The situation of the parties is that of debtor and creditor merely, the amount of the debt being determined by the equitable apportionment to be made by the corporation through its officers; 101 N. Y. 421; 145 Mass. 56. The apportionment of the fund is not absolutely conclusive upon the policy holders. It is prima facie right, but may be shown to be based on erroneous principles; id. The rights under such a policy being absolutely vested, the possession by another of the evidence of their rights cannot change or affect them; 108 U. S. 498.

Workmen's Industrial Insurance; State Insurance; Compulsory Insurance; Workmen's Compensation: These terms mean those statutory provisions which cover the relation of master and servant and industrial accidents suffered by employees. The several systems embrace accidents, non-fatal or fatal to employees, sickness, unemployment, old age, and invalidity. Except where such enactments provide for insurance which is non-compulsory, either expressed or implied, they relate rather to economic or sociologic conditions than to the contract of insurance or to the principles governing that contract, or, at the most, they create new remedies or are but an evolution of the employer's liability principle. These enactments, in their general nature are designated as either compulsory or elective or voluntary insurance or purely compensation laws, with an element that might be construed as coercive or in the nature of a penalty. 1 Joyce, Insurance, 2nd ed., 88 et seq.; 147 Wis. 327.

INSURANCE AGENT. An agent for effecting insurance may be such by appointment or the recognition of his acts done as such; 2 Phill. Ins. § 1848; 4 Cow.

645. He may be agent for either of the parties to the policy, or for distinct purposes for both; 16 T. B. Monr. 252; 20 Barb. 68.

An insurance agent's powers may be more or less extensive according to the express or implied stipulations and understandings between him and his principals. They may be for filling up and issuing policies signed in blank by his principals; for transmitting applications to his principals filled up by himself, as their agent or that of the applicant, for receiving and transmitting premiums, for adjusting and settling losses, or granting liberties and making new stipulations; or for any one or more of these purposes; 19 N. Y. 305; 25 Conn. 53, 465, 542; 12 La. 122; 37 N. H. 35; 12 Md. 348; 1 Grant, Cas. 472; 23 Pa. 50, 72; 26 id. 50; 82 Tex. 631; 23 Or. 578.

A general agent is one who represents the insurer in the conduct of the business generally in a particular place or territory. The powers of the general agent are thus stated by Dwight, Com., in 65 N. Y. 6. "It is clear that a person authorized to accept risks, to agree upon and settle the terms of insurance, and carry them into effect by issuing and renewing policies, must be regarded as the general agent of the company." (43 Barb. 551.) The possession of blank policies and renewal receipts, signed by the president and secretary, is evidence of a general agency. (40 Barb. 292.) The power of such an agent of a stock company is plenary as to the amount and nature of the risk, the rate of premium, and generally as to the terms and conditions, and he may make such memoranda and indorsements, modifying the general provisions of the policy, and even inconsistent therewith, as in his discretion seems proper, before the policy is delivered, and in some cases even afterward. (May, Ins. 129.) He may also insert, by memorandum or indorsement, a description of the property inconsistent with the description of the same contained in the application, and such change will be effectual to protect the insured, although the policy itself provides that all conditions named in the application are to be fully complied with and that the application shall be a part of the policy, and a warranty on the part of the insured. (May, Ins. 129; 5 Gray 497.)

An agent holding a commission from an insurance company authorizing him to take risks generally, without placing any limitation thereon, either as to the kinds of risks or as to the territory within which they may be, is a general agent; and the fact that the policy provides that, in any matter relating to the insurance, no person shall be deemed the agent of the company unless authorized in writing, and that the agent's commission states that he shall be subject to the rules of the company, and to such instructions as may be given him from time to time, do not impose on one dealing with the agent a duty to ascertain his authority to issue a policy on a risk extra-hazardous and located in a place other than the town in which is situated the agent's office; 43 N. E. Rep. (Ind.) 41.

The resident agent of an insurance company having general authority to issue policies and renewals, fix rates and accept risks, collect premiums and cancel insurance, and perform all the duties of a recording agent, is a general agent for the locality; 56 Ill. App. 629. If the agent acts as such for both the company and the insured the contract may be avoided by either party who, at the time of the contract, did not know of such business agency for the other party or had, not knowing the facts, ratified it; 40 Pac. Rep. (Colo.) 147.

When an insurance agent solicited business in an adjoining state, assumed to act with full authority, received the premium and issued the policy, he may be considered as a general agent and not a special agent without authority to make the contract; 33 Pac. Rep. (Or.) 683.

It was held in a recent federal case that before the execution of a policy, the power and authority of a local and soliciting agent are co-extensive with the business entrusted to his care, and his positive knowledge as to material facts and his acts and declarations within the scope of his employment are obligatory on his principal, unless restricted by limitations well known to the other party at the time of the transaction; 74 Fed. Rep. 114.

The powers of agents were extensively discussed by the Kansas supreme court, which said:

"The bulk of the fire insurance business of the state is done by eastern companies, who are represented here by agents." "It is a matter of no small moment therefore that the exact measure and limit of the powers of these agents be understood. All the assured knows about the company is generally through the agent. All the information as to the powers of, and limitations upon, the agent is received from him. Practically, the agent is the principal in the making of the contract. It seems to us therefore that the rule may be properly thus laid down that an agent authorized to issue policies of insurance and consummate the contract binds his principal by every act, agreement, representation, or waiver, within the ordinary scope and limit of insurance business which is not known by the insured to be beyond the authority granted to the agent;" 43 Kan. 497; s. c. 23 Pac. Rep. 637; and it was held in that case that an insurance company might, through its agents, by a parol contract, waive provisions stated in the policy with reference to the manner of altering or waiving its terms and conditions; 33 Mich. 143; the court, in considering the question whether an agent of a company might change by parol the conditions of a policy wherein it was provided that it could only be done upon the consent of the company written thereon, held that a written bargain is of no higher legal degree than a parol one. "Either may vary or discharge the other, and there can be no more force in an agreement in writing not to agree by parol than in a parol agreement not to agree in writing. Every such agreement is ended by the new one which contradicts it;" 11 Kan. 533; 49 Kan. 78.

"Where insurance companies deal with the community through a local agency, persons having transactions with the company are entitled to assume, in the absence of knowledge as to the agent's authority, that the acts and declarations of the agent are valid as if they proceeded directly from the company;" 20 Or. 547.

An attempted restriction upon the power of the officer or agents, acting within the scope of their general authority, to waive provisions of the policy, unless such waiver is written upon the policy itself, is ineffectual; 65 N. W. Rep. (Wis.) 742.

A provision in the application or in the policy making the person procuring the application the agent of the insured and not of the company, cannot change the legal status of such person as agent of the company or the law of agency if he is in fact the agent of the company; 23 S. E. Rep. (W. Va.) 738.

A broker was held to be the agent of the company where he solicited applications which were sent by him to the agent, by whom policies were sent to the broker and the premiums were charged to the broker; in such case the finding by the jury that the broker was the duly authorized agent of the company within the meaning of the provisions in the policy requiring payments of the premiums to the company or its duly authorized agent within a certain time, will not be disturbed; 83 Atl. Rep. (N. H.) 515. In the absence of direct proof of the broker's authority to act for the insurer or insured he may establish his agency by showing that the act relied on was within the scope of his authority; 84 Atl. Rep. (Md.) 878. Where insurance is procured through a broker, though at his solicitation, he is the agent of the insured and his acts will not bind the company, but when his employment extends only to the procurement of the policy he ceases to be an agent of the insured on the execution and delivery; id. A broker employed by a firm of insurance agents to solicit business on commission, having a desk in their office, is not such an agent as that notice to him by a policy holder is notice to the firm; 49 Hun 610; and one is a mere broker who only represented the company in a single transaction and whose name did not appear on the policy, though he may have told the insurer that he represented the company, collected the premiums, and delivered the policy; 54 N. W. Rep. (Minn.) 1117.

An agent has no power to delegate his authority so as to impose a liability on the company; 15 Can. L. T. 49; 34 Atl. Rep. (N. J.) 931.

But an insurance company is bound by the acts of a clerk of its agent in accepting risks and issuing policies against the same in the performance of his duties, and one dealing with the clerk, as such, is not bound to inquire into his authority as to those matters; id.

An agent's solicitor who took applications on which policies were issued has been held the agent of the company in effecting such insurance; 31 Atl. Rep. (Pa.) 988.

It has been held that a general agent (appointed by contract in this case) had power to waive cash payments of premiums and extend credit; 66 N. W. Rep. (Neb.) 445; 36 S. W. Rep. (Ark.) 1051; to receive notice of loss; 42 N. E. Rep. (Ind.) 286; waive proofs of loss; 2 Mo. App. Rep. 1375; 99 Mo. 50; contra, 65 N. W. Rep. (Minn.) 635. An agent who has power to adjust losses may by parol waive formal proofs of loss; 40 N. Y. Supp. 800. He cannot waive the iron safe clause, when that authority is expressly withheld from him by the policy; 35 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 955. He can insure goods subject to chattel mortgage by indorsement on, or annexation to, the policy, though it is forbidden in the printed conditions; 40 N. Y. Supp. 300. Local agents cannot bind the company by consenting to vacancies; 32 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 583; or that insurance on a risk, not usually taken by the company should take effect from the application (nor will it matter that a special agent, having no power to contract, was present and approved); 41 Pac. Rep. (Cal.) 298.

An agent, during the continuance of his agency, may at any time, even after loss, correct a policy issued by him by inserting the property included in the contract but omitted by mistake from the policy; 67 N. W. Rep. (Ia.) 577. The agent of a company, whose authority has been revoked by the execution by it of an assignment for the benefit of creditors, has thereafter no authority to cancel policies and pay rebates or to set off rebates against a claim by the assignee for premiums collected; 35 N. Y. Supp. 612. The agent is liable for failure to cancel policy when directed to do so; 1 Pa. Super. Ct. 320; and when directed to cancel or reinsure a risk cannot reinsure in another company for which he is agent without its assent; 138 N. Y. 446.

It was held that a lodge officer who receives money for dues to the corporation does so as agent and must pay it over to the company. He cannot return it to those from whom it was collected because he fears that his principal may not be able to perform the contract; 52 Leg. Int. 473.

Notice to an agent of matters within his commission is such to the company; 16 Barb. 159; 1 E. L. & Eq. 140; 6 Gray 14; 50 Kan. 449; 111 N. C. 45; 142 N. Y. 882. See May, Ins. Ch. v.

The insurer has been held bound or estopped by the knowledge or action of or notice to the agent in the following cases: By his knowledge of foreclosure proceedings; 65 N. W. Rep. (Wis.) 742; of the existence of a mortgage, and his attaching a clause making the loss payable to the mortgagee; 18 So. Rep. (Miss.) 414; of a chattel mortgage; 149 N. Y. 477; of incurrence; 36 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 125; 87 N. W. Rep. (Wis.) 719; 40 N. Y. Supp. 800; where the agent is informed as to incurrences and fills out the application, describing the property as not incumbered; 23 S. E. Rep. (W. Va.) 738; 83 Atl. Rep. (N. H.) 731; where the agent, having power to issue and cancel policies, allowed a policy to remain in force after notice of an incumbrance; 39 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 810; where the application stated that no other company had refused to insure, and the agent had notice to the contrary; id.; where the agent incorrectly stated the title of the insured, after being correctly informed thereof; 44 Pac. Rep. (Col.) 756; where the agent was acquainted with premises of the insured and could have made an accurate description through his knowledge of them, the company is estopped to avoid its obligation by showing a misdescription of the property; 36 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 146. Where the insured makes true answers to the questions in an application, the validity of the insurance is not affected by the falsity of the answers inserted by the agent; 37 N. Y. Supp. 146; 17 Misc. Rep. 115; 173 Pa. 18. In such case he will be regarded as the agent of the company, and not of the applicant and his knowledge of the falsity of the answer will be imputed to the company; 25 S. E. Rep. (Ga.) 333. The company is not estopped by the agent's knowledge when that is acquired by him by virtue of his relation as attorney for the insured in a transaction with which the company was not connected; 71 Fed. Rep. 473; or when the knowledge of the agent is acquired after the issuance of the policy; 67 N. W. Rep. (Ia.) 577; 77 Fed. Rep. 114. Or where the notice was to one of a firm of insurance agents, another member of which issued the policy in suit and was given several months before the policy was applied for; 35 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 829; and it was held that when the policy provided that no agent could stipulate for a modification of its provisions not brought to the knowledge of his principal officer, knowledge of the general superintendent that material statements in the application were false was not knowledge of the company; 66 Conn. 227. See, generally, an extended discussion and collection of cases on the authority of insurance agents, 34 Am. L. Reg. N. s. 654; WARRANTY.

INSURANCE BROKER. A broker through whose agency insurances are effected. 3 Kent's Com. 260. See INSURANCE AGENT.

INSURANCE COMPANY. A company which issues policies of insurance, — an incorporated company, and either a stock company, a mutual one, or a mixture of the two. In a stock company, the members or stockholders pay in a certain capital which is liable for the contracts of the company. In a mutual company, the members are themselves the parties insured; in other words, all the members contribute premiums to the fund, which is liable for indemnity to each member for loss, according to the terms of the contract. In the mixed class, certain members, who may or may not be insured, contribute a certain amount of the capital, for which they hold certificates of shares, and are entitled to interest on the same at a stipulated rate, or to an agreed share of the surplus receipts, after the payment of losses and expenses, to be estimated at certain periods.

There are in some states companies formed upon the plan combining a stock capital with mutual insurance and issuing both bonds of mutual insurance and stock policies based upon the capital. In New York it has been held that, under the statutes then in force regulating the formation of insurance companies and their organization, they could not be organized upon this plan so as to accept premium notes from some customers and cash premiums from others and assess the premium notes to pay losses in either branch of the business; 28 Barb. 578. See also 18 N. Y. 810.

Beneficial societies are sometimes held to be insurance companies within the meaning of the statutes regulating such companies; 46 Fed. Rep. 489; and see 72 Mo. 146; 105 Mass. 149; 32 N. W. Rep. (Minn.) 797; 118 Ill. 492. In Iowa it is said that where the main purpose of an order is that of life insurance, and insurance against sickness and disability, whatever purposes it may have, it is amenable to the laws of that state relating to insurance companies; it therefore must comply with the requirements of the statutes of that state (if the order is organized under the laws of another state), as to foreign insurance companies, before it can do business in that state; 78 Ia. 747. But in Wisconsin an association incorporated for the purpose of fraternal benevolent insurance upon the co-operative or assessment plan was a charitable and benevolent order within the meaning of the statute which, in line with the defined policy of the state, was exempted from the general laws relating to life insurance; 75 Wis. 832. In Pennsylvania a foreign mutual aid association of the same character was held not liable for violation of the laws regulating insurance companies; 94 Pa. 481; and the same association was held not to be a mutual insurance company in Ohio, the state of its incorporation; 26 Ohio 10; so in many other states such associations are held not to be insurance companies within the purview of the general insurance laws of the state; 35 Kan. 51; 82 Ky. 103; 59 Ia. 125; 90 Ill. 186; 62 How. Pr. 886; 142 Mass. 224; 4 Mo. App. 429; 72 Mich. 603; 50 N. W. Rep. (Minn.) 1028. In Pennsylvania it was explicitly decided that an association organized not to do business for profit or gain but to aid pecuniarily the widows, orphans, heirs, and devisees of its members, is not an insurance company; 154 Pa. 99.

INSURANCE POLICY. See POLICY.

INSURED. A person whose life or property interest is covered by a policy of insurance. See INSURANCE.

INSURER. The underwriter in a policy of insurance; the party agreeing to make compensation to the other. Sometimes applied improperly to denote the party insured. See INSURANCE.

INSURGENTS. Rebels contending in arms against the government of their country who have not been recognized by other countries as belligerents. Insurgents have no standing in international law until recognized as belligerents. When recognized as belligerents the rules relating to contraband and other rules of war apply to them, but until so recognized their acts are merely the acts of individuals which may be piracy or any other crime according to the circumstances. The United States and other countries have statutes regulating dealings with insurgents in other countries and filibustering expeditions, as they are called, and expeditions to supply insurgents with arms and ammunition are forbidden; Snow, Lect. Int. Law 132.

In general insurgents have no belligerent rights. Their war vessels are not received in foreign ports, they cannot establish blockades which third powers will respect, and they must not interfere with the commerce of other nations. In the older books on international law they were usually treated as pirates. Their hostilities are never regarded as legal war. As late as 1885 in The Ambrose Light, 25 Fed. Rep. 408, this subject was discussed and the authorities fully reviewed, and it was held that the liability of a vessel to seizure as piratical, turned wholly on the question whether the insurgents had obtained any previous recognition of belligerent rights, either from their own or any other government. The court only refrained from entering a decree of forfeiture of the vessel, as a pirate, because of an implied recognition of the insurgents as belligerents, contained in a letter of the secretary of state of the date of the seizure. In recent years, however, a certain amount of recognition has been accorded to insurgents. In 1894, when insurgents were bombarding Rio Janeiro, Admiral Benham took the position that American merchant vessels, moving about the harbor and discharging cargoes, did so at their own risk. But any attempt on the part of the insurgents to prevent legitimate movements of our merchant vessels at other times was not to be permitted. Of this official action it has been said: "This establishment of this point, which seemed to be the logical outcome of recent practice, almost recognizes an imperfect status, or right of action ad hoc, for insurgents;" Snow, Lect. Int. L. 25.

In U. S. v. Trumbull, 48 Fed. Rep. 99, it was held that insurgents may purchase arms in the United States without violating U. S. Rev. Stat. § 5283, provided the arms are not designed to constitute any part of the furnishings or fittings of the vessel which carries them. This case was a prosecution in connection with the Itata which was also libelled for forfeiture by the United States. There was much discussion as to the meaning of the word "people" as used in the statute. It had been previously said to be one of the denominations of a foreign power; 6 Pet. 467; and that a vessel could not be said to be in the service of a foreign people, etc., unless they had received recognition as belligerents; 37 Fed. Rep. 800; the case of The Salvador, L. R. 3 C. P. 218, cited to the contrary, is distinguishable as resting on the broader provisions of the English foreign enlistment act; but in the Itata case the question was not raised by the facts, and it was simply held that the neutrality laws did not cover the case of a vessel which receives arms and munitions of war, in this country, with intent to carry them to a party of insurgents in a foreign country, but not with intent that they shall constitute any part of the fittings or furnishings of the vessel herself; and that she could not be condemned as piratical on the ground that she is in the employ of an insurgent party, which has not been recognized by our government as having belligerent rights; 56 Fed. Rep. 503, aff. 49 id. 646. See also 5 Wall. 62; 6 id. 91; Snow, Lect. Int. L. 135.

In The Three Friends, 166 U. S. 1, the vessel was seized for a violation of U. S. Rev. St. § 5283, and was released by the district court upon the ground, inter alia, that the libel did not show that the vessel was fitted out and armed with intent that it should "be employed in the service of a foreign prince or state, or of any colony, district, or people with whom the United States are at peace." The libel was amended so as to read "in the service of a certain people, to wit, certain people then engaged in armed resistance to the government of the King of Spain, in the island of Cuba." The district court held that the word "people" was used in an individual and personal sense and not as an organized and recognized political power in any way corresponding to a state, prince, colony, or district. The supreme court reversed the decree, holding that the vessel had been invidiously released, and that the word "people" in the statute covers any insurgent or insurrectionary body conducting hostilities, although its belligerency has not been recognized; and although the political department of the government had not recognized the existence of a de facto belligerent power engaged in hostility with Spain, it had recognized the existence of insurrectionary warfare, and the case sharply illustrated the distinction between recognition of belligerency, and of a condition of political revolt. See BELLIGERENCY.

INSURRECTION. A rebellion of citizens or subjects of a country or state against its government.

Any open and active opposition of a number of persons to the executive of the laws of the United States, of so formidable a character as to defy, for the time being, the authority of the government, constitutes an insurrection, even though not accompanied by bloodshed and not of sufficient magnitude to make success possible; 62 Fed. Rep. 828.

As to the distinctions involved in the several words used to express organized resistance to governmental authority, see

REBELLION.

The constitution of the United States, art. 1, s. 8, gives power to congress "to provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions."

Whenever the United States shall be invaded, or be in imminent danger of invasion, from any foreign nation or Indian tribe, it shall be lawful for the president of the United States to call forth such number of the militia of the state, or states, most convenient to the place of danger or scene of action, as he may judge necessary to repel such invasion, and to issue his orders, for that purpose, to such officer or officers of the militia as he shall think proper. And in case of an insurrection in any state against the government thereof, it shall be lawful for the president of the United States, on application of the legislature of such state, or of the executive (when the legislature cannot be convened), to call forth such number of the militia of any other state or states, as may be applied for, as he may judge sufficient to suppress such insurrection; U. S. Rev. Stat. pp. 287, 1029.

Whenever the laws of the United States shall be opposed, or the execution thereof obstructed, in any state, by combinations too powerful to be suppressed by the ordinary course of judicial proceedings, or by the powers vested in the marshals by this act, it shall be lawful for the president of the United States to call forth the militia of such state, or of any other state or states, as may be necessary to suppress such combinations, and to cause the laws to be duly executed; and the use of militia so to be called forth may be continued, if necessary, until the expiration of thirty days after the commencement of the next session of congress.

Whenever it may be necessary, in the judgment of the president, to use the military force hereby directed to be called forth, the president shall forthwith, by proclamation, command such insurgents to disperse, and retire peaceably to their respective abodes, within a limited time; U. S. Rev. Stat. § 5520.

The president may declare by proclamation whenever the inhabitants of any state or part thereof are found by him to be in a state of insurrection, that such inhabitants are in a state of insurrection against the United States; and thereupon all commercial intercourse between them and the citizens of the United States shall be unlawful and shall cease so long as such condition of hostility continues, and all goods and chattels, wares and merchandise coming from such state or section into other parts of the United States or proceeding from other parts of the United States to such state or section together with the vessel or vehicle conveying the same shall be forfeited to the United States; but commercial intercourse may, in the discretion of the president, be permitted and licensed with loyal persons residing in such insurrectionary section, so far as to supply such persons with necessities; U. S. Rev. Stat. §§ 5520-5524.

Capital cases for insurrection by a citizen of the United States against the government of any foreign countries having treaties with the United States may be tried before the minister of the United States in such country; id. § 4090. See INSURGENTS. CIVIL WAR.

INTAKERS. In English Law. The name given to receivers of goods stolen in Scotland, who take them to England. 9 Hen. V. c. 27.

INTEGER (Lat.). Whole; untouched. Res integra means a question which is new and undecided. 2 Kent 177.

INTEMPERATE. If the habit is to drink to intoxication whenever occasion offers, and sobriety or abstinence is the exception, then the charge of intemperate habits is established, and it is not necessary that this custom should be an everyday rule; 63 Ala. 152. See 76 Ill. 213; 9 R. 1. 355. See HABITUAL DRUNKARD; DRUNKENNESS.

"Sober and temperate" does not imply total abstinence from intoxicating liquor. The moderate, temperate use of intoxicating liquors is consistent with sobriety. Anderson; 9 J. R. 253. See DRUNKENNESS.

INTENDANT. One who has the charge, management, or direction of some office, department, or public business.

INTENDED TO BE RECORDED. This phrase is frequently used in conveying, in deeds which recite other deeds which have not been recorded. In Pennsylvania, it has been construed to be a covenant, on the part of the grantor, to procure the deed to be recorded in a reasonable time; 2 Rawle 14.

INTENDENTA. In Spanish Law. The immediate agent of the minister of finance, or the chief and principal director of the different branches of the revenue, appointed in the various departments in each of the provinces of the Spanish monarchy. See Escribano, Intendente.

INTENDMENT OF LAW. The true meaning, the correct understanding, or intention, of the law; a presumption or inference made by the courts. Co. Litt. 78.

It is an intendment of law that every man is innocent until he is proved to be guilty; see PRESUMPTION OF INNOCENCE; that every one will act for his own advantage; that every officer acts in his office with fidelity; that the children of a married woman, born during the coverture, are the children of the husband. See BASTARDY. Many things are intended after verdict, in order to support a judgment; but intendment cannot supply the want of certainty in a charge in an indictment for a crime; 5 Co. 121. See COM. DIG. PLEADER (C 25); (S 31); Dane, Abr. Index; 14 Viner, Abr. 449; 1 Halst. Ch. N. J. 132.

INTENT. See COMMON INTENT. CRIMINAL INTENT; LEGISLATIVE INTENT.

INTENTIO (Lat.). In Civil Law. The formal complaint or claim of a plaintiff before the praetor. "Reus exceptionem velut intentionem implet: reus id est, reus in exceptione actor est." The defendant makes up his plea as if it were a declaration; i. e. the defendant is plaintiff in the plea.

In Old English Law. A count or declaration in a real action (narratio). Bracton, lib. 4, tr. 2, c. 2; Fleta, lib. 4, c. 7; Du Cange. See FORMULAE.

INTENTION. A design, resolve, or determination of the mind.

In Criminal Law. To render an act criminal, a wrongful intent must exist; 1 Leach 280; 7 C. & P. 428; Paine 18; 2 McLean 14; 2 Ind. 207; 30 Me. 132; 1 Rice 145; 4 Harring. 315; 19 Vt. 564; 3 Dev. 114; 90 N. C. 741. And with this must be combined a wrongful act; as mere intent is not punishable; 9 Co. 81; 2 C. & P. 414; 2 Mass. 138; 2 B. Monr. 417; 10 Vt. 338; 1 Dev. & B. 121; Gilp. 806; 5 Cra. 311; but see Jebb 48 n.; R. & R. 308; 1 Lew. Cr. Cas. 42; and generally, perhaps always, the intent and act must concur in point of time; 1 Bish. Cr. L. § 207; Cl. Cr. L. 45, 238, 285; but a wrongful intent may render an act otherwise innocent criminal; 1 C. & K. 600; C. & Marsh. 236; 2 Allen 181; 1 East, Pl. Cr. 255; 6 Conn. 9; 22 id. 153.

Generally, where any wrongful act is committed, the law will infer conclusively that it was intentionally committed; 2 Gratt. 584; 4 Ga. 14; 2 Allen 179; 103 N. Y. 380; as the intent to take life may be inferred from the character of the assault, the use of a deadly weapon and the attendant circumstances; 94 Ala. 85; 82 Wis. 571; and also that the natural, necessary, and even probable consequences were intended; 3 Maule & S. 11, 15; 5 C. & P. 538; 3 Wash. C. C. 515; 13 Wend. 87; 3 Pick. 304; 2 Gratt. 594; 1 Bay 245; 9 Humphr. 66; 1 Ov. 305; 98 U. S. 67.

Generally speaking, when a statute makes an act indictable, irrespective of guilty knowledge, ignorance of fact is no defence; 118 Mass. 441; L. R. 2 C. C. 154; 56 Mo. 540; see 41 N. J. L. 552; contra, 33 Ohio St. 456; s. c. 30 Am. Rep. 614, where the subject is fully treated. See IGNORANCE.

When by the common law, or by the provision of a statute, a particular intention is essential to an offence, or a criminal act is attempted but not accomplished, and the evil intent only can be punished, it is necessary to allege the intent with distinctness and precision, and to support the allegations with proof. On the other hand, if the offence does not rest merely in tendency, or in an attempt to do a certain act with a wicked purpose, but consists in doing an unlawful or criminal act, the evil intention will be presumed, and need not be alleged, or, if alleged, it is a mere formal averment, which need not be proved; Bigelow, C. J., 2 Allen 180. See 1 Chitty, Cr. Law 233; 6 East 474; 5 Cush. 306; 158 U. S. 603; 93 N. C. 616.

This proof may be of external and visible acts and conduct from which the jury may infer the fact; 8 Co. 146; or it may be by proof of an act committed, as, in case of burglary with intent to steal, proof of burglary and stealing is conclusive; 5 C. & P. 510; 9 id. 729; 2 Mood. & R. 40. When a man intending one wrong fails, and accidentally commits another, he will, except where the particular intent is a substantive part of the crime, be held to have intended the act he did commit; 13 Wend. 159; 21 Pick. 515; 1 Gall. 624; 1 C. & K. 746; Rosc. Cr. Ev. 272.

Where intent is a material ingredient of the crime it is necessary to be averred, but it may always be averred in general terms; 153 U. S. 584, 608.

In Contracts. An intention to enter into the contract is necessary; hence the person must have sufficient mind to enable him to intend.

In Wills and Testaments. The intention of the testator governs unless the thing to be done be opposed to some unbinding rule of law; 6 Cruise, Dig. 285; 6 Pet. 68. This intention is to be gathered from the instrument, and from every part of it; 3 Ves. 105; 58 N. H. 511; 23 W. Va. 186; 103 Ill. 607; 128 Mass. 374; 60 Ala. 605; and from a later clause in preference to an earlier; 74 Me. 413; 94 Ill. 158; 62 Ala. 510. See WILLS; CONSTRUCTION.

As to statutes, see INTERPRETATION; CONSTRUCTION; STATUTES.

To Kill. If one knows, or has reason to know that to do a certain act will endanger the life of another and such act results in a death of another an "intention to kill" may be inferred. 140 Ky. 652, 131 S. W. 517.

INTENTIONAL. The word "intentional" refers alone to the person inflicting the injury, and if as to the person injured the injury was unforeseen, unexpected, not brought about through his agency designedly, or was without his foresight or was a casualty or mishap not intended to befall him, then the occurrence was accidental. 99 Ky. 445, 36 S. W. 170.

INTENTIONE. A writ that lay against him who entered into lands after the death of a tenant in dower, or for life, etc., and held out to him in reversion or remainder. Fitz. N. B. 203.

INTER (Lat.). Between; among.

INTER ALIA (Lat.). Among other things; as, "the said premises, which, inter alia, Titius granted to Caius."

INTER ALIOS (Lat.). Between other parties, who are strangers to the proceeding in question.

INTER APICES JURIS. See APEX JURIS.

INTER CAETEROS. Among others; in a general clause; not by name (nomina-tim). A term applied in the civil law to clauses of disinheritance in a will. Inst. 2, 18, 1; id. 2, 13, 3.

INTER CANEM ET LUPUM (Lat.) between the dog and the wolf. The twilight; because then the dog seeks his rest, and the wolf his prey. Co. 3d Inst. 63.

INTER PARTES (Lat.) between the parties. A phrase signifying an agreement professing in the outset, and before any stipulations are introduced, to be made between such and such persons; as, for example, "This indenture, made the — day of —, 1848, between A B of the one part, and C D of the other." It is true that every contract is in one sense inter partes, because to be valid there must be two parties at least; but the technical sense of this expression is as above mentioned; Addison, Contr. 9.

This being a solemn declaration, the effect of such introduction is to make all the covenants comprised in a deed to be covenants between the parties and none others: so that should a stipulation be found in the body of a deed by which "the said A B covenants with E F to pay him one hundred dollars," the words "with E F" are inoperative, unless they have been used to denote for whose benefit the stipulation may have been made, being in direct contradiction with what was previously declared, and C D alone can sue for the non-payment; it being a maxim that where two opposite intentions are expressed in a contract, the first in order shall prevail; 8 Mod. 116; Rolle 106; 7 M. & W. 63. But this rule does not apply to simple contracts inter partes; 2 D. & R. 277; 3 id. 273.

When there are more than two sides to a contract inter partes, for example, a deed, as, when it is made between A B of the first part, C D of the second, and E F of the third, there is no objection to one covenanting with another in exclusion of the third. See 5 Co. 182; 8 Taunt. 245; 4 Q. B. 207.

INTER SE, INTER SESE (Lat.). Among themselves. Story, Partn. § 405.

INTER-STATE LAW. See EXTRADITION; FUGITIVE FROM JUSTICE; COMMERCE; Rorer, Int. St. Law; 10 Am. L. Reg. n.s. 416.

INTER VIVOS (Lat.). Between living persons; as a gift inter vivos, which is a gift made by one living person to another. It is a rule that a fee cannot pass by grant or transfer inter vivos, without appropriate words of inheritance. 2 Pres. Est. 64. See DONATIO CAUSA MORTIS; GIFTS INFLUENCE.

INTERCALARE. In the Civil Law. To introduce or insert among or between others; to introduce a day or month into the calendar; to intercalate. Dig. 50, 16, 98, pr.

INTERCEDERE. In the Civil Law. To become bound for another's debt.

INTERCHANGEABLY. By way of exchange or interchange. This term properly denotes the method of signing deeds, leases, contracts, etc., executed in duplicate, where each party signs the copy he delivers to the others.

INTERCOMMON. To enjoy a right of common mutually with the inhabitants of a contiguous town, vill, or manor. When the commons of two adjacent manors join, and the inhabitants of both have immemorially fed their cattle promiscuously on each other's common, this is called intercommoning. 2 Bla. Com. 33; Termes de la Ley.

INTERDICT. In Civil Law. The formula according to which the praetor ordered or forbade anything to be done in a cause concerning true or quasi possession until it should be decided definitely who had a right to it. But in modern civil law it is an extraordinary action, by which a summary decision is had in questions of possession or quasi possession. Heineccius, Elem. Jur. Civ. § 1287. Interdicts are either prohibitory, restitutory, or exhibitory; the first being a prohibition, the second a decree for restoring possession lost by force, the third a decree for the exhibiting of accounts, etc.; id. 1290; Howe, Stud. Civ. L. 252; Dig. 4, 15, 2. It is said by the writers of the Institutes that some (including Gaius) thought that from the true etymology of the word interdict, it should be applied only to prohibitory orders, and that those which were restitutory or exhibitory were properly decreta, but that "the usage has obtained of calling them all interdicts as they are pronounced between two parties, inter duos dicuntur." id. Interdicts were decided by the praetor without the intervention of a judez, differing in this from actions (actiones).

According to Isidorus, however, the derivation is from quod interim dicitur. See Voc. Jur. Utr.; Sand. Just. 489; Mac-kelvey, Civ. Law §§ 258-64. In the formulary procedure the interdict was preliminary and conservative, and afterwards made final or not according to the result of the litigation. After the disappearance of this procedure, as a recent writer says, "no doubt the remedies remained by the forms of action which succeeded. Some of the most important of these were really injunctions, either prohibitory or mandatory." Howe, Stud. Civ. L. 263. Like an injunction, the interdict was merely personal in its effects; and it had also another similarity to it, by being temporary or perpetual. Dig. 43. 1. 1, 8, 4. This similitude prompts the suggestion by the author last quoted, that "it is easy to perceive how they may have been adopted from the Roman and Canon law into the equity practice of England, and thence into that of America;" Howe, Stud. Civ. L. 254. See Story, Eq. Jur. § 885; Halifax, Anal. ch. 6. See INJUNCTION.

In Ecclesiastical Law. An ecclesiastical censure, by which divine services are prohibited either to particular persons or particular places. These tyrannical edicts, issued by ecclesiastical powers, have been abolished in England since the reformation, and were never known in the United States. See 2 Burn. Eccl. Law 340. Baptism was allowed during an interdict; but the eucharist was denied, except in the article of death, and burial in consecrated ground was denied, unless without divine offices. For the ancient form of an interdict, see Tomlin's L. Dict. h. t.

INTERDICTION. A prohibition of commercial intercourse between the citizens or subjects of the country enacting or proclaiming it and some other specified country or port.

By act of March 1, 1809, congress interdicted commercial intercourse between the United States and Great Britain, and in a case arising under this act, the United States supreme court held that the term interdiction means an entire cessation, for the time being, of all trade whatever.

It has been held in England and in this country that interdiction of commerce with the port of destination is not a loss within a policy of marine insurance; 11 East 22; 6 Wheat. 176; 3 Mas. 6; contra, 4 Dall. 417; 9 East 283; 8 Wheat. 183; 12 S. & R. 440; 1 Wash. C. C. 882. See 8 Kent 293.

In Civil Law. A judicial decree, by which a person is deprived of the exercise of his civil rights.

The condition of the party who labors under this incapacity.

There can be no voluntary interdiction, as erroneously stated by some writers: the status of every person is regulated by the law, and can in no case be affected by contract.

Interdiction is the civil law proceeding by which, as by inquisition in lunacy (q. v.) under English and American law, a person is found to be incapable of the management of himself and his estate. It is devised for the special protection of the rights and persons of those who are unable to administer them themselves, and although the person interdicted is not permitted to exercise his legal rights, he is by no means deprived of their enjoyment. These rights are exercised for his benefit by a curator, who is held to a strict accountability, and the fidelity of whose administration is secured, in most cases, by a bond of security, and always by a tacit mortgage on all his property.

By the law of the twelve tables, prodigals alone could be interdicted. Curators were appointed for those afflicted with mental aberration, idiocy, or incurable diseases, qui perpetuo morbo laborant; but no decree of interdiction was pronounced against them. By the modern civil law, prodigality and profligacy are not sufficient reasons for interdiction; but whenever a person is prostrated, either by mental or physical disease, to such a degree as to be permanently disabled from administering his estate, he may be interdicted.

A decree of interdiction can be pronounced only by the court having jurisdiction of the domicile of the person to be affected. The causes assigned are imbecility, insanity, and madness.

The application may be by any relative, or wife or husband; or, in case of madness, the public law officer must apply, or in case of imbecility or insanity he may do so. The proceeding is by petition; the acts relied on are stated in writing; and the opinion of the family council is taken, the petitioners not participating. The judgment must be given at a public sitting, and, pending the proceedings, temporary administration may be provided for. Even if the application is rejected, the person against whom the proceedings are taken may be forbidden to go to law, compromise, borrow, receive payment of capital or give discharges, conveyances, or mortgages without advice of counsel appointed by the same judgment.

An appeal is provided, and there may be another examination. The decree must be duly served and recorded, and posted in the tribunal of birth. From the day of judgment all acts are void, and it may have a retroactive effect, by which previous acts are annulled.

After death a person's sanity can only be attacked if he has been interdicted, unless the insanity result from the act questioned.

A guardian or curator is appointed, as in case of minors, to which it is by statute assimilated; the husband for his wife, as of right; the wife may be appointed for her husband, in which case the family council regulate the manner of administration.

No one is compelled to act as guardian for more than ten years. The income must be used primarily to better the condition of the interdicted person. If his child marry, the family council fix the dowry. Interdiction ceases with the causes which made it necessary, and it may be withdrawn by proceedings similar to those by which it was obtained.

Such are substantially the rules on the subject of interdiction found in the law of Louisiana; Civ. Code, Tit. ix. Art. 389-426, and the French Code, Art. 489-512, Cashard's translation. They are substantially the same in all the modern codes having the civil law for their basis.

In Louisiana it has been held that mental weakness is not sufficient unless interdiction be necessary for protection of person or property; 31 La. Ann. 757; the motives of the party applying should be fully investigated; 29 id. 302; trial by jury cannot be demanded and judgment may be at chambers; 38 id. 523; a non-resident cannot be interdicted; 32 id. 679; testimony of experts does not control the court and is of little weight when they had seen defendant only once; 31 id. 757; and opinions of non-experts are of little weight; they should state facts; 36 id. 563; costs of proceeding to interdict a wife, include fees of her lawyers, and are a debt of the community; 30 id. 836.

A judge may in the exercise of a sound legal discretion, without a special statutory authority, exclude relations from a family meeting to recommend a curator, and he is not restricted to a narrow construction of the term "conflicting interest" in the statute disqualifying persons, having such an interest, for participating in the family meeting; 44 La. Ann. 1027. In the selection of a curator the family meeting is not limited to applicants, nor to persons suggested by relations of the interdict; id.

In Scotch Law. A legal restraint laid upon persons liable to be imposed upon, though having, to some extent, the exercise of reason, to prevent them from signing any deed affecting heritage, to their own prejudice, without the consent of their curators or interdictors. It is nearly superseded in practice by voluntary trusts. In cases where a trust cannot be obtained, the law relating to unconscionable bargains and to facility and circumvention is usually sufficient protection. Interdiction was either voluntary, which was generally executed in the form of a bond, obliging the grantor to do no deed affecting his estate without the consent of certain friends therein mentioned, or judicial, imposed by the court of sessions upon an action commenced by a near kinsman to the party and sometimes by the nobile officium of the court. The latter sort of interdiction must be taken off by the authority of the court which imposed it. Voluntary interdiction cannot be recalled at the pleasure of the person interdicted, but it may be: 1. By a sentence of the court of sessions declaring that there was ab initio no sufficient ground, or that it no longer exists. 2. By the joint action of the person interdicted and the interdictor. 3. The restraint ceases where the bond requires a certain number of the quorum, if they be reduced by death below that number; Ersk. Prin. I. vii. 30-32.

INTERDICTION OF FIRE AND WATER. Banishment by an order forbidding all persons to supply the person banished with fire or water, they being considered the two necessities of life. This banishment was termed by Livy legitimum exilium.

INTERDICTION SALVIANUM (Lat.) In Roman Law. The Salvian interdict. A process which lay for the owner of a farm to obtain possession of the goods from his tenant who had pledged them to him for the rent of the land. Inst. 4, 15, 3.

INTERESSE (Lat.) Interest. The interest of money; also an interest in lands.

INTERESSE TERMINI (Lat.) An interest in the term. The demise of a term in land does not vest any estate in the lessee, but gives him a mere right of entry on the land, which right is called his interest in the term, or interesse termini. See Co. Litt. 46; 2 Bla. Com. 144; 10 Viner, Abr. 348; Dane, Abr. Index; Watk. Conv. 15; 1 Washb. R. P. Index.

INTEREST (Lat.) it concerns; it is of advantage).

In Contracts. The right of property which a man has in a thing. See INSURABLE INTEREST.

On Debts. The compensation which is paid by the borrower of money to the lender for its use, and, generally, by a debtor to his creditor in recompense for his detention of the debt.

The compensation allowed by law or fixed by the parties to a contract for the use or forbearance or detention of money. 3 Tex. Civ. App. 81.

Legal interest is the rate of interest established by the law of the country, which will prevail in the absence of express stipulation; conventional interest is a certain rate agreed upon by the parties. 2 Cal. 568.

Who is bound to pay interest. The contractor who has expressly or impliedly undertaken to pay interest is, of course, bound to do so.

Executors; 12 Conn. 350; 7 S. & R. 264; administrators; 4 Gill & J. 453; 35 Miss. 321; assignees of bankrupts or insolvents; 2 W. & S. 557; but see 149 U. S. 95; guardians; 29 Ga. 82; 14 La. Ann. 764; and trustees; 1 Pick. 528; 10 Gill & J. 175; 15 Md. 75; 29 Ca. 82; 61 d. 564; 11 Cal. 71; who have kept money an unreasonable length of time; 18 Pick. 1; 29 Ga. 82; and have made or might have made it productive; 4 Gill & J. 453; 1 Pick. 530; 3 Woods 542, 724; Myrick, 8, 168; are chargeable with interest. Where a litigant claiming money as his own, was permitted to collect and retain it, subject only to the order of the court should it afterwards be decided he was not entitled to it, he is chargeable with interest; 93 Ky. 129. When a loan is negotiated, the retention of a portion of it for an unreasonable time entitles the borrower to a rebate of interest; 144 U. S. 451.

Tenants for life must pay interest on incumbrances on the estate; 4 Ves. 33; 1 Vern. 404, n.; Story, Eq. Jur. § 487; 5 Johns. Ch. 482. Where interest is reserved by contract, a mere readiness to pay will not relieve the debtor from liability therefor; 24 Pa. 110.

Who are entitled to receive interest. The lender upon an express or implied contract for interest. Executors, administrators, etc., are in some cases allowed interest for advances made by them on account of the estates under their charge; 10 Pick. 77; 6 Halst. Ch. 44. See 9 Mass. 87. The rule has been extended to trustees; 1 Binn. 488; and compound interest, even, allowed them; 16 Mass. 228.

On what claims allowed. When the debtor expressly undertakes to pay interest, he or his personal representatives having assets are bound to pay it. But if a party has accepted the principal, it has been determined that he cannot recover interest in a separate action; 1 Esp. N. P. 110; 3 Johns. 220. See 1 Campb. 50; 1 Dall. 315; 45 Me. 542; 9 Ohio St. 452.

On contracts where, from the course of dealings between the parties, a promise to pay is implied; 1 Campb. 50; 3 Brown, Ch. 436; Kirb. 207; 2 Wend. 501; 33 Ala. N. S. 459; 8 Ia. 168. On account stated or other liquidated sum, whenever the debtor knows precisely what he is to pay and when he is to pay it; 2 W. Bla. 761; 2 Ves. 385; 9 Burr. 1085; 5 Esp. 114; 1 Hayw. 178; 2 Cox 219; 20 N. Y. 463; 18 Ind. 475; 8 Fla. 161; 86 Ky. 608. But interest is not due for unliquidated damages, or on a running account where the items are all on one side, unless otherwise agreed upon; 1 Dall. 265; 4 Cow. 496; 5 Vt. 177; 1 Speers 209; 1 Rice 21; 2 Blackf. 313; 1 Bibb 443; 20 Ark. 410; 7 Utah 510; see 63 Hun 624; 8 Mont. 312; but when the damages are to be assessed on the principle of compensation, and with reference to a definite standard, the jury may give additional damages in the nature of interest. This, however, is not strictly interest, but compensation for delay, measured by the rate of interest; 124 Pa. 571; 130 Pa. 37. On the arrears of an annuity secured by a specialty; 3 Atk. 579; 9 Watts 530; or given in lieu of dower; 1 Harr. Del. 106; 3 W. & S. 457. On bills and notes if payable at a future day certain, after due; 3 D. & B. 70; 5 Humphr. 406; 19 Ark. 690; 13 Mo. 252; 50 Kan. 440; if payable on demand, after a demand made; 5 Ves. 133; 15 S. & R. 264; 1 M'Cord 370; 6 Dana 70; 1 Hempst. 155; 18 Ala. N. S. 300; 94 Mich. 411. See 4 Ark. 210; 83 Tex. 446. But see 40 Ill. App. 613, where interest on a note due on demand was held to run from its date. Where the terms of a promissory note are that it shall be payable by instalments, and on the failure of any instalment the whole is to become due, interest on the whole becomes payable from the first default; 4 Esp. 147. Where, by the terms of a bond or a promissory note, interest is to be paid annually, and the principal at a distant day, the interest may be recovered before the principal is due; 1 Binn. 185; 2 Mass. 568. An accepted draft bears interest from the time of delivery, when no time of payment is stated therein; 65 Hun 625.

When not stipulated for by contract or authorized by statute, interest is allowed by the courts as damages for the detention of money or property; 136 U. S. 211.

On a deposit by a purchaser, which he is entitled to recover back, paid either to a principal or an auctioneer; Sugd. Vend. 327; 3 Campb. 258; 6 Taunt. 625. But see 4 Taunt. 334. For goods sold and delivered, after the customary or stipulated term of credit has expired; 2 B. & P. 337; 2 Dall. 193; 11 Ala. 451; 1 McLean 411; 12 N. H. 474; 26 Ga. 465; 8 Ia. 163. On judgment debts; 2 Ves. 162. In a judgment on sci. fa. the interest is calculated on the old judgment and the new judgment entered for a lump sum; 5 Binn. 61; 1 H. & J. 754; 3 Wend. 496; 4 Metc. 317; 6 Halst. 91; 3 Mo. 86; 4 J. J. Marsh. 244; T. U. P. Charlt. 138. See 3 M'Cord 186; 1 Ill. 52; 14 Mass. 239; 50 Ark. 416. On judgments affirmed in a higher court; 4 Burr. 2128; 2 H. Bla. 267, 284; 2 Campb. 428, n.; 3 Taunt. 508. See 3 Hill, N. Y. 426; 9 C. C. App. 498. In an accounting for profits made by selling an article contrary to contract, interest should be allowed; 48 Fed. Rep. 789; also on the amount found as damages for breach of contract; 82 Tex. 608. On money obtained by fraud, or where it has been wrongfully detained; 9 Mass. 504; 1 Campb. 129; 3 Cow. 426. On money paid by mistake, or recovered on a void execution; 1 Pick. 212; 9 S. & R. 409; 8 Sumn. 336; 64 Hun 632; see 160 Mass. 438. On money lent or laid out for another's use; 2 W. S. 462; 4 Blackf. 21, 164. On the value of an animal in an action for causing its death; 50 Ark. 169; 125 Pa. 24. On purchase-money which has lain dead, where the vendor cannot make a title; Sugd. Vend. 327. On purchase-money remaining in purchaser's hands to pay off incumbrances; 1 Sch. & L. 134. See 1 Wash. Va. 125; 5 Munf. 842; 6 Binn. 435. On taxes wrongfully collected; 72 Tex. 509. See 159 Mass. 388. Rent in arrear due by covenant bears interest, unless under special circumstances, which may be recovered in action; 6 Binn. 159. See 46 Ohio St. 66; but no distress can be made for such interest; 2 Binn. 248. Interest cannot, however, be recovered for arrears of rent payable in wheat; 1 Johns. 276. See 2 Call 249; 3 Hen. & M. 463.

Interest cannot be recovered as damages for the detention of the principal, after the principal sum has been paid; 153 U. S. 456. Where interest is recoverable, not as a part of the contract, but by way of damages, if the plaintiff has been guilty of laches in unreasonably delaying the prosecution of his claim, it may be properly withheld; 135 U. S. 271; 140 id. 664. Interest allowed for non-payment of a judgment is in the nature of statutory damages; 146 U. S. 162.

On legacies. On specific legacies interest is to be calculated from the date of the death of the testator; 2 Ves. Sen. 563; 5 W. & S. 30; 3 Munf. 10.

A general legacy, when the time of payment is not named by the testator, is not payable till the end of one year after testator's death, at which time the interest commences to run; 13 Ves. 333; 1 Sch. & L. 10; 5 Binn. 475; 3 V. & B. 183; 16 R. 1. 98; 29 W. Va. 784; and this is so whether the will has been proved during the year or not; 149 Mass. 82. But where only the interest is given, no payment will be due till the end of the second year; 7 Ves. 89.

Where a general legacy is given, and the time of payment is named by the testator, interest is not allowed before the arrival of the appointed period of payment, and that notwithstanding the legacies are vested; Prec. in Ch. 387. But when that period arrives, the legatee will be entitled although the legacy be charged upon a dry reversion; 2 Atk. 108. See, also, 3 Atk. 101; 8 Ves. 10; 4 Brown, Ch. 149, n.; 1 Cox, Ch. 193. When the executor can pay a legacy without any possible inconvenience to the estate, it has been held that interest begins to run at once; 113 N. Y. 207. When a legacy is given payable at a future day with interest, and the legatee dies before it becomes payable, the arrears of the interest up to the time of his death must be paid to his personal representatives; McClell. 141. And a bequest of a sum to be paid annually for life bears interest from the death of testator; 5 Binn. 475; 26 W. N. C. Pa. 374. And so also for a legacy of income for the support and maintenance of the legatee; 106 Pa. 288; especially is this so when the legacy is to be paid by the executors transferring to the trustees for the legatee interest-bearing securities belonging to the testator's estate; id.

Where the legatee is a child of the testator, or one towards whom he has placed himself in loco parentis, the legacy bears interest from the testator's death, whether it be particular or residuary, vested but payable at a future time, or contingent if the child have no maintenance. In that case the court will do what in common presumption the father would have done—provide necessaries for the child; 2 P. Wms. 31; 3 Ves. 13, 287; Bacon, Abr. Legacies (K) 9; 3 Atk. 432; 1 Dick. Ch. 310; 2 Brown, Ch. 59; 2 Rand. 409; 44 N. J. Eq. 506; 106 Pa. 288. In case of a child en ventre sa mère at the time of the father's decease, interest is allowed only from its birth; 2 Cox, Ch. 425. Where maintenance or interest is given by the will, and the rate specified, the legatee will not, in general, be entitled to claim more than the maintenance or rate specified; 3 Atk. 697, 716; 3 Ves. 286, n. And see further, as to interest in cases of legacies to children; 15 Ves. 363; 1 Brown, Ch. 267; 4 Madd. 275;

1 Swanst. 553; 1 P. Wms. 788; 1 Vern. 351; 3 V. & B. 183.

Interest is not allowed by way of maintenance to any other person than the legitimate children of the testator: 3 Ves. 10; 4 id. 1; unless the testator has put himself in loco parentis: 1 Sch. & L. 5, 6. A wife: 15 Ves. 301; a niece: 3 Ves. 10; a grandchild: 6 Ves. 546; 1 Cox. Ch. 133; are, therefore, not entitled to interest by way of maintenance. See 2 Wms. Exec. 748. Nor is a legitimate child entitled to such interest if he have a maintenance, although it may be less than the amount of the interest of the legacy: 1 Sch. & L. 5; 3 Ves. 17. But see 4 Johns. Ch. 103; 2 Roper. Leg. 302; 106 Pa. 368, cited above.

Where an intention, though not expressed, is fairly inferable from the will, interest will be allowed: 1 Swanst. 561, n.

Interest is not allowed for maintenance, although given by immediate bequest for maintenance, if the parent of the legatee, who is under moral obligation to provide for him, be of sufficient ability: so that the interest will accumulate for the child's benefit until the principal becomes payable: 3 Ark. 399; 1 Brown. Ch. 886; 3 id. 60, 416. But to this rule there are some exceptions: 3 Ves. 730; 4 Brown. Ch. 223; 4 Madd. 275, 289.

Where a fund, particular or residuary, is given upon a contingency, the intermediate interest undisposed of—that is to say, the intermediate interest between the testator's death, if there be no previous legatee for life, or, if there be, between the death of the previous taker and the happening of the contingency—will sink into the residue for the benefit of the next of kin, or executor of the testator, if not bequeathed by him; but if not disposed of, for the benefit of his residuary legatee: 1 Brown. Ch. 57; 4 id. 114; 2 Atk. 329.

Where a legacy is given by immediate bequest, whether such legacy be particular or residuary, and there is a condition to divest it upon the death of the legatee under twenty-one, or upon the happening of some other event, with a limitation over, and the legatee dies before twenty-one, or before such other event happens, which nevertheless does take place, yet, as the legacy was payable at the end of the year after the testator's death, the legatee's representatives, and not the legatee over, will be entitled to the interest which accrued during the legatee's life, until the happening of the event which was to divest the legacy: 1 P. Wms. 501; 5 Ves. 335, 522.

Where a residue is given, so as to be vested, but not payable at the end of the year from the testator's death, but upon the legatee's attaining twenty-one, or upon any other contingency, and with a bequest over divesting the legacy, upon the legatee's dying under age, or upon the happening of the contingency, then the legatee's representatives in the former case, and the legatee himself in the latter, shall be entitled to the interest that became due during the legatee's life or until the happening of the contingency: 2 P. Wms. 419; 1 Brown. Ch. 81, 335; 3 Mer. 355.

Where a residue of personal estate is given, generally, to one for life with remainder over, and no mention is made by the testator respecting the interest, nor any intention to the contrary to be collected from the will, the rule appears to be settled that the person taking for life is entitled to interest from the death of the testator, on such part of the residue bearing interest as is not necessary for the payment of debts. And it is immaterial whether the residue is only given generally, or directed to be laid out, with all convenient speed, in funds or securities, or to be laid out in lands. See 6 Ves. 520; 9 id. 89, 549, 558. Interest, in case of a remainder in an estate in money, does not run until the death of the life tenant: 81 Ga. 229.

But where a residue is directed to be laid out in land, to be settled on one for life, with the remainder over, and the testator directs the interest to accumulate in the mean time until the money is laid out in land, or otherwise invested on security, the accumulation shall cease at the end of one year from the testator's death, and from that period the tenant for life shall be entitled to the interest: 6 Ves. 520; 7 id. 95; 2 S. & S. 396. Where a gift is made of the residue of the testator's estate to one person for life, and the principal is given over to another one at the death of the life tenant, the legatee is entitled to interest from the testator's death: 44 N. J. Eq. 506.

Where no time of payment is mentioned by the testator, annuities are considered as commencing from the death of the testator; and, consequently, the first payment will be due at the end of the year from that event; if, therefore, it be not made then, interest, in those cases wherein it is allowed at all, must be computed from that period: 5 Binn. 475. See 6 Mass. 37; 1 Hare & W. Lead. Cas. 350.

How much interest is to be allowed. As to time. In actions for money had and received, interest is allowed from the date of service of the writ: 1 Mass. 436; 15 Pick. 500; 13 N. H. 474. See 100 U. S. 119. On debts payable on demand, interest is payable only from the demand: 15 Pick. 500; 5 Conn. 222; 1 Mas. 117. See 12 Mass. 4; and supra. The words "with interest for the same" carry interest from date: Add. 323; 1 Stark. 453, 507; 57 N. W. Rep. (Minn.) 315. Interest upon a quantum meruit for services rendered, does not begin to run until a demand is made: 81 Wis. 230. It is allowed on the amount found as damages for breach of contract, from the date they accrued: 82 Tex. 808. Interest coupons bear interest from maturity of the coupons: 114 N. Y. 122; 84 Hun 120; 149 U. S. 122; 132 id. 107. Interest on a dividend declared by a receiver should be allowed from the time it was declared and ought to have been paid: 133 U. S. 433. Interest runs on liability of shareholders to creditors of a national bank from the time it goes into liquidation: 127 U. S. 27.

Interest may be computed from the commencement of an action for the balance due on a general account and the enforcement of lien: 73 Wis. 520; 39 Kan. 452.

The mere circumstance of war existing between two nations is not a sufficient reason for abating interest on debts due by the subjects of one belligerent to another: 1 Pet. C. C. 524; 4 H. & McH. 161. But a prohibition of all intercourse with an enemy during war furnishes a sound reason for the abatement of interest until the return of peace: Perl. Int. 145; 2 Dall. 102, 132; 1 Wash. Va. 172; 1 Call 194; 3 Wash. C. C. 396; 8 S. & R. 103; 62 Ala. 58. See infra.

A debt barred by the statute of limitations and revived by an acknowledgment bears interest for the whole time: 16 Vt. 297.

As to the allowance of simple and compound interest. Interest upon interest is not allowed, except in special cases: 1 Eq. Cas. Abr. 287; 31 Vt. 679; 34 Pa. 210; and the uniform current of decisions is against it, as being a hard, oppressive exaction, and tending to usury: 1 Johns. Ch. 14; Cam. & N. 361; 13 Vt. 430; 21 Or. 333. But interest on interest may be allowed if made after the interest which is to bear interest becomes due: 31 W. Va. 410; 79 Ga. 213. By the civil law, interest could not be demanded beyond the principal sum, and payments exceeding that amount were applied to the extinguishment of the principal: Ridley's Views of the Civil, etc., Law 84; Authentica, 9th Coll.

Where a partner has overdrawn the partnership funds, and refuses, when called upon to account, to disclose the profits, recourse would be had to compound interest as a substitute for the profits he might reasonably be supposed to have made: 2 Johns. Ch. 213.

When executors, administrators, or trustees convert the trust-money to their own use, or employ it in business or trade, or fail to invest, they are chargeable with compound interest: 1 Pick. 528; 1 Johns. Ch. 820. Nothing but very culpable conduct will justify the compounding of interest against an administrator: 87 Tenn. 172; 71 Mich. 350. Interest cannot ordinarily be compounded against a guardian: 73 Mich. 220; 118 Ind. 512; but it may be in some cases: 99 N. C. 387.

In actions for negligence, interest cannot be allowed by the jury as such, but they may, in computing their verdict, consider the lapse of time since the cause of action arose: 125 Pa. 24.

In an action to recover the annual interest due on a promissory note, interest will be allowed on each year's interest until paid: 2 Mass. 588; 8 id. 445; 1 N. H. 179; 16 Vt. 45; 9 Dana 331; 2 N. & McC. 38; 10 Am. Dec. 500; 69 N. C. 89; 26 Ohio St. 59; 61 Ga. 275; 34 Am. Rep. 101; contra, 8 Mass. 455; 2 Cush. 92; 1 Binn. 152, 165; 5 Pa. 98; 67 N. Y. 162. A note which provides for a conventional rate of interest, but omits to provide for the rate of interest after maturity, draws the legal rate: 22 How. 118; 100 U. S. 72; 68 Ind. 202; 42 L. J. Rep. n. s. 666; 39 Minn. 122; 39 Kans. 73; 135 N. Y. 354; but a different view has been held: 112 Mass. 63; 12 Vroom 349; 23 Alb. L. J. 130. See, as to charging compound interest, 1 Johns. Ch. 550; Cam. & N. 361; 1 Binn. 165; 1 Hen. & M. 4; 3 id. 89; 1 Viner, Abr. 457, Interest (C); Com. Dig. Chancery (3 S 3); 1 Hare & W. Lead. Cas. 371. An infant's contract to pay interest on interest after it has accrued will be binding upon him when the contract is for his benefit: 1 Eq. Cas. Abr. 286; 1 Atk. 489; 3 id. 613. The including in a note payable a year after date with a certain rate of interest, until paid, of a year's interest, is not compounding interest: 18 S. W. Rep. (Ky.) 1034. As to interest on interest coupons, see infra.

As limited by the penalty of a bond. It is a general rule that the penalty of a bond limits the amount of the recovery: 2 Term 388. But in some cases the interest is recoverable beyond the amount of the penalty: 4 Cra. 333; 15 Wend. 76; 10 Conn. 95; Paine 601; 6 Me. 14; 8 N. H. 491. The recovery depends on principles of law, and not on the arbitrary discretion of a jury: 3 Caines 49.

The exceptions are—where the bond is to account for moneys to be received: 2 Term 388; where the plaintiff is kept out of his money by writs of error: 2 Burr. 1094; or delayed by injunction: 1 Vern. 349; 16 Viner, Abr. 303; if the recovery of the debt be delayed by the obligor: 6 Ves. 92; 1 Vern. 349; if extraordinary emoluments are derived from holding the money: 2 Bro. P. C. 251; or the bond is taken only as a collateral security: 2 Bro. P. C. 338; or the action be on a judgment recovered on a bond: 1 East 436. See, also, 4 Day 30; 3 Caines 49; 1 Taunt. 218; 1 Mass. 306; Com. Dig. Chancery (3 S 2); Viner, Abr. Interest (E).

But these exceptions do not obtain in the administration of the debtor's assets where his other creditors might be injured by allowing the bond to be rated beyond the penalty: 5 Ves. 329. See Viner, Abr. Interest (C 5).

Upon a bond given to appear in a United States court to answer to an indictment, no interest can be recovered: 127 U. S. 212.

As to the allowance of foreign interest. The rate of interest of the place of performance is to be allowed, where such place is specified: 10 Wheat. 367; 20 Johns. 102; 8 Pick. 194; 12 La. An. 815; 1 B. Monr. 29; 2 W. & S. 327; 23 Vt. 286; 21 Ga. 135; 23 Tex. 108; 7 Fred. 424; 5 C. & F. 1; otherwise, of the place of making the contract: 11 Ves. 314; 1 Wash. C. C. 521; 3 Wheat. 101; 12 Mass. 4; 1 J. J. Marsh. 406; 5 Fred. 590; 17 Johns. 511; 25 N. H. 474; 1 Ala. 387; 13 La. 91; 25 H. & J. 193; 3 Conn. 253; 5 Tex. 87, 262. But the rate of interest of either place may be reserved; and this provision will govern, if an honest transaction and not a cover for usury: 2 Pa. 85; 14 Vt. 38; 20 Mart. La. 1; 2 Johns. Cas. 355; 10 Wheat. 367. Coupons after their maturity bear interest at the rate fixed by the law of the place where they are payable, where there is no stipulation as to the rate after maturity: 149 U. S. 132; 182 id. 107. See also Dicey, Conf. L., Moore's ed. 616, 625.

How computed. In casting interest on notes, bonds, etc., upon which partial payments have been made, every payment is to be first applied to keep down the interest; but the interest is never allowed to form a part of the principal so as to carry interest; 2 Wash. C. C. 167; 1 Halst. 408; 2 Hayw. 17; 17 Mass. 417; 14 Conn. 445; 140 U. S. 247.

When a partial payment exceeds the amount of interest due when it is made, it is correct to compute the interest to the time of the first payment, add it to the principal, subtract the payment, cast interest on the remainder to the time of the second payment, add it to the remainder, and subtract the second payment, and in like manner from one payment to another, until the time of judgment; Perl. Int. 168; 1 Pick. 194; 4 Hen. & M. 431; 8 S. & R. 458; 2 Wash. C. C. 167. See 3 id. 350, 396; 3 Cow. 86.

The same rule applies to judgments; 2 N. H. 169; 8 S. & R. 432.

Where a partial payment is made before the debt is due, it cannot be apportioned part to the debt and part to the interest. As, if there be a bond for one hundred dollars, payable in one year, and at the expiration of six months fifty dollars be paid in, this payment shall not be apportioned part to the principal and part to the interest, but at the end of the year, interest shall be charged on the whole sum, and the obligor shall receive credit for the interest of fifty dollars for six months; 1 Dall. 124.

When interest will be barred. When the money due is tendered to the person entitled to it, and he refuses to receive it, the interest ceases; 3 Campb. 296; 60 Conn. 343; 83 Tex. 11; 38 Fed. Rep. 36. See 134 U. S. 68. A tender by a junior mortgagee to a senior mortgagee of the amount due on the senior mortgage, with accrued costs of foreclosure, does not, unless kept good, prevent the running of interest; 132 N. Y. 288.

Where the plaintiff was absent in foreign parts beyond seas, evidence of that fact may be given in evidence to the jury on the plea of payment, in order to extinguish the interest during such absence; 1 Call 133; 3 McCord 340; 1 Root 178. But see 9 S. & R. 263.

Whenever the law prohibits the payment of the principal, interest during the prohibition is not demandable; 2 Dall. 102; 1 Pet. C. C. 524; 2 Dall. 132; 4 id. 286.

If the plaintiff has accepted the principal, he cannot recover the interest in a separate action; 1 Esp. 110; 3 Johns. 229. See 14 Wend. 116.

For or against Government or State. Interest is not to be awarded against a sovereign government, unless its consent has been manifested by an act of its legislature or by a lawful contract of its executive officers; 186 U. S. 211. The United States is not liable to pay interest or claims against it, in the absence of express statutory provision therefor; 127 U. S. 251; 23 Ct. Cls. 144; 164 U. S. 213; but it must be allowed to the United States under U. S. Rev. St. § 866; id. A city is not liable for interest on its loans, after maturity, if it has provided funds to pay them; 181 Pa. 805.

The legal rate of interest is five per cent. in Illinois and Louisiana; seven per cent. in Arizona, California, Georgia, Idaho, Minnesota, Nebraska, Nevada, North Dakota, Oklahoma, South Carolina, South Dakota, and Washington; eight per cent. in Alabama, Colorado, Florida, Oregon, Utah, and Wyoming; ten per cent. in Montana; and six per cent. in the remaining states and territories.

Any rate may be agreed upon by contract in Arizona, California, Colorado, Maine, Massachusetts, Montana, Nevada, Rhode Island, and Utah; but the rate by contract cannot be more than seven per cent. in Illinois; eight per cent. in Alabama, Georgia, Indiana, Iowa, Louisiana, Michigan, Missouri, Ohio, and South Carolina; ten per cent. in Arkansas, District of Columbia, Florida, Indian Territory, Kansas, Minnesota, Mississippi, Nebraska, Oregon, Texas, and Wisconsin; twelve per cent. in Idaho, Oklahoma, New Mexico, North Dakota, South Dakota, Washington, and Wyoming; and six per cent. in the remaining states. In New York demand loans of not less than $5,000, with collateral, may be made at any rate of interest agreed upon in writing.

In Ontario and Quebec the legal rate is six per cent.; in the former there is no limit on the rate by contract, and in the latter it is seven per cent.

For exceeding the legal rates of interest the penalty is variously fixed by the different states. See USURY.

In Practice. Concern; advantage benefit.

Such a relation to the matter in issue as creates a liability to pecuniary gain or loss from the event of the suit; 11 Metc. 895, 896.

When used as a criterion of the proper parties to a suit it means interest in the object, not interest in the subject-matter; 89 Va. 253.

A person may be disqualified to act as a judge, juror, or witness in a cause by reason of an interest in the subject-matter in dispute.

As to the disqualifying interest of judges, see JUDGE; as to the disqualifying interest of jurors, see CHALLENGE.

An interest disqualifying a witness must be legal, as contradistinguished from mere prejudice or bias arising from relationship, friendship, or any of the numerous motives by which a witness may be supposed to be influenced; Leach 154; 2 Hawk. Pl. Cr. 46, s. 25; must be present; 1 Hoffman. 21; 14 La. Ann. 417; 38 W. Va. 616; must be certain, vested, and not uncertain and contingent; 2 P. Wms. 287; 5 Johns. 256; 7 Mass. 25; 25 Ga. 337; 2 Metc. Ky. 608; 35 Pa. 351; must be an interest in the event of the cause, or the verdict must be lawful evidence for or against him in another suit, or the record must be an instrument of evidence for or against him; 22 Tex. 295; 3 John. Cas. 83; 1 Phill. Ev. 38. See 142 Ill. 302. But an interest in the question does not disqualify the witness; 4 Johns. 303; 1 S. & R. 32; 1 Hen. & M. 165, 168; or the fact that he has a case of the same kind pending; 37 Pac. Rep. (Cal.) 144.

An attorney will under most circumstances be permitted to testify in behalf of his client; but the courts do not look with favor upon the practice; 72 Pa. 229. See 32 Tex. Cr. R. 102.

The magnitude of the interest is altogether immaterial; a liability for costs is sufficient; 5 Term 174; 2 Me. 194; 11 Johns. 57.

Interest will not disqualify a person as a witness if he has an equal interest on both sides; 7 Term 480; 1 Bibb 298; 2 Mass. 106; 6 Pa. 322; 89 Ga. 582.

The objection to incompetency on the ground of interest may be removed by an extinguishment of that interest by means of a release, executed either by the witness, when he would receive an advantage by his testimony, or by those who have a claim upon him, when his testimony would be evidence of his liability. The objection may also be removed by payment. Stark. Ev. 757. In England and the United States it is no longer a cause of objection to the competency of witnesses in most cases that they have an interest in the subject-matter in issue. A growing consciousness that the truth in judicial investigations is best brought out by the production of all relevant testimony has led to the universal abrogation of the old rule of the common law; Tayl. Ev. 1187; 63 Pa. 156; 82 Tex. 141. In the trial of suits against the United States no person is excluded as a witness because he is a party to or interested therein; 1 Sup. Rev. Stat. 561; id. 408; id. 915. The interest of a party in the result of an action makes his credibility a question for the jury; 76 Hun 3. See, generally, Geenleaf; Starkie; Philipps; Wharton; Miller, Evidence.

See COUPLED WITH AN INTEREST; VESTED ESTATE, or INTEREST.

INTEREST-BEARING STOCK. See STOCK.

INTEREST, COUPLED WITH AN. The phrase "coupled with an interest," in connection with a power of attorney, does not mean an interest in the exercise of the power, but an interest in the property on which the power is to operate. 203 U. S. 126, following, 8 Wheat. U. S. 174.

INTEREST, MARITIME. See MARITIME INTEREST.

INTEREST OR NO INTEREST. A provision in a policy of insurance, which imports that the policy is to be good though the insured have no insurable interest in the subject-matter. This constitutes a wager policy, which is bad in England, by statute 19 Geo. II. c. 37, and generally, from the policy of the law; 2 Par. Mar. Law 89, note. See INSURABLE INTEREST; POLICY.

INTERFERENCE. See PATENTS.

INTERIM (Lat.). In the mean time; meanwhile. An assignee ad interim is one appointed between the time of bankruptcy and appointment of the regular assignee. 2 Bell, Com. 355.

INTERIM CURATOR. A person appointed by justices of the peace to take care of the property of a felon convict until the appointment by the Crown of an administrator or administrators for the same purpose. Moz. & W.

INTERIM FACTOR. In Scotch Law. A judicial officer elected or appointed under the bankruptcy law to take charge of and preserve the estate until a fit person shall be elected trustee. 2 Bell, Com. 357.

INTERIM ORDER. An order to take effect provisionally, or until further directions. The expression is used especially with reference to orders given pending an appeal. Moz. & W.

INTERLAQUEARE. In Old Practice. To link together, or interchangeably. Writs were called interlaqueata where several were issued against several parties residing in different counties, each party being summoned by a separate writ to warrant the tenant, together with the other warrantors. Fleta, lib. 5, c. 4, § 2.

INTERLINEATION. Writing between two lines.

Interlineations are made either before or after the execution of an instrument. Those made before should be noted previously to its execution; those made after are made either by the party in whose favor they are, or by strangers.

When made by the party himself, whether the interlineation be material or immaterial, they render the deed void; 1 Gall. 71; 35 N. J. 227; s. c. 10 Am. Rep. 232; unless made with the consent of the opposite party. See 11 Co. 27 a; 9 Mass. 807; 15 Johns. 293; 1 Halst. 215. But see 5 H. & J. 41; 2 La. 290; 4 Bingh. 123; Fitzg. 207, 223; 2 Pa. 191. See 126 id. 247.

When the interlineation is made by a stranger in an instrument in the hands of the promisee, though without his knowledge, if it be immaterial, it will not vitiate the instrument, but if it be material, it will, in general, avoid it; 11 Co. 27 a; L. R. 10 Ex. 380; see 6 Wash. 418; otherwise if the instrument be not then in the possession of a party; 6 East 309. If made while in the possession of an agent of the promisee, it avoids the instrument; L. R. 10 Ex. 380; contra, 35 N. J. 227; s. c. 10 Am. Rep. 232. The insertion of the words "or order" without the consent of the maker constitutes a material alteration which avoids the note; 20 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 58. An interlineation made in a bond, after its execution, by an agent of the obligee, without authority, will not invalidate it, but is only an act of spoliation; 86 Mich. 581.

The decisions vary as to the effect of interlineations, when an instrument is put in evidence. In a late case the rule is stated thus: If the interlineation is in itself suspicious, as, if it appears to be contrary to the probable meaning of the instrument as it stood before the insertion of the interlined words; or if it is in a handwriting different from the body of the instrument, or appears to have been written with different ink, in all such cases, if the court considers the interlineation suspicious on its face, the presumption will be that it was an unauthorized alteration after execution. On the other hand, if the interlineation appears in the same handwriting with the original instrument, and bears no evidence on its face of having been made subsequent to the execution of the instrument, and especially if it only makes clear what was the evident intention of the parties, the law will presume that it was made in good faith, and before execution; 3 Fed. Rep. 16. See 155 Pa. 152. Where interlineations in a deed are in the handwriting of the officer who attested it officially, the presumption is that they were made at or before the execution of the instrument; 89 Ga. 798; but it has been held that an alteration appearing on the face of a deed is presumed to have been made after its execution, and the burden is upon the party presenting it to explain the alteration: 44 Ill. App. 81.

If an instrument appears to have been altered, it is incumbent on the party offering it to explain its appearance. Generally speaking, if nothing appears to the contrary, the alteration will be presumed to be contemporaneous with the execution of the instrument; but if there is ground of suspicion, the law presumes nothing, but leaves the questions of the time when, the person by whom, and the intent with which it was done, to the jury, upon proofs to be adduced by the party offering the instrument; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 564; Tayl. Ev. 1547; 63 Mo. 68; 108 id. 353; 2 Johns. Cas. 198; 157 id. 473; 82 Tex. 352. See 45 Ill. App. 234. In cases of negotiable instruments, the holder is held to clearer proof than in cases of deeds; 2 Dan. Neg. Instr. § 1417. See 40 Minn. 531. In a carefully considered case, 20 Vt. 205, the court adopt what it calls the old common-law rule that an alteration of an instrument, if nothing appear to the contrary, should be presumed to have been made at the time of the execution. So, also, 1 Shepl. 396; 2 Johns. Cas. 198; contra, 11 N. H. 395; 48 Ind. 459. It has been held, when a place of payment was inserted, that it was a question for the jury, but that it lay on the plaintiff to account for the alteration, etc.; 6 C. & P. 273; 6 Ala. N. S. 707; such an insertion after delivery is a material alteration; 14 So. Rep. (Ala.) 411; 91 Ga. 827. But in 39 Conn. 164, it was held that the burden of proof of accounting for an alteration is not necessarily on the party producing the instrument. See 44 Ill. App. 81.

In 25 Kans. 510; s. c. 37 Am. Rep. 259, it was held that a negotiable note offered in evidence, bearing on its face an apparent material alteration, is admissible in evidence, and the question as to the time of alteration is for the jury. The court said: If there is neither extrinsic nor intrinsic evidence as to when the alteration was made, it is to be presumed that it was made before or at the time of the execution. Perhaps there might be cases where the alteration is attended with such manifest circumstances of suspicion that the court might refuse to allow the note to go to the jury without some explanation, etc. This title is fully treated in a note in 37 Am. Rep. 260. As to alteration of negotiable instruments, see 7 Harv. Law Rev. 1. See ALTERATION; ERASURE.

INTERLOCUTORY. Properly means a judgment or judicial order pronounced in the course of a suit, which does not finally determine the cause. But in Scotch practice, the term is extended to the judgments of the Court of Session or the Lord Ordinary, which exhaust the point at issue, and which if not appealed against will have the effect of finally deciding the case. Bell; Max. & W.

INTERLOCUTORY. Something which is done between the commencement and the end of a suit or action which decides some point or matter, which, however, is not a final decision of the matter in issue: as, interlocutory judgments, or decrees, or orders. See DECREE; JUDGMENT; ORDER; FINAL DECREE.

INTERLOPERS. Persons who interrupt the trade of a company of merchants, by pursuing the same business with them in the same place, without lawful authority.

INTERN. To shut within a particular place; confine within a town or fortress; send to or keep in an interior place; place under restraint. Stand. Dict.

In International Law. Used to denote one of the duties of neutrals in reference to warships or troops of the belligerent which are in its ports or have entered its territory. Such warships or troops must either depart within twenty-four hours, or disarm and be interned for the remainder of the war. Maxey, Int. Law, 540, 541.

INTERNAL REVENUE. See REVENUE; TAXATION.

INTERNATIONAL. The word "international" is a generic term, pertaining to relations between nations, and when applied to business or to transactions of private character it imports dealings of some sort in matters or with people of different nations, or which have some relation to them. It is in common use, and in its nature it is descriptive, and ordinarily characterizes the business to which it pertains, rather than its origin or proprietorship; and, so treated, the use of it cannot be exclusively appropriated by any party. 142 Ky. 531, 134 S. W. 877.

INTERNATIONAL ARBITRATION. The hearing and decision of disputes or differences between sovereign states by arbitrators or umpires chosen by mutual agreement.

Such an agreement may be by a special treaty negotiated with reference to the particular case or by a general treaty of arbitration.

Treaties of arbitration, with respect to special matters between the United States and Great Britain, have been frequently negotiated and carried into effect, and also, in many cases, between each of those countries and other nations. A summary of arbitrations to which the United States have consented is given infra.

The first instance of international arbitration is related by Herodotus as occurring between Artabanus and Xerxes and was decided by Darius.

National arbitrations were known to the Greeks among themselves. They did not cover political questions but usually were confined to disputes touching commerce, religion, boundaries, and the possession of contested territories. Thus in the time of Solon five Spartans were chosen to decide between the Athenians and the Megarians as touching the possession of the island of Salamis.

The Romans were never willing to arbitrate their disputes with neighboring countries, though they acted as arbitrators in disputes between other nations.

The practice of arbitration appears to have obtained in the barbarian world.

There are historical instances of arbitration, especially after the Church exercised a preponderating influence and the Bishops of Rome called to their tribunal all differences between peoples and kings.

Saint Louis was called upon to arbitrate between Henry III. and his barons in 1263. Occasionally a city assumed the duties of arbitrator. Thus the Treaty of Westminster of October 25, 1555, stipulated that the Republic of Hamburg should act as arbitrator between France and England. The parliaments of France were chosen to settle disputes between foreign sovereigns.

Sometimes eminent lawyers were employed as arbitrators; thus the doctors of the Italian universities were often employed to settle disputes between the different states of Italy.

It has been said that arbitrations anterior to the seventeenth century were frequently cases rather than of amicable settlement than of strict arbitration.

The first attempt by the United States to arbitrate with England was under the Treaty of 1794, commonly called the Jay Treaty, which provided for mixed commissions. Under this the northeast boundary line was settled in 1796. Another commission met in Philadelphia in 1797 to determine the compensation due British subjects in consequence of impediments which certain of the United States had in violation of the Treaty of 1794. Peace, interposed to the collection of debts by British creditors. This was unsuccessful, and the claims were afterwards adjusted by the Treaty of January 8, 1802.

Another commission under the Jay Treaty finished its report in 1804. The question before it was the rights of neutrals, and the finality of the decisions of prize courts.

The Treaty of Ghent, December 24, 1814, provided for three arbitrations. One related to certain islands in Passamaquoddy Bay, the second related to the ascertainment of the true boundary of the United States. The commissions failed to agree and each made a separate report to its own government, and finally in 1825 the points of difference were referred to the King of the Netherlands. The third was to determine the Northern boundary of the United States along the middle of the Great Lakes and thence to the Lake of the Woods. These questions were not determined until the Treaty of August 9, 1842, generally known as the Webster-Ashburton Treaty, and the boundary from the northwest angle of the Lake of the Woods to the Rocky Mountains under the Treaty of 1846, was settled by a joint commission of which the American member was appointed by Act of Congress of March 10, 1872.

Differences arose as to England's performance of the obligation touching slaves under the Treaty of Ghent. This was referred to the Emperor of Russia, who decided that Great Britain had failed to keep her obligations and must make indemnity. A convention was concluded between the two countries for a commission to determine the amount of the indemnity to be paid by Great Britain, upon the decision that country paid $1,204,950 in full settlement of all claims.

On February 8, 1853, there was a convention at London for a general settlement of all claims pending between the United States and Great Britain. It sat from September 15, 1853, to January 15, 1855. On July 1, 1853, a convention was concluded between the two countries to determine the compensation due to the Hudson's Bay Company and the Puget's Sound Agricultural Company on claims for damages on the transfer of the territory of the United States, their property and rights in territory acknowledged by the treaty of 1818 to be under the sovereignty of the United States. The commission met in 1855 and made an award September 10, 1859.

The Treaty of Washington of August 8, 1871, provided for four distinct arbitrations, the principal of which was that held at Geneva covering the demands of the United States arising out of acts of confederate cruisers of British origin and generically known as the Alabama claims.

The arbitration declined to make an award to the United States for the loss in the transfer of the American merchant marine to the British flag; for enhanced payment of marine insurance; for the prolongation of the war and the increased expenditures for the suppression of the rebellion; and declined by a majority of three to two to award compensation for expenses incurred in pursuit of the confederate cruisers, but awarded as a direct loss growing out of the destruction of vessels and their cargoes the sum of $15,500,000. This arbitration began December 15, 1871, and ended September 14, 1872.

The dispute as to the San Juan water boundary was referred to the Emperor of Germany, who, on October 21, 1872, made an award in favor of the United States. Claims of British subjects against the United States, and of citizens of the United States against Great Britain (excepting the Alabama claims) arising out of injuries during the Civil War, were referred to a mixed commission respectively appointed by the United States, Great Britain, and Spain.

The fourth arbitration under the Treaty of Washington was to determine the compensation due to Great Britain for privileges accorded by that treaty to the United States in the northeastern fisheries. It was conducted by a commission of three persons, a citizen of the United States, a British subject, and a Belgian. It met June 15, 1877, and on November 23 following, awarded Great Britain the sum of $5,500,000.

Under the Treaty of February 29, 1892, the United States and Great Britain submitted certain questions relating to the protection of the fur seals in Behring Sea to a tribunal of arbitration which sat in Paris.

The only arbitration between the United States and France was one to determine the claims of citizens of France for injury to their persons and property during the Civil War, and for claims of the citizens of the United States for like injuries during the war between France and Germany. It sat from November, 1890, to March 1894.

The United States has had four arbitrations with Spain, one in 1795, relating to claims for illegal captures of vessels by Spanish subjects. In 1871, relating to claims growing out of the insurance in Cuba. In 1870, relating to the seizure of a steamer by the Spanish authorities in 1870. In 1886, relating to damages to be paid by Spain for the wrongful seizure or detention of an American vessel.

There have been two arbitrations between Mexico and the United States, the first under the Treaty of April 11, 1850, the second under the Treaty of July 4, 1866, for the adjustment of miscellaneous claims. By the convention of March 1, 1889, a permanent board, called an International Boundary Commission, was established for the determination of questions growing out of changes in the course of the Rio Grande and the Colorado River where they form a boundary between the two countries.

The treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo was entered into between the United States and Mexico on February 2, 1848, and contained a general proposition to arbitrate under which all subsequent arbitrations between the two countries may be in a measure referred. Under this treaty the two nations agreed to "endeavor, in the most sincere and earnest manner, to settle the differences so arising, and to preserve the state of peace and friendship in which the two countries are now placing themselves, using, for this end, mutual representations and pacific means, and a resort to arms, a recourse that should be had to reprisals or hostility of any kind" until the government of that which deems itself aggrieved shall have maturely considered, in the spirit of peace and good neighborhood, whether it would not be better that such difference should be settled by the arbitration of commissioners appointed on each side or by that of a friendly nation. And should such course be proposed by either party, it shall be acceded to by the other, unless deemed by it altogether incompatible with the nature of the difference, or the circumstances of the case."

There have been three arbitrations between the United States and Haiti, one under a protocol May 24, 1864, by which two claims against Haiti were referred to Mr. Justice Strong of the supreme court of the United States. The decision was adverse to Haiti, but the United States has thus far declined to enforce them. On March 7, 1888, there was an agreement for a mixed commission of two Americans and two Haitians to adjust the claims of citizens of the United States growing out of civil disturbance in the island. Under the protocol of May 28, 1888, Alexander Porter Morse, of Washington, was named as an arbitrator to consider the claim for damages on the part of Van Bokkelen, a United States citizen, who was imprisoned in Haiti for debt.

A commission was appointed between the United States and Venezuela under a convention of January 19, 1892, to settle the claims of an American steamship company for the seizure of its steamers on the Orinoco.

Three mixed commissions have been appointed under treaty with Colombia, the first and second under convention of September 10th, 1897, and February 10th, 1894, covering rights under the treaty with New Granada of 1848. The third, August 17, 1874, for an award for the capture of the American steamer Montijo by insurgents in the State of Panama. Two commissions have sat for the adjustment of claims and the claims under conventions of January 12, 1893, and December 4, 1898, one with Costa Rica under the Treaty of July 2, 1880, and one with Ecuador under the Treaty of November 25, 1892.

Under a convention with Peru, December 30, 1892, claims against Peru for the seizure of two vessels were referred to the King of the Belgians, but they were afterwards withdrawn.

By a convention of February 4, 1869, the claims of the United States against Paraguay were referred to a commission composed of a representative of each government. The decision was adverse to the claim, but the United States have repudiated the award and endeavored to settle it by negotiation.

The questions between the United States and Portugal arising out of the destruction of the American privateer General Armstrong in the port of Fajal, were referred to arbitration under the Treaty of February 28, 1867. The award was adverse to the claim. After an attempt on the part of the claimants to set it aside the United States paid the claim out of its own treasury. Another arbitration between the United States and Portugal under a protocol signed June 18, 1891, to which Great Britain is also a party, in relation to the seizure of the Delagosa Bay railway, is now pending.

The United States and Chile by the convention of November 10, 1885, referred to the King of the Belgians a claim growing out of the seizure of the American brig Macedonian by the Chilean navy. An award was made in 1893, in favor of the United States. Under the Treaty of August 7, 1892, these two nations provided for a general arbitration of claims by means of a mixed commission.

In 1890, the congress of the United States adopted a concurrent resolution requesting the president to invite negotiation to the end that differences arising between it and other governments may be referred to arbitration and possibly adjusted. On July 16, 1893, the British House of Commons adopted a resolution referring in terms to the above resolution of congress and expressing the sympathy of that house with its purpose and asking the British government to co-operate with the government of the United States.

The Institute of International Law, at its session in 1874 and 1875, discussed the subject of rules for the procedure of international tribunals of arbitration, and at the latter meeting adopted provisional rules. At the same time the American Conference held on April 8, 1890, and attended by delegates from North, Central, and South America, the plan of a permanent tribunal of arbitration was adopted.

Proposed rules for the International Tribunal of Arbitration were submitted by William Allen Butler to the Universal Peace Congress in Chicago in 1899.

In 1899, certain members of the British and French Parliaments formed at Paris a parliamentary union to be composed of members of the legislative assemblies of various countries for the purpose of considering the development of international arbitration. At its session at Brussels in 1896, it adopted certain provisions which it recommended to the consideration of the governments of civilized states.

A conference of a number of prominent men was held at Washington, April 22 and 23, 1896, for the purpose of furthering international arbitration. In the same year a treaty was negotiated between the United States and Great Britain providing for a tribunal to which all disputes of a certain character between those two nations were to be referred; but it failed to be ratified by the senate.

See Report on International Arbitration, by committee of American Bar Association, August 30, 1896, Vol. XIX., 10, 386; Historical Notes on the Subject of International Arbitration by John E. Moore of New York, published in the report of this conference from which the above brief statement has been taken.

International disputes are occasionally submitted to arbitration by disinterested persons, frequently rulers of other states, and the contending parties are concluded by the decision of the arbitrators unless it is outside the terms of the submission or there is evident fraud or denial of justice. 16 A. & E. Ency. 2nd ed., 1139; Hall, Int. Law 4th ed., § 118 et seq.

In recent years the availability and desirability of arbitration as a means of settling international disputes have been much discussed, and at the peace conference at The Hague, held in 1899, to which most of the civilized nations sent representatives, a plan was adopted for the establishment of an international bureau of arbitration. According to this plan, the diplomatic representatives of the signatory powers accredited to the Hague were to form a council which should organize and direct the bureau or arbitration. Each power was to appoint four international lawyers of character and ability, and from those lawyers the parties to any international dispute would, upon notification to the bureau, be asked to choose arbitrators, and those so chosen would decide to dispute according to certain rules of procedure to be formulated. Id.; Hazell's Annual for 1900, 462.

The conference reassembled in 1907 in order to consider various suggestions for the mitigation of the horrors of war and as to contraband, etc.; but little came of this further meeting. Byrnes.

INTERNATIONAL LAW.* The system of rules which Christian states acknowledge to be obligatory upon them in their relations to each other and to each other's subjects. It is the jus inter gentes, as distinguished from the jus gentium.

[Another definition by President Woolsey is: "International law, as we have viewed it, is a system of rules adopted by the free choice of certain nations for the purpose of governing their intercourse with each other, and not inconsistent with the principles of natural justice." Intro. to Int. L. § 203. This, it is to be observed, differs materially from the first, with respect to a point to some extent discussed infra.

That body of rules which governs the actions of states in their intercourse with one another. These rules are the outgrowth of the customs of nations, of international agreements, and of state acts which have, in the lapse of time, been accepted as binding by the civilized states of the world. It differs from the municipal or national law of individual states in that it has no superior or supreme tribunal whose function it is to enforce the law in the case of its infraction. Nevertheless, it is obeyed for the most part without question, and it is only on rare occasions that resort is had to war. Indeed, most states have adopted it as a part of their municipal law, and a great majority of the cases that arise under it are adjudicated upon by the courts of law of the individual states; "Snow, Int. L. 17.

A distinction is sometimes drawn between public international law, which is the subject here treated, and private international law, as it is termed by continental jurists, or the conflict of laws (q. v.), as it is more frequently designated in England and America. The former title is however used by many writers in the last-named countries. There is a concurrence of authority that they are but different names for the same subject. Dicey, Conf. L. 6. Professor Lorimer objects very earnestly to the term Private International Law, and denies that it is International Law at all, and Professor Holland agrees with him; 1 Law Quar. Rev. 100. See also Whart. Com. Am. L. ch. v.; Whart. Conf. L. 1; Woolsey, Int. L. 69; Westlake, Priv. Int. L. 1, 4.

A different terminology has been suggested, which attempts to differentiate Private International Law and the Conflict of Laws.

* This title being reprinted without alteration of the text as written by the late President Woolsey, such additions as seemed necessary or desirable have been made within brackets, and to preserve the original completeness of the treatment of the subject, some parts of it are undisturbed, although relating to subjects elsewhere treated under the various titles of International Law.

"The aggregate of rules and limitations which sovereign states agree to observe in their intercourse and relations with each other. As it deals with the relations of states in their sovereign capacity, it is sometimes called Public International Law, to distinguish it from that branch of the science which has to do with the relations of states to the citizens or subjects of other states, which is called Private International Law; or, as it is in question whether the court of a state shall apply their own municipal laws or those of another state in the determination of a given cause, this branch of the subject has sometimes been called the Conflict of Laws" (q. v.); Davis, Int. L. 2.

The only authority cited is Amos, Science of Law, and the quotations, made at some length, apply mainly to controversies between citizens of different states.

A recent division of the subject is as follows: "It is divided into three departments: the principles that should regulate the conduct (1) of states to each other; (2) of private parties arising out of the conduct of states to each other; (3) of private parties as affected by the separate internal codes of distinct nations. Its leading principles are three: (1) that every nation possesses an exclusive sovereignty and jurisdiction in its own territory; (2) that no state or nation can by its laws directly affect or bind property out of its own territory, or persons not resident therein, natural born subjects or others; (3) that whatever forbids the laws of one country have in another depends solely on the municipal laws of the latter." Encyc. Dict.

The scientific basis of these rules is to be found in natural law, or the doctrine of rights of the state; for nations, like smaller communities and individuals, have rights and correlative obligations, moral claims and duties. Hence it might seem as if the science consisted simply of deductions from certain fundamental propositions of natural right; but this is far from being the case, for national intercourse is the most voluntary possible, and takes a shape widely different from a system of natural justice. It would be true to say that this science, like every department of moral science, can require nothing unjust; but, on the other hand, the actual law of nations contains many provisions which imply a waiver of just rights; and, in fact, a great part of the modern improvements in this code is due to the spirit of humanity controlling the spirit of justice, and leading the circle of Christian nations freely to abandon the position of rigorous right for the sake of mutual convenience or good will.

[The operation of this law is upon sovereign states, as that of municipal law is upon the individual person (q. v.), using this word in its larger sense. Formerly the definitions of International law like that first above given applied the subject to Christian nations, the idea being that this branch of the law was in a special degree the outgrowth of an effort to apply to states the moral obligations and duties the recognition of which is largely and primarily due to Christianity.

It is true that President Woolsey recognized that the views embodied in International Law were beginning to spread beyond the bounds of Christendom, but he ascribed it to the fact that "Christian states are now controllers of opinion." Intro. Int. L. 20.

Sir R. Phillimore thus expressed the idea which generally prevailed, "the consent of nations to things which are naturally, that is by the law of God, binding upon them." But the extension of these very principles, which Christian states alone were assumed to regard, to such an extent that non-Christian nations have been gradually brought more and more within the pale of their influence, and led to the acceptance, more or less, of civilized ideas of government, requires some modification of the older phraseology.

It is now some years since Professor E. Robinson said, evidently with this thought premier upon his mind, with much less reason for it than now exists: "In modern times, at least, it has included all the states of the Christian world; but at one time it excluded non-Christian states, and at this moment it would be difficult to say to what extent it covers the relation of such states inter se and with the Christian states of Europe and America;" Encyc. Brit.

And now with Mohammedan Turkey to a considerable extent recognizing some amenability to the rules of international law (even admitting that it is external and not internal influence which produces this result), and Japan, almost completely, and China, to a less degree, recognized as admitted to the family of nations, it may fairly be said that the definition of the subject must be broadened so as to apply, not merely to Christian states but to civilized sovereign states, using that term broadly.

Nor is it entirely consistent with the truth of history to assume that international law owes its origin entirely to Christian nations. All that can be positively affirmed is that international law had no existence as a science until moulded into a scientific system by the master mind of Grotius. But no more did he create it than did Coke and Blackstone create the common law. Nor can it be said without qualification that the principles of morality which underlie the scientific expression of international law are the product of Christianity. They are rather a part of that great body of fundamental principles which belong to humanity, and which we express by the term Divine law, because, although inherent in the nature of man, they are conceived to have been imbedded there by the Divine Author of his existence, and lying dormant through centuries of human history, now and then dimly manifesting themselves through human strivings and human reason, they could only become fully operative after humanity had passed through the general refining process which was the result of the teachings of the founder of Christianity. These principles have the same relation to the Christian system which is borne by those principles of what is termed natural law or natural morality, which have been found in a greater or less degree in the beginning of all the great religions of the world. It is in this sense, and this only, that international law finds its connection with Christianity and the so-called Christian nations.

Hence we find in systems of law prior to Christianity the recognition of fundamental principles of justice and morality which underlie international law, as of those which find their natural development and expression in various branches of municipal law.

Thus the independent Hellenic sovereignties recognized, and their existence as such favored the recognition of, certain general customs which may be considered, as suggested by a writer already quoted, as, at least, a parallel to modern international law. And the latter finds its prototype, if not more, in the jus fœderale of the Romans which doubtless would have developed largely as a general system but for the fact that the universal domination of the Roman Empire reduced its operation to a minimum and practically terminated the necessity of its preservation as a distinct branch of the civil law. But this very fact contributed to its influence in the direction of forming a new system, even if it be not admitted as contended by many authorities that it was in fact its origin. A thoughtful writer, however, has said that the jus fœderale "differs radically from the modern science of international law which is founded upon the consent of nations and presupposes the existence of many independent states, and rather expresses the imperfect and one-sided views of international obligation which were held by the most powerful state of the ancient world;" Davis, Int. L. 4. The strong concurrence of opinion is unquestionably in favor of the theory that the Roman law was a factor of the first importance. Mr. Carter, in his argument referred to infra, said, "The Roman law, that wonderful result of reason working upon a basis of abstract right, is largely appealed to in international discussions, as containing rules which, at least by analogy, may serve to settle international disputes. No one can be an accomplished diplomatist without a familiar acquaintance with much of this immortal code" (quoting Phill. Int. Law 14-28). "Not only," says another commentator, "has the Roman law been preserved in the municipal and ecclesiastical jurisprudence of modern Europe: it has also exercised a marked influence on the growth of that body of rules by which the states of Europe are bound together in one moral commonwealth." Morey, Rom. Law § 207.

And Sir Henry Maine, in endeavoring to determine the place of international law in the general development of European jurisprudence, concludes that we may answer pretty confidently that its rapid advance to acceptance by civilized nations was a stage, though a very late stage, in the diffusion of Roman law over Europe; Int. L. 18. And the same writer says further on: "It is sometimes difficult to be quite sure how Grotius and his successors distinguished rules of the Law of Nature from religious rules prescribed by inspired writers. But that they did draw a distinction is plain. Grotius' famous work, the De Jure Belli ac Pacis, is in great part composed of examples supplied by the language and conduct of heathen statesmen, generals, and sovereigns, whom he could not have supposed to know anything of inspired teaching. If we assume him to have believed that the most humane and virtuous of the acts and opinions which he quotes, were prompted by an instinct derived from a happier state of the human race, when it was still more directly shaped and guided by Divine authority, we should probably have got as near his conception as possible. As time has gone on, some parts of this basis of thought have proved to be no longer tenable. . . . But nevertheless the system founded on an imaginary reconstruction of it, more and more calmed the fury of angry belligerency, and supplied a framework to which more advanced principles of humanity and convenience easily adjusted themselves."

It may be suggested that not alone through the jus fœderale is the intimate connection of Roman law with modern international law to be sought. Those laws it is truly said concerned mainly, if not only, embassies, the declaration of war, and the making of peace; see Fœderal Laws; but, after all, the relation of Rome to other states involved little more than questions of war or peace, and with these their only embassies were concerned. So that those laws did control all of foreign relations which then existed.

But after the jus civile, the law of a city, was replaced by the jus gentium, the law for the civilized world, as Böhm aptly puts it (Inst. Rom. L. § 13), we find the real foundation on which Grotius and those who came after him erected a stately modern structure. The jus gentium was an expression of what is variously termed natural law, universal morality, moral law, divine law, applied to the relations of states,—not independent ones (for there were none such contemplated under the empire), but readily adapted to the relations of sovereign and equal states. Perhaps the system and the principles framed for use by states bound together by the bonds of the empire were not less easily adapted to the use to which they have been put by the family of nations, in theory absolutely independent, but in practice rendered more interdependent even than the components of the empire by community of interest, commercial relations, mutual reliance on the exchange of products, and above all the unifying influence of modern civilization in its annihilation of the natural barriers of time and space.]

So much for the general foundation of international law. The particular sources are the jural and the moral. The jural elements are, first, the rights of states as such, deducible from the nature of the state and from its office of a protector to those who live under its law; second, those rights which the state shares with individuals, and in part with artificial persons, as the rights of property, contract, and reputation; and, third, the rights which arise when it is wronged, as those of self-protection and redress. To these have been joined by some the rights of punishment and of conquest,—the latter, at least, without good reason; for there is and can be no naked right of conquest, irrespective of redress and self-protection. The moral elements are the duties of humanity, comity, and intercourse.

[The propriety of the phrase "international law" has been challenged as being, strictly speaking, inexact. Among those who have taken this view was the late Lord Coleridge, who said that "Law implies a lawgiver and a tribunal capable of enforcing it and coercing its transgressors." This view, however, accepts the theory of Austin's definition of the law, as the command of a superior with coercive power. Lord Russell of Killowen, in his address before the American Bar Association in 1896, contended for the substantial accuracy of the term law in this connection; he considered Austin's definition as applying rather to the later development of arbitrary power than to that body of customary law which, in earlier stages of society, precedes law strictly so called, but which is made up of rules and customs which are laws in every real sense of the word, as for example the law merchant. And he continues: "in stages later still, as government becomes more frankly democratic, resting broadly on the popular will, laws bear less and less the character of commands, imposed by a coercive authority and acquire more and more the character of customary law founded on consent."

Addressing himself to the question what is international law, he defines it to be "the sum of the rules or usages which civilized states have agreed shall be binding upon them in their dealings with one another." He takes issue with the theory that there is any a priori rule of right of reason or of morality, or law of nature, which, by its own force, apart from and independently of the consent of nations, is part of the law of nations, and insists that international law is neither more nor less than what civilized nations have agreed shall be binding on one another as international law.

This was a repetition from an academic standpoint of views expressed by their author in a forensic spirit before the Paris tribunal of arbitration in 1893.

At that time the opposing view of the foundation and sources of international law was stated with great clearness by Mr. James C. Carter, counsel for the United States, substantially as follows: The rules which govern the mutual relation of states in their corporate capacity are "properly law, because they have been established by particular states as a part of their own municipal system, and are enforced . . . in the same manner as other portions of the local codes. They are in fact principles of the law of nature or morality put in the form of human command, and clothed with a human sanction. International law, in its general sense, he terms international morality, consisting of rules founded upon justice and equity and deduced by right reason, having no binding force in themselves as law, but observed in deference to the general public opinion of Christendom by a conviction that they are right in themselves, or at least expedient, or by fear of provoking hostilities. This moral sanction is so strong that it may be said to create rights and corresponding duties which belong to and devolve upon independent states; accordingly, a large portion of international law is rather a branch of ethics than of positive human jurisprudence, the sources of which are: 1. The Divine law; 2. enlightened reason; 3. the consent of nations. He contended that international law could not be confined within the limits of mere precedents or previously recognized rules for regulating the action of sovereign states, but being largely the result of enlightened reason acting upon the abstract principles of morality, "it is, as a science, the most progressive of any department of jurisprudence or legislation. The improvement of civilized nations in culture and refinement, the more complete understanding of rights and duties, the growing appreciation of the truth that what is right is also expedient, have told, and still do tell upon it with sudden and surprising effect.

"The result is that doctrines which were universally received a generation since are as universally rejected now; that precedents which were universally considered as binding a quarter of a century ago, would, at the present, be passed by as without force, as acts which could not endure the light of more modern investigation."

In the same line is the view of Professor Lorimer, who in his Institutes of the Law of Nations defines it to be: "the law of nature, realized in the relations of separate political communities."

On the other hand the view of Lord Russell of Killowen is thus expressed by Mr. Hall in his Treatise on International Law: "Existing rules are the sole standard of conduct or law of present authority; and changes and improvements in those rules can only be effected through the same means by which they were originally formed, namely, by growth in harmony with changes in the sentiments and external conditions of the body of states."

Various divisions of international law have been proposed, but none are of any great importance. One has been into natural and voluntary law, in which latter conventional or treaty law and customary are embraced. Another, somewhat similar, separates international rules into those which are deducible from general natural jus, those which are derived from the idea of estate, and those which grow out of simple compact. Whatever division be made, it is to be observed that nations are voluntary, first, in deciding the question what intercourse they will hold with each other; second, that they are voluntary in defining their rights and obligations, moral claims and duties, although these have an objective existence beyond the control of the will of nations; and, third, that when international law has arisen by the free assent of those who enter into certain arrangements, obedience to its provisions is as truly in accordance with natural law—which requires the observance of contracts—as if natural law had been intuitively discerned or revealed from heaven and no consent had been necessary at the outset.

The aids in ascertaining what international law is or has been, are derived from the sea codes of mediæval Europe, especially the Consolato del Mare; from treaties, especially those in which a large part of Europe has had a share, like the treaties of Westphalia; from judicial decisions, state papers on controverted points, and the treatises of text-writers. Among the latter, Grotius led the way in the seventeenth century, while Puffendorf, fifty years afterwards, from his having confounded the law of nature with that of nations, has sunk into deserved oblivion. In the next century, Cornelius van Bynkershoek, although the author of no continuous work embracing the whole of our science, ranks among its ablest expounders, through his treatises entitled, De Dominio Maris, De Foro Legatorum, and Quæstiones Juris Publici. In the middle of the eighteenth century, Vattel, a disciple of the Wolfian philosophy, published a clear but somewhat superficial treatise, which has had more than its due share of popularity down to the present day. Of the very numerous modern works we can only name that of Klüber, in French and German (1819 and since), that of De Martens, which came to a fifth edition in 1855, and those of Wheaton and of Heffter, which last two are leading authorities,—the former for the English-speaking lands, the latter for the Germans. The literature of the science must be drawn from Von Ompteda and his continuator, Von Kamptz, or from the more recent work of Von Mohl (Erlangen, 1855-58), in which, also, an exposition of the history is included. The excellent works of Ward (Inquiry into the Foundation and History of the Law of Nations, etc.), and of Wheaton (History of the Law of Nations from the Earliest Times to the Treaty of Washington in 1842), are of the highest use to all who would study the science, as it ought to be studied as the offshoot and index of a progressive Christian civilization.

Among the provisions of international law, we naturally start from those which grow out of the essence of the individual state. The rights of the state, as such, may be comprised under the term sovereignty, or be divided into sovereignty, independence, and equality; by which latter term is intended equality of rights. Sovereignty and independence are two sides of the same property, and equality of rights necessarily belongs to sovereign states, whatever be their size or constitution; for no reason can be assigned why all states, as they have the same powers and destination in the system of things, should not have identically the same rights. States are thus, as far as other states are concerned, masters over themselves and over their subjects, free to make such changes in their laws and constitutions as they may choose, and yet incapable, by any change, whether it be union, or separation, or whatever else, of escaping existing obligations. With regard to every state, international law only asks whether it be such in reality, whether it actually is invested with the properties of a state. With forms of government international law has nothing to do. All forms of government, under which a state can discharge its obligations and duties to others, are, so far as this code is concerned, equally legitimate. See GOVERNMENT; SOVEREIGNTY.

Thus, the rule of non-intervention in the affairs of other states is a well-settled principle of international law. In the European system, however, there is an acknowledged exception to this rule, and also a claim on the part of certain states to a still wider departure from the rule of non-intervention, which other states have not as yet admitted. See INTERVENTION.

It is conceded that any political action of any state or states which seriously threatens the existence or safety of others, any disturbance of the balance of power, may be resisted and put down. This must be regarded as an application of the primary principle of self-preservation to the affairs of nations.

But while certain states claim a right to interfere in the internal affairs of others in order to suppress constitutional movements and the action of a people without its own sphere, this is as yet an unauthorized ground of interference. The plea here is, on the part of those states which have asserted such a right, especially of Austria, Prussia, Russia, and at times of France, that internal revolutions are the result of wide-spread conspiracies, and if successful anywhere, are fatal to the peace and prosperity of all absolute or non-constitutional governments. The right, if admitted, would destroy by an international law all power of the people in any state over their government, and would place the smaller states under the tutelage of two or three of the larger. England has always protested against this enlargement of the right of interference, and France has established more than one revolutionary government in spite of it. See INTERVENTION.

In the notion of sovereignty is involved paramount exclusive jurisdiction within a certain territory. As to the definition of territory, international law is tolerably clear. Besides the land and water included within the line of boundary separating one state from another, it regards as territory the coast-water to the distance of a marine league, and the portions of sea within lines drawn between headlands not very remote, or, in other words, those parts of the sea which are closely connected with a particular country when it needs to defend itself against attack. The high sea, on the other hand, is free, and so is every avenue from one part of the sea to another, which is necessary for the intercourse of the world. It has been held that rivers are exclusively under the jurisdiction of countries through which they flow, so that the dwellers on their upper waters have no absolute right of passage to and from the sea; but practically, at present, all the rivers which divide or run through different states are free for all those who live upon them, if not for all mankind. It has been claimed that ships are territory; but it is safer to say that they are under the jurisdiction of their own state until they come within that of another state. By comity, public vessels are exempt from foreign jurisdiction, whether in foreign ports or elsewhere. See HIGH SEAS; FAUCES TERRÆ; NAVIGABLE WATERS.

The relations of a state to aliens, especially within its borders, come next under review. Here it cannot be affirmed that a state is bound, in strict right, to admit foreigners into or to allow them transit across its territory, or even to hold intercourse with them. All this may be its duty and perhaps, when its territory affords the only convenient pathway to the rest of the world, or its commodities are necessary to others of mankind, transit and intercourse may be enforced. But, aside from these extreme cases, intercourse is only a duty, and not definable with precision, as is shown by the endless varieties of commercial treaties. It can only be said that the practice of Christian states is growing more and more liberal, both as regards admitting foreigners into their territories and to the enjoyment of those rights of person and property which the natives possess, and as regards domiciliating them, or even incorporating them, afterwards, if they desire it, into the body politic. See ALIEN; NATURALIZATION.

[Formerly all criminals of one country who escaped into another were safe from pursuit. In modern times extradition treaties have been made providing for their return, but extradition has been regarded as a matter of treaty, and not an international duty. Political offenders are not usually extradited. In Spain and the Spanish American States a legation may grant asylum to persons charged with offences, but this right is not allowed in other countries. Nor can ships of war, as a rule, grant asylum except possibly in cases of political offenders. French naval officers are given the right to refuse asylum under any circumstances, but are forbidden to permit any pursuit or search of their vessels provided a refugee is once given asylum; Snow, Int. Law 88. See 17 Law Mag. & Rev., 4th. 93; Whart. Dig. Int. L. § 104; EXTRADITION; ASYLUM; FUGITIVE FROM JUSTICE.]

The multiplied and very close relations which have arisen between nations in modern times, through domiciled or temporary residents, have given rise to the question: What law, in particular cases involving personal status, property, contracts, family rights, and succession, shall control the decisions of the courts? Shall it be always the lex loci, or sometimes some other? The answers to these questions are given in private international law, or the conflict of law, as it is sometimes called,—a very interesting branch of law, as showing how the Christian nations are coming from age to age nearer to one another in their views of the private relations of men. See CONFLICT OF LAWS; LEX LOCI.

Intercourse needs its agents, both those whose office it is to attend to the relations of states and the rights of their countrymen in general, and those who look after the commercial interests of individuals. The former share with public vessels, and with sovereigns travelling abroad, certain exemptions from the law of the land to which they are sent. Their persons are ordinarily inviolate; they are not subject to foreign civil or criminal jurisdiction; they are generally exempt from imposts; they have liberty of worship, and a certain power over their trains, who likewise share their exemptions. Only within five centuries have ambassadors resided permanently abroad—a change which has had an important effect on the relations of states. Consuls have almost none of the privileges of ambassadors, except in countries beyond the pale of Christianity. See AMBASSADOR.

Nations, like individuals, have the right of contracts, and their treaties are subject to the same rules of interpretation and of morality which govern in municipal law. An interesting description of treaties are those of guaranty, by which sometimes a right of intervention in the affairs of other states is secured beforehand.

But treaties may be broken, and all other rights invaded; and there is no court of appeal (except by arbitration) where wrongs done by states can be tried. The rights of self-defence and of redress now arise, and are of such importance that but for redress by force or war, and to prevent war, international law would be a very brief science. The laws and usages of modern warfare show a great advance of the nations in humanity since the middle ages. The following are among the leading principles and usages:—

That declarations of war, as formerly practised, are unnecessary; the change in this respect being due chiefly to the intimate knowledge which nations now have, through resident ambassadors and in other ways, of each other's movements and dispositions.

That at the opening of war the subjects of one hostile state within the territory of another are protected in their persons and property, and this notwithstanding it is conceded that by strict right such property is liable to confiscation.

That war is waged between states, and by the active war agents of the parties, but that non-combatants are to be uninjured in person and property by an invading army. Contributions or requisitions, however, are still collected from a conquered or occupied territory, and property is taken for the uses of armies at a compensation.

That combatants, when surrendering themselves in battle, are spared, and are to be treated with humanity during their captivity, until exchanged or ransomed.

That even public property, when not of a military character, is exempt from the ordinary operations of war, unless necessity requires the opposite course.

That in the storming of inhabited towns great license has hitherto been given to the besieging party; and this is one of the blot of modern as well as of ancient warfare. But humane commanders avoid the bombardment of fortified towns as far as possible; while mere fortresses may be assailed in any manner.

The laws of sea-warfare have not as yet come up to the level of those of land-warfare. Especially is capture allowed on the sea in cases where it would not occur on the land. Yet there are indications of a change in this respect; privateering has been abandoned by many states (the first article of the Declaration of Paris recites that "Privateering is and remains abolished"), and there is a growing demand that all capture upon the sea, even from enemies, except for violation of the rules of contraband, blockade, and search, shall cease. See CAPTURE; PRIVATEER.

When captures are made on the sea, the title, by modern law, does not fully vest in the captor at the moment, but needs to pass under the revision of a competent court. The captured vessel may be ran-somed on the sea, unless municipal law forbids, and the ransom is of the nature of a safe-conduct. If a vessel is recaptured, or rescued from other perils, a compensation is due to the rescuer, which is called salvage, which see.

In modern international law, questions of neutrality play a great part. A neutral is one, strictly, who affords assistance to neither party; for assistance afforded to both alike, in almost every case, would benefit one party and be of little use to the other. The neutral territory, on land and sea, must be untouched by the war; and for all violations of this rule the neutral can take or demand satisfaction.

The principal liabilities of neutral trade are the following:—

In regard to the nationality of goods and vessels, the rule, on the whole, has been that enemy's goods were exposed to capture on any vessel, and neutral's goods were safe on any vessel, and that the neutral vessel was not guilty for having enemy's goods on board. Owing to the declaration of the Peace of Paris in 1856, the humane rule that free ships make free goods will no doubt become universal.

Certain articles of especial use in war are called contraband, and are liable to capture. But the list has been stretched by belligerents, especially by England, so as to include naval stores and provisions; and then, to cure the hardship of the rule, another—the rule of pre-emption—has been introduced. The true doctrine with regard to contraband seems to be that nothing can be so called unless nations have agreed so to consider it; or, in other words, that articles cannot become occasionally contraband owing to the convenience of a belligerent. See CONTRABAND.

An attempt of a neutral ship to enter a blockaded place is a gross violation of neutrality; and, as in cases of contraband trade the goods, so here the guilty vessel is confiscated. But blockade must exist in fact, and not alone upon paper, must be made known to neutrals, and, if discontinued, must be resumed with a new notification. See BLOCKADE.

To carry out the rights of war, the right of search is indispensable; and such search ought to be submitted to without resistance. Search is exclusively a war right, excepting that vessels in peace can be arrested near the coast on suspicion of violating revenue laws, and anywhere on suspicion of piracy. The slave trade, not being piracy by the law of nations (though it is piracy by statute in the United States, Great Britain, and other countries), vessels of other nations cannot be searched on suspicion of being engaged in this traffic. And here comes in the question which has agitated the two leading commercial states of Christendom: How shall it be known that a vessel is of a nationality which renders search unlawful? The English claim, and justly, that they have right to ascertain this simple fact by detention and examination; the United States contend that if in so doing mistakes are committed, compensation is due, and to this England has agreed. INTERNATIONAL MILITARY COMMISSION. A conference of most of the European powers held at St. Petersburg in 1863 which drew up the famous Declaration of St. Petersburg prohibiting the use in war of explosive or inflammable bullets. Bordwell, Law of War, p. 87, 88.

INTERNATIONAL PRIVATE LAW. The law of nations is divided into two branches, (1) public international law, which regulates the political relation of nation to nation; and (2) private international law, which, though based upon the first, regulates the reciprocal and personal relations of the inhabitants of different states. International private law is a system of rules established by the comity of nations for the prevention of conflict of laws.

Connection between International Private Law and Public. Rules concerning the purely private relations of individuals, and which relate to rights depending upon the law of one state whose enforcement may be forbidden in the court of another, can only be connected with international law proper by virtue of the fact that the tacit consent which upholds the system of reciprocal concessions is a part of the code regulating the intercourse of nations. The law of the state actually enforced within the territory of another is national law; the rule by virtue of which it is so enforced is an international rule. In that way only in international private law, whose province it is to prevent conflict in matters of purely individual right, connected with international public law which is strictly confined to the relation of states with states. Taylor, Int. Law 153, 209. See COMITY.

INTERNATIONAL PUBLIC LAW. See INTERNATIONAL PRIVATE LAW.

INTERNATIONAL REGULATION. A regulation which belongs to that class of laws which concern the exterior relation of this whole nation with other nations and governments. 92 U. S. 273.

INTERNATIONAL RULES OF NAVIGATION. See NAVIGATION RULES.

INTERNUNCIO. A Papal minister of the second order, accredited to minor states where there is no nuncio (q. v.).

INTERPELLATE. To question imperatively, as a minister or other executive officer, in explanation of his conduct; generally on the part of a legislative body. Webster.

INTERPLEAD. To discuss or try a point incidentally arising, before the principal cause can be determined, by making the parties concerned litigate it between them.

INTERPLEADER. In Practice. A proceeding in the action of detinue, by which the defendant states the fact that the thing sued for is in his hands, and that it is claimed by a third person, and that whether such person or the plaintiff is entitled to it is unknown to the defendant, and thereupon the defendant prays that a process of garnishment may be issued to compel such third person so claiming to become defendant in his stead. 3 Reeve, Hist. Eng. Law c. 23; Mitt. Eq. Pl. 141; Story, Eq. Jur. § 800; Beach, Mod. Eq. Pr. 141. Interpleader is allowed to avoid inconvenience; for two parties claiming adversely to each other cannot be entitled to the same thing; Brooke, Abr. Interpleader 4; hence the rule which requires the defendant to allege that different parties demand the same thing.

If two persons sue the same person in detinue for the thing, and both actions are depending in the same court at the same time, the defendant may plead that fact, produce the thing (e. g. a deed or charter) in court, and aver his readiness to deliver it to either as the court shall adjudge, and thereupon pray that they may interplead. In such a case it has been settled that the plaintiff whose writ bears the earliest teste has the right to begin the interpleading, and the other will be compelled to answer; Brooke, Abr. Interpleader, 2.

For the law in regard to interpleader in equity, see BILL OF INTERPLEADER.

Under the Pennsylvania practice, when goods levied upon by the sheriff are claimed by a third party, the sheriff takes a rule of interpleader on the parties, upon which, when made absolute, a feigned issue is framed, and the title to the goods is tested. The goods, pending the proceedings, remain in the custody of the defendant upon the execution of a forthcoming bond.

INTERPOLATION. In Civil Law. The act by which, in consequence of an agreement, the party bound declares that he will not be bound beyond a certain time. Wolff, Inst. Nat. § 752.

In the case of a lease from year to year, or to continue as long as both parties please, a notice given by one of them to the other of a determination to put an end to the contract would bear the name of interpolation.

INTERPRETATION. The discovery and representation of the true meaning of any signs used to convey ideas. Lieber, Leg. and Pol. Hermeneutics.

The "true meaning" of any signs is that meaning which those who used them were desirous of expressing. A person adopting or sanctioning them "uses" them as well as their immediate author. Both parties to an agreement equally make use of the signs declaratory of that agreement, though one only is the originator, and the other may be entirely passive. The most common signs used to convey ideas are words. When there is a contradiction in signs intended to agree, resort must be had to construction,—that is, the drawing of conclusions from the given signs, respecting ideas which they do not express. Construction is usually confounded with interpretation; and in common use, construction is generally employed in the law in a sense that is properly covered by both, when each is used in a sense strictly and technically correct; Cooley, Const. Lim. 49. A distinction between the two, first made in the Leg. and Pol. Hermeneutics, has been adopted by Greenleaf and other American and European jurists. Hermeneutics includes both. See CONSTRUCTION.

Close interpretation (interpretatio restricta) is adopted if just reasons, connected with the formation and character of the text, induce us to take the words in their narrowest meaning. This species of interpretation has generally been called literal, but the term is inadmissible. Lieber, Herm. 88.

Extensive interpretation (interpretatio extensiva), called, also, liberal interpretation, adopts a more comprehensive signification of the word.

Extravagant interpretation (interpretatio excedens) is that which substitutes a meaning evidently beyond the true one: it is, therefore, not genuine interpretation.

Free or unrestricted interpretation (interpretatio soluta) proceeds simply on the general principles of interpretation in good faith, not bound by any specific or superior principle.

Limited or restricted interpretation (interpretatio limitata) is when we are influenced by other principles than the strictly hermeneutic ones. Ernesti, Institutio Interpretis.

Predestined interpretation (interpretatio predestinata) takes place if the interpreter, laboring under a strong bias of mind, makes the text subservient to his preconceived views or desires. This includes artful interpretation (interpretatio vasa), by which the interpreter seeks to give a meaning to the text other than the one he knows to have been intended.

The civilians divide interpretation into:—Authentic (interpretatio authentica), which proceeds from the author himself.

Usual (interpretatio usualis), when the interpretation is on the ground of usage.

Doctrinal (interpretatio doctrinalis), when made agreeably to rules of science. Doctrinal interpretation is subdivided into extensive, restrictive, and declaratory: extensive, whenever the reason of a proposition has a broader sense than its terms, and it is consequently applied to a case which had not been explained; restrictive, when the expressions have a greater latitude than the reasons; and declaratory, when the reasons and terms agree, but it is necessary to settle the meaning of some term or terms to make the sense complete.

The following are the elementary principles and rules of interpretation and construction, which are here given together on account of their intimate connection and the difficulty of separating them.

There can be no sound interpretation without good faith and common sense. The object of all interpretation and construction is to ascertain the intention of the authors, even so far as to control the literal signification of the words; for verba ita sunt intelligenda ut res magis valeat quam pereat. Words are, therefore, to be taken as those who used them intended, which must be presumed to be in their popular and ordinary signification, unless there is some good reason for supposing otherwise, as where technical terms are used: quoties in verbis nulla est ambiguitas, ibi nulla expositio contra verba fienda est. When words have two senses, of which one only is agreeable to the law, that one must prevail; Cowp. 714; when they are inconsistent with the evident intention, they will be rejected; 2 Atk. 32; when words are inadvertently omitted, and the meaning is obvious, they will be supplied by inference from the context, see 64 N. W. Rep. (Minn.) 933. When language is susceptible of two meanings, one of which would work a forfeiture, while the other would not, the latter must prevail; 71 Wis. 177.

In Constitutions. The following principles governing the construction of state constitutions are laid down by Judge Cooley. The construction must be uniform and unvarying; 13 Mich. 138; 19 How. 893; and sensible, so as to effectuate the legislative intention, and, if possible, avoid an unjust or absurd conclusion; 144 U. S. 47. The object of construction is to give effect to the intent of the people in adopting it; this intent is to be found in the instrument itself; Miller, Const. U. S. 100; Ordrón. Const. Leg. 575; 2 Hill, N. Y. 35. The whole is to be examined with a view to arriving at the true intention of each part; it is not to be supposed that any words have been employed without occasion, or without intent that they should have effect as part of the law; if different portions should seem to conflict, the courts should harmonize them, if practicable, and should lean in favor of a construction which will render every word operative, rather than one which may make some idle and nugatory; 8 W. Va. 320; 3 Paine 584; 27 Wisc. 478. It must be presumed that words have been employed in their natural and ordinary meaning; 9 Wheat. 183; but technical words are presumed to have been employed in their technical sense. See Cooley, Const. Lim. ch. iv. Where two provisions of a constitution are irreconcilably repugnant, that which is last in order of time and local position will prevail; 7 Ind. 570.

In Statutes. In construing written laws, it is the intent of the law-giver which is to be enforced; this intent is found in the law itself. The first resort is to the natural signification of the words employed, in their order of grammatical arrangement; 7 N. Y. 9, 97; Cooley, Const. Lim. 70; 180 U. S. 670; 60 Ill. 86. The whole law is to be examined, with a view to arrive at the true intention of each part; Co. Litt. 381 a. It is a general rule, in the construction of writings, that a general intent appearing, it shall control the particular intent; but a particular intent plainly expressed in one place must sometimes prevail over a general intent deduced from other parts of the writing; 5 Tex. 441.

Where a law is expressed in plain and unambiguous terms, whether those terms are general or limited, the legislature should be intended to mean what they have plainly expressed, and consequently no room is left for construction; 180 U. S. 671; 99 id. 72; 3 Cranch 399. Statutes should receive a sensible construction, such as will effectuate the legislative intention, and, if possible, so as to avoid an unjust or absurd conclusion; 144 U. S. 47.

Penal statutes must be strictly interpreted; remedial ones liberally; 1 Bla. Com. 38; 6 W. & S. 278; 3 Taunt. 377; see 120 U. S. 678; 184 id. 624; and generally, in regard to statutes, the construction given them in the country where they were enacted will be adopted elsewhere. Though penal statutes are to be strictly construed, yet the intention of the legislature must govern; 184 U. S. 624.

Statutes should be so construed, if practicable, that one section will not destroy another, but explain and support it; 147 U. S. 242.

The change of conditions as well as of the meaning of words in their ordinary use frequently creates difficulties in the application of statutes which in England led to the passage, in 1889, of the stat. 52 and 53 Vict. c. 63, known as the General Interpretation Act, which was intended to cover the whole subject of statutory interpretation. A synopsis of its provisions, together with an instructive collation of words having a marked difference in their ordinary and judicial meaning, will be found in Ordrónaux, Const. Leg. c. xi. In this country the subject is not so comprehensively treated, but there will usually be found in the general statutes of each state a chapter defining the meaning of certain words as used in the statutes.

In the exposition of statutes and constitutions, every word is to be expounded in its plain, obvious, and common sense, unless the context furnishes some ground to control, qualify, or enlarge it, and there cannot be imposed upon the words any recondite meaning or any extraordinary gloss. 253 U. S. 398, quoting 1 Story, Const. § 451; 130 U. S. 662.

Unless the contrary appears, statutory words are presumed to be used in their ordinary and usual sense, and with the meaning commonly attributable to them. 250 U. S. 381.

The language of a statute is to be interpreted in the light of the particular matter in hand and the object sought to be accomplished as manifested by other parts of the act, and words used may be qualified by their surroundings and connections. 203 U. S. 76. Though in actions of slander, words were formerly construed in the mildest sense that they would admit, they are now to be taken according to their ordinary import and meaning. 1 Dall. (U. S.) 114. Where a criminal statute does not define a word used therein, its etymology must be considered and its ordinary meaning applied. 241 U. S. 73.

When several words are followed by a clause which is applicable as much to the first and other words as to the last, the clause should be read as applicable to all. 253 U. S. 348.

In Contracts. There must always be reference to the surrounding circumstances and the object the parties intended to accomplish; 116 Ind. 60; 77 Ga. 36; and when the language is indefinite or ambiguous and of doubtful construction, the practical interpretation by the parties is of great weight, if not controlling; 122 U. S. 121. Where there was a doubt as to the nature of a contract, the court adopted its view of it, and held that even if the meaning were doubtful, the court would follow the interpretation put upon it by both parties in good faith; 74 Fed. Rep. 183. Impossible things cannot be required. The subject-matter and nature of the contract, or its objects, causes, effects, consequences, or precedents, or the situation of the parties, must often be consulted in order to arrive at their intention, as when words have, when literally construed, either no meaning at all or a very absurd one. The whole of an instrument must be viewed together and not each part taken separately; and effect must be given to every part, if possible; 87 Minn. 398. Assistance must be sought from the more near before proceeding to the remote. When one part is totally repugnant to the rest, it will be stricken out; but if it is only explanatory, it will operate as a limitation. Reference to the lex loci or the usage of a particular place or trade is frequently necessary in order to explain the meaning; 2 B. & P. 164; 3 Stark. Ev. 1086; 16 S. & R. 126. A court of law should read a written contract according to the obvious intention of the parties, in spite of clerical errors or omissions which can be corrected by perusing the whole instrument; 55 N. J. L. 132; 18 Or. 383.

In the construction of a contract it is proper to consider the course of dealing between the parties, and the construction they had by their actions put on previous contracts between them of the same general character; 155 Pa. 23; 13 U. S. App. 193; 44 Ill. App. 627; 8 Misc. Rep. 61; 50 Fed. Rep. 764; 134 U. S. 505.

Words spoken cannot vary the terms of a written agreement; they may overthrow it. Words spoken at the time of the making of a written agreement are merged in the writing; 5 Co. 96; 2 B. & C. 634; 4 Taunt. 779. Where there is a latent ambiguity which arises only in the application and does not appear upon the face of the instrument, it may be supplied by other proof; ambiguitas verborum latens verificatione suppletur; 1 Dall. 426; 3 S. & R. 609.

The rule that an agreement is to be construed most strongly against the party benefited can only be applied in doubtful cases; 125 U. S. 260; and when other rules of interpretation fail; 11 Col. 50. The more the text partakes of a solemn compact, the stricter should be its construction.

General expressions used in a contract are controlled by the special provisions therein. In agreements relating to real property, the lex rei sitae prevails, in personal contracts the lex loci contractus, except when they are to be performed in another country, and then the law of the latter place governs; 2 Mass. 88; 1 Pet. 317; Story, Conf. Laws § 242; 4 Cow. 410, note; 2 Kent 39, 457. When there are two repugnant clauses in a deed, which cannot stand together, the first prevails. With a will the reverse is the case. In all instruments the written part controls the printed, if the two are inconsistent; 78 Hun 23; 13 Gray 37; 150 U. S. 312; 25 Neb. 849; 62 Mich. 546; 84 Ala. 109; when a contract is embodied in several instruments, its true meaning is to be ascertained from a consideration of all the instruments and their effect upon each other; 24 Fla. 560; 98 Mo. 315; 86 Ky. 141; 41 Kan. 763.

In addition to the above rules, there are many presumptions of law relating to agreements, such as, that the parties to a simple contract intend to bind their personal representatives; that where several parties contract without words of severalty, they are presumed to bind themselves jointly; that every grant carries with it whatever is necessary to its enjoyment; when no time is mentioned, a reasonable time is meant; and other presumptions arising out of the nature of the case. It is the duty of the court to interpret all written instruments; see 10 Mass. 384; 3 Cra. 180; 3 Rand. 586; 10 U. S. App. 352; 7 Misc. Rep. 710; 150 Pa. 8; written evidence; 2 Watts 347; and foreign laws; 1 Pa. 388; and where the terms of a parol agreement are shown without any conflict of evidence; 47 Mo. INTERPRETATION CLAUSE. A clause frequently inserted in Acts of Parliament, declaring the sense in which certain words used therein are to be understood. Moz. & W.

A section of a statute which defines the meaning or certain words occurring frequently in the other sections. R. & L. Dict.

INTERPRETER. One employed to make a translation.

and is not bound to testify as to what he has acquired in those confidential communications; 1 Pet. C. C. 386; 4 Munf. 273; 8 Wend. 387.

Communications made to an interpreter are not hearsay when he translates and communicates what has been said to him, and the party to whom it is made may testify to it; 50 Minn. 91. Conversations carried on through an interpreter may be shown by either party thereto or a third person who hears it, its weight only and not its competency being affected thereby; 157 Mass. 393.

INTERREGNUM (Lat.). The period, in case of an established government, which elapses between the death of a sovereign and the accession of another, is called interregnum. The vacancy which occurs when there is no government.

INTERROGATOIRE. In French Law. An act, or instrument, which contains the interrogatories made by the judge to the person accused, on the facts which are the object of the accusation, and the answers of the accused. Pothier, Proc. Crim. s. 4, art. 2, § 1.

INTERROGATORIES. Material and pertinent questions in writing, to necessary points, exhibited for the examination of witnesses or persons who are to give testimony in the cause.

They are either original and direct on the part of him who produces the witnesses, or cross and counter, on behalf of the adverse party, to examine witnesses produced on the other side. Either party, plaintiff or defendant, may exhibit original or cross interrogatories.

The form which interrogatories assume is as various as the minds of the persons who propound them. They should be as distinct as possible, and capable of a definite answer; and they should leave no loop-holes for evasion to an unwilling witness. Care must be observed to put no leading questions in original interrogatories, for these always lead to inconvenience; and for scandal or impertinence interrogatories will, under certain circumstances, be suppressed. See Willis, Int. passim; Greal. Eq. Ev. pt. 1, c. 3, s. 1; Viner, Abr.; Hind. Ch. Pr. 317; 4 Bouvier, Inst. n. 4419 et seq.; Daniell, Ch. Pr.

Civil interruption is that which takes place by some judicial act.

Natural interruption is an interruption in fact. 4 Mas. 404; 2 Y. & J. 285. See EASEMENTS; LIMITATIONS; PRESCRIPTION.

INTERSTATE. "Interstate," as used in a state tax statute, can fairly be construed as including all commerce other than "intrastate" when the evident purpose is to tax only the earnings subject to state taxation. 232 U. S. 577.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE. Comprehends all commercial intercourse between different States and all the component parts of that intercourse, and is not confined to transportation from one State to another. Where goods in one State are transported into another for purposes of sale the commerce does not end with the transportation, but embraces as well the sale of the goods after they reach their destination and while they are in the original packages. 12 Wheat. (U. S.) 446. Where goods are purchased in one State for transportation to another the commerce includes the purchase quite as much as it does the transportation. 190 U. S. 143. Commerce is a term of the largest import. It comprehends intercourse, for the purposes of trade in any and all its forms, including the transportation, purchase, sale, and exchange of commodities. 91 U. S. 280. Buying and selling and the transportation incidental thereto constitute commerce. 128 U. S. 20. See also, 175 U. S. 241.

Intercourse for the purpose of trade in any and all its forms, including transportation, purchase, sale, and exchange of commodities, between the citizens of different states. 171 U. S. 597, quoting 91 U. S. 275. Subject, by the Constitution, to the exclusive regulation of Congress, whose enactments in regard to it are administered and enforced by the Interstate Commerce Commission (q. v.). 3 Moore, Carriers, 2nd ed., 1758, 1759. See CARRIER; COMMERCE; DISCRIMINATION; INTERSTATE COMMERCE ACT.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE ACT.

An act of Congress, passed in 1887, for the purpose of regulating interstate commerce, and creating a commission, known as the Interstate Commerce Commission, charged with the administration and enforcement of the act and all later amendments to it. The principal objects of the act were "to secure just and reasonable charges for transportation; to prohibit unjust discriminations in the rendition of like services under similar conditions and circumstances; to prevent undue and unreasonable preferences to persons, corporations, or localities; to inhibit greater compensation for a shorter than for a longer distance over the same line; and to abolish combinations for the pooling of freights." 3 Moore, Carriers 2nd ed., 1759. See INTERSTATE COMMERCE; INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION; DISCRIMINATION; COMMERCE; HEPBURN ACT.

The Interstate Commerce Act embraces the whole field of interstate commerce; it does not exempt such foreign commerce as is carried on a through bill of lading, but in terms applies to the transportation of property shipped from any place in the United States to a foreign country and carried from such place to a port of transshipment. 209 U. S. 57.

The Interstate Commerce Act was intended to afford an effective and comprehensive means for redressing wrongs resulting from unjust discrimination and undue preference, and to that end placed upon carriers the duty of publishing schedules of reasonable and uniform rates. 204 U. S. 426.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION.

A commission created by the Interstate Commerce Act (q. v.) of 1887, charged with the administration and enforcement of the Act and all subsequent amendments. It consisted originally of five members to be appointed by the President for terms ranging from two to six years; enlarged in 1906 to seven members, with terms of seven years each. It has no legislative powers, and no judicial power, except of a quasi judicial nature, but is simply an administrative board exercising administrative powers. 3 Moore, Carriers 2nd ed., 2068, 2096, 1759, 1760. See INTERSTATE COMMERCE; INTERSTATE COMMERCE ACT.

The Constitution of the United States, Art. I, Sec. 8, gives to Congress the power "to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several states and with the Indian tribes." The Interstate Commerce Act was passed on February 4th, and took effect on April 5th, 1887. It was amended March 2, 1899; February 10, 1901; February 8, 1906; supplementary acts were passed February 11, 1903; March 2, 1903; August 7, 1898. It applies to all common carriers "engaged in the transportation of passengers or property wholly by railroad or partly by railroad and partly by water, when both are used under a common control, management, or arrangement for a continuous carriage or shipment," between states or territories and the District of Columbia; between places in the United States and any adjacent foreign country; between places in the United States when any part of the transportation is through an adjacent foreign country; and to transportation of property from any place in the United States to a foreign country which is carried from such place to a port of transshipment, and to property shipped from a foreign country to any place in the United States, and carried to such place from a port of entry, either in the United States or an adjacent foreign country. It does not apply to the transportation of persons or property, etc., wholly within a state and not shipped to or from a foreign country. It extends to bridges and ferries used in connection with any railroad. It declares that all charges for services rendered in connection therewith shall be reasonable and just and prohibits all unjust and unreasonable charges.

Sec. 2. The charging of any greater or less compensation for any service rendered any shipper or person than is charged or collected from another for a like and contemporaneous service, etc., is declared to be unlawful.

Sec. 3. It forbids the giving any undue or unreasonable preference to one person, etc., or locality over another person or place, or any undue discrimination of traffic over another and prohibits the carrier from subjecting any shipper, locality, or traffic to any undue or unreasonable prejudice or disadvantage. It imposes a duty to afford reasonable, proper, and equal facilities to connecting carriers, for the interchange of business, without discrimination.

Sec. 4. It prohibits charging or giving greater compensation in the aggregate for the transportation of persons or of like kind of property, under substantially similar conditions, for a shorter than is charged for a longer distance over the same line in the same direction, the shorter being included within the longer distance.

Sec. 5. It prohibits any agreement between carriers for the pooling of freights of competing railroads or for dividing their joint earnings.

Sec. 6. It provides that the carriers shall print schedules of their rates, duly classified, and file copies with the Commission and of copies of all their stations and offices for public inspection. These must specify terminal charges and any rules affecting the rates. These rates can only be advanced after ten days' public notice and an amendment of the schedules accordingly; nor can they be reduced except after three days' similar notice and the like amendment. Copies of all agreements between two or more carriers for making a line of through transportation are also required to be filed with the Commission. If joint tariffs of rates are provided for, copies of these tariffs must be filed with the Commission. Such publicity is to be given to these joint tariffs as the Commission may direct. This section contains the same requirement as to ten days' notice of any advance and three days' notice of any reduction in the joint rates, as is prescribed respecting the rates of the individual carrier.

Sec. 7. It prohibits any scheme between carriers to prevent the continuous transportation of property without change of cars. No breaking of bulk, etc., unless necessary, shall be considered as breaking the continuous passage.

Sec. 8. It provides that any carrier committing a breach of this act shall be liable in damages to the person injured, including a counsel fee to be taxed as costs.

By sec. 9 any person aggrieved may complain before the Commission or bring suit in the circuit or district court having jurisdiction, for damages. In the latter cases the court may compel all officers, etc., to appear and produce before the court the books of the company, but no evidence which they may give shall be used against them in any criminal proceeding.

By sec. 10 any carrier, or, if a corporation, any officer, etc., thereof, guilty of an infraction of the act, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and subject to a fine of not to exceed $5,000, or if the offense is an unlawful discrimination in rates, to imprisonment for not to exceed two years, or both in the discretion of the court. False billing, classification, etc., of goods is made a misdemeanor, whether by the carrier or its officer, or by the shipper, and so is the act of inducing a common carrier to discriminate unjustly.

Sec. 11 creates the Commission, who have authority, by sec. 12 to inquire into the management of the business of common carriers and to enforce the act; they may institute proceedings for that purpose and for the punishment of violations of the act; they may require the production of all necessary books, contracts, etc.

By sec. 13 any person, corporation, association, or any mercantile, agricultural, or manufacturing society, or any individual, or any other legal organization or State Railroad Commission may complain before the Commission of any infraction of the act, and the Commission itself may institute any inquiry on its own motion.

By sec. 15 if the Commission find that the act has been contravened, it shall notify the carrier thereof.

By sec. 16 if any carrier refuses to obey an order of the Commission, the latter or any party interested may apply to the circuit court of the district where such carrier has its principal office. Such court shall hear the case speedily, without formal pleadings; the findings of fact of the Commission shall be prima facie evidence of the matter therein stated. If it appear that any lawful order of the Commission has been disobeyed, the court shall enjoin further disobedience thereof. If the matter in dispute exceeds $5,000, either party may appeal. Common carriers are required to file annual reports to the Commission, and the latter may prescribe a uniform system of keeping accounts.

The act expressly excepts the carriage of property free, or at reduced rates, for the United States, state, or municipal governments, or for charitable purposes, or to and from expositions, etc., or the free carriage of destitute persons transported by charitable societies; or the issuance of mileage, excursion, or commutation passenger tickets; or giving reduced rates to ministers of religion; or to certain indigent persons; or the exchange of passes between the officers of railroad companies for their officers and employees.

The provisions of the act are declared to be in addition to all remedies by common law or by statute. By the act of March 3, 1899, the United States courts are given jurisdiction to issue writs of peremptory mandamus commanding the movement of interstate traffic or the furnishing of cars and other transportation facilities.

By the act of February 11, 1903, no person shall be excused from testifying before the Commission, upon the ground that his evidence, documentary or otherwise, will tend to criminate him, etc.; but no person shall be prosecuted (except for perjury before the Commission) by reason of such evidence.

The Commission is made a body corporate, with legal capacity to be a party plaintiff or defendant in the federal courts, by reason of the provision in the act that it "shall have an official seal, which shall be judicially noticed," and that making it lawful for it to apply by petition for the enforcement of its orders; 51 C. Rep. 405; s. c. 162 U. S. 197. It has only administrative powers of supervision and investigation, which fall far short of making it a court, or its action judicial. Its action or conclusions upon matters brought before it is neither final nor conclusive; nor is it vested with any authority to enforce its decision or award. It hears, investigates, and reports upon complaints made before it, but subsequent judicial proceedings are contemplated and provided for in all cases, where the party against whom the decision is rendered does not yield voluntary obedience thereto. Its findings of facts are prima facie evidence in subsequent judicial proceedings brought to enforce its orders. The circuit court is not the mere execution of the Commission's orders or recommendations. The suit in that court is an original, independent proceeding, and the court hears and determines the cause de novo upon proper pleadings and proofs. The Commission may be regarded as the general referee of the court. The jurisdiction of the court depends upon the fact that it relates to a subject over which congress has exclusive control, independently of the citizenship of the parties; 37 Fed. Rep. 567; see also 56 id. 925. The Commission is authorized and required to execute and enforce the provision of the act. It can investigate, find facts, reach conclusions, and make orders, on complaint made by others, or upon inquiry instituted on its own motion. The conclusions and orders have no binding force; its reported findings of fact alone have legal effect, and its conclusions and recommendations can only be enforced through the courts; 31 C. Rep. 151; s. c. 41 C. C. R. 116. The Commission is not a court but a special tribunal whose duties are through largely administrative, are sometimes semi or quasi judicial; 51 C. Rep. 656 (U. S. C. C. M. D. of Tenn.); 3 id. 890; s. c. 51 C. C. R. 166; it is required to investigate and report, but its final act is not considered as a judgment; id.; its opinion has not the effect of a judicial determination, and, to enforce it, the court, in an original proceeding, hears the complaint de novo; 51 C. Rep. 282 (C. C., S. D. of Ohio); s. c. 62 Fed. Rep. 690; the order of the Commission is administrative, and not final or conclusive like the judgment or decree of a court; and the order of the circuit court enforcing it does not make it a final judgment, so that change or modification cannot be made when changed traffic conditions arise; and when the Commission files a petition in a federal court to enforce its findings, they are not conclusive of the facts or entitled to greater weight than a complaint filed by an individual; 49 Fed. Rep. 177; but the finding and opinion were said in another case to be entitled to great weight; 51 C. Rep. 666 (U. S. C. C., M. D. of Tenn.); s. c. 73 Fed. Rep. 409.

The Commission has authority to investigate and deal with violation of the law independently of any formal complaint; 31 C. Rep. 151; it can only determine whether existing rates are in conflict with the statute, and not make rates itself; 5 id. 391; s. c. 162 U. S. 184; 76 Fed. Rep. 183.

It has no power to prescribe rates, either maximum, minimum, or absolute, and it cannot secure the same result indirectly by determining what in reference to the past was reasonable and just, and then endeavor to obtain from the courts a peremptory order that in the future the railroad company should follow such rates; 167 U. S. 479. It can apply the act only where an overt violation of its provisions by a carrier subject thereto is made to appear; 1 I. C. Rep. 323; s. c. 11 C. C. R. 102.

Subject to the two leading prohibitions that their charges shall not be unreasonable or unjust, and that they shall not unjustly discriminate, so as to give undue preference to persons or traffic similarly circumstanced, the act leaves common carriers as they were at common law, free to make special contracts, to classify their traffic, to adjust and apportion their rates, and generally, to manage their important interests upon the same principles which are regarded as sound in other pursuits; 162 U. S. 184; s. c. 51 C. Rep. 391 (C. C. of A.); id. 685. The act was not designed to prevent competition between different roads, or to interfere with the customary arrangements made by railway companies for reduced fares in consideration of increased mileage, where such reduction does not operate as an unjust discrimination. It is not all discriminations that are prohibited, but only those that are unjust and unreasonable; 145 U. S. 263, affirming 43 Fed. Rep. 37. The act is not to be construed so as to abridge or take away the common-law right of the carrier to make contracts and adopt proper business methods, further than its terms and recognized purposes require; a railroad company may lawfully charge low rates on coal in the summer months, if its rates are equal to all persons; 51 C. Rep. 656 (C. C., M. D. of Tenn.).

The act should be liberally construed in favor of commerce among the states, but when complaint is made solely or mainly in the interest of the common carriers engaged in such commerce, the act complained of, or the right asserted, should not rest upon any doubtful construction, but should clearly appear to have been forbidden or conferred; 37 Fed. Rep. 567.

Where a railroad company by a contract with a bridge company had the right to use a bridge for its traffic, the railroad company is subject, as a common carrier, to the act, but the bridge company cannot invoke it to compel railroad companies to transact business with it; id. Carriers by water are not under the act except "when both are used under a common control, etc., for a continuous carriage, etc.;" 21 C. Rep. 496.

The act does not apply to express companies, independently organized; 42 Fed. Rep. 448; nor to the carriage of property by rail or otherwise wholly within a state; 30 id. 867; when the carrier issues no bills of lading to points beyond its line, receives no freight on through bills of lading, and has no arrangement with other roads for a conventional division of charges or a common management; 77 id. 842; but if a railroad company, whose line is entirely within one state, issues through bills of lading to points in other states, it is within the act; 11 C. Rep. 315. Receivers of railroad companies are common carriers and subject to the act; 61 C. Rep. 379; and a carrier subject to the act cannot, by leasing its road, free itself from liability for practices illegal under the act, nor after the termination of the lease escape liability for damages for injuries sustained during the lease; 61 C. Rep. 378.

The act does not come within the constitutional prohibition as to impairing the obligation of contracts, although its effect may be to prevent the literal enforcement of pre-existing contracts; 21 C. Rep. 102; s. c. 21 C. C. R. 162; 45 Am. & Eng. R. Cas. (Mont.) 284.

The act requires that all charges by common carriers subject to its provisions "shall be reasonable and just," and this is the sole requirement of the law upon the subject of rates which such carriers may demand for the transportation of interstate traffic; 37 Fed. Rep. 567. The terms "reasonable, just," "unreasonable, unjust," "undue or unreasonable preference or advantage," "undue or unreasonable advantage in any respect whatsoever," used in the act imply

* The decisions of the Commission have been published in a series of Interstate Commerce Commission Reports, 6 vols. The Interstate Commerce Reports, 6 vols., contain the decisions of the Commission and commerce cases in the courts. The former series has been discontinued; it is cited as I. C. R. E.; the latter as I. C. Rep.

comparison of relative locations, natural and acquired advantages, of the reasonableness of charges per se and in their relations to other roads or lines which serve competing localities, and consideration of all the facts and circumstances which affect rates to different communities; 6 I. C. Rep. 458.

The act is for the protection of the public only; 2 I. C. Rep. 187; s. c. 3 I. C. C. R. 331.

The mere circumstance that there is in a given case a preference does not, of itself, show that such preference is unreasonable; 5 I. C. Rep. 685 (C. C. of A.); s. c. 74 Fed. Rep. 715. See DISCRIMINATION.

Evidence that the rates on a certain commodity are higher in certain cases than certain other rates, and that they produce a large revenue to the carrier, does not make a prima facie case that they are unreasonable. The reasonableness must be determined by an examination of the whole subject; 2 I. C. Rep. 163. The fact that a road earns little more than operating expenses is not to be overlooked in fixing rates, but it cannot be made to justify grossly excessive rates. Wherever there are more roads than the business, at fair rates, will remunerate, they must rely upon future earnings for the return of investments and profits; 2 I. C. Rep. 289.

There is nothing in the act requiring connecting lines of interstate carriers to make through routes and through rates with one connecting line because it has done so with another; 37 Fed. Rep. 567.

The relative fairness of a rate is not determined alone by its being low. Low rates to one place may not be just if still lower rates are given to another place; 2 I. C. Rep. 187. The legitimate interests of carrying companies, as well as of traders and shippers, should be considered in determining the lawfulness of rates under the act. Ocean competition may constitute a dissimilar condition, and conditions which exist beyond the seaboard of the United States can be legitimately regarded for the purpose of justifying a difference in rates charged by railroads between import and domestic traffic; 5 I. C. Rep. 405; s. c. 162 U. S. 197.

Trade centres are not, as a matter of right, entitled to have more favorable rates than the smaller towns for which they form distributive centres; and carriers may give the smaller places rates as favorable as the larger ones; when the rates are impartial in themselves as between large and small towns, the fact that one large centre may have an advantage over another in the business of the small places does not make out a case of undue preference. Impartial rates are not rendered illegal by their effect upon the business of localities; 2 I. C. Rep. 32; that rates should be fixed in inverse proportion to the natural advantages of competing towns with the view of equalizing "commercial conditions" is at variance with justice; 4 I. C. Rep. 65; 7 id. 180. A through rate does not unjustly discriminate against an intermediate point because less proportionally than the rate from such point to the common destination; 2 I. C. Rep. 393.

A railroad company is under special obligation to give reasonable rates for its local business. It may accept business from other carriers on through rates which, when divided between them, will give to any one of them for its division less than its own local rates; 2 I. C. Rep. 414.

Through transportation over connecting lines is favored by the act, and the rate is correctly adjusted upon the distance through, and not upon the shorter distances over, the several lines; 8 I. C. Rep. 460. While the question of distance is important in establishing rates, it is not an absolute and unconditional right from which a departure may not be justified by other considerations. The public benefits, the greater volume of business warranting lower rates to all, and the force of competition may furnish reasons that outweigh a claim of right founded merely on geographical considerations; 2 I. C. Rep. 436. See id. 604.

When rates are on their face disproportionate or relatively unequal, the burden is on the carrier to justify them; 2 I. C. Rep. 604. In determining rates on a short local line, where the cost of service is great, owing to steep grades, sparse population, and light traffic, such circumstances should have much controlling weight. This rule was applied where a road existing under such conditions was charged with unjust rates in transporting oil, as compared with the cost of piping it to the same point; 2 I. C. Rep. 298.

Ordinarily there is no better measure of railroad service in carrying goods than distance, though it is not always controlling. And where the rates for carrying freight from a certain territory over one road are considerably greater than the rates charged by another road from neighboring territory to the same place, the higher rates will be held excessive; 2 I. C. Rep. 609. Greater compensation in the aggregate for the shorter, than for the longer, haul over a direct line is unlawful; 6 I. C. Rep. 361.

Mileage, while a circumstance to be considered with the conditions in fixing rates, is by no means controlling or the most important; 5 I. C. Rep. 656 (C. C., M. D. of Tenn.).

There may be cases in which a carrier legitimately engaged in serving some territory is compelled by some new and aggressive competition to reduce normal and reasonable rates, to retain business on its line, and where corresponding reductions at points not affected, or less affected, by such competition, might be unreasonable. But when a carrier voluntarily enters a field of competition where, by reason of a disadvantageous route, or the rigor of the competitive conditions, remunerative rates cannot be charged, and its service to a portion of its patrons is unprofitable, it accepts the legal obligation that its service shall be impartial to all who sustain similar relations to the traffic, and for whom the service itself is not substantially dissimilar; 3 I. C. Rep. 115. Where there has been a consolidation of competing lines that have formerly served the same territory in competitive traffic to the same market, the consolidated lines cannot deprive the public of fair competition, nor give oppressive discrimination with a view to its own interest; 3 I. C. Rep. 162.

In fixing reasonable rates on such articles as food products, the operating expenses, bonded debt, fixed charges, dividends on the stock and other necessary expenses are all to be considered, but the claim that any particular rate is to be measured by these as a fixed standard, below which the rate cannot lawfully be reduced, is subject to some qualifications, one of which is that these obligations must be actual and in good faith; 37 Fed. Rep. 567; nor, on the other hand, can these rates be so limited that the shipper may, in all cases, realize actual cost of production; 3 I. C. Rep. 93; S. c. 4 I. C. C. R. 48; in the carriage of great staples which supply an enormous business, and which in market value and actual cost of transportation are among the cheapest articles of commerce, rates yielding only moderate profit to the carrier are both necessary and justifiable; id.

The fact that one company controls parallel lines affords no warrant for giving superior advantages to the patrons of one line and denying similar advantages to those of the other line; 1 I. C. Rep. 608.

Ordinarily no adequate reason exists for a difference in rates for a solid carload of one kind of freight from one consignor and a like carload from the same point to the same destination consisting of freight from more than one consignor to one consignee, etc., and such difference is not justified by the difference in the cost of handling; 2 I. C. Rep. 742.

The Commission has no power to require the adoption of rates on a uniform and equal mileage basis; 2 I. C. Rep. 9.

The expense of carrying fruit, etc., from Jersey City, the railroad terminal, to New York, may be added to the rate charged to the latter place; 6 I. C. Rep. 295. As to the effect of free cartage at terminals, see 167 U. S. 633.

Party-rate tickets are not commutation tickets, and when party rates are lower than the fare for single passengers they are illegal; 2 I. C. Rep. 729. A sale of mileage tickets to commercial travellers, and a refusal to sell to other passengers except at a higher rate, is unjust discrimination within the act; and the fact that the former release the carrier from liability, or that they may influence business in favor of the road, does not justify such discrimination; 1 I. C. Rep. 369. The placing of passenger tickets in the hands of ticket brokers to be disposed of at reduced rates, under the pretence of paying a commission, is a violation of the act; 2 I. C. Rep. 340. A passenger rate war in which rates are repeatedly reduced by carriers without filing tariffs or reducing intermediate rates, is unlawful; id.; granting free transportation to city officials is unjust discrimination within the act; 3 I. C. Rep. 793; s. c. 5 I. C. C. R. 153.

Where the established rate for single passengers is three cents a mile, it is not unlawful to issue what are termed "party-rate tickets" for not less than ten persons, at two cents a mile, which is less than the established rate for single passengers, where such tickets are offered to the public generally; 145 U. S. 263. See 2 I. C. Rep. 445, where the Commission held that party rates and passenger carload rates lower than for single passengers are illegal.

The provision of sec. 22 that nothing in the act shall apply "to the issuance of mileage passenger tickets" applies only to the issuing of such tickets; the terms upon which they are issued must be in accordance with the general provisions of the act; 1 I. C. Rep. 369.

If a reduction in passenger rates be made between competing points, the rates must also be reduced between intermediate points; 2 I. C. Rep. 340.

A greater charge for a shorter haul than for a longer haul is permissible, if the conditions are not in fact "substantially similar," and the carrier may determine this question for itself, subject to a liability for violating the act. It is not necessary first to obtain a ruling from the Commission; 50 Fed. Rep. 295; s. c. 50 Am. & Eng. R. Cas. 93.

The act does not prevent the making of the charge less in proportion to the distance for a longer than for a shorter haul; 1 I. C. Rep. 764. The provision of sec. 4 prohibiting a greater charge for a shorter than for a longer distance, the shorter being included within the longer distance, is limited to cases in which the circumstances are substantially similar; nor is it a sufficient justification for such greater charge that the short haul is more expensive to the carrier, unless it be exceptionally so, or that the long haul traffic is exceptionally inexpensive; nor that the lesser charge on the longer haul has for its motive the encouragement of some branch of industry, or to build up business or trade centres, or that it is merely a continuation of favorable rates under which they had been built up; 1 I. C. Rep. 278. The long and short haul clause can be suspended only in exceptional cases, and not where there is only a general reason therefor, however serious the consequences of a refusal may be; id. 73.

The fact that a railroad company makes an unreasonably low rate does not authorize a rival, extending between the same points, to make greater charges for the shorter haul to intermediate points than it does to the terminal; 2 I. C. Rep. 137.

Where a road makes the same charge to one point that it does to another which is only from a third to two-thirds of the same distance, the charge to the shorter point is presumptively illegal; 2 I. C. Rep. 187. Actual water competition of controlling force relating to traffic important in amount, may justify a lower charge for a longer distance than for a shorter distance included therein; 3 I. C. Rep. 80; but disturbance of rates, secret or open, will not; 7 I. C. Rep. 61; nor will competition between markets or between carriers subject to the act; 7 I. C. Rep. 224; nor possible water competition; 3 I. C. Rep. 188. Water competition must be such that the freight would go to its destination by water, if the lower rate were not given; 3 I. C. Rep. 682; s. c. 4 I. C. R. 744.

On the ground that "through failure of crops" the people of long distance localities were without necessary food for themselves and animals, a temporary order was made in 6 I. C. Rep. 298, authorizing a carrier to charge less for a longer distance than they were authorized to charge for a shorter distance. And the need of additional facilities for passengers travelling to Chicago during the World's Fair was considered a ground for the same relief; 6 I. C. Rep. 823. An intermediate local rate should never exceed the through rate plus the local rate back to the intermediate place; 2 I. C. Rep. 1.

The classification of freight is expressly recognized by the act; 2 I. C. Rep. 742. But in classifying freights the carrier must respect the interests of the shipper on the basis of relative equality and justice; 2 I. C. Rep. 742. Common carriers should be held responsible for the correctness of the weight and classification of freight received, and in turn should hold every station agent responsible; 1 I. C. Rep. 818.

Lower rates on carload lots than on less quantities are not unlawful; but if the difference be so wide as to destroy competition between large and small dealers, especially upon articles that are of general and necessary use, and that furnish a large volume of business, the act is violated; 2 I. C. Rep. 742. When an article moves in sufficient volume and the demands of commerce will be better served, it is reasonable to give a lower classification for carloads than that which applies to less than carload quantities, but the difference in such classification should not be so wide as to be destructive to competition between large and small dealers; 4 I. C. Rep. 285.

It is the duty of a carrier to equip its road with suitable cars for its traffic and to furnish them alike to all who have occasion for their use; 3 I. C. Rep. 162. The public must be justly and equally served in furnishing cars; if in a time of special pressure, some one must wait, regular customers of the road are not entitled to preference; 1 I. C. Rep. 787. A carrier is not justified in refusing less desirable freights because more money can be made by using its cars in carrying another kind; 1 I. C. Rep. 787. See FACILITIES.

In an action for unjust discrimination in freight charges, under sec. 2, it is sufficient to set out the rates charged plaintiff and another shipper, and the circumstances and conditions under which plaintiff's shipment was made, with an allegation that the smaller charges made the other shipper were for like services, under substantially the same circumstances and conditions, without setting out such circumstances and conditions; 81 Fed. Rep. 80.

It is the duty of a carrier of live stock to provide proper facilities for receiving and discharging live stock free from all charges except the regular transportation charges; and it cannot receive and discharge such live stock at a depot, access to which must be purchased; 1 I. C. Rep. 601.

Under the statute shippers are not to be put in a position of subservience to common carriers, and are not required to ask for rates, but are entitled to equal and open rates at all times; 2 I. C. Rep. 203.

Complaints, though brought by an individual, may challenge the entire schedule of rates to competing points; 6 I. C. Rep. 458.

The Commission can rehear a particular case and amend its original order therein, although the circuit court may have refused to enforce such original order; 6 I. C. Rep. 548.

In proceedings before the Commission, all offending carriers need not be made parties defendant, but the case may proceed only against the carrier whose lines the complainant uses; 6 I. C. Rep. 548.

The jurisdiction of the circuit court is limited to approval or disapproval, and to an enforcement, or a refusal to enforce, an order of the Commissioners. It cannot modify it; 5 I. C. Rep. 656 (C. C., M. D. of Tenn.).

The right asserted by a petitioner in the circuit court under the act arises and is claimed under a law of the United States which relates to a subject over which congress has exclusive control; and this is sufficient to sustain the jurisdiction; 87 Fed. Rep. 567; 2 L. R. A. 289. A state court has no jurisdiction; 49 La. Ann. 511.

It is not necessary that a person making a complaint before the Commission should have a pecuniary interest in the violation of the statute complained of; it is sufficient if a responsible party complains of a matter which amounts to a public grievance; 1 I. C. Rep. 571; 7 I. C. Rep. 92.

It is not proper for railroad companies to withhold the larger part of their evidence from the Commission, and first adduce it in the circuit court in proceedings by the Commission to enforce its order; the purposes of the act call for a full inquiry by the Commission in the first instance; 5 I. C. Rep. 391; s. c. 162 U. S. 184. It is not necessary to file with a petition for the enforcement of an order of the Commission the transcript of the evidence taken before it, under the provision of the statute making the findings of the fact of the Commission prima facie evidence of the matter stated, but either party may use as evidence any competent testimony taken before the Commission; 5 I. C. Rep. 181; s. c. 64 Fed. Rep. 981. Where the Commission applies for an injunction to restrain a railroad company from disobeying an order of the Commission, a preliminary injunction will not be granted when the company's answer denies the facts upon which the order was based; 49 Fed. Rep. 177. A preliminary injunction will not be granted where the question involved is a new one; or where the injury to the defendant is likely to be greater than the benefit to the plaintiff; id. It is doubtful if a preliminary injunction should ever be granted; 62 Fed. Rep. 690; s. c. 5 I. C. Rep. 287. An action against the carrier for a violation of the act in making unlawful discriminations may be maintained in the name of the United States by the district attorney; 5 I. C. Rep. 106 (U. S. C. C., D. of Kans.). No appeal now lies to the supreme court from decisions of the Commission; 149 U. S. 284.

Under the 5th amendment to the constitution of the United States, which declares that "no person . . . shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself," a person under examination by a grand jury, in an investigation into certain alleged violations of the act and its amendments, is not obliged to answer questions where he states that his answers might tend to criminate him; although section 860 of the Revised Statutes provides that no evidence given by him shall in any manner be used against him in any court of the United States in any criminal proceedings. The object of this constitutional provision is to insure that a person shall not be compelled, when acting as a witness in any investigation, to give testimony which may tend to show that he himself has committed a crime; 142 U. S. 547.

The provision in the act of February 11, 1893, "that no person shall be excused from attending and testifying or from producing books, etc., before the" Commission, on the ground that the testimony, may tend to criminate him or subject him to a penalty or forfeiture; but that no such person shall be prosecuted or subjected to any penalty or forfeiture on account of any matter concerning which he may testify or produce such evidence, affords absolute immunity against prosecution and deprives the witness of his constitutional right to refuse to answer; 161 U. S. 591; s. c. 5 I. C. Rep. 389. This act is said to have been passed in view of the decision in 142 U. S. 547, supra; see 161 U. S. 594.

The act of February 4, 1897, is not inconsistent with the act of July 2, 1890. "To protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraints and monopolies;" 166 U. S. 290.

So far as congress adopted the language of the English Traffic Act, it is to be presumed that it had in mind the construction given by the English courts to the adopted language; and intended to incorporate it into the statute; 145 U. S. 268.

INTERSTATE RENDITION. See FUGITIVE FROM JUSTICE.

INTERVENING DAMAGES. Damages suffered by an appellee from delay caused by the appeal. 1 Tyler 267.

INTERVENOR. One not originally a party who, by leave of the court, interposes in a suit and becomes a party thereto to protect a right or interest in the subject-matter.

A person who intervenes in a suit, either on his own behalf or on the behalf of the public. See INTERVENTION.

INTERVENTION (Lat. intervenio, to come between or among). In Practice. The admission, by leave of the court, of a person not an original party to pending legal proceedings, by which such person becomes a party thereto for the protection of some right or interest alleged by him to be affected by such proceedings.

Persons who are not parties to a suit cannot in general file a petition therein for a stay of proceedings or any other cause; the remedy is by original bill. Exceptions are: where the pleadings contain scandal against a stranger, or where a stranger purchases the subject of litigation pending the suit, and the like; creditors are allowed to prove debts and persons belonging to a class on whose behalf the suit is brought are regarded as quasi parties and, of course, may have a standing in court; per Bradley, J., in 2 Woods 628. Third persons may be driven to intervene for their rights in equity if those rights are to be affected, and if at the hearing the court would be compelled to notice their absence and order the case to stand over until they were brought in; 19 Fed. Rep. 659. See 1 Dan. Ch. Pr. 267; Story, Eq. Pl. § 220. It is not necessary to the right of intervention, in order to participate in a trust fund in the custody of the law, that the intervenor should first obtain judgment at law or should have any lien upon the fund. Intervention will be granted, after a foreclosure decree against a railroad company, to unsecured note-holders who pray to have their debts established as equitable liens upon the property and funds of the company paramount to the lien of the mortgage; 21 Fed. Rep. 264. A holder of railroad bonds secured by a mortgage under foreclosure has an interest in the amount of the trustee's compensation, which entitles him to intervene and to contest it and to appeal from an adverse decision; 111 U. S. 684. Where a part of a canal was sold and the fund brought into court, it was held that the contractor who built the canal could intervene for the protection of his rights either upon the fund or against the purchaser; 105 U. S. 509. Bondholders in a foreclosure suit brought by the trustee of the mortgage are quasi parties and may be heard for the protection of their interests; 53 Fed. Rep. 850.

If one who is a necessary party to a case in a state court is wrongfully excluded and denied leave to file a proper cross bill and answer and to present a motion for removal to the federal court, he will be treated by the latter court as if a party; 23 Fed. Rep. 356. A case in 8 Fed. Rep. 97 was based on special facts.

Where a suit in equity was properly instituted against a railroad company by a stockholder, a bondholder, and the trustees for the bondholders named in the land grant mortgages of the company, and the bill charged that the officers of the company were squandering its property, and the purpose of the suit was the preservation and administration of the assets of the company, and a decree pro confesso had been entered and a receiver appointed, individual stockholders were not permitted to intervene and file a cross bill on a general charge of fraud and collusion on the part of the receiver and erroneous judgment on the part of the court in making the order referred to. In such a suit, it is not the proper practice to allow individual stockholders to intervene to set aside the proceedings or to interpose obstacles to the progress of the suit. Such stockholders may come in to take the benefit of the proceedings and decree, but not to oppose and nullify them. Rival creditors by proceedings before the master may fix the priority of their respective liens, and creditors or stockholders may contest the validity of the claims of other creditors and stockholders, but all in subordination to the general object of the suit, to obtain an administration of the company's assets and property. Persons will not be allowed to intervene as general defendants unless they show that they have an interest in the results as stockholders, and are also able to show fraud and collusion between the plaintiff in the suit and the officers of the company; per Bradley, J., in 2 Woods 823. In 3 Hughes 390, the Amsterdam Bondholders' Committee, representing a very large number of bonds, filed a petition setting out the grounds for disapproving their trustees' management of the foreclosure suit, and praying intervention, but leave to intervene was denied; 55 Fed. Rep. 448.

Where the holder of a large amount of bonds, on which foreclosure proceedings were pending, asked leave to intervene, and it appeared that the mortgage trustee was already a party and there was no allegation that it was not acting properly for the interests of all bondholders, leave to intervene was refused (even for the mere purpose of requiring notice to such bondholder of successive steps in the proceedings), on the ground of excessive inconvenience in the administration of the cause; Dallas, J., in the Reading Railroad foreclosure, U. S. C. C.

The practice in respect of intervention in ordinary railroad foreclosure cases probably differs somewhat in different circuits, and varies considerably in different cases. The question of the right to intervene by members of a class already represented on the record appears to be rather a matter of discretion, in view of what is deemed best for the due conduct of the cause. Probably the right to be heard will not ordinarily be refused in any case.

There would seem to be a distinction between the intervention of parties for the purpose of sharing in a fund and the intervention of parties in the course of the administration of a railroad property, during receivership. In the latter class of cases, it would appear, from the authorities, that unless good cause be shown for the intervention of new members of a class already represented on the record they will not be allowed to come in, upon the ground stated by Dallas, C. J., in the Reading foreclosure, —the excessive inconvenience in the administration of the cause.

In a suit to foreclose a railroad mortgage, certain persons prayed leave to intervene, alleging that the defendant company was made up by an illegal consolidation of three other companies, of one of which they were stockholders, that they never consented to the consolidation and were not bound by it nor by the mortgage, that the original company had no officers to defend for them, and that the consolidated company declined to set up the defence which they desired to make; leave to intervene was refused as there was no charge of fraud or collusion, and the proper remedy was by an independent suit; 48 Fed. Rep. 14.

A purchaser at a foreclosure sale may be admitted as a party to the record and allowed to appeal; 1 Wall. 655; 2 id. 609; upon failure to ask leave to come in, the court should compel him to become a party of record; 49 Fed. Rep. 426. The purchaser at a foreclosure sale under a junior mortgage who takes subject to a prior mortgage, will be made a party to proceedings to foreclose such prior mortgage; 44 Fed. Rep. 116. Parties given leave to intervene in an equity suit after a decree pro confesso have a right of appeal from a decree affecting their rights, and the supreme court will enforce this right by a mandamus; 94 U. S. 248. See 111 U. S. 884.

When a creditor's bill in equity is properly removed from a state court to a federal court on the ground that the controversy is wholly between citizens of different states, the jurisdiction of the latter is not ousted by admitting in the circuit court as co-plaintiffs other creditors who are citizens of the same state as the defendants; 115 U. S. 61.

When property in the possession of a third person claiming ownership, is attached on mesne process issuing out of the United States circuit court, as the property of a defendant and citizen of the same state, as the person claiming it, such person may seek redress in the circuit court by ancillary proceedings; as, for instance, if the original proceeding is in equity, by a petition pro interesse suo, or by ancillary bill, or by summary motion, according to circumstances; or, if it is at common law, by a summary motion or by a proceeding in the nature of an interpleader; or, if proceedings authorized by statutes of the state afford an adequate remedy, by adopting them as part of the practice of the court; Matthews, J., in 110 U. S. 276. Where, in a suit in equity, an execution is issued and a levy and sale made of certain lands, a third party claiming to be the real owner cannot intervene for the purpose of moving to set aside the execution when there is no privity of estate between him and the defendant in the execution; 55 Fed. Rep. 17.

On a creditors' bill, judgment creditors who choose to intervene may share ratably with complainants in the proceeds of a sale of the property, even if some do not intervene until after the decree of sale; 44 Fed. Rep. 117. The practice of permitting judgment creditors to come in and make themselves parties to a creditors' bill is well settled; 5 Wall. 205.

Stockholders of a corporation who have been allowed to put in answers in the name of the corporation cannot be regarded as answering for the corporation itself. In a special case, however, where there is an allegation that the directors fraudulently refused to attend to the interests of the corporation, equity may allow a stockholder to become a party defendant for the protection of his own interest and that of such other stockholders as may join him in the defence; 2 Wall. 288. Where any fraud has been perpetrated by the directors of a company by which the interests of the stockholders are affected, the stockholders have a right to come in as parties to a suit against the company and ask that their property shall be relieved from the effect of such fraud; 8 Biss. 193.

The state can intervene in proceedings to foreclose a railroad mortgage only where it is entitled as a bond or lien holder to share in the proceeds of a sale, or where public interests are at stake which are seriously threatened by the proposed disposition of the property. An intervening petition filed by a state in railroad foreclosure proceedings alleging that bonds and the mortgage securing them were void, and that the railroad company, by collusion and neglect to defend, was about to allow judgment to go against it by default, that the company in consideration of large land grants from the state had agreed to maintain low rates of transportation, which, by foreclosure, would be increased, gives no right of intervention, especially where neither the charter of the company nor any subsequent legislation showed any such contract as the one alleged; 81 Tex. 530. Permission will not be granted to a state to intervene for the stay of the sale of a railroad under foreclosure proceedings; 2 Woods 628.

In a controversy between two states in relation to the boundary line between them, the attorney-general of the United States may appear on behalf of the United States and adduce evidence, though he does not thereby become a party in the technical sense of the word, and no judgment will be entered for or against the United States; 17 How. 478.

A petition to intervene need not be as formal as a bill of complaint, yet it should exhibit all the material facts relied on, embodying so much of the record in the original suit as is essential, and proceedings taken therein which would fortify the right of the intervenor should be incorporated in the petition by amendment, and if this is not done, such proceedings cannot be noticed on a demurrer to the petition; 77 Fed. Rep. 700.

In bills brought on behalf of a class, an intervening member of the class will ordinarily be joined as a plaintiff and this will not generally deprive the court of jurisdiction; 115 U. S. 61. If there should be any danger that it would, he may be joined as a defendant or, if he intends to act in hostility to the original complainant, the court may make him a defendant; 1 Post. Fed. Prac. § 201; 5 Blatchf. 525; 2 Woods 828.

A person claiming a right to share in a fund or claiming a right to property in the hands of a receiver is generally allowed to intervene pro interesse suo; 1 Post. Fed. Pr. § 201.

One who, in an action at law, has been denied the right to intervene, because of his status, cannot afterwards maintain a bill in equity in the same court to enjoin the proceedings and to be permitted to intervene; 81 Fed. Rep. 753.

Under Codes. There are provisions in the codes of several of the states, which appear to have been originally adopted from Louisiana, permitting any person who has an interest in any matter in litigation to intervene by rule of court. This interest must be of such a direct and important character that the intervenor will either gain or lose by the direct effect of the judgment; the interest must be that created by a claim in suit or a lien upon the property, or some part thereof, in suit, or a claim to or lien upon the property or some part thereof which is the subject of litigation; 18 Cal. 62, per Field, J. See 144 U. S. 518; 1 La. 425. Where, under a judgment, there were attachments against property, one who held attachments upon the same property subsequent to those of the plaintiff in the suit, sought to intervene, alleging that the notes upon which the judgment was based were fraudulent, and that the suit and attachment were in execution of a collusive scheme between the plaintiff and defendant to defraud the intervenor, it was held that when the judgment was entered against the defendants the whole subject-matter of the suit was disposed of and that the writ of attachment was a part of the remedy and had nothing to do with the cause of action; also, that the vindication of the right as against the attached property involved an independent judicial inquiry, and leave to intervene was therefore refused; 28 Minn. 428.

See A. & E. Enc., Intervention.

In Patent Law. Where a third party asked to be made a party defendant, alleging that it was the manufacturer of machines claimed to infringe; that the defendant was its vendee; that it desired to settle the question as to whether or not the machines did infringe, both the complainant and the third party being non-residents, the petitioner was allowed to become a party defendant; 82 Fed. Rep. 835. In a suit against a railway company for infringing a patent upon oil cars, the defendant set up that it merely transported the cars under its obligation as a common carrier; and upon petition by the owner of the cars, he was allowed to intervene and defend the suit; 54 Fed. Rep. 621.

In Admiralty. Any person may intervene in a suit in rem for his interest and he may do so notwithstanding the res has been delivered to a claimant on a stipulation in a certain sum to abide by and perform the decree, the stipulation as far as it goes standing for the res; 45 Fed. Rep. 62. An administrator may intervene in a suit in rem to recover the damages allowed by a law of the state for the death of his intestate, caused by the wrongful act or omission of the person in charge of the res; 48 Fed. Rep. 78. When a vessel labelled by a material man has been taken possession of by the court, other material men may intervene by libel praying warrants of arrest in order to retain the property in case security be given for its release; 57 Fed. Rep. 233. See Admiralty Rule 43.

In International Law. The right of one state to interfere in the internal affairs of another is a question that has been much debated in international law. The Holy Alliance which existed for so many years was a combination of European states to suppress all attempts to overthrow monarchy in any country, and religion and humanity have frequently given excuses for the exercise of the right. The United States, however, has usually adhered to the policy of non-intervention, but with some exceptions not extending to armed intervention but tending in that direction, as in Mexico, during Maximilian's rule, in the war between Chile and Peru, and in the recent difficulty between Great Britain and Venezuela. See Snow, Lect. Int. L. 57. It is sometimes termed interference. See Davis, Int. L. 74.

The doctrine has been thus spoken of by a distinguished writer, "Historicus": "Its essence is illegality and its justification is its success." Instances of intervention are in China, Armenia, Madagascar, and Nicaragua. In 1861 France made an armed intervention in Mexico. Coercive intervention has long been looked upon as justifiable in cases where one state has been guilty of undue punishment of citizens of another state, or of any arbitrary or capricious unfairness towards such citizens; 20 Law Mag. and Rev. 4th ser. 242. See INTERNATIONAL LAW.

In Civil Law. The act by which a third party becomes a party in a suit pending between other persons.

The intervention is made either to be joined to the plaintiff, and to claim the same thing he does, or some other thing connected with it; or to join the defendant, and with him to oppose the claim of the plaintiff, which it is his interest to defeat. Pothier, Proc. Civ. 1ère part, ch. 2, s. 6, § 3.

In English Ecclesiastical Law. The proceeding of a third person, who, not being originally a party to the suit or proceeding, but claiming an interest in the subject-matter in dispute, in order the better to protect such interest, interposes his claim. 2 Chitty, Pr. 492; 3 Chitty, Com. Law 633; 2 Hagg. Cons. 137; 3 Phill. Eccl. 598; 1 Add. Eccl. 5; 4 Hagg. Eccl. 67; Dunlop, Adm. Pr. 74. The intervenor may come in at any stage of the cause, and even after judgment, if an appeal can be allowed on such judgment; 2 Hagg. Cons. 137; 1 Eng. Eccl. 490; 2 id. 13.

Intervention is allowed in certain cases, especially in suits for divorce and nullity of marriage, by 23 & 24 Vict. c. 144, and 36 & 37 Vict. c. 31, where it is usual for the queen's proctor to intervene, where collusion is suspected; Moz. & W.

In Possession and Administration of the Deceased. "Intervene in the possession and administration of the deceased" as the expression is used in the Argentine Treaty of 1853, is to be construed as permitting the consul of either contracting nation to temporarily possess the estate of his national for the purpose of protecting it, before it comes under the jurisdiction of the laws of the country, or to protect the interests of his national in an administration already instituted otherwise than by him. 223 U. S. 317. See MEDIATION.

INTESTABILIS. A witness incompetent to testify. Calv. Lex.

INTESTABLE. One who cannot lawfully make a testament.

An infant, an insane person, or one civilly dead, cannot make a will, for want of capacity or understanding; a married woman cannot make such a will without some special authority, because she is under the power of her husband. They are all intestable.

INTESTACY. The state or condition of dying without a will.

INTESTATE. Without a will. A person who dies, having made no will, or one which is defective in form. In that case, he is said to die intestate, and his estate descends to his heirs at law.

This term comes from the Latin intestatus. Formerly, it was used in France indiscriminately with de-confesse; that is, without confession. It was regarded as a crime, on account of the omission of the deceased person to give something to the church, and was punished by privation of burial in consecrated ground. This omission, according to Fournel, Hist. des Avocats, vol. 1, p. 116, could be repaired by making an ampliative testament in the name of the deceased. See Vely, tom. 6, page 145; Henrion de Pansey, Autorité judiciaire 129, and note. DESCENT AND DISTRIBUTION; WILL.

INTESTATE SUCCESSION. A succession is called intestate when the deceased has left no will, or when his will has been revoked, or annulled as irregular. Therefore the heirs to whom a succession has fallen by the effects of the law only are called "heirs ab intestato." Civil Code La. art. 1096.

INTESTATO. In the Civil Law. Intestate; without a will. Calv. Lex.

INTESTATUS. In the Civil and Old English Law. An intestate. One who dies without a will. Dig. 50, 17, 7.

INTIMACY. As generally applied to persons, it is understood to mean a proper, friendly relation of the parties, but it is frequently used to convey the idea of an improper relation; an intimacy at least disreputable and degrading. 153 Pa. 187. See 157 Mass. 478.

INTIMATION. In Civil Law. The name of any judicial act by which a notice of a legal proceeding is given to some one; but it is more usually understood to mean the notice or summons which an appellant causes to be given to the opposite party, that the sentence will be reviewed by the superior judge.

In Scotch Law. An instrument of writing, made under the hand of a notary, and notified to a party, to inform him of a right which a third person had acquired: for example, when a creditor assigns a claim against his debtor, the assignee or cedent must give an intimation of this to the debtor who, till then, is justified in making payment to the original creditor. Kames, Eq. b. 1, p. 1, s. 1.

INTIMIDATING. See ALARMING.

INTIMIDATION. The act of intimidating or making fearful; the state of being intimidated.

In Old English Law. Every person commits a misdemeanor, punishable with a fine or imprisonment, who wrongfully uses violence to, or intimidates, any other person, or his wife or children, with a view to compel him to abstain from doing, or to do, any act which he has a legal right to do or abstain from doing. (Stat. 38 and 39 Vict. c. 86, § 7.) This enactment is chiefly directed against outrages by trade-unions and there are similar statutes in many of the States. R. & L. Dict. See BOYCOTTING.

INTIMIDATION OF VOTERS. Statutes have been enacted in some states to punish the intimidation of voters. Under an early Pennsylvania act, it was held that to constitute the offence of intimidation of voters, there must be a preconceived intention for the purpose of intimidating the officers or interrupting the election; 8 Yeates 429.

INTO. Prohibiting the transporting of liquor "into" a State does not preclude its transportation through such a State, as the word "into" refers to the State of destination, and not to the means by which that end is reached. 249 U. S. 375.

INTOL AND UTOL. Toll or custom paid for things imported, or exported, or bought in or sold out. Tom.; Calv. Lex.

INTOXICATING BEVERAGE. See ANY, Intoxicating Beverage.

INTOXICATING LIQUOR. In the National Prohibition Act of 1919 (in effect 1920), title II and title III, the word "liquor" or the phrase "intoxicating liquor" shall be construed to include alcohol, brandy, whisky, rum, gin, beer, ale, porter, and wine, and in addition thereto any spirituous, vinous, malt, or fermented liquor, liquids, and compounds, whether medicated, proprietary, patented, or not, and by whatever name called, containing one-half of 1 per centum or more of alcohol by volume which are fit for use for beverage purposes. Thorpe, National and State Prohibition, 141.

INTOXICATION. See DRUNKENNESS.

INTRA VIRES. An act is said to be intra vires ("within the power") of a person or corporation when it is within the scope of his or its powers or authority. It is the opposite of ultra vires (q. v.).

INTRINSECUM SERVITIUM. Common and ordinary duties with the lord's court. Kenn. Glos.

Such service as was due out of the land by a tenant who held of the lord, as contrasted with forinsecum servitium, which meant such service as was due to the superior of whom the lord himself held the land. The intrinsecum servitium was "inside," and arose out of the bargain between the lord and the tenant: the forinsecum servitium was "outside," and existed independently of any such bargain. Byrne.

INTRINSIC. The intrinsic value of a thing is its true, inherent, and essential value, not depending upon accident, place, or person, but the same everywhere and to every one. 5 Fred. L. 696.

INTRODUCE INTO COMMERCE of United States. See "ATTEMPT TO INTRODUCE INTO COMMERCE OF UNITED STATES."

INTRODUCTION. That part of a writing in which are detailed those facts which elucidate the subject.

INTROMISSION. In Scotch Law. The assuming possession of property belonging to another, either on legal ground, or without any authority: in the latter case it is called vicious intromission. Bell, Dict.

In English Law. Dealing with stocks, goods, or cash of a principal coming into the hands of his agent, to be accounted for by the agent to his principal. 29 Eng. Law & Eq. 891. See AGENT.

INTRONISATION. In French Ecclesiastical Law. The installation of a bishop in his episcopal see. Clef des Lois Rom.; André.

INTRUDER. One who, on the death of the ancestor, enters on the land, unlawfully, before the heir can enter.

INTRUSION. The entry of a stranger after the determination of a particular estate of freehold, before the entry of him in reversion or remainder.

This entry and interposition of the stranger differs from an abatement in this, that an abatement is always to the prejudice of an heir or immediate devisee; an intrusion is always to the prejudice of him in remainder or reversion. 8 Bla. Com. 169; Fitzh. N. B. 203; Archb. Civ. Pl. 12; Dane, Abr. Index; 8 Steph. Com. 448.

The name of a writ brought by the owner of a fee simple, etc., against an intruder. New Nat. Brev. 458. Abolished by 3 & 4 Will. IV. c. 57.

INFUNDATION. The overflow of waters by coming out of their bed.

Inundations may arise from three causes:

from public necessity, as in defence of a place it may be necessary to dam the current of a stream, which will cause an inundation to the upper lands; they may be occasioned by an invincible force, as by the accidental fall of a rock in the stream, or by a natural flood or freshet; or they may result from the erection of works on the stream. In the first case, the injury caused by the inundation is to be compensated as other injuries done in war; in the second, as there was no fault of any one, the loss is to be borne by the unfortunate owner of the estate; in the last, when the riparian proprietor is injured by such works as alter the level of the water where it enters or where it leaves the property on which they are erected, the person injured may recover damages for the injury thus caused to his property by the inundation: 9 Co. 59; 1 B. & Ald. 356; 4 Day 244; 1 Rawle 218; 3 Mas. 172; 7 Pick. 198; 3 Hill, N. Y. 531; 32 N. H. 90, 316; 1 Cox 460; 3 H. & J. 231; 27 Ala. N. S. 127; 3 Strobh. 348. See 79 Ga. 731; 155 Pa. 523; 112 Mo. 6; 111 N. C. 80; 43 Ill. App. 108; Schultes, Aq. R. 122; Angell, Wat. C. § 380; Pom. Ripar. Rt. 73; DAM; BACKWATER; IRRIGATION; WATER; WATER COURSE.

INURE. To take effect; to result. See ENTRE.

INUREMENT. Use; user; service to the use or benefit of a person. 100 U. S. 583.

INVADIARE. To mortgage lands. Toml.

INVADIATIO (L. Lat.). A pledge or mortgage.

INVADIATUS. One who is under pledge; one who has had sureties or pledges given for him. Spel. Glos.

INVADING A JUDGE. Assaulting a judge. Patterson.

INVALID. Not valid; of no binding force.

INVASION. The entry of a country by a public enemy, making war. See INSURRECTION.

INVASIONES. The inquisition of sergeants and knights' fees. Cowel; Calv. Lex.

INVECTA ET ILLATA (Lat.). In Civil Law. Things carried and brought in. Things brought into a building hired (cedes), or into a hired estate in the city (prædium urbanum), which are held by a tacit mortgage for the rent. Voc. Jur. Utr.; Domat, Civ. Law.

INVENT. To create. 243 U. S. 45. Distinguished from "furnish" which means to supply. Id.

INVENTIO. In the Civil Law. Finding; one of the modes of acquiring title to property by occupancy. Heinecc. lib. 2, tit. 1, 350.

In Old English Law. A thing found; as goods, or treasure-trove. Cowel. The plural, "inventiones," is also used.

INVENTION. See PATENT.

INVENTIONES. A word used in some ancient English charters to signify treasure-trove.

INVENTOR. One who contrives or produces a thing which did not before exist. One who makes an invention. The word is generally used to denote the author of such contrivances as are by law patentable. See PATENT.

INVENTORY. A list, schedule, or enumeration in writing, containing, article by article, the goods and chattels, rights and credits, and, in some cases, the land and tenements, of a person or persons. A conservatory act, which is made to ascertain the situation of an intestate's estate, the estate of an insolvent, and the like, for the purpose of securing it to those entitled to it.

When the inventory is made of goods and estates assigned or conveyed in trust, it must include all the property conveyed. It is prima facie evidence of the value as against the administrator; 5 Misc. Rep. 580; 74 Hun 358.

In case of intestate estates, it is required to contain only the personal property, or that to which the administrator is entitled. The claims due to the estate ought to be separated; those which are desperate or bad ought to be so returned. The articles ought to be set down separately, as already mentioned, and separately valued. It is not the duty of an administrator to inventory property which was conveyed by his intestate in fraud of creditors; 17 R. 1, 751. The duty of having an appraisal and inventory made of a testator's estate, rests on the executor and not on the adult legatees; 65 Hun 619. An item inserted in the inventory by mistake may be stricken out after it is sworn to; 78 Hun 202.

The inventory is to be made in the presence of at least two of the creditors of the deceased, or legatees, or next of kin, or of two honest persons. The appraisers must sign it, and make oath or affirmation that the appraisement is just to the best of their knowledge. See, generally, 14 Vin. Abr. 465; Bac. Abr. Executors, etc. (E 11); Ayl. Par. 305; Com. Dig. Administration (B 7); 2 Add. Eccl. 319; 2 Eccl. 322; Shoul. Ex. & Ad. 230; 2 Bla. Com. 514; 8 S. & R. 128.

INVENTUS. See FOUND.

INVEST (Lat. investire, to clothe). To put in possession of a field upon taking the oath of fealty or fidelity to the prince or superior lord. Also, to lay out capital in some permanent form so as to produce an income.

The term would hardly apply to an active capital employed in banking; 15 Johns. 358. It would cover the loaning of money; 37 Ind. 123. Whenever a sum is represented by anything but money, it is invested; 28 N. Y. 242.

When speaking of the capital of a business corporation or partnership, (such as the Revenue Act of Oct. 3, 1917 deals with) "to invest" imports a laying out of money, or money's worth, either by an individual in acquiring an interest in the concern with a view to obtaining income or profit from the conduct of its business, or by the concern itself in acquiring something of permanent use in the business; in either case involving a conversion of wealth from one form into another suitable for employment in the making of the hoped-for gains. 256 U. S. 387.

INVESTED CAPITAL. In the Revenue Act of Oct. 3, 1917, § 207 (taking place of the Act of Mar. 3, 1917): In the case of a corporation or partnership: (1) Actual cash paid in, (2) the actual cash value of tangible property paid in other than case, for stock or shares in such corporation or partnership, at the time of such payment, and (3) paid in or earned surplus and undivided profits used or employed in the business, exclusive of undivided profits earned during the taxable year.

As used in this Act does not include stocks, bonds (other than obligations of the United States), or other assets, nor money or other property borrowed. 256 U. S. 384. It includes nothing but money, or money's worth actually contributed or converted in exchange for shares of the capital stock, or actually acquired through the business activities of the corporation or partnership (involving again a conversion) and coming in ab extra, by way of increase over the original capital stock. Id. 388. In short, invested capital is defined in the statute according to the original cost of the property instead of its present value; Id. 391. See also INVEST.

INVESTITURE. The act of giving possession of lands by actual seisin. The ceremonial introduction to some office of dignity.

When livery of seisin was made to a person by the common law, he was invested with the whole fee; this the foreign feudists, and sometimes our own law-writers, call investiture; but generally speaking, it is termed by the common-law writers the seisin of the fee. 2 Bla. Com. 209, 313; Fearn, Rem. 223, n. (2).

By the canon law, investiture was made per baculum et annulum, by the ring and crozier, which were regarded as symbols of the episcopal jurisdiction. Ecclesiastical and secular fiefs were governed by the same rule in this respect,—that previously to investiture neither a bishop, abbot, nor lay lord could take possession of a fief conferred upon him by the prince.

Pope Gregory VI. first disputed the right of sovereigns to give investiture of ecclesiastical fiefs, A. D. 1045; but Pope Gregory VII. carried on the dispute with much more vigor, A. D. 1073. He excommunicated the emperor Henry IV. The popes Victor III., Urban II., and Paul II. continued the contest. This dispute, it is said, cost Christendom sixty-three battles, and the lives of many millions of men. De Pradt.

INVESTIVE FACT. The fact by means of which a right comes into existence; e. g. a grant of a monopoly, the death of one ancestor. Holl. Jur. 132.

INVESTMENT. A sum of money left for safekeeping, subject to order, and payable not in the specific money deposited, but in an equal sum; it may or may not bear interest, according to the agreement. 144 Pa. 499; 54 N. W. Rep. (Wis.) 11.

As to investment of trust funds, see TRUSTEE.

An investment is the loaning or placing of money so as to produce interest or profit. 17 A. & E. Ency. 2nd ed., 425. Also, it is the loaning or placing by a fiduciary of money in his hands in such capacity, so as to produce interest or profit for the benefit of the one for whom he holds. Id. A sum is "invested" whenever its amount is represented by anything but money. Id.; 23 N. Y. 242. See INVEST.

INVIOABILITY. That which is not to be violated. The persons of ambassadors are inviolable. See AMBASSADOR; TELEGRAM.

INVITO. Against, or without the assent or consent; unwilling.

INVITO DEBITORE. Against the will of the debtor.

INVITO DOMINO (Lat.). In Criminal Law. Without the consent of the owner.

In order to constitute larceny, the property stolen must be taken invito domino; this is the very essence of the crime. Cases of considerable difficulty arise when the owner has, for the purpose of detecting thieves, by himself or his agents, delivered the property taken, as to whether they are larcenies or not: the distinction seems to be this, that when the owner procures the property to be taken, it is not larceny; and when he merely leaves it in the power of the defendant to execute his original purpose of taking it, in the latter case it will be considered as taken invito domino; 2 Russ. Cr. 66, 105; 2 East, Pl. Cr. 666; Bac. Abr. Felony (C); 2 B. & P. 508; 1 Carr. & M. 217; LARCENY.

INVOICE. In Commercial Law. An account of goods or merchandise sent by merchants to their correspondents at home or abroad, in which the marks of each package, with other particulars, are set forth. Marsh. Ins. 408; Dane, Abr. Index. An invoice ought to contain a detailed statement, which should indicate the nature, quantity, quality, and prices of the things sold, deposited, etc.; 1 Pard. n. 248. See 3 Wash. C. C. 118, 155. Invoice carries no necessary implication of ownership, but accompanies goods consigned to a factor for sale, as well as in the case of a purchaser; 4 Abb. App. Dec. 78. See BILL OF LADING; Invoice Price. The prime cost, or invoice of the cost. 7 Johns. 343.

INVOLUNTARY. An involuntary act is that which is performed with constraint (q. u.), or with repugnance, or without the will to do it. An action is involuntary which is performed under duress. Wolfius, Inst. § 5.

INVOLUNTARY MANSLAUGHTER. See MANSLAUGHTER; HOMICIDE.

IOWA (an Indian word denoting "the place or final resting place"). The name of one of the states of the United States, being the sixteenth admitted to the Union.

This state was admitted to the Union by an act of congress approved December 28, 1846.

INVOLUNTARY SERVITUDE. In the Thirteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, has a larger meaning than "slavery." They include slavery of whatever name and form and all its badges and incidents; any state of bondage. Control by which the personal service of one man is disposed of or coerced for another's benefit is the essence of involuntary servitude. 219 U. S. 241. See PEONAGE.

IPSISSIMIS VERBIS (Lat.). In the identical words: opposed to substantially. 7 How. 719; 5 Ohio St. 346.

IPSO FACTO (Lat.). By the fact itself. By the mere fact. A proceeding ipso facto void is one which has not prima facie validity, but is void ab initio.

IPSO JURE (Lat.). By the operation of law. By mere law.

IPSWICH, DOMESDAY OF. A local record which is printed pp. 16-209 of Vol. II of the Black Book of the Admiralty (q. v.). It contains amongst other things the Ipswich code of sea-laws. Byrne.

IRRECUSABLE. A term used to indicate a certain class of contractual obligations recognized by the law which are imposed upon a person without his consent and without regard to any act of his own. They are distinguished from recusable obligations which are the result of a voluntary act on the part of a person on whom they are imposed by law. A clear example of an irrecusable obligation is the obligation imposed on every man not to strike another without some lawful excuse. A recusable obligation is based upon some act of a person bound, which is a condition precedent to the genesis of the obligation. These terms were first suggested by Prof. Wigmore in 8 Harv. Law Rev. 200. See HARR. CONTR. 6, where this classification is very fully discussed. See CONTRACTUAL OBLIGATION.

IRREGULAR. Out of rule; not according to rule.

IRREGULAR DEPOSIT. See DEPOSIT.

IRREGULAR JUDGMENT. See ERRONEOUS.

IRREGULARITY. In Practice. The doing or not doing that in the conduct of a suit at law, which, conformably with the practice of the court, ought or ought not to be done. 2 Ind. 252. The term is usually applied to such informality as does not render invalid the act done; thus an irregular distress for rent due is not illegal ab initio.

A party entitled to complain of irregularity should except to it previously to taking any step by him in the cause; Lofft 822, 833; because the taking of any such step is a waiver of any irregularity; 1 B. & P. 342; 3 East 547; 2 Wils. 380. See ABATEMENT.

The court will, on motion, set aside proceedings for irregularity. On setting aside a judgment and execution for irregularity, they have power to impose terms on the defendant, and will restrain him from bringing an action of trespass, unless a strong case of damage appears. 1 Chitty, Bail. 133, n. And see Baldw. 246; 3 Chitty, Pr. 509.

In Canon Law. Any impediment which prevents a man from taking holy orders.

IRRELEVANCY. The quality or state of being inapplicable or impertinent to a fact or argument.

Irrelevancy, in an answer, consists in statements which are not material to the decision of the case; such as do not form or tender any material issue. 18 N. Y. 315, 321.

IRRELEVANT. Not pertinent; inapplicable. Anderson.

In pleading, said of a fact or allegation which has no bearing upon the subject-matter and cannot affect the decision of the court. Id.; 9 Neb. 321. Testimony cannot be excluded as irrelevant which would have a tendency, however remote, to establish the probability of the fact in controversy. Id.; 33 Me. 367. A statement not material to the decision of the case is irrelevant; as, an answer which does not form or tender a material issue. Id.; 18 N. Y. 321. A pleading is irrelevant which has no substantial relation to the controversy between the parties to the suit. "Irrelative" is, perhaps, more appropriate. In parliamentary debate in England, "irrelevant" means "unassisting, unrelieving." Id.; 6 How. Pr. 313-14. Facts, in an answer to a bill in equity, not material to the decision are "impertinent." The test is whether the subject of the allegation could be put in issue, and would be matter proper to be given in evidence between the parties. Id.; 1 Johns. Ch. *106. See IRRELEVANT EVIDENCE.

IRRELEVANT EVIDENCE. That which does not support the issue, and which, of course, must be excluded. See EVIDENCE.

In the law of evidence, collateral, disconnected facts are generally irrelevant. But from one part similar qualities of another part may be inferred. Evidence of prior ignitions is admissible against a railroad company charged with the negligent use of fire. Anderson; 1 Whart. Ev. Ch. II.

Evidence is admissible which "tends" to prove the issue, or constitutes a link in the chain of proof, although alone it might not justify a verdict in accordance with it. Id.; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 51 a.

IRREMOVABILITY. The status of a pauper in England, who cannot be legally removed from the parish or union in which he is receiving relief, notwithstanding that he has not acquired a settlement there. Thus a pauper who has resided in a parish during the whole of the preceding year is irremovable. Stat. 23 and 29 Vict. c. 79, § 8.

IRREPARABLE INJURY. As a ground for injunction, it is that which cannot be repaired, retrieved, put back again, atoned for. 28 Fla. 387; it does not necessarily mean that the injury is beyond the possibility of compensation in damages, nor that it must be very great; 142 Ill. 104. See INJUNCTION.

Injury of such nature that the party wronged cannot be adequately compensated in damages, or when the damages which may result cannot be measured by any certain pecuniary standard. Anderson; 39 Wis. 164.

All that is meant is, that the injury would be a grievous one, or at least a material one, and not adequately repairable in damages. The term does not mean that there must be no physical possibility of repairing the injury. Id.; 76 Va. 306. The word "irreparable" is unhappily chosen to express the rule that an injunction may issue to prevent wrongs of a repeated and continuing character, or which occasion damages estimable only by conjecture and not by an accurate standard. Id.; 24 Pa. 160. In the sense in which used in conferring jurisdiction upon courts of equity, does not necessarily mean that the injury complained of is incapable of being measured by a pecuniary standard. Id.; 58 Mich. 455. Literally, anything is irreparable injury which cannot be restored in specie. In law nothing is irreparable which can be fully compensated in damages. To entitle a party to an injunction, he must show that the injury complained of is irreparable because the law affords no adequate remedy. Id.; 35 Pitts. Leg. J. 406.

IRREPLEVIBLE. That cannot be replevied or delivered on sureties. Spelled, also, irreplevisable. Co. Litt. 145; 13 Edw. I. c. 2.

IRRESISTIBLE FORCE. A term applied to such an interposition of human agency as is, from its nature and power, absolutely uncontrollable; as, the inroads of a hostile army. Story, Bailm. § 25; Lois des Batim. pt. 2, c. 2, § 1. See INEVITABLE ACCIDENT.

IRRESISTIBLE IMPULSE. The "irresistible impulse" recognized by the law is that only resulting from mental disease, from the derangement of the mind caused by a disease of the mind. It is not material how recently the derangement may have occurred. A person acts under the insane, "irresistible impulse" when, by the duress of mental disease, he has lost the power to choose between right and wrong, to avoid doing the act in question, his free agency being at the time destroyed. 114 Ky. 621, 71 S. W. 658.

IRREVOCABLE. Which cannot be revoked or recalled. A power of attorney in which the attorney has an interest granted for consideration is irrevocable. See WILL; POWER OF ATTORNEY.

IRRIGATION. The operation of watering lands or causing water to flow over lands by artificial means for agricultural purposes.

"The word irrigation, in its primary sense, means a sprinkling or watering; but the best lexicographers give it an agricultural or special signification, thus: 'The watering of lands by drains or channels' (Worcester); 'The operation of causing water to flow over lands for nourishing plants' (Webster). The term irrigation as used in Colorado, in the constitution and statutes and judicial opinions, in view of the climate and soil, is in its special sense, to wit: 'The application of water to lands for the raising of agricultural crops and other products of the soil;' " 12 Colo. 529.

In Egypt as well as in other countries of the East and also among the ancient races of South America, irrigation was to a great extent a necessity, and its methods of accomplishment and the laws covering the rights incident to it were well known. But in England and until recently in all other countries where the common law prevailed, irrigation was seldom necessary and the law relating to it was but little developed.

At common law the right of the riparian proprietor to divert the water of a stream for the purposes of irrigation was well recognized, and it was described as an artificial use of the water and not a natural use like taking the water for drinking, domestic purposes, and watering cattle, which would allow the use of all the water in the stream. A riparian owner could use for domestic purposes and watering cattle as much of the water of the stream as he chose, and if he found it necessary, take all the water in the stream, but in using the water for irrigation he was allowed to take only a reasonable amount of it and could not diminish the flow of the stream, so as to cause loss to other riparian owners; Gould, Waters 217; Kinney, Irrig. § 66; 98 Am. Dec. 543 and note; 37 Tex. 173; 4 Mas. 400; Ang. Water C. 34; 2 Conn. 584.

This doctrine of the common law was sufficient for any irrigation that had been found necessary in England or in the United States east of the Mississippi River. But as civilization advanced into what was once known as the Great American Desert and is now called the Arid Region west of the Mississippi, "there has grown up or evolved out of the necessities of the people and the exigencies of the communities interested, a great body of law, custom, regulation, and judicial interpretation.

These statutes in general form the principle of prior appropriation as wrought out by the earlier miners, and embodied in federal law, and then by the states and territories, being steadily sustained by the courts, with a few exceptions, as the common law of an arid region such as ours. The development of the beneficial use of water has of course modified the practice of prior appropriations to a first or prior pro rata share of the natural waters, when taken from bed or source for industrial purposes;" Senate Report on Irrigation, 1890.

The arid region in the United States covers an area of about a thousand miles from north to south and fifteen hundred miles from east to west, lying between the 100th meridian and the Coast Range of Mountains in California, extending from the British possessions to Mexico and including Arizona, New Mexico, Utah, Wyoming, Idaho, Colorado, Nevada, and portions of North Dakota, South Dakota, Nebraska, Kansas, Texas, Montana, California, Oregon, and Washington. The Arid Region Doctrine, however, was first worked out, not in the arid region itself, but in the mining districts of California.

After the discovery of gold in California had brought great numbers of people to that region, the miners developed a sort of code of their own, called the Mining Customs, which in 1851 were recognized by the legislature of California and made a part of the law of the state. By these customs a new principle in water rights was developed, called the Law of Priority of Appropriation, by which the person who first uses the water of a stream is by virtue of priority of occupation entitled to hold the same, and may use all the water in the stream for the purpose of carrying on his mining operations; Kinney, Irrig. § 104; 20 Pac. Rep. (Idaho) 42. This doctrine beginning in the Mining Customs and sanctioned by the legislature of California and the supreme court of that state, was afterwards approved by the supreme court of the United States, and congress not only passed acts which sanctioned the doctrine as regarded mines, but extended it to all other beneficial uses or purposes for which water may be essential, as irrigation for the purposes of agriculture and horticulture and to milling, manufacturing, and municipal purposes, in the Arid Region, and this development was all based upon the principle that the portions of the United States known as the Arid Region require it; Kinney, Irrig. sec. 122.

An appropriator of water for the operation of a quartz stamping mill is liable to a prior appropriator for irrigation purposes for any injury to the land by tailings or debris discharged from the mill; 75 Fed. Rep. 884.

In order to make an appropriation of water valid under the Arid Region Doctrine, there must be a bona fide intention to use the water for some beneficial purpose; 21 Cal. 374; 6 Col. 540; 32 Cal. 33; 1 Mont. 543; 14 Nev. 167; 2 Utah 535; 17 Col. 146; 18 id. 1; 69 Cal. 255. The intention to appropriate must be shown by the work and labor usual in such enterprises to accomplish the end. If there is no actual intention to appropriate the water for a beneficial purpose, or if there is unnecessary delay in the completion of the works for the appropriation of the water, a subsequent appropriator who diverts and applies the water for a beneficial purpose has the superior right; 87 Cal. 505; 15 id. 271; 58 id. 80; 20 Wall. 682; 98 U. S. 453. In a case where a ditch or canal company appropriates or diverts the water and then sells it to other persons who apply it to beneficial purposes, there has been some doubt whether the ditch company, being only an appropriator of the water and not itself applying it to a beneficial purpose, could divert the water. The better opinion seems to be that it can, provided the water is all applied to beneficial purposes by the persons to whom it is sold, but if a company appropriates and diverts more water than is actually used for a beneficial purpose, this surplus water is open for reappropriation; 9 Col. 248; 16 id. 61; 17 id. 141. It is also necessary to the validity of an appropriation that the water be used continuously. If allowed to run to waste for any length of time it will be treated as abandoned and open for a fresh appropriation. But water once lawfully appropriated is not lost by a change in its use; 27 Cal. 476; 32 id. 26; 3 Col. 580; 7 id. 148.

All persons in the Arid Region competent to hold lands have also the right to appropriate water; 3 Nev. 507; 18 Col. 105; 68 Cal. 43; 11 Mont. 489. But under the Arid Region Doctrine an appropriator need not necessarily be a riparian owner of land. The right to appropriate is not an incident of the soil, but is simply a possessory right acquired by valid appropriation; 5 Cal. 445; 16 Col. 61; 3 Col. App. 212; 10 Nev. 217; 20 Wall. 670; 101 U. S. 276; 51 Cal. 288; Kinney, Irrig. § 156.

A provision that no land shall be included in an irrigation district, except such as may be benefited by the system of irrigation used in that district, means that the land must be such that it may be substantially benefited. It is not sufficient that such irrigation creates an opportunity thereafter to use the land for a new kind of crop, while not substantially benefiting it for the cultivation of the old kind, which it has produced in reasonable quantities, and with ordinary certainty, without the aid of irrigation; 184 U. S. 112.

In order to make an appropriation valid there must be sufficient notice to the public of the intention to appropriate; and the notice may be in any form which gives the name of the appropriator and a description of the stream and of the purposes for which the water is to be taken; 56 Cal. 571.

In Krall v. U. S. 79 Fed. Rep. 241, it was held by the circuit court of appeals that the previous establishment of a government reservation below the point of appropriation does not affect the right, except so far as the waters of the stream have been previously appropriated for the use of such reservation. But Gilbert, J., dissented on the authority of Steer v. Berk, 133 U. S. 541, which held that a homestead entryman on land over which the waters of a creek flowed had the right to the natural flow of the water as against a subsequent appropriation.

The rights of an appropriator of water for irrigating purposes are not interfered with by a subsequent appropriation for mining purposes at a point further up the stream, unless the use for the latter purpose impairs the value of the water for the purpose of irrigation. The liability of an irrigation company for failing to supply a certain volume of water to the holders of water rights, according to contract, cannot be determined on the theory that the company is a common carrier; 1 Col. App. 480.

Although in the Arid Region the doctrine of appropriation generally prevails, the old common-law doctrine of the reasonable use of water by a riparian owner for irrigation is not entirely abolished in all the jurisdictions. In some states the common-law doctrine has been entirely abolished, but in others it exists side by side with the doctrine of appropriation, and is applied usually in the case of riparian owners who, making no claim to an appropriation, wish to use some of the waters of a stream for irrigation; Kinney, Irrig. 273.

The constitution of California declares the use of all water a public use and subject to the control of the state, the rates for water supplied by any person or corporation to be fixed annually by the supervisors of the district. The constitution of Colorado declares all natural streams, not theretofore appropriated, to be the property of the public, and subject to appropriation as provided by law; and that the right to divert unappropriated water shall never be denied. Priority of appropriation shall give the better right as between those using water for the same purpose, when water is not sufficient for all, those who require it for domestic use have the preference, and those using it for agricultural purposes have the preference over those using it for manufacturing purposes.

Somewhat similar provisions will be found in the constitutions of Idaho, Montana, North Dakota, Washington, and Wyoming.

See, generally, Black's Pomeroy on Waters; Hall; Kinney, Irrig.; 98 Am. Dec. 543-5; 5 Special Consular Reports, 1891; Gould, Waters § 217; 69 Cal. 255; Senate Report on Irrigation, 1890, where all the acts in the irrigation states are set forth, together with a digest of reported cases; Mills, Constitutional Annotations §§ 510-13 and notes, where the cases on this subject and constitutional provisions are collected.

IRRITANCY. In Scotch Law. The happening of a condition or event by which a charter, contract, or other deed, to which a clause irritant is annexed, becomes void. Erskine, Inst. b. 2, t. 5, n. 25. Irritancy is a kind of forfeiture. It is legal or conventional. Burton, Real Prop. 298.

IRRITANT CLAUSE. In Scotch Law. A provision by which certain prohibited acts specified in a deed are, if committed, declared to be null and void. A resolution clause dissolves and puts an end to the right of a proprietor on his committing the acts so declared void.

IRROTULATIO (Law Lat.). An inrolling; a record. 2 Rymer, Foed. 673; Du Cange; Law Fr. & Lat. Dict.; Bracton, fol. 298; Fleta, lib. 2, c. 65, § 11.

IS DIRECTED TO GIVE. As Used in a Will. The phrase "is directed to give" has been construed to be effective words to give an immediate interest in the estate. 110 Ky. 890, 62 S. W. 1036.

ISH. In Scotch Law. The period of the termination of a tack or lease. 1 Bligh 522. See TACK.

If the tack does not mention the ish, it is good for one year only, unless an intention appear to continue it for more than that period, in which case it is limited to the minimum period the words admit of. If the tack is in perpetuity, the ish being indefinite, it has not the benefit of the statute giving effect to a tack for its full term, no matter into whose hands the lands might come. Ersk. Prin. II. VI. 10.

ISLAND. A piece of land surrounded by water.

When new islands arise in the open sea, they belong to the first occupant; but when they are newly formed so near the shore as to be within the boundary of some state, they belong to that state.

Islands which arise in rivers when in the middle of the stream belong in equal parts to the riparian proprietors. When they arise mostly on one side, they belong to the riparian owners up to the middle of the stream.

The owner in fee of the bed of a river or other submerged land is the owner of any bar, island, or dry land which may be subsequently formed thereon; 188 U. S. 226.

Where an island springs up in a navigable river, and by accretion to the shores of the island and the mainland, they are united, the owner of the mainland is not entitled to the island, but only to such accretion as formed on his land; 117 Mo. 83.

See ACCESSION; ACCRETION; BOUNDARY; 3 Washb. R. P. 56; 3 Kent 428.

ISSINT (Norm. Fr. thus, so). In Pleading. A term formerly used to introduce a statement that special matter already pleaded amounts to a denial.

In actions founded on deeds, the defendant may, instead of pleading non est factum in the common form, allege any special matter which admits the execution of the writing in question, but which, nevertheless, shows that it is not in law his deed, and may conclude with, "and so it is not his deed;" as, that the writing was delivered to A B as an escrow, to be delivered over on certain conditions, which have not been complied with, "and so it is not his act," or that at the time of making the writing the defendant was a feme covert, "and so it is not her act;" Bac. Abr. Pleas (H 3), (I 3); Gould, Pl. § 64. An example of this form of plea, which is sometimes called the special general issue, occurs in 4 Rawle 88.

ISSUABLE. In Practice. Leading or tending to an issue. An issuable plea is one upon which the plaintiff can take issue and proceed to trial.

ISSUABLE TERMS. Hilary and Trinity Terms were so called from the making up of the issues, during those terms, for the assizes, that they might be tried by the judges, who generally went on circuit to try such issues after these two terms. But for town causes all four terms were issuable. 3 Bla. Com. 350; 1 Tidd, Pr. 121. Since the Judicature Acts of 1873 and 1875 this distinction has become obsolete.

ISSUE. In Real Law. Descendants. All persons who have descended from a common ancestor. 3 Ves. Ch. 257; 17 id. 481; 19 id. 547; 1 Roper, Leg. 90.

In a will it may be held to have a more restricted meaning, to carry out the testator's intention; 7 Ves. Ch. 522; 1 Roper, Leg. 90. 2 Wills. Exec. 388, n.; but it has been held that a devise to "issue" means prima facie legitimate issue, and an intention to include illegitimates must appear from the will itself without resort to extrinsic evidence; 66 Fed. Rep. 182. See Bac. Abr. Courtesy (D), Legatee.

If the term be used in the sense of heirs, that is, as comprehending a class to take by inheritance, it is to be interpreted as a term of limitation, and brings the case within the rule in Shelley's case; and this is the interpretation that prima facie will be given it; 70 Pa. 70; 79 id. 383; 24 Atl. Rep. (Pa.) 297. But if the context indicate a different intention, it will be sustained as a word of purchase; 2 Wms. R. P. 603. In a deed it is always taken as a word of purchase; 63 Pa. 483; 4 Fed. Rep. 299; 2 Ves. Sr. 681; 2 Wms. R. P. 604.

In Pleading. A single, certain, and material point, deduced by the pleadings of the parties, which is affirmed on the one side and denied on the other.

The entry of the pleadings. 1 Chitty, Pl. 630.

Several connected matters of fact may go to make up the point in issue.

An actual issue is one formed in an action brought in the regular manner, for the purpose of trying a question of right between the parties.

A collateral issue is one framed upon some matter not directly in the line of the pleadings; as, for example, upon the identity of one who pleads diversity in bar of execution. 4 Bla. Com. 396.

A common issue is that which is formed upon the plea of non est factum to an action of covenant broken.

This is so called because it denies the deed only, and not the breach, and does not put the whole declaration in issue, and because there is no general issue to this form of action. 1 Chitty, Pl. 483; Gould, Pl. c. 6, pt. 1, § 7.

An issue in fact is one in which the truth of some fact is affirmed or denied.

In general, it consists of a direct affirmative allegation on one side and a direct negative on the other. Co. Litt. 126 a; Bac. Abr. Pleas (G 1); 2 W. Bla. 1812; 5 Pet. 149. But an affirmative allegation which completely excludes the truth of the proceeding may be sufficient; 1 Wils. 6; 2 Str. 1177. Thus, the general issue in a writ of right (called the mise) is formed by two affirmatives; the defendant claiming a greater right than the tenant, and the tenant a greater than the defendant. 8 Bla.

Com. 195, 305. And in an action of dower the count merely demands the third part of [ ] acres of land, etc., as the dower of the defendant of the endowment of A B, heretofore the husband, etc., and the general issue is that A B was not seised of such estate, etc., and that he could not endow the defendant thereof, etc.; which mode of denial, being argumentative, would not, in general, be allowed. 2 Saund. 329.

A feigned issue is one formed in a fictitious action, under direction of the court, for the purpose of trying before a jury some question of fact.

Such issues are generally ordered by a court of equity, to ascertain the truth of a disputed fact. They are also frequently used in courts of law, by the consent of the parties, to determine some disputed rights without the formality of pleading; and by this practice much time and expense are saved in the decision of a cause; 3 Bla. Com. 452. Suppose, for example, it is desirable to settle a question of the validity of a will in a court of equity.

For this purpose an action is brought, in which the plaintiff by a fiction declares that he laid a wager for a sum of money with the defendant, for example, that a certain paper is the last will and testament of A, then avers it is his will, and therefore demands the money; the defendant admits the wager, but avers that it is not the will of A; and thereupon that issue is joined, which is directed out of chancery, to be tried; and thus the verdict of the jurors at law determines the fact in the court of equity. A feigned issue is also formed for trial by a jury in certain interpleader proceedings; as in proceedings to test the title to goods levied upon by the sheriff and claimed by a third party.

The name is a misnomer, inasmuch as the issue itself is upon a real, material point in question between the parties, and the circumstances only are fictitious. It is a contempt of the court in which the action is brought to bring such an action, except under the direction of some court; 4 Term 402.

A formal issue is one which is framed according to the rules required by law, in an artificial and proper manner.

A general issue is one which denies in direct terms the whole declaration: as, for example, where the defendant pleads nil debet (that he owes the plaintiff nothing), or nil disseisin (no disseisin committed). 3 Greenl. Ev. § 9; Steph. Pl. 220; 3 Bla. Com. 305. See GENERAL ISSUE.

An immaterial issue is one formed on some immaterial matter, which, though found by the verdict, will not determine the merits of the cause, and will leave the court at a loss how to give judgment. 2 Wms. Saund. 319, n. 6. See IMMATERIAL ISSUE.

An informal issue is one which arises when a material allegation is traversed in an improper, or inartificial manner. Bac. Abr. Pleas (G 2), (N 5); 2 Wms. Saund. 319 a, n. 7. The defect is cured by verdict, by the statute 32 Hen. VIII. c. 80.

A material issue is one properly formed on some material point which will, when decided, settle the question between the parties.

A special issue is one formed by the defendant's selecting any one substantial point and resting the weight of his cause upon that. It is contrasted with the general issue. Comyns, Dig. Pleader (R 1, 2). See MATTER IN ISSUE.

ISSUE IN LAW. An issue upon matter of law, or consisting of matter of law, being produced by a demurrer on the one side, and a joinder in demurrer on the other. 3 Bl. Com. 314.

ISSUE ROLL. In English Law. The name of a record which contained an entry of issue as soon as it was found. It was abolished by the rules of Hilary Term, 1834. Moz. & W. Dict.

ISSUED AND OUTSTANDING STOCK. See STOCK.

ISSUES. In English Law. The goods and profits of the lands of a defendant against whom a writ of distingas or distress infinite has been issued, taken by virtue of such writ, are called issues. 8 Bla. Com. 280; 1 Chitty, Crim. Law 351.

ISSUES ON SHERIFFS. Fines and amercements inflicted on sheriffs for neglects and defaults, levied out of the issues and profits of their lands. Toml.

ISTIMBAR. Continuance; perpetuity; especially a farm or lease granted in perpetuity by government or a zemindar (q. v.). Wilson's Gloss. Ind.

ISTIMRARDAR. The holder of a perpetual lease. Moz. & W.

ITA EST (Lat.). So it is.

Among the civilians, when a notary dies, leaving his register, an officer who is authorized to make official copies of his notarial acts writes, instead of the deceased notary's name, which is required when he is living, ita est.

ITA QUOD (Lat.). The name or condition in a submission, which is usually introduced by these words, "so as the award be made of and upon the premises," which, from the first words, is called the ita quod.

When the submission is with an ita quod, the arbitrator must make an award of all matters submitted to him of which he had notice, or the award will be entirely void. 7 East 81; Cro. Jac. 200; 2 Vern. Ch. 109; Rolle, Abr. Arbitrament (L. 9).

ITEM (Lat.). Also; likewise; in like manner; again; a second time. These are the various meanings of this Latin adverb.

It is used to introduce a new paragraph, or chapter, or division; also to denote a particular in an account. It is used when any article or clause is added to a former, as if there were here a new beginning. Du Cange. Hence the rule that a clause in a will introduced by item shall not influence or be influenced by what precedes or follows, if it be sensible, taken independently; 1 Salk. 239; or if there is no plain intent that it should be taken in connection, in which cases it may be construed conjunctively, in the sense of and, or also, in such a manner as to connect sentences. If, therefore, a testator bequeath a legacy to Peter, payable out of a particular fund or charged upon a particular estate, item a legacy to James, James's legacy as well as Peter's will be a charge upon the same property; 1 Atk. 436; 1 Bro. Ch. 482; 1 Mod. 100; Cro. Car. 368; Vaugh. 262; 1 Salk. 234. See ALSO.

ITER (Lat.). In Civil Law. A way; a right of way belonging as a servitude to an estate in the country (prædium rusticum). The right of way was of three kinds: 1, iter, a right to walk, or ride on horseback, or in a litter; 2, actus, a right to drive a beast or vehicle; 3, via, a full right of way, comprising right to walk or ride, or drive beast or carriage. Heineccius, Elem. Jur. Civ. § 408. Or, as some think, they were distinguished by the width of the objects which could be rightfully carried over the way; e. g. via, 8 feet; actus, 4 feet, etc. Mackeldy, Civ. Law § 290; Bracton 282; 4 Bell, H. L. 890.

In Old English Law. A journey, especially a circuit made by a justice in eyre, or itinerant justice, to try causes according to his own mission. Du Cange; Bracton, lib. 8 c. 11, 12, 13; Britton, c. 2; Cowel; EYRE.

ITINERANT. Wandering; travelling; who make circuits. See EYRE.

JACKENS. In abeyance. Toml.

JACKENS HEREDITAS. See HÆREDITAS JACKENS.

JACERE (Lat.). To lie. To lie, as an action, or proceeding in an action, to have place, to be applicable or available; to be competent or legally proper. To be fallen, or in a state of prostration; to be unclaimed, to be in abeyance. To be overthrown or defeated in a suit. Lying; fallen; prostrate Burrill; Bract. fol. 84.

JACET IN ORE. It lies in the mouth. Fleta, lib. 5, c. 5, § 49.

JACOBUS. A gold coin an inch and three-eighths in diameter, in value about twenty-five shillings, so called from James I., in whose reign it was first coined.

It was also called broad, laurel, and broad-piece. Its value is sometimes put at twenty-four shillings, but Macaulay speaks of a salary of eight thousand Jacobuses as equivalent to ten thousand pounds sterling. Hist. Eng. ch. xv. A cut of this coin showing both sides will be found in the Century Dictionary, sub v. broad.

JACTATION. Boasting of something which is challenged by another. Moz. & W.

The word is used principally with reference to jactation of marriage, which title see. In Louisiana, it is the name used as an action for slander of title to land.

Jactation of right to a seat in a church appears to be the boasting by a man that he has a right or title to a pew or sitting in a church to which he has legally no title.

Jactation of tithes is the boasting by a man that he is entitled to certain tithes, to which he has legally no title. See Rog. Ecc. L. 483.

Assertions repeated to the prejudice of another's right; false boasting. Abbott. The term designates a wrong which, in certain aspects, is cognizable under the canon law, in the ecclesiastical courts. The wrong known in the common law as slander of title is in its nature a species of jactation, and the Louisiana code allowed an action of jactation to protect the ownership of lands from disturbance by slander of title. Id.

JACTITATION OF MARRIAGE. In English Ecclesiastical Law. The untruthful boasting by an individual that he or she has married another, from which it may happen that they will acquire the reputation of being married to each other. 3 Bla. Com. 93. It was held that the boasting must be malicious as well as false; 2 Hagg. 290, 290.

The ecclesiastical courts formerly might in such cases entertain a libel by the party injured, and on proof of the facts enjoin the wrong-doer to perpetual silence, and, as a punishment, make him pay the costs; 3 Bla. Com. 93; 2 Hagg. Cons. 428, 285; 2 Chitty, Pr. 459.

The jurisdiction of such a suit would now be in the Probate, Divorce, and Matrimonial Division, but the remedy is now rarely resorted to, as, in general, since Lord Hardwicke's act (1766), there is sufficient certainty in the forms of legal marriage in England to prevent any one being in ignorance whether he or she is really married or not—a reproach which, however, is often made against the law of Scotland. The Scotch suit of a declarator of putting to silence, which is equivalent to jactitation of marriage, is often resorted to, a notorious instance of its use being that in the Yelverton marriage case; 1 Sc. Sess. Cas. 3d ser. 181.

JACTURA (Lat. jaceo, to throw). A jettison (q. v.).

JACTUS (Lat.). A throwing goods overboard to lighten or save the vessel, in which case the goods so sacrificed are a proper subject for general average. Dig. 14, 2, de lege Rhodia de jactu; 1 Pardessus, Collec. des Lois marit. 104; Kurioke, Inst. Marit. Hansæ tit. 8; 1 Par. Mar. Law 288, note.

JACTUS LAPILLI (Lat. the throwing down of a stone). In Civil Law. A method of preventing the acquisition of title by prescription by interrupting the possession. The real owner of land on which another was building, and thereby acquiring title by usucapion (q. v.), could challenge the intrusion and interrupt the prescription by throwing down a stone from the building before witnesses called upon to note the transaction.

JAIL. See GAOL; PRISON.

JAILER. See CORONER.

JAMUNLINGI, JAMUNDILINGI. Freeman who delivered themselves and property to the protection of a more powerful person, in order to avoid military service and other burdens. Spelman, Gloss. Also, a species of serfs among the Germans. Du Cange. The same as commendati.

JAMUNLINGUS. Commendatus (q. v.).

JANITOR. A person employed to take charge of rooms or buildings, to see that they are kept clean and in order, to look and unlock them, and generally to care for them. 84 N. Y. 332. See FLAT.

Formerly, a door-keeper. Fleta, lib. 2, c. 24.

JAVELOUR. In Scotch Law. Jailor or gaoler. 1 Pito. Crim. Tr. pt. 1, p. 33.

JEOPAILLE (L. Fr.). I have failed; I am in error.

Certain statutes are called statutes of amendments and jeofailes, because, where a pleader perceives any slip in the form of his proceedings, and acknowledges the error (jeofaile), he is at liberty, by those statutes, to amend it. The amendment, however, is seldom made; but the benefit is attained by the court's overlooking the exception; 3 Bla. Com. 407; 1 Saund. 228, n. 1; Doct. Pl. 297; Dane, Abr. These statutes do not apply to indictments.

JEOPARDY. Peril; danger.

The term is used in this sense in the act establishing and regulating the post-office department. The words of the act are, "or if, in effecting such robbery of the mail the first time, the offender shall wound the person having the custody thereof, or put his life in jeopardy by the use of dangerous weapons, such offender shall suffer death." 8 Story, Laws U. S. 1862. See Baldw. 83-95.

The situation of a prisoner when a trial jury is sworn and impanelled to try his case upon a valid indictment, and such jury has been charged with his deliverance. 1 Bail. 655; 7 Blackf. 191; 1 Gray 490; 38 Me. 574, 586; 23 Pa. 12; 12 Vt. 96.

It is the peril in which a prisoner is put when he is regularly charged with a crime before a tribunal properly organized and competent to try him; 121 Pa. 108.

This is the sense in which the term is used in the United States constitution: "no person . . . shall be subject for the same offence to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb," U. S. Const. art. v. Amend., and in the statutes or constitutions of most if not all of the states.

This provision in the constitution of the U. S. binds only the United States; 2 Cow. 319; 5 How. 410; 20 S. C. 892; 1 Bish. N. Cr. L. § 981. At one time it was not uniformly so considered, and it was held contra, 2 Pick. 521; 18 Johns. 187; Walker, Miss. 134. This was the same fluctuation of judicial opinion as to the effect of the early constitutional amendments which affected other questions. See EMINENT DOMAIN. In this country this rule depends in most cases on constitutional provisions. In England it is said to be one of the universal maxims of the common law; 4 Bla. Com. 835; and Stephen in repeating the expression adds in a note that although Blackstone uses the term "jeopardy of his life," it is not confined to capital offences, and extends to misdemeanors; 4 Steph. Com. 384; 3 B. & C. 502. In a leading case where the question was considered whether the rule applied when a jury had been discharged for want of agreement it was held that the court had authority in its discretion to discharge the jury in such a case, and that such action did not operate as an acquittal. This is also the prevailing opinion in this country. See infra. In the English case referred to, it was said by Cockburn, C. J., that in considering the question of the right to discharge a jury in such cases they were not dealing with one of those principles which lie at the foundation of the law, but with a matter of practice, which has fluctuated at various times, and "even at the present day may perhaps be considered as not finally settled;" L. R. 1 Q. B. 289. This would seem to be a more reasonable construction of the language of Lord Cockburn than that sometimes put upon it. See 1 Bish. N. Cr. L. § 982. That which he characterized as a mere matter of practice was not the existence of the doctrine of jeopardy, but whether it was applicable.

The constitutional provision, which refers to "life or limb," properly interpreted, extends only to treason and felonies, but it has usually been extended to misdemeanors; 1 Bish. Cr. L. § 980; 26 Ala. 185; but not to proceedings for the recovery of penalties, nor to applications for sureties of the peace; 1 Bish. Cr. L. § 980.

A person is in legal jeopardy when he is put upon trial, before a court of competent jurisdiction, upon indictment or information which is sufficient in form and substance to sustain a conviction, and a jury has been charged with his deliverance; Cooley, Const. Lim., 4th ed. 404; approved in 9 Bush 338; 21 Alb. L. J. 396; 77 Cal. 183.

The discharge of a competent jury without defendant's consent, express or implied, without sufficient cause, operates as an acquittal; 63 Mich. 807; 76 Cal. 57; 83 Ala. 96.

But where the indictment was good and the judgment erroneously arrested, the verdict was held to be a bar; 2 Yerg. 84.

After a jury has been impanelled and sworn in a criminal case, the trial cannot stop short of a verdict without the defendant's consent except for imperative reasons, such as the illness of a juror, the judge, or the defendant, the absence of a juror, or a disagreement. The absence of a witness for the state is not sufficient unless by consent of the accused, and his consent is not established by the mere fact that, being without counsel, he does not object to a postponement; 25 S. E. Rep. (S. C.) 220. The discharge of a jury on the last day of the term after they have for five days failed to agree upon a verdict, made against the objection of the defendant, bars another trial for the same offence; 121 Pa. 109; contra, 111 N. C. 695; 15 So. Rep. (Ala.) 603.

Where one of the jurors is discharged because of the death of his mother, and the court declared a mistrial, a plea of former jeopardy is not good; 91 Ga. 831.

An order of an examining magistrate, either committing or discharging the accused, is not a bar to a second hearing on the same charge; 18 So. Rep. (Ala.) 729.

But it has been held by the United States Supreme Court, that where a jury in a criminal case is discharged during the trial and the defendant subsequently put on trial before another jury, he is not twice put in jeopardy within the meaning of the fifth amendment to the United States Constitution; 142 U. S. 148; and in a later case it is said that a jury may be discharged from giving any verdict, whenever the court is of opinion that there is a manifest necessity for the act, or that the ends of public justice would otherwise be defeated, and may also order a trial before another jury, and a defendant is not thereby twice put in jeopardy; 155 U. S. 271. This case is quite in accord with an English decision made upon much consideration; L. R. 1 Q. B. 289; and Bishop, as the result of a very extended examination and citation of authorities, concludes: "But in England and Ireland, at present, and in most of our states, when a reasonable time for discussion and reflection has been given the jury, and they have in open court declared themselves unable to agree, and the judge is satisfied of the truth of the declaration, they may be discharged and the prisoner held to be tried anew. And this doctrine is applied as well in felony as in misdemeanor." Bish. Cr. L. § 1033. See JURY.

It has been held that the accused was not in jeopardy, and may be again put upon trial, if the court had no jurisdiction of the cause; 7 Mich. 161; or one of its members is related to the prisoner and under a statute the conviction is void; 142 N. Y. 130; or if the indictment was so defective that no valid judgment could be rendered upon it; 96 Ga. 447; 105 Mass. 53; or if by any overruling necessity the jury are discharged without a verdict; 9 Wheat. 579; 63 N. C. 203; or if the term of the court comes to an end before the trial is finished; 5 Ind. 290; or the jury are discharged with the consent of the defendant, express or implied; 9 Metc. 572; or if after verdict against the accused it has been set aside on his motion for a new trial or on writ of error, or the judgment thereon has been arrested; 13 Johns. 351; 8 Kan. 232; s. c. 12 Am. Rep. 469, n.; 7 Mont. 489; 127 Ill. 507; 41 Minn. 50; 111 N. C. 695; 64 Cal. 260; 33 Fla. 389; or where there is any irregularity of verdict which will compel a reversal upon the application of the accused; 83 Ala. 96; 77 Cal. 213. See Cooley, Const. Lim., 4th ed. 404-5; Von Holst, Const. L. 280; Story, Const. L. § 1787.

Where a prisoner during his trial fled the jurisdiction, and it became necessary to discharge the jury, it was held that he was never in jeopardy; 13 Reporter 105; s. c. 59 Cal. 357.

The constitutional guaranty is against two trials for the same offence, and the decisions as to what constitutes identity of the offences are not uniform. They are collected in 1 N. Cr. L. §§ 1048-69, by Mr. Bishop, who lays down the following rules as sustained by just principle: "They are not the same when (1) the two indictments are so diverse as to preclude the same evidence from maintaining both; or when (2) the evidence to the first and that to the second relate to different transactions, whatever be the words of the respective allegations; or when (3) each indictment sets out an offence differing in all its elements from that in the other, though both relate to one transaction,—a proposition of which the exact limits are difficult to define; or when (4) some technical variance precludes a conviction on the first indictment, but does not appear on the second. On the other side, (5) the offences are the same whenever evidence adequate to the one indictment will equally sustain the other. Moreover, (6) if the two indictments set out like offences and relate to one transaction, yet if one contain more of criminal charge than the other, but upon it there could be a conviction for what was embraced in the other, the offences, though of different names, are, within our constitutional guaranty, the same." The author considers the test to be, "whether if what is set out in the second indictment had been proved under the first, there could have been a conviction; when there could, the second cannot be maintained; when there could not, it can be;" id. § 1052, and cases cited in notes.

Where the greater offence includes a lesser one, a verdict on an indictment for the minor offence only is a bar to a trial on an indictment for the greater offence, and the same principle applies if the jury are out in the first case when the second is called; 149 Pa. 35. In this case, this was said to be not a mere technical rule of procedure, but a substantial one founded in reason, and in harmony with the constitutional mandate that no person shall be subject to be twice in jeopardy for the same offence.

There is some difference of opinion, however, in the application of this rule in homicide cases. If a prisoner is put on trial for murder and convicted of manslaughter and that verdict is set aside, on defendant's application for a new trial or an appeal, he cannot again be tried for murder; 11 Ia. 350; 54 Ill. 325; 41 La. Ann. 610; on this principle it has been held that if a prisoner has been indicted for murder, convicted of murder in the second degree, and afterwards granted a new trial on his own motion, he cannot, on the second trial, be convicted of a higher crime than murder in the second degree; 33 Wis. 121; s. c. 14 Am. Rep. 748, n.; 85 Mo. 105; 61 N. W. Rep. (Ia.) 246; 31 Fla. 262; 72 Ala. 201 (see 69 Cal. 227); contra, 20 Ohio St. 572; 8 Kan. 232; s. c. 12 Am. Rep. 469, n. A distinction has been made in some cases based upon the theory that the two lower grades of homicide do not bear the same relation to the offence charged. Manslaughter is clearly a different crime from that charged, and a conviction of that offence is therefore an acquittal of the graver one. But it has been said that the division of murder into two degrees does not make two offences and the same rule should not apply; 65 Cal. 232; 67 Vt. 465. Indeed the whole theory is that, when the defendant obtains a reversal, the conviction of the lesser crime is an acquittal of the graver one, so that another trial would be within the prohibition against putting the accused twice in jeopardy; 18 Neb. 57; 20 Ohio St. 572; 8 Kan. 232; 60 Ind. 291; 83 Ky. 1; 11 Mo. App. 92. But it is said that "the weight of authority is that securing a new trial only operates to set aside conviction and not the verdict so far as it operates as an acquittal;" 1 McClain, Cr. L. § 890; 30 Wis. 216; 13 Tex. 168. If it is an acquittal pro tanto nothing less than constitutional amendment can remove the effect of the general provision as to jeopardy; 107 U. S. 221. In some state constitutions, as those of Arkansas, Colorado, Georgia, and Missouri, the usual declaration securing a person from being put twice in jeopardy is modified by a further provision that if the jury disagree, or if the judgment be arrested after verdict or reversed for error in law, the accused shall not be deemed to have been in jeopardy; Ark. II. 8; Colo. II. 18; Ga. I. 8; Mo. II. 23.

Statutes which provide for a severer punishment when a criminal is convicted of a second or third offence are not in violation of the constitutional provision that no one shall be twice put in jeopardy for the same offence. The doctrine is that the subsequent punishment is not imposed for the first offence, but for persistence in crime;

2 Pick. 163; 158 Mass. 586; 116 Ill. 588; 48 Wis. 647; 47 Cal. 118; 169 U. S. 878, aff. 121 Mo. 514.

The question of former jeopardy cannot be passed upon by the supreme court on habeas corpus proceedings, but is a proper plea in bar, to be tried by the lower court; 82 Pac. Rep. (Wash.) 1068.

Whether an offence is one against the laws of the state or against the United States, and whether the same act may be an offence against both, punishable by each, without infringing upon the constitutional guaranty against being twice put in jeopardy for the same offence, are questions which a state court of original jurisdiction is competent to decide in the first instance, and the proper time to invoke the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court of the United States is after the highest state court has passed upon the question adversely to the accused; 155 U. S. 89. See NON BIS IN IDEM; AUTREFOIS ACQUIT; JURY.

JERGUER. In English Law. An officer of the custom-house, who oversees the waiters. Techn. Dict.

JERK. In Operation of Train. A "jerk" in the operation of a heavy freight train might be violent, and nevertheless necessary and usual in such operation. 156 Ky. 415, 161 S. W. 246.

Jerking a Car In. By "jerking a car in" is meant giving it a jerk with the engine and letting it run without the engine being attached to it. 114 Ky. 746, 71 S. W. 905.

JET. In French Law. Jettison (q. v.).

JETSAM. Goods thrown into the sea from a vessel in danger of wreck, for the purpose of lightening her and which remain under water, without coming to land. 1 Bl. Com. 292.

JETTISON, JETSAM. The casting out of a vessel, from necessity, a part of the lading. The thing so cast out.

It differs from flotsam in this, that in the latter the goods float, while in the former they sink, and remain under water. It differs also from ligan.

The jettison must be made for sufficient cause, and not for groundless timidity; 66 Fed. Rep. 776; 57 id. 403. It must be made in a case of extremity, when the ship is in danger of perishing by the fury of a storm, or is laboring upon rocks or shallows, or is closely pursued by pirates or enemies.

If the residue of the cargo be saved by such sacrifice, the property saved is bound to pay a proportion of the loss. In ascertaining such average loss, the goods lost and saved are both to be valued at the price they would have brought at the place of delivery on the ship's arrival there, freight, duties, and other charges being deducted; Marsh. Ins. 246; 3 Kent 185; Park. Ins. 123; Pothier, Charte-partie, n. 108; Boulay-Paty, Dr. Com. tit. 13; Pardeus, Dr. Com. n. 784; 1 Ware 9. The owner of a cargo jettisoned has a maritime lien on the vessel for the contributory share from the vessel on an adjustment of the average, which may be enforced by a proceeding in rem in the admiralty; 19 How. 162; 2 Para. Marit. Law, 378. See Abbott; Kay, Shipping; AVERAGE; ADJUSTMENT; DEELECT.

JEUX DE BOURSE. In French Law. A kind of gambling or speculation, which consists of sales and purchases which bind neither of the parties to deliver the things which are the object of the sale, and which are settled by paying the difference in the value of the things sold between the day of the sale and that appointed for delivery of such things. 1 Pardeus, Droit Com. n. 162.

JEWEL. A precious stone; a gem; a personal ornament, consisting more or less of precious stones. Ornaments intended to be worn on the person.

The precise meaning of the word was discussed by Shaw, C. J., in 14 Pick. 870.

He said: "The question whether plain gold earrings and knobs, without any precious stone, pearl, or other gem set in them, constitute jewelry." "Jewelry" is not found in any English dictionary, and is probably an Americanism. It is defined in Webster to be 'jewels in general. He defines 'jewel' to be 'an ornament worn by ladies, 'a pendant in the ear.' It is manifest, however, that these are put by way of instances, and not intended as strict definitions. The term bijou, which seems to be nearly analogous to it in the French language, is defined to be 'a little work of ornament, valuable (precieux) for its workmanship or by its material. Cette femme a de beaux bijoux. Dict. de l'Acad. The counsel on both sides cited passages of Scripture to show, on the one side, that the translators of the common version included ornaments of gold under the name of jewels, and on the other, to show that by a distinct enumeration they excluded them. These instances do little more than show that, though the argument founded on them is at first view plausible, it would be entirely unsafe to rely upon it as a ground of legal construction. Nor can much more reliance be placed upon lexicographers; they are necessarily confined, in a considerable degree, to generalities, and cannot ordinarily go into minute and very accurate distinctions. On the best consideration we have been able to give the subject, we are satisfied that the legislature, in the use of the word 'jewelry,' intended to employ it as a generic term, of the largest import, including all articles under the genus. Without attempting to define the term used in the statute, we are all of opinion that earrings and ear-knobs are included under the term jewelry, as it was used in the statute."

It has been held that a watch is not a "jewel ornament," "it is not carried or used as a jewel or ornament, but as a time-piece or chronometer, an article of ordinary wear by most travellers of every class, and of daily and hourly use by all. It is as useful and necessary to the guest in his room as out of it, in the night as in the day-time. It is carried for use and convenience, and not for ornament." 43 N. Y. 539. See also, to the same effect, 33 N. Y. Sup. Ct. 271.

The meaning of the word is most frequently drawn into question in cases involving the construction of statutes limiting the liability of innkeepers for money, jewelry, or valuables not deposited in the safe. In such a case it was said, "The watch, and pen and pencil case are certainly valuables, and perhaps might be called jewels, but I think should be considered a part of the traveller's personal clothing or apparel. The legislature certainly did not expect the traveller, after retiring, to send down his ordinary clothing or apparel to be deposited in the safe;" 36 Barb. 70; but under a similar statute specifying money, jewelry, and articles of gold and silver manufacture, a gold watch was held to be included as an article of gold manufacture; 24 Wis. 241.

The meaning of the word is also frequently involved in cases arising under the tariff laws, which usually contain also the term "imitation jewelry." In such a case Lacombe, J., said: "The word jewelry is generally used as including articles of personal adornment, and the word further imports that the articles are of value in the community where they are used. . . . The articles of value used for personal adornment in our civilization are, and for centuries have been, the precious metals gold and silver, to which, I think, platina is now generally added, and what are known as the precious stones, the diamond, sapphire, ruby, etc." "There is such a thing as imitation jewelry. . . . If by a pleasing combination of appropriate materials, by an attractive arrangement of parts, an article is produced bearing a general resemblance to real jewelry ornaments, and suitable for similar uses, it may fairly be called imitation jewelry." 38 Fed. Rep. 709.

Where a jeweller claimed an exemption as tools of a debtor, of those which he himself worked with on watches as well as of those which his apprentice worked with on jewelry, and it being found by the jury that the principal business was that of jeweller, both were held to be exempt. The court said that the circumstance that he was also engaged in the business of repairing watches did not make him a watchmaker in distinction to a jeweller; . . . "this is rather part of the employment of a jeweller, as exercised in this country, than a distinct and separate occupation by himself." 2 Pick. 80.

Family jewels constitute one of the kinds of personal property for the unlawful detention of which the remedy at law is considered inadequate and equitable relief is sustained; Ad. Eq. 8th ed. 91.

They are also included in the paraphernalia (q. v.), and "even the jewels of a peeress have been held such;" 2 Bla. Com. 438.

Jewels of the wife, though given by her husband's will to her for life, were decreed to her absolutely, as her paraphernalia (q. v.), as against creditors who sought to have them sold to pay debts charged on real estate in aid of the testator's personal estate; 1 Bro. C. C. 576.

JEWES. The name given to the descendants of the patriarch Abraham.

The Jews were exceedingly oppressed during the middle ages throughout Christendom. In France, a Jew was a serf, and his person and goods belonged to the baron on whose demesnes he lived. He could not change his domicile without permission of the baron, who could pursue him as a fugitive even on the domains of a king. In an article of commerce, he might be lent or hired for a time, or mortgaged. If he became a Christian, his conversion was considered a larceny of the lord, and his property and goods were confiscated. They were allowed to utter their prayers only in a low voice and without chanting. They were not allowed to appear in public without some badge or mark of distinction. Christians were forbidden to employ Jews of either sex as domestics, physicians, or surgeons. Admission to the bar was forbidden to Jews. They were obliged to appear in court in person when they demanded justice for a wrong done them; and it was deemed disgraceful to an advocate to undertake the cause of a Jew. If a Jew appeared in court against a Christian, he was obliged to swear by the ten names of God and invoke a thousand imprecations against himself if he spoke not the truth. Sexual intercourse between a Christian man and a Jewess was deemed a crime against nature, and was punishable with death by burning. Quis est rex habere cum concubina habere cum Judaea quæ casta reputatur: sic comburi debet. 1 Fournel, Hist. des Avocats, 108, 110. See Merlin, Répert. Juifs.

Under the Roman law the Jews were the subject of severe restrictive laws and were classed in the enactments of the Christian emperors with apostates, heretics, and heathens; Mack. Rom. L. § 152. Marriage with them was forbidden; id. § 555; and a Jew could not be the tutor of a Christian; id. § 616. In the fifth book of the Decretals it is provided that if a Jew have a servant that desirous to be a Christian, the Jew shall be compelled to sell him to a Christian for twelve pence; that it shall not be lawful for them to take any Christian to be their servant; that they may repair their old synagogues, but not build new; that they shall be lawful for them to open their doors or windows on Good Friday; that their wives shall neither have Christian nurses, nor themselves be nurses to Christian women; that they wear different apparel from the Christians, whereby they may be known, etc. See Ridley's View of the Civ. and Eccl. Law, part 1, chap. 6, sect. 7; Madox, Hist. of Exch.

In England, the Jew could have nothing that was his own, for whatever he acquired he acquired not for himself but for the king; Bract. f. 386 b. For about a century and a half they were important elements in English history, as their greatest privilege was to be allowed to do things that were forbidden to Christians, notably, to take interest on money. This money-lending business required some governmental regulation, the king having a deep interest in it, for what was potentially owed to the Jew was owed to the king, and this matter could hardly be left to the English tribunals as they would do but scant justice to the Jew, and therefore but scant justice to the king who stood behind the Jew. In 1194, an edict was issued about the Jewish loans. In every town in which the Jews lived an office was established for the registration of their deeds. All loans and payments of loans were to be made under the eye of certain officers, some of them Christians, some of them Jews, and a copy or part of every deed was to be deposited in an ark or chest under official custody. A few years later a department of the royal exchequer—the exchequer of the Jews—was organized for the supervision of this business. At its head were a few "Justices of the Jews." This exchequer was, like the great exchequer, both a financial bureau and a judicial tribunal. It managed all the king's transactions—and there were many—with the Jews, saw to the exaction of tallages, relief, escheats, and forfeitures, and also acted judicially, not merely as between king and Jew, but also as between king and gentile, when, as often happened, the king had for some cause or another seized into his hand the debts due to one of his Jews by Christian debtors. Also it heard and determined all manner of disputes between Jew and Christian. 1 Pol. & M. 491.

This system could not work well; it oppressed both Jew and Englishman, and from the middle of the thirteenth century the king was compelled to rob them of their privileges, to forbid them to hold lands, and some efforts were made to induce them to give up their profession of usury, as was also done in France and elsewhere during the same period, but the fact is, that they were so heavily taxed by the sovereigns or governments of Christendom, and at the same time debarred from almost every other trade or occupation—partly by special decrees, partly by the vulgar prejudice—that they could not afford to prosecute ordinary vocations. In 1563 the Jews—no longer able to withstand the constant hardships to which they were subjected in person and property—begged of their own accord to be allowed to leave the country. Richard of Cornwall, however, persuaded them to stay. Ultimately, in 1590 a. d., they were driven from the shores of England, pursued by the execrations of the infuriated rabble, and leaving in the hands of the king all their property, debts, obligations, and mortgages, they emigrated for the most part to France and Germany.

Practically, the only disabilities to which Jews are now subject in England are, incompetency to fill certain high offices in the state (e. g. that of lord chancellor), and inability to present to an ecclesiastical benefice attached to an office in her majesty's gift. 8 Steph. Com. 58.

JOB. The whole of a thing which is to be done. In this sense it is employed in the Civil Code of Louisiana, art. 2727: "To build by plot, or to work by the job," says that article, "is to undertake a building for a certain stipulated price." See Duranton, du Contr. de Louage, liv. 3, t. 8, nn. 248, 268; Pothier, Contr. de Louage, nn. 892, 894. See DEVIATION.

JOBBER. In Commercial Law. One who buys and sells articles in bulk and resells them to dealers. Stock-jobbers are those who buy and sell stocks for others. This term is also applied to those who speculate in stocks on their own account.

See STOCK-JOBBER.

JOCALIA (Lat.). Jewels (q. v.). "This term was formerly more properly applied to those ornaments which women, although married, call their own. When these joculia are not suitable to her degree, they are assets for the payment of debts; 1 Rolle, Abr. 911.

JOCKEY CLUB. An association of persons for the purpose of regulating all matters connected with horse racing.

A corporation owning and operating a race track 2 Misc. Rep. 512.

Such a club is a private and not a quasi-public corporation, and may refuse to allow certain persons to enter horses for its races; 22 N. Y. S. 894; s. c. 2 Misc. Rep. 512. A grant by the state to such a corporation to make and register bets and sell pools on the result of its races is not a grant of state aid, but is merely a removal of the statutory prohibition against the exercise of a right existing at common law; id.

JOHN DOE. See DOE, JOHN.

JOINDER. In Pleading. Union; concurrence.

OF ACTIONS. IN CIVIL CASES. The union of two or more causes of action in the same declaration.

At common law, to allow a joinder, the form of actions must be such that the same plea may be pleaded and the same judgment given on all the counts of the declaration, or, the counts being of the same nature, that the same judgment may be given on all; 2 Saund. 177 c; Comyns, Dig. Actions (G); 16 N. Y. 548; 4 Cal. 27; 12 La. Ann. 878; 33 N. H. 495. And all the causes of action must have accrued to the plaintiff or against the defendant; 12 La. Ann. 44; in the same right, though it may have been by different titles. Thus, a plaintiff cannot join a demand in his own right to one as representative of another person, or against the defendant himself to one against him in a representative capacity; 2 Viner, Abr. 62; Bacon, Abr. Action in General (C); 21 Barb. 245; 54 Fed. Rep. 935. See 25 Mo. 357. Nor can a cause of action in tort and in contract be joined; 25 Abb. N. C. 317; nor a tort with a claim for money had and received; 89 Ga. 154.

In real actions there can be but one count.

In mixed actions joinder occurs, though but infrequently; 8 Co. 876; Poph. 24; Cro. Elis. 290.

In personal actions joinder is frequent. By statutes, in many of the states, joinder of actions is allowed and required to a greater extent than at common law.

In CRIMINAL CASES. Different offenses of the same general nature may be joined in the same indictment; 1 Chitty, Cr. Law 238, 239; 20 Ala. n. s. 63; 28 Miss. 297; 4 Ohio St. 440; 6 McLean 596; 4 Denio 183; 18 Me. 108; 1 Cheves 108; 4 Ark. 56; 158 Mass. 164; 25 Neb. 581; see 14 Gratt. 637; 80 Tex. App. 628; and it is no cause of arrest of judgment that they have been so joined; 29 E. L. & Eq. 636; 29 N. H. 184; 11 Ga. 225; 3 W. & M. 184; see 1 Strobb. 455; but not in the same count; 5 R. I. 385; 24 Mo. 353; 1 Rich. 260; 4 Humphr. 25; see 9 Lawy. Rep. Ann. 162, note; and an indictment may be quashed, in the discretion of the court, where the counts are joined in such manner as will confound the evidence; 17 Mo. 544; 19 Ark. 563, 577; 20 Miss. 468.

No court, it is said, will, however, permit a prisoner to be tried upon one indictment for two distinct and separate crimes; Steph. Cr. Proc. 154; 29 N. H. 184. See 5 S. & R. 59; 10 Cush. 580.

Where, out of precaution to meet every aspect of a single offence, an indictment charges distinct crimes, and no attempt is made to convict accused of disconnected offences, the state will not be compelled to elect on which he shall be tried; 91 Ala. 87. Three separate offences, but not more, against the provisions of U. S. Rev. Stat. § 5490, prohibiting the use of the mails with intent to defraud, when committed within the same six calendar months, may be joined, and when so joined there is to be a single sentence for all, but this does not prevent other indictments for other offences under the same statute committed within the same six calendar months; 123 U. S. 672.

In Demurrer. The answer made to a demurrer. Co. Litt. 71 b. The act of making such answer is merely a matter of form, but must be made within a reasonable time; 10 Rich. 49.

Of Issue. The act by which the parties to a cause arrive at that stage of it in their pleadings, that one asserts a fact to be so, and the other denies it. For example, when one party denies the fact pleaded by his antagonist, who has tendered the issue thus, "And this he prays may be inquired of by the country," or, "and of this he puts himself upon the country," the party denying the fact may immediately subjoin, "And the said A B does the like;" when the issue is said to be joined.

Of Parties. In CIVIL CASES. In EQUITY. All parties materially interested in the subject of a suit in equity should be made parties, however numerous; Mitf. Eq. Plead. 144; 2 Eq. Cas. Abr. 179; 1 Pet. 299; 18 id. 859; 7 Cr. 73; 2 Mas. 181; 5 McLean 444; 3 Paine 536; 1 Johns. Ch. 849; 2 Bibb 184; 24 Me. 20; 7 Conn. 342; 11 Gill & J. 426; 4 Rand. 451; 7 Ired. Eq. No. C. 261; 2 Stew. Ala. 290; either as plaintiffs or defendants, so that there may be a complete decree which shall bind them all; 138 U. S. 238, 579. But, where the parties are very numerous, and sue in the same right, a portion may in some cases appear for all in the same situation; Beach, Eq. Pr. § 68; 16 Ves. 321; 16 How. 228; 11 Conn. 112; 3 Paige, Ch. 223; 19 Barb. 517. See 153 Mass. 133.

More possible or contingent interest does not render its possessor a necessary party; 6 Wheat. 550; 8 Conn. 854; 5 Cow. 719. And see 8 Bibb 96; 6 J. J. Marsh. 435. Contingent remaindermen are not necessary parties to a suit to set aside the deed creating the remainder; 143 Ill. 290; nor a residuary legatee to a bill filed by a legatee or creditor to assert a claim against the estate of a testator; 17 N. J. Eq. 166.

There need be no connection but community of interest; 2 Ala. n. s. 209. It is not indispensable that all the parties to a suit should have an interest in all the matters contained in the suit, but it will be sufficient if each party has an interest in same material matters in the suit, and they are connected with the others; 139 U. S. 408.

A court of equity, even after final hearing on the merits and on appeal to the court of last resort, will compel the joinder of necessary parties; 89 Mo. 284.

PLAINTIFFS. All persons having a unity of interest in the subject-matter; 3 Barb. Ch. 397; 2 Ala. n. s. 209; and in the object to be attained; 2 Ia. 65; 118 Mo. 848; 89 Va. 455; who are entitled to relief; 14 Ala. n. s. 185; may join as plaintiffs. The rights claimed must not arise under different contracts; 8 Pet. 123; 5 J. J. Marsh. 154; or be vested in the same person in different capacities; 1 Busb. Eq. 196. And see 1 Paige 637; 5 Metc. 119. Persons representing antagonistic interests cannot be joined as complainants; 14 So. Rep. (Ala.) 705.

Assignor and assignee. The assignor of a contract for the sale of lands should be joined in a suit by the assignee for specific performance; 3 Sandf. Ch. 614; and the assignor of part of his interest in a patent in a suit by assignee for violation; 3 McLean 350.

But he should not be joined where he has parted with all his legal and beneficial interest; 32 Me. 203, 248; 18 B. Monr. 210. The assignee of a mere chose in action may sue in his own name, in equity; 17 How. 43; 5 Wisc. 270; 6 B. Monr. 540; 7 id. 273.

Corporations. Two or more may join if their interest is joint; 8 Ves. 706. A corporation may join with its individual members to establish an exemption on their behalf; 8 Anstr. 788. Corporations themselves are indispensable parties to a bill which affects their corporate rights or liabilities; 148 U. S. 608.

Husband and wife must join where the husband asserts an interest in behalf of his wife; 6 B. Monr. 514; 8 Hayw. 252; 5 Johns. Ch. 196; 9 Ala. 133; as, for a legacy; 5 Johns. Ch. 196; or for property devised or descended to her during coverture; 5 J. J. Marsh. 179, 600; or where he applies for an injunction to restrain a suit at law against both, affecting her interest; 1 Barb. Ch. 818. Where a widow sues to set aside a deed executed by herself and husband on the ground that it was procured by fraud, the administrator of the husband is not a necessary party; 58 Hun 605.

Under modern statutes for the enlargement of the rights and remedies of married women, it is in many cases unnecessary to join the husband in suits to which he was formerly a necessary party. See MARRIED WOMAN.

Idiot and lunatic may be joined or not in bills by their committees, at the election of the committee, to set aside acts done by them whilst under imbecility; 1 Ch. Cas. 112; 1 Jac. 377; 7 Johns. Ch. 189. They must be joined in suits brought for the partition of real estate; 3 Barb. Ch. 24. In England it seems to be the custom to join; 2 Vern. 678. See Story, Eq. Pl. § 64, and note; Story, Eq. Jur. § 1836, and note.

Infants. Several may join in the same bill for an account of the rents and profits of their estate; 2 Bland 68.

Trustee and cestui que trust should join in a bill to recover the trust fund; 5 Dana 138; but need not to foreclose a mortgage; 5 Ala. 447; 4 Abb. Fr. 106; nor to redeem one made by the trustee; 2 Gray 180. And see 8 Edw. Ch. 175; 7 Ala. n. s. 386.

An appeal may be prosecuted by one party to the record, as against another, without joining other parties who are in no way interested in the controversy; 80 Fed. Rep. 961.

DEFENDANTS. In general, all persons interested in the subject-matter of a suit who cannot be made plaintiffs should be made defendants. They may claim under different rights if they possess an interest centering in the point in issue; 4 Cow. 682. In order to obtain the rescission of a contract of sale, all of the parties interested in the property involved must be brought before the court; 53 Kan. 237.

Bills for discovery need not contain all the parties interested as defendants; 1

McCord, Ch. 301; and a person may be joined merely as defendant in such bill; 3 Ala. 214. A person should not be joined as a party to such bill who may be called as a witness on trial; 13 Ill. 212; 3 Barb. Ch. 482. And see 1 Chandl. 286.

Assignor and assignee. An assignor who retains even the slightest interest in the subject-matter must be made a party; 2 Dev. & B. Eq. 895; 1 Green, Ch. 347; 2 Paige 289; 11 Cush. 111; as a covenantor in a suit by a remote assignee; 1 Dana 585; or an assignee in insolvency, who must be made a party; 3 Johns. 543; 1 Johns. Ch. 339; 10 Paige 20; or the original plaintiff in a creditor's bill by the assignee of a judgment; 4 B. Monr. 594.

A fraudulent assignee need not be joined in a bill by a creditor to obtain satisfaction out of a fund so transferred; 1 Paige 637. The assignee of a judgment must be a party in a suit to stay proceedings; 11 Paige 438.

Corporations and associations. A corporation charged with a duty should be joined with the trustees it has appointed, in a suit for a breach; 1 Gray 899; 7 Paige 281. Where the legal title is in part of the members of an association, no others need be joined; 1 Gilm. 187. The directors of a corporation may be included as parties defendant in a bill against the corporation for infringement of a trade-mark; 53 Fed. Rep. 124. When discovery is sought, the officer from whom the information is to be obtained should be made a co-defendant with the corporation; 93 Ala. 542.

Officers and agents may be made parties merely for purposes of discovery; Beach, Eq. Pr. § 61, n.; 9 Paige 188.

Creditors who have repudiated an assignment and pursued their remedy at law are properly made parties to a bill brought by the others against the trustee for an account and the enforcement of the trust; 3 Wisc. 367. So, when judgments are impeached and sought to be set aside for fraud, the plaintiffs therein are indispensable parties to the bill; 20 Ala. 200. To a bill brought against an assignee by a creditor claiming the final balance, the preferred creditors need not be made parties; 28 Vt. 465. See, also, 20 How. 94; 1 Md. Ch. 299; 8 Metc. 474; 11 Paige 49.

Debtors must in some cases be joined with the executor in a suit by a creditor; though not ordinarily; Story, Eq. Pl. § 227; 1 Johns. Ch. 305. Where there are several debtors, all must be joined; 1 McCord, Ch. 301; unless utterly irresponsible; 1 Mich. 446. Judgment debtors must in some cases be joined in suits between the creditor and assignees or mortgagees; 5 Sandf. 271. In an action by judgment creditors for the appointment of a receiver, to take charge of property belonging to their debtor, the payees of unpaid purchase-money notes given for such property are necessary parties; 12 So. Rep. (Miss.) 596.

Executors and administrators should be made parties to a bill to dissolve a partnership; 21 Ga. 6; to a bill against heirs to discover assets; 7 B. Monr. 127; to a bill by creditors to subject lands fraudulently conveyed by the testator, their debtor, to the satisfaction of their debt; 9 Mo. 304. See, also, 21 Ga. 433; 6 Munf. 520; 7 E. L. & Eq. 54.

Foreclosure suits. All persons having an interest, legal or equitable, existing at the commencement of a suit to foreclose mortgaged premises, must be made parties, or they will not be bound; Tiedm. Eq. Jur. § 441; 4 Johns. Ch. 605; 10 Paige 307; 10 Ala. n. s. 233; 3 Ark. 864; 6 McLean 416; 11 Tex. 526; including the mortgagor within a year after the sale of his interest by the sheriff; 4 Johns. Ch. 649; and his heirs and personal representative after his death; 2 Bland 664. But bond-holders for whose benefit a mortgage has been made by a corporation to a trustee need not be made parties; 5 Gray 163; Jones, Corp. Bonds & Mortg. § 398. A person claiming adversely to mortgagor and mortgagee cannot be made a defendant to such suit; 3 Barb. Ch. 438.

Heirs, distributees, and devisees. All the heirs should be made parties to a bill respecting the real estate of the testator; 8

N. Y. 261; 2 Ala. N. S. 571; 4 J. J. Marsh. 231; 5 Ill. 453; although the testator was one of several mortgagees of the vendee, and the bill be brought to enforce the vendor's lien; 6 B. Monr. 74; but need not to a bill affecting personality; 1 M'Conn. Ch. 280. Where, in a suit to set aside a deed for fraud, one of the heirs did not join as plaintiff, he may be made a party defendant, even if he should elect to affirm the deed; 156 Mass. 303. All the devisees are necessary parties to a bill to set aside the will; 2 Dana 155; or to enjoin executors from selling lands belonging to the testator's estate; 2 T. B. Monr. 30. All the distributees are necessary parties to a bill for distribution; 1 B. Monr. 27; to a bill by the widow of the intestate against the administrator to recover her share of the estate; 4 Bibb 543; and to a bill against an administrator to charge the estate with an annual payment to preserve the residue; 1 Hill, Ch. 51. See, also, 11 Paige 49; 2 T. B. Monr. 95; 5 id. 573. A bill cannot be filed against the heirs and devisees jointly for satisfaction of a debt of the deceased; 9 Paige 28. Idiot and lunatic should be joined with their committees when their interests conflict and must be settled in the suit; 3 Johns. Ch. 243; 3 Paige 470.

Partners must, in general, be all joined in a bill for dissolution of the partnership; but need not if without the jurisdiction; Lind. Part. 460; 17 How. 468; 12 Metc. 329. And see 3 Sto. 335.

Assignees of insolvent partners must be joined; 10 Me. 255.

Dormant partners need not be joined when not known in the transaction on which the bill is founded; 7 Blackf. 218.

Principal and agent should be joined if there be a charge of fraud in which the agent participated; 3 Sto. 611; 13 Ark. 720; and the agent should be joined where he binds himself individually; 3 A. K. Marsh. 484.

Trustee and cestui que trust. If a trustee has parted with the trust fund, the cestui que trust may proceed against the trustee alone to compel satisfaction, or the fraudulent assignee may be joined with him at the election of the complainant; 2 Paige 278. Where a claimant against the estate of a deceased person seeks to follow the assets into the hands of a trustee, it is not necessary to make the beneficiaries parties; 45 Ch. Div. 444.

On a proceeding in equity for the appointment of trustees under a mortgage, where two of the three trustees have died, and there is no provision in the mortgage for filling the vacancies, the mortgagor and the surviving trustee are necessary parties; 85 Me. 78.

The trustees under a settlement of real estate, against whom a trust or power given to them to sell the estate is to be enforced, are necessary parties to a suit for that purpose; 89 E. L. & Eq. 76. See, also, id. 225; 24 Miss. 597; 19 How. 376; 5 Du. N. Y. 168; 8 Md. 84.

AT LAW. In actions ex contractu. All who have a joint legal interest or are jointly entitled must join in an action on a contract, even though it be in terms several, or be entered into by one in behalf of all; 1 Saund. 163; Arrib. Civ. Pl. 58; 3 S. & R. 308; 15 Me. 295; 3 Brev. 249; 3 Ark. 565; 16 Barb. 325; as, where the consideration moves from several jointly; 2 Wms. Saund. 116 a; 4 M. & W. 296; or was taken from a joint fund; 19 Johns. 218; 1 Meigs 394.

Some contracts may be considered as either joint or several, and in such case all may join, or each may sue separately; but part cannot join leaving the others to sue separately.

In an action for a breach of a joint contract made by several, all the contracting parties should be made defendants; 1 Saund. 158, n.; even though one or more be bankrupt or insolvent; 3 Maule & S. 83; but see 1 Wils. 99; or an infant; but not if the contract be utterly void as to him; 3 Taunt. 207; 5 Johns. 160, 280; 1 Pick. 500.

On a joint and several contract, each may be sued separately, or all together; 1 Pet. 73; 1 Wend. 524.

A corporation is a necessary party to a suit brought by its stockholders to enforce its rights; 149 U. S. 478.

Executors and administrators must bring their actions in the joint names of all; Crosw. Ex. & Adm. § 636; 5 Scott, N. R. 728; 1 Saund. 291 g; 3 N. & M. C. 70; 1 Dutch. 374; even though some are infants; Broom, Part. 104.

All the executors who have proved the will are to be joined as defendants in an action on the testator's contract; 1 Cr. M. & R. 74; 4 Bingh. 704. But an executor de son tort is not to be joined with the rightful executor. And the executors are not to be joined with other persons who were joint contractors with the deceased; 2 Wheat. 344; 6 S. & R. 272; 5 Cal. 178.

Administrators are to be joined, like executors; Comyns, Dig. Administrators (B 12). Foreign executors and administrators are not recognized as such, in general; 2 Jones, Eq. 276; 10 Rich. 393; 7 Ind. 211.

Husband and wife must join to recover rent due the wife before coverture on her lease while sole; Co. Litt. 55 b; Cro. Eliz. 700; on the lease by both of lands in which she has a life estate, where the covenant runs to both; 20 Barb. 269; but on a covenant generally to both, the husband may sue alone; 1 B. & C. 448; in all actions in implied promises to the wife acting in autre droit; Comyns, Dig. Baron & F. (V); 9 M. & W. 694; 4 Tex. 288; as to suit on a bond to both, see 2 Penning. 827; on a contract running with land of which they are joint assignees; Woodf. Landl. & T., 1st Am. ed. 529; Cro. Car. 503; in general, to recover any of the wife's choses in action where the cause of action would survive to her; Comyns, Dig. Baron & F. (V); 1 Chitty, Pl. 17; 1 M. & S. 180; 13 Wend. 271; 10 Pick. 470; 9 Ired. 163; 21 Conn. 557; 24 Miss. 245; 3 Wisc. 22.

They may join at the husband's election in suit on a covenant to repair, when they become joint grantees of a reversion; Cro. Jac. 399; to recover the value of the wife's choses in action; 5 Harring. 57; 24 Conn. 45; 3 Wisc. 22; 2 M. & S. 396, n.; in case of joinder the action survives to her; 6 M. & W. 426; 10 B. & C. 556; in case of an express promise to the wife, or to both where she is the meritorious cause of action; Cro. Jac. 77, 205; 1 Chitty, Pl. 18; 5 Harring. 57; 52 Ala. N. S. 30.

They must, in general, be joined in actions on contracts entered into by the wife dum sola; 3 Term. 480; 7 id. 449; 8 Johns. 149; 1 Grant, Cas. 21; 5 Harring. 357; 25 Vt. 207; see 15 Johns. 408; 7 Mass. 291; where the cause of action accrues against the wife in autre droit; Cro. Car. 518. They may be joined when the husband promises anew to pay the debt of the wife contracted dum sola; 7 Term 349; for rent or breaches of covenant on a joint lease to both for the wife's benefit; Broom, Part. 178. In an action on a contract against a husband and wife, a contract signed by the husband alone is insufficient to support a judgment against the wife; 158 Pa. 295.

Joint tenants must join in debt or an avowry for rent; Broom, Part. 24; but one of several may make a separate demise, thus severing the tenancy; Bacon, Abr. Joint Ten. (H 2); 8 Campb. 190; and one may maintain ejectment against his cotenants; Woodf. Landl. & T. 789.

Partners must all join in suing third parties on partnership transactions; 2 Campb. 302; 18 Barb. 534; 7 Rich. 118; including only those who were such at the time the cause of action accrued; Broom, Part. 65; although one or more may have become insolvent; 2 Cr. M. & R. 318; but not joining the personal representative of a deceased partner; 4 B. & Ald. 574; 9 B. & C. 538. See 118 Ind. 818; with a limitation to the actual parties to the instrument in case of specialties; 6 M. & S. 75; and including dormant partners or not, at the election of the ostensible partners; Pars. Part. § 202; 10 B. & C. 671; 4 B. & Ald. 487. See 4 Wend. 626; 71 Mich. 475. A partner who has sold his interest to another partner is not a necessary party to an action for an accounting or the partnership affairs; 180 U. S. 505. Where one partner contracts in his name for the firm, he may sue alone, or all may join; 4 B. & Ald. 815; 4 B. & Ald. 487; but alone if he was evidently dealt with as the sole party in interest; 1 M. & S. 249. Partners cannot sue or be sued in their copartnership name, but the individual names of its members must be set out; 5 So. Rep. (Miss.) 113; 17 Or. 256.

The surviving partners; 3 Ball & B. 30; 1 B. & Ald. 29, 522; 18 Barb. 592; must all be joined as defendants in suits on partnership contracts; 1 East 30. And third parties are not bound to know the arrangements of partners amongst themselves; 4 M. & S. 482; 8 M. & W. 703, 710.

A partner need not be joined if he was not known as such at the time of making the contract and there was no indication of his being a partner; Lind. Part. 281; 1 Bosw. 28; 19 Ark. 701. And see PARTNERSHIP.

Tenants in common should join in an action on any joint contract; Comyns, Dig. Abatement (E 10).

Trustees must all join in bringing an action; 1 Wend. 470.

In actions ex delicto. Joint owners must, in general, join in an action for a tortious injury to their property; 1 Saund. 291 g; 11 N. H. 141; in trover, for its conversion; 5 East 407; in replevin, to get possession; 6 Pick. 571; 8 Mo. 522; 15 Me. 245; or in detinue, for its detention, or for injury to land; 8 Bingh. 455; 29 Barb. 9.

So may several owners who sustain a joint damage; 1 W. & M. 223.

The grantor and grantee of land cannot join in a counter-claim for continuing trespasses on the land sold, since their rights of action are not joint; 6 Ind. App. 663.

For injury to the person, plaintiffs cannot, in general, join; 2 Wms. Saund. 117 a; Cro. Car. 512; Cro. Eliz. 472.

Partners may join for slanders; 3 Bingh. 453; Lind. Part. 278; 8 C. & P. 708; for false representations; 17 Mass. 182; injuring the partnership. The joinder or non-joinder of a dormant partner constitutes no objection to the maintenance of a suit in any manner whatever; 71 Mich. 475.

In a suit against joint contractors, one of whom is dead, the survivors only should be made parties, the administrator of the deceased partner not being necessary; 44 Ill. App. 114.

An action for the infringement of letters patent may be brought jointly by all the parties who at the time of the infringement were the holders of the title; 1 Gall. 429; 1 MoAll. 82.

In cases where several join in the commission of a tort, they may be joined in an action as defendants; 5 Taunt. 29; 14 Johns. 463; as, in trover; 1 M. & S. 588; in trespass; 2 Wms. 117 a; for libel; Broom, Part. 249;—not for slander; Cro. Jac. 647; in trespass; 1 C. & M. 96.

Husband and wife must join in action for direct damages resulting from personal injury to the wife; Schoul. Husb. & W. 107; 8 Bla. Com. 140; 4 Iowa 420; see 11 So. Rep. (La.) 541; in detinue, for the property which was the wife's before marriage; 2 Tayl. 266; 87 W. Va. 377; see 30 Ala. N. S. 582; for injury to the wife's property before marriage; 2 Jones, N. C. 59; where the right of action accrues to the wife in autre droit; Comyns, Dig. Baron & F. (V); 2 B. & P. 407; and, generally, in all cases where the cause of action by law survives to the wife; 4 B. & Ald. 533; 10 Pick. 470; 85 Me. 89.

They may join for slander of the wife, if the words spoken are actionable per se, for the direct injury; 4 M. & W. 5; 22 Barb. 896; 2 T. B. Monr. 56; 25 Mo. 590; 4 Ia. 420; 11 Cush. 10; 113 N. C. 298; (but she may maintain an action in her own name; 89 Ga. 839;) and in ejectment for lands of the wife they may join; Broom, Part. 235; 1 Bulstr. 51. An action for permanent injury to community property must be brought by husband and wife jointly; 8 Wash. 73.

They must be joined as defendants for torts committed by the wife before marriage; Co. Litt. 351 b; 5 Binn. 48; or during coverture; 19 Barb. 331; 2 E. D. Smith 90; 17 S. E. Rep. (S. C.) 851; or for libel or slander uttered by her; 5 C. & P. 484; and in an action for waste by the wife, before marriage, as administratrix; 2 Wms. Ex. 1441.

They may be joined in trespass for their joint act; 3 B. & Ald. 687; 6 Gratt. 215.

Joint tenants and parceners, during the continuance of the joint estate, must join in all actions ex delicto relative thereto, as in trespass to their land, and in trover or replevin for their goods; 2 Bla. Com. 182, 188; Bacon, Abr. Joint Ten. (K); 29 Barb. 29. Joint tenants may join in an action for slander of the title to their estate; 3 Bingh. 455. They should be sued jointly, in trespass, trover, or case, for anything respecting the land held in common; Comyns, Dig. Abatement (F 6); 1 Wms. Saund. 291 e. Joint tenants should join in an avowry or cognizance for rent; 3 Salk. 207; or for taking cattle damage feasant; Bacon, Abr. Joint Ten. (K); or one joint tenant should avow in his own right, and as bailliff to the other; 3 Salk. 207. But a tenant in common cannot avow the taking of the cattle of a stranger upon the land damage feasant, without making himself bailliff or servant to his co-tenant; 2 H. Bla. 388; Bacon, Abr. Replevin (K).

Master and servant, where co-trespassers should be joined though they be not equally culpable; 5 B. & C. 559. Partners may join for a joint injury in relation to the joint property; 3 C. & P. 196. They may be joined as defendants where property is taken by one of the firm for its benefit; 1 C. & M. 93; and where the firm makes fraudulent representations as to the credit of a third person, whereby the firm gets benefit; 17 Mass. 182. In an action against a corporation for a tort, the corporation and its servants by whose act the injury was done may be joined as defendants; 98 N. C. 34.

Tenants in common must join for a trespass upon the lands held in common; Littleton § 816; 8 Cow. 304; 28 Me. 136; or for taking away their common property; Cro. Eliz. 143; or for detaining it; 1 Hill, N. Y. 234; or for a nuisance to their estate; 14 Johns. 246.

IN CRIMINAL CASES. Two or more persons who have committed a crime may be jointly indicted therefor; 7 Gratt. 619; 6 McLean 596; 10 Ired. 153; 8 Blackf. 205; only where the offence is such that it may be committed by two jointly; 8 Sneed 107; and not where there are distinct and different offences; 97 N. C. 474. A principal and accessory may be joined in one indictment; 155 Mass. 224; 65 N. H. 284.

They may have a separate trial, however, in the discretion of the court; 15 Ill. 586; 1 Park. Cr. Ca. 424; 7 Gratt. 619; 10 Cush. 530; 5 Strobb. 85; 9 Ala. N. S. 137; and in some states as a matter of right; 1 Park. Cr. Ca. 371.

See Dioey, Parties; Steph. Pl.; PARTIES. As to the effect of Misjoinder and Nonjoinder, and how and when advantage should be taken of either, see those titles.

JOINT. Joined together; united; shared by two or more. The term is used to express a common property interest enjoyed or a common liability incurred by two or more persons; as applied to real estate it involves the idea of survivorship. See ESTATE IN JOINT TENANCY; ESTATE IN COMMON.

With respect to the ownership of choses in action, the term implies that the interest and right of action are united so that all the owners must be joined in a suit to enforce the obligation jointly held. See JOINT AND SEVERAL.

A joint liability on choses in action implies that though each person subject to it is liable for the whole, they are all treated in law as together constituting one legal entity and must be sued together or a release to one will operate in favor of all. One who pays the debt is entitled to contribution (q. v.).

As applied to property (other than choses in action), "joint" signifies that it belongs to two or more persons in such a way that on the death of one of them without having disposed of his interest inter vivos, it passes to the survivors, and so on until they have all died but one, who then takes the whole by survivorship. This quality distinguishes a joint ownership from an ownership in common, and also, in the case of land, from the form of ownership known as coparcenary. As to the rules relating to joint ownership and ownership in common, see ESTATE IN COMMON; JOINT TENANCY.

In the case of bonds, covenants, contracts and other choses in action, when the right of action is vested in two or more persons, so that they must all join in suing upon the bond, etc., then the bond, etc., is said to be joint, as opposed to one which is several, namely, where each of the obligees has a separate interest, and may therefore sue alone. Whether a bond, covenant or the like is joint or several depends much more upon the subject-matter than upon the words employed, for if each of the obligees has a separate interest, the right of action will be several, although expressed to be joint and several. A bond, covenant, or the like, entered into with several obligees, cannot be joint or several at their election, but must be either one or the other. If one obligee releases the obligor, this is sufficient to bar all the obligees; and if one of several joint obligees dies, his interest passes to the survivors. In the case of partners in trade, however, the share of a deceased partner devolves in equity on his personal representatives, and the surviving partners become trustees for them of his share. The same rule applies where two or more persons advance money and take the security to themselves jointly.

A joint ownership of a chose in action cannot be severed at law by either or both of the obligees, but the parties may make a severance which will be binding in equity. Byrne.

JOINT ACTION. An action brought by two or more as plaintiffs or against two or more as defendants. See JOINT AND SEVERAL; ACTIONS; JOINDER.

JOINT ADMINISTRATORS. See ADMINISTRATOR.

JOINT BOND. The bond of two or more obligors, the action to enforce which must be joint against them all.

JOINT COMMITTEE. A committee composed of members of both houses of a legislature. See May, Parl. Pr.

JOINT CONTRACT. One in which the contractors are jointly bound to perform the promise or obligation therein contained, or entitled to receive the benefit of such promise or obligation.

It is a general rule that a joint contract survives, whatever may be the beneficial interests of the parties under it. When a partner, covenantor, or other person entitled, having a joint interest in a contract not running with the land, dies, the right to sue survives in the other partner, etc.; 1 Dall. 65, 248; Add. Contr., 9th ed. 289. And when the obligation or promise is to perform something jointly by the obligors or promisors, and one dies, the action must be brought against the survivor; Hamm. Partn. 156.

When all the parties interested in a joint contract die, the action must be brought by the executors or administrators of the last surviving obligee against the executors or administrators of the last surviving obligor; Add. Contr. 289. See CONTRACTS; PARTIES; CO-OBLIGOR.

JOINT DEBTORS. Two or more persons jointly liable for the same debt.

To sustain a suit against joint debtors, a joint and subsisting indebtedness must be shown; 18 Johns. 459; and by proceeding to judgment against one or more of joint debtors the debt is merged in the judgment as to all; id.

JOINT DEBTORS' ACTS. Statutes enacted in many of the states, which provide that judgment may be given for or against one or more of several plaintiffs, and for or against one or more of several defendants, and that, "in an action against several defendants, the court may, in its discretion, render judgment against one or more of them, leaving the action to proceed against the others, whenever a several judgment is proper." The name is also given to statutes providing that where an action is instituted against two or more defendants upon an alleged joint liability, and some of them are served with process, but jurisdiction is not obtained over the others, the plaintiff may still proceed to trial against those who are before the court, and, if he recovers, may have judgment against all of the defendants whom he shows to be jointly liable. 1 Black, Judg. §§ 208, 235.

Such judgments are generally held to bind the common property of the joint-debtors, as well as the separate property of those served with process; and, while they are binding personally on the former, they are regarded as either not personally binding at all or only prima facie binding on the latter. Id.; 91 U. S. 168.

JOINT EXECUTORS. Those who are joined in the execution of a will. See EXECUTOR.

JOINT FIAT. A fiat which was formerly issued against two or more trading partners.

Only those partners of a firm who have committed acts of bankruptcy, can be made bankrupts and none but a joint creditor can issue a joint fiat. Wharton; 6 Geo. IV., c. 16, § 16.

JOINT FINE. The fine which might be levied upon a whole vill.

Such a fine was considered good because of necessity. But, in other cases, fines for offences were to be severally imposed on each particular offender, and not jointly upon all of them. Abbott; 1 Roll. Rep. 33; 11 Rep. 42.

JOINT HEIRS. Co-heirs.

JOINT INDICTMENT. One indictment brought against two or more offenders, charging the defendants jointly. It may be where there is a joint criminal act, without any regard to any particular personal default or defect of either of the defendants; thus there may be a joint indictment against the joint keepers of a gaming-house; 1 Vent. 302; 2 Hawk. Pl. Cr. 240.

JOINT LIVES. An expression used to designate the duration of an estate or right, limited or granted to two or more persons, to be enjoyed during the lives of both or all of them.

An annuity to two for their lives is payable until the death of one. Where the survivor is to be benefited, the conveyance or devise is usually expressed to be "to hold their joint lives and the life of the survivor."

JOINT OWNERSHIP. See JOINT.

JOINT PROPERTY. Property held jointly or in partnership or in coparcenary or in common. Section 732, Subsection 29, Civil Code of Kentucky.

JOINT RATE. See TRUCK ROUTE.

JOINT RESOLUTION. A resolution adopted by both houses of congress or a legislature. When such a resolution has been approved by the president or passed with his approval, it has the effect of a law. 6 Op. Atty. Gen. 660.

The distinction between a joint resolution and a concurrent resolution of congress, is that the former requires the approval of the president while the latter does not.

JOINT AND SEVERAL. A liability is said to be joint and several when the creditor may sue one or more of the parties to such liability separately, or all of them together at his option. Dioey, Parties 280.

Where one is compelled to pay the whole debt or more than his proper share, he is entitled to contribution (q. v.). In case of the death of one his liability remains against his estate; Wms. Pers. Prop. 368. As a general rule all the transactions of partners are said to be joint and several. See PARTNERSHIP.

As to joint and several debtors, Lord Mansfield said in Rice v. Shute, Burr. 2611, that "all contracts with partners were joint and several, and every partner was liable to pay the whole." But it was remarked by Spencer, C. J., that "it would be straining Lord Mansfield's opinion unreasonably to say, that he meant technically that all contracts with partners were joint and several, for, then, the non-jointer of any of the partners never could be pleaded in abatement, which all the court expressly decided. In equity they are joint and several; and so they were as regarded that suit, the defendant having neglected to avail himself of the objection in a legal manner. Surely it cannot be said that in a legal sense, when there are a plurality of debtors, that their contract is joint and several, when they have engaged jointly to pay the debt. Each debtor is bound for the whole, until the debt is paid; but as regards the remedy to coerce payment, there is a material and settled distinction. If they have undertaken severally to pay, separate suits may be brought against each; but when their undertaking is joint, unless they waive the advantage, by not interposing a plea in abatement, they must be sued jointly, if in full life, and neither has been discharged by operation of a bankrupt or insolvent law, or is not liable on the ground of infancy." 18 Johns. 459.

JOINT AND SEVERAL BOND. A bond of two or more obligors, who bind themselves jointly and severally to the obligees, who can sue all the obligors jointly, or any one of them separately, for the whole amount, but cannot bring a joint action against part,—that is, treat it as joint as to some and several as to others.

JOINT AND SEVERAL CREDITOR. One for whose debt a firm is jointly, and all or some or one of its members are or is also separately, liable. (Robs. Bankr. 616.) Thus, if A. and B. are trading in partnership under the firm of A. and Company, and a bill of exchange is accepted by A. and Company, and indorsed by A., the holder of the bill would, in the event of A. and B.'s bankruptcy, be a joint and several creditor, and, therefore, entitled to prove against both the joint estate of the firm and the separate estate of A. R. & L. Dict.; L. R. 7 Ch. 178.

JOINT AND SEVERAL OBLIGATION. One in which all the obligees are to be held either collectively or as individuals. Anderson.

JOINT-STOCK ASSOCIATION. See STOCK ASSOCIATION.

JOINT STOCK BANKS. In English Law. A species of quasi corporations, or companies regulated by deeds of settlement. See JOINT STOCK COMPANY.

JOINT STOCK COMPANY. An association of individuals for purposes of profit, possessing a common capital contributed by the members composing it, such capital being commonly divided into shares of which each member possesses one or more, and which are transferable by the owner. Shelf. Jt. St. Co. 1.

A quasi partnership, invested by statutes in England and many of the states with some of the privileges of a corporation. See 10 Wall. 556; L. R. 4 Eq. 695.

A partnership whereof the capital is divided, or agreed to be divided, into shares so as to be transferable without the express consent of the co-partners. Pars. Part. § 436.

Such associations are not pure partnerships, for their members are recognized as an aggregate body; nor are they pure corporations, for their members are more or less liable to contribute to the debts of the collective whole. Incorporated companies are intermediate between corporations known to the common law and ordinary corporations and partake of the nature of both. 1 Lindl. Partn., 1st ed. 6.

They are to be distinguished from limited partnerships chiefly in that there is, in a joint stock company, no directus personarum, that is, no choice about admitting partners, the shares are transferable without involving a dissolution of the association, the assignee of shares becomes a partner by virtue of the transfer, and the rights and duties of the members are determined by articles of association, or in England by a deed of settlement; 1 Pars. Contr., 8th ed. 144.

The power to manage the business is vested exclusively in the directors, and a shareholder, as such, has no power to contract for the company; 2 H. L. Cas. 520. Generally the number of shares is fixed by the charter, but it is sometimes provided that there shall not be less than a certain number nor more than a certain number. In such cases it is left for the company to determine the number within the limits prescribed; 45 Me. 254; but where the charter fixes the amount of the capital stock, and provides that it may be increased from time to time at the pleasure of the corporation, the directors have no power to increase the amount of the stock, although the charter provides that all the corporate powers shall be vested in, and exercised by a board of directors, and such officers and agents as such board shall appoint; 18 Wall. 238.

In New York joint stock companies have all the attributes of a corporation except the right to have and use a common seal, and an action is properly brought for or against the president as such, and the judgment and execution against him bind the joint property of the association, but do not bind his own property; 74 N. Y. 234; but it has been held that the provisions in the New York statutes are merely local in their operation, and that the members may be sued in other states as partners; 128 Mass. 445; 60 Me. 468. They may be served with summons in another state in the same manner that corporations are served; 44 N. E. Rep. (Ohio) 506; and on an issue as to whether an association was a joint stock company or a corporation, its classification by the statutes of New York, where it was created, has been held not conclusive; 1 Ohio, N. P. 259. A joint stock company having some of the characteristics of a corporation and some of a partnership, including the right to a common seal, ownership of the property by the association, and the right to sue and be sued in the corporate name, is as much a citizen of the state which created it as a corporation organized under its laws, and when sued in another state is entitled to a removal to the federal court irrespective of the citizenship of its individual members; 46 Fed. Rep. 209; 1 Flap. 611; 10 Biss. 273.

At common law they are held not corporations but are to be sued as partners; 128 Mass. 445; 60 Me. 468; 4 Metc. 535; 64 Ia. 220. But in states where there are statutory provisions concerning them the indebtedness of joint stock companies will be charged pro rata to the solvent members; 34 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 178. An English joint stock company (in this case a fire insurance company) endowed by its deed of settlement with the following powers and faculties, 1. A distinctive artificial name by which it can make contracts. 2. A statutory authority to sue and be sued in the name of its officers as representing the association. 3. A statutory recognition of it as an entity distinct from its members by allowing them to sue it or be sued by it. 4. A provision for its perpetuity by transfer of its shares so as to secure succession of membership, was held to be a corporation in this country; 10 Wall. 556; 100 Mass. 531; notwithstanding the acts of parliament declaring it should not be so considered, and the court held that such corporations, whether organized under the laws of a state of the Union or a foreign government, may be taxed by another state for the privilege of conducting their corporate business therein.

When such a company is not organized under the statutes a suit brought by or against it should be in the name of all the partners or of one or more for the use of all; 1 Ia. 369; 58 Me. 537; and a defective certificate of organization will render all the parties liable to a common-law action as partners; 127 Pa. 255. A mere subscription for shares in an unincorporated joint stock company will not make the subscribers liable as partners to third persons dealing with the company; they must have intended to become members and share in the profits of the business, but an unexplained subscription is evidence of that fact; 53 Mo. App. 245.

It is an incumbent duty on the part of a joint stock company not to permit a transfer of stock until fully satisfied of the shareholder's authority to transfer; L. R. 9 Eq. 181; 153 Pa. 232; 129 Mass. 46; 2 Bing. 893; and as to the nature of shares in such an association see SHARES.

An authority conferred on the directors to make contracts and bargains, and to transact all matters requisite for the affairs of the company will not in general authorize the directors to draw bills; 19 L. J. Ex. 34; 9 C. B. 574; 20 L. J. Q. B. 160; but if the directors have authority to bind the company by bills, and they regularly accept, in the name of the company, a bill drawn on the company, every member is liable as a joint acceptor to any holder who is not also a member of the company; 8 M. & H. 894; 10 id. 132; 19 L. J. Ex. 34; 5 E. & B. 1; so the acceptance of a bill by an agent who is also a member of the company binds him personally; 9 Exch. 154.

To a suit for a dissolution or winding up of the affairs of a joint stock company, all the shareholders, however numerous, must be parties; 1 Keen 24; and any member of the company may institute an action for its dissolution; 92 Hun 432. The fact that such a company has conducted business for twenty-three years without making dividends for its stockholders, is good ground for its dissolution at suit of one of them; 85 Atl. Rep. (Vt.) 459. A society that cannot be incorporated because organized to resist the enforcement of laws cannot sue in the society name for the collection of a debt; 44 Mich. 313. See Bissett; Buckley; Wordsworth, Joint Stock Companies; Ang. & Ames; Thompson, Corporations; Lindl. Partn.; Lindl. Company Law; CORPORATION; DIRECTOR; STOCKHOLDER; PARTNERS; PARTNERSHIP.

JOINT TENANCY. In the case of joint tenancy, all the tenants have together, in the theory of the law, but one estate in the land and this estate each joint tenant owns conjointly with the other cotenants. All the joint tenants, whether only two or more than two, constitute for some purposes but one tenant, or, as it has been more specifically stated, each joint tenant is regarded as the tenant of the whole for purposes of tenure and survivorship, while for purposes of alienation and forfeiture each has an undivided share only. (Co. Litt. 186 a 1 Preston, Estates, 136.) As between themselves each is entitled to a share of the rents and profits. (Williamson, Real Prop., 21st ed., 136.)

In a joint tenancy there are said (2 Bl. Com. 180) to be four unities, to wit, unity of interest, or title, and of possession, or, in other words, joint tenants have one and the same interest, accruing by one and the same conveyance, commencing at one and the same time, and held by one and the same undivided possession. 1 Tiffany, Real Prop., 2nd ed., 625. See CO-OWNERSHIP; TENANCY IN COMMON; COPARCENARY; TENANCY BY ENTIRETIES; COMMUNITY PROPERTY; PARTNERSHIP PROPERTY.

In "joint tenancy," the tenants thereof must have one and the same interest, arising by the same conveyance, commencing at the same time, and held by one and the same undivided possession. The chief peculiarity of this estate is the right of survivorship, by which, upon the death of one joint tenant, the entire tenancy remains to the surviving co-tenants, not to the heirs or other representatives of the deceased, the last survivor taking the whole estate. 108 Ky. 424, 56 S. W. 682.

JOINT TENANTS. Two or more persons to whom are granted lands or tenements to hold in fee-simple, fee-tail, for life, for years, or at will. Freem. Coten. & Par. § 9; 2 Bla. Com. 179. The estate which they thus hold is called an estate in joint tenancy. See ESTATE OF JOINT TENANCY; JUS ACCRESCENDI; SURVIVOR.

JOINT TORTFEASORS. Wrongdoers; two or more who commit a tort.

When several persons join in an offence or injury, they may generally be sued jointly, or any number less than the whole may be sued, or each one may be sued separately; 10 Wend. 654. Each is liable for himself, because the entire damages sustained were occasioned by each, each sanctioning the acts of the others, so that by suing one alone, he is not charged beyond his just proportion. Any number less than the whole may be sued, because each is answerable for his companion's acts. Thus a joint action may be brought against several for an assault and battery, or for composing and publishing a libel; 2 Saund. 117a; Bacon, Abr. Actions in General (C); 2 Tyl. 129.

But to this rule that for a joint injury a joint action may be brought, there is an exception, namely, that no joint action can be maintained for a joint slander; this exception, seems to proceed upon the ground that each man's slander is his own, and it cannot by any means be considered that of another. Although this exception appears to be fully established, yet it is difficult to see the reason of it; when one of several trespassers gives the blow, he is considered as acting for the others, and, if they acted jointly, they may be jointly sued; why not consider the speaker, when acting in concert with others, as the actor for the whole in uttering the words? The blow is no more that of the person who did not give it than the words are the words of him who only united with the other in an agreement that they should be spoken. In either case, upon principle, the maxim, qui facit per alium facit per se, ought to have its force. Such, however, is not the law.

Where a person is injured by a joint tort and accepts satisfaction from one of the wrongdoers, he cannot sue the other; 28 Atl. Rep. (N. J.) 582.

A covenant not to sue one of two joint tortfeasors does not operate as a release of the other from liability; [1892] 2 Q. B. 511; nor does the dismissal of an action against one together with an executor for a valuable consideration, of an agreement not to sue him, release the other; 148 Ill. 358; nor does the fact that where property is jointly converted by two persons, and one of those converting accounts to the owner, who accepts part of the proceeds, remove the other's liability; 5 Tex. Civ. App. 841.

JOINT TRESPASSERS. Two or more who unite in committing a trespass.

JOINT TRUSTEES. Two or more persons who are intrusted with property for the benefit of one or more others. See TRUSTEE.

JOINTRESS, JOINTURESS. A woman who has an estate settled on her by her husband, to hold during her life, if she survive him. Co. Litt. 46.

JOINTURE. A competent livelihood of freehold for the wife, of lands and tenements, to take effect, in profit or possession, presently after the death of the husband, for the life of the wife at least.

Jointures are regulated by the statute of 27 Hen. VIII. c. 10, commonly called the statute of uses.

To make a good jointure, the following circumstances must concur, namely: It must take effect, in possession or profit, immediately from the death of the husband.

It must be for the wife's life, or for some greater estate. It must be limited to the wife herself, and not to any other person in trust for her. It must be made in satisfaction for the wife's whole dower, and not of part of it only. The estate limited to the wife must be expressed or averred to be in satisfaction of her whole dower. It must be made before marriage. See 27 Ohio St. 60, where it is said that it may also be made after marriage. A jointure attended with all these circumstances is binding on the widow, and is a complete bar to the claim of her dower; or, rather, it prevents its ever arising. See 4 Kent 55.

But there are other modes of limiting an estate to a wife, which, Lord Coke says, are good jointures within the statute, provided that the wife accepts them after the death of the husband. She may, however, reject them, and claim her dower; Cruise, Dig. tit. 7; 2 Bla. Com. 187. As to the effect of jointure as a bar of dower, see Wms. R. P., 6th ed. 233, and the American notes. See DOWER. It is held that a jointure cannot be affected by a post-nuptial agreement; 7 Houst. 102; s. c. 80 Atl. Rep. 785.

In its more enlarged sense, a jointure signifies a joint estate limited to both husband and wife. 2 Bla. Com. 187. See 14 Vintr. Abr. 540; 3 Bac. Abr. 190; Bouvier, Inst. 176; Washb. R. P.

JOUR. A French word signifying day. It is used in our old law-books: as, tout jours, forever. It is also frequently employed in the composition of words: as, journal, a day-book; journeyman, a man who works by the day; journeys account.

JOURNAL. In Maritime Law. The book kept on board of a ship or other vessel which contains an account of the ship's course, with a short history of every occurrence during the voyage. Another name for log-book. Chitty, Law of Nat. 199.

In Commercial Law. A book used among merchants, in which the contents of the waste-book are separated every month, and entered on the debtor and creditor side, for more convenient posting in the ledger.

In Legislation. An account of the proceedings of a legislative body.

The constitution of the United States, art. 1, s. 5, directs that "each house shall keep a journal of its proceedings, and from time to time publish the same, excepting such parts as may in their judgment require secrecy." See 2 St. Const., 5th ed. § 889.

The constitutions of the several states contain similar provisions.

On a reference to the journal of the federal house of representatives to ascertain whether a duly authenticated law was passed, the court is bound to assume that the journal speaks the truth, and cannot receive oral evidence to impeach its correctness; 144 U. S. 1; but the debates in congress may not be resorted to for the purpose of discovering the meaning of a statute; 166 id. 290.

The journal of either house is evidence of the action of that house upon all matters before it; 7 Cow. 613; Cowp. 17. It is a public record of which the courts may take judicial notice; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 482; 5 W. Va. 85; s. c. 17 Am. Rep. 28; 16 id. 647; 94 U. S. 260; 60 Ia. 549; 79 Va. 280; 1 Wyo. 85; Cooley, Const. Lim. 135; contra, 45 Ill. 119; 2 Cent. L. J. 407. If it should appear therefrom that any act did not receive the requisite vote, or that the act was not constitutionally adopted, the courts may adjudge the act void; Cooley, Const. Lim. 164. Failure to comply with certain constitutional provisions in the passage of an act can be shown only by the journals; 27 S. E. Rep. (Ga.) 188; and if the journal sufficiently shows on its face a substantial compliance with constitutional requirements, a mere clerical omission in the journals of either house will not vitiate an act; 27 S. E. Rep. (W. Va.) 218. Where they are silent as to the observance of any constitutional requirement, it will not be presumed that such requirement was disregarded, and where they do not expressly show whether the act was constitutionally passed it will be held valid unless there is an omission of some matter expressly required by the constitution to be entered therein; 47 Pac. Rep. (Utah) 670.

Where the constitution requires that the yeas and nays be entered on the journals, they are conclusive as against not only a printed statute published by law, but a duly enrolled act; 25 S. E. Rep. (N. C.) 966.

In determining whether an act was passed in accordance with a constitutional provision requiring the assent of two-thirds of the members, recourse may be had to the journals, if the certificate of the presiding officer fails to show by what vote the bill was passed; 42 N. E. Rep. (N. Y.) 1088.

The journals need not show that a bill was read by sections on its final passage, as required by the constitution, the presumption being that it was read; 18 So. Rep. (Fla.) 767. And where they affirmatively show non-compliance with an essential requirement to the enactment of a bill, or fail to show any essential step in the enactment which the constitution requires them to show, the enrolled bill as evidence of the law is overcome; 18 So. Rep. (Fla.) 767.

Where a bill, as approved, contains important clauses which the journals show were stricken out by the amendment in the houses it is invalid; 68 N. W. Rep. (Wis.) 769.

The journals cannot be resorted to by the court for the purpose of inquiring into the motive which actuated the legislature or any member of it in enacting a law; 45 Pac. Rep. (Ida.) 890.

The journals are inadmissible to show that parts of the bill, as passed by the houses, were omitted from the enrolled bill as signed by the presiding officers of the two houses and the governor, where all bills are required to be signed by the governor after having passed the legislative assembly; 42 Pac. Rep. (Ariz.) 1025. Every reasonable presumption is made in favor of the action of a legislative body; it will not be presumed from the mere silence of the journals that either house disregarded a constitutional requirement in the passage of an act, unless in cases where the constitution has required the journals to show the action that has been taken; 25 Ill. 181; 11 Ind. 424; 3 Ohio St. 475; and the presumption that a properly authenticated bill was passed is not overcome by the failure of the journals to show any fact which is not specifically required by the constitution to be entered therein; 67 N. W. Rep. (Minn.) 632. Such a bill properly enrolled, signed, and approved cannot be impeached by reference to the journals of either house, to show that it was enacted in conformity to constitutional requirements; 35 S. W. Rep. (Ky.) 3; id. 275.

JOURNEY. Originally a day's travel. It is now applied to travel from place to place, without restriction of time. But when thus applied, it is employed to designate a travel which is without the ordinary habits, business, or duties of the person, to a distance from his home, and beyond the circle of his friends or acquaintances. 53 Ala. 521.

JOURNEYS ACCOUNT. In English Practice. A new writ which the plaintiff was permitted to sue out within a reasonable time after the abatement, without his fault, of the first writ. This time was computed with reference to the number of days which the plaintiff must spend in journeying to reach the court; hence the name of journeys account, that is, journeys accomptes or counted. This writ was quasi a continuance of the first writ, and so related back to it as to oust the defendant or tenant of his voucher, plea of non-tenure, joint tenancy fully administered, or any other plea arising upon matter happening after date of the first writ; Co. Litt. fol. 9 b.

This mode of proceeding has fallen into disease, the practice now being to permit that writ to be quashed, and to sue out another. See Termes de la Ley; Bacon, Abr. Abatement (Q): 14 Viner, Abr. 558; 4 Comyn, Dig. 714; 7 M. & G. 762; 8 Cra. 84.

JOUSTS. See JUDS

JURILACION. In Spanish Law. The right of a public officer to retire from office, retaining his title and his salary, either in whole or in part, after he has attained the age of fifty years and been in public service at least twenty years, whenever his infirmities prevent him from discharging the duties of his office.

JUDAISMUS (Lat.). The religion and rites of the Jews. Du Cange. A quarter set apart for residence of Jews. Du Cange. A usurious rate of interest. 1 Mon. Angl. 839; 2 id. 10, 665. See marces sterlingorum ad quietandam terram predictam de Judaismo, in quo fuit impetrata. Du Cange. An income anciently accruing to the king from the Jews. Blount.

JUDEX (Lat.). In Old English Law. A juror. Spelman, Gloss. A judge, in modern sense, especially—as opposed to justiciarius, i. e. a common-law judge—to denote an ecclesiastical judge. Bracton, fol. 401, 402.

In Roman Law. One who, either in his own right or by appointment of the magistrate for the special case, judged causes.

Thus, the prætor was formerly called judez. But, generally, prætores and magistratus who judge of their own right were distinguished from judices, who were private persons, appointed by the prætor, on application of the plaintiff, to try the cause, as soon as issue was joined, and furnished by him with instructions as to the legal principles involved. They were variously called judices delegati, or pedanes, or speciales. It has been said that they resembled in many respects jurors; thus, both are private persons, brought in at a certain stage of the proceedings, viz. issue joined, to try the cause, under instructions from the judge as to the law of the case. But civilians are not clear whether the judices had to decide the fact alone, or the law and fact. The judez resembles in many respects the arbitrator, or arbiter, the chief difference being, first, that the latter is appointed in cases of trust and confidence, the former in cases where the relations of the parties are governed by strict law (in pactionibus strictis); second, the latter has the whole control of case, and decides according to equity and good conscience, the former by strict formulae; third, that the latter may be a magistrate, the former must be a private person; fourth, that the award of the arbitrator derives its force from the agreement of submission, while the decree of the judez has its sanction in the command of the prætor to try the cause. Calvinus, Lex. 1 Spence, Eq. Jur. 210, note; Mackeldey, Civ. Law, Kaufmann ed. § 198, note.

It has been said that there was generally one judez, sometimes three,—in which case the decision of two, in the absence of the third, had no effect; Calvinus, Lex. But another careful writer says that "although there could never be more than one judez, there were sometimes several arbiters, but the arbiter was chosen from the same class as the judez." Sand. Inst. Just. Intro. lxxli.

Down to the time of handing over the cause to the judez, that is, till issue joined, the proceedings were before the prætor; and were said to be in jure; after that before the judez, and were said to be in judicio. In all this we see the germ of the Anglo-Saxon system of judicature; 1 Spence, Eq. Jur. 67.

A judge who conducted the trial from beginning to end; magistratus. The practice of calling in judices was disused before Justinian's time; therefore, in the Code, Institutes, and Novels, judez means judge in its modern sense. Heineccius, Elem. Jur. Civ. § 1827.

The term judez is used with very different significations at different periods of Roman law. The distinctive features of the position of the judez belong to the earlier history of the Roman law. A recent writer defines very clearly the functions of the judez as that period is distinguished from those of the magistrate: "In the earlier history of civil procedure in Rome, we find two sharply defined divisions,—the proceedings which were said to be in jure, and those which were said to be in judicio. The former took place before the magistrate, who represented officially the judicial power of the State. This magistrate in this capacity decided, in the first instance, whether the claim of the complaining party was cognizable at all,—whether there was any form of procedure by which it could be enforced. If it was controverted, and there seemed to be any action that would fit the case, the litis contestatio was formed, by a solemn appeal addressed by each party to his witnesses, and the controversy was then referred to the judez, or in some cases to a body or college of judices. The judices were not magistrates, and did not represent the power of the State. They were, it would seem, more in theory like referees. They took up the issue which had been stated by the magistrate, heard the testimony, and pronounced the sententia, and this finding was afterwards enforced by the magistrate." Howe, Stud. Civ. L. 368.

The relation to the period during which the sharply defined distinction between proceedings in jure and those in judicio was strictly observed. If, for example, the dispute concerned property it was assigned temporarily to the possession of one party, who was security for its restoration if required, and the judez simply decided which litigant was right; Morey, R. L. 18, 880. The growth of the proceeding by formula during the next period was doubtless largely due to the convenience as a method of controlling the judez the instructions of the magistrate with respect to the case referred to him. The new proceeding tended very much to increase the flexibility of the law in its application to particular cases, as it had been before there was no tradition to fetter the formula of the prætor. In the old litis contestatio the issue was formulated in narrowly prescribed terms; in the new formula the terms used were informal and freely chosen by the magistrate. "The formula was thus well adapted as a means for directly submitting to the decisions of a judez in judicio any question, or complex of questions, which the prætor deemed actionable. The prætor himself was now in a position, while formulating the legal issue, to give the judez the same time direct instructions in reference to the decision of such issue. For whether the judez condemned or acquitted depended now solely on the manner in which the prætor formulated the question in dispute." Sohm, Inst. Rom. L. 177. It was now for the first time that the judez became in effect an official, he ceased to be an independent private person bound only by the positive law, and his action was dominated by the limitations of the prætor's edict. Thus the latter became a dominating force in legal procedure, the judez in some degree a subordinate official, and the result was "that the formal procedure obliterated beyond recovery the clear sharp line which had hitherto severed jus and judicium." This naturally resulted from the fact that by the formula the judez was converted into an organ or instrument not only of the civil, but also of the prætor, made law, and the proceedings in judicio and those in jure were controlled by the same authority; id. 175, 182. In the last period of Roman procedure during the later administration of the law, and when the edict came to be fixed by the will of the emperor the prætor and the præses were bound by it equally with the judez and in the formula the judez had before been limited by their own edict. Its publication by the prætor was merely formal, and he became a mere instrument for applying the law, and his duties became more and more ministerial in proportion as, on the one hand, scientific jurisprudence developed, and defined the contents of the existing law and, on the other hand, the imperial power, superseding all other agencies, appropriated to itself the function of developing the law. Thus the judez gradually became an official, whose duty it was to assist the prætor and in the same way the prætor became in reality an official whose duty it was to assist the emperor; id. 230.

For a long period senators alone were qualified to act as judices, and during that time any member of the senate could act, if justified, by mutual consent of the parties, or they could act, where by law there were also plebeian judges called centumviri elected by the comitia constituting a collegium divided into sections and having special jurisdiction of citizenship and sucessionis; their jurisdiction was exclusive where it existed, as to the duties of the judices see also; id. 17, 1-7; Sand. Intro. xli. xlii, lxxiv; Sohm, Inst. Rom. L. §§ 34-37; Prætor; Rescriptores; Juridici; In Jure.

Judex Ordinarius (Lat.). In Civil Law. A judge who had jurisdiction by his own right, not by another's appointment. Calvinus, Lex.; Vicat, Voc. Jur. Blackstone says that judices ordinarii decided only questions of fact, while questions of law were referred to the centumviri; but this would seem to be rather the definition of judices selecti; and not all questions of law were referred to the centumviri, but particular actions: e. g. querela inofficiosi testamenti. See 2 Bla. Com. 315; Vicat, Voc. Jur. Utr. Centumviri.

Judex Pedaneus. Inferior judges; deputy judges; "petit judges that try only trifling cases (so-called because they had only a low seat and no tribunal)." Harper's Lat. Dict.; Dig. 3. 1. 1. 6.

The name was given to the judez who was delegated to hear the whole cause. Their appointment is said to have been due to the necessities, to the great increase in the volume of judicial business, which led the emperor Diocletian to authorize the provincial governors to refer cases of minor importance to them. They were not judices in the sense of the word, but according to the juron of Ortolan, permanent magistrates entrusted with the special duty of conducting such cases as the governor might see fit to refer to them. No other view of the character of these officers seems consistent with the facts, which permeated the whole imperial system; id. Morey, Rom. L. 148. A recent writer says, "About the end of the third century, the præses provinciarum were in the habit of proceeding extra ordinem in civil actions, i. e. they were in the habit of either appointing themselves or of delegating the whole cause to a deputy judge, a judez pedaneus. This deputy judge (who is also called judez datus or judez delegatus) is now in form as well as in substance an official who acts in lieu of the magistrate; he is not merely entrusted, like the old judez privatus, with the conduct of the proceedings in judicio, but is deputed—and this is the reason why no formula is used—to hear and determine the whole cause, including the proceedings in jure. Like the proceedings before the præses himself, the proceedings before this subordinate judge are extra ordinem." Sohm, Inst. Rom. L. 228. It has been said with respect to these judges that the prætores and other great magistrates did not themselves decide the actions which arose between private individuals; these were submitted to judges chosen by the parties, and these judges were called judices pedanes. In choosing them, the plaintiff had the right to nominate, and the defendant to accept or reject those nominated; Heineccius, Antiq. lib. 4, tit. b. n. 40; 7 Toullier, a. 353. As to judices pedanes, generally, see Zimmerman, Ges. Rom. Priv. § 18.

Judex Questionis. A magistrate who decided the law of a criminal case, when the prætor himself did not sit as a magistrate. Morey, Rom. L. 88.

The director of the criminal court under the presidency of the prætor. Harper's Lat. Dict.; Cic. Brut. 76, 264.

Judex Selectus. A select or selected judge or judge.

The judges in criminal suits selected by the prætor. Harper's Lat. Dict.; Cic. Verr. 2, 2, 18, § 82.

These judices selecti were used in criminal causes, and between them and modern jurors many points of resemblance have been noticed; 3 Bla. Com. 368. They were first returned by the prætor, then drawn by lot, subject to challenge; they were sworn and taken oaths were struck. So many points of resemblance were thought to exist between them and the jurors of the Greeks and our jurors that the English institution has been thought to be derived from the former ones; id. note (n). But the root idea of both systems is sufficiently natural and logical to have been indigenous in both countries. See Jones.

JUDGE. A public officer lawfully appointed to decide litigated questions according to law.

An officer so named in his commission, who presides in some court.

In its most extensive sense the term includes all officers appointed to decide litigated questions while acting in that capacity, including justices of the peace, and even jurors, it is said, who are judges of the facts. 4 Dall. 229; 3 Yeates 300. In ordinary legal use, however, the term is limited to the sense of the second of the definitions here given; 15 Ill. 388; unless it may be that the case of a justice or commissioner acting judicially is to be considered an extension of this meaning. See 3 Cosh. 584.

By the common law every court, while engaged in the exercise of its lawful functions, has the authority to preserve order, decency, and silence in its presence, and may apprehend and punish the offender without examination or proof; but if the offence be committed out of court the party is entitled to notice and a hearing in his defence; 1 Cal. 152; 28 Ind. 205. See CONTEMPT.

An assault on a judge sitting in court is not only punishable as a contempt, but indictable, as a crime against public justice, and more aggravated than an ordinary assault, or even than an assault committed upon another person in a court; 2 Bish. N. Cr. L. § 250; this principle comes from the common law and was, as early as 25 Edw. 3, embodied in a statute, under which such an offence was punishable by the loss of the right hand, forfeiture of lands and goods, and perpetual imprisonment. In Neagle's case, 185 U. S. 1, it was held that "an assault upon a judge of a court of the United States, while in discharge of his official duties, is a breach of the peace of the United States, as distinguished from the peace of the State in which the assault takes place." In this case the petitioner was a United States deputy marshal, appointed for the express purpose of guarding Mr. Justice Field against a threatened attack, which took place, and the killing was held by the court to have been caused by a just apprehension that an attack would result in the death of the justice, and was justifiable and a judgment of the circuit court, discharging him from the custody of the sheriff, by whom he was held, under process of the state court, was affirmed.

So any insult, disrespect, or insolence to a judge is punishable; 2 Bish. N. Cr. L. §

350. On this subject, it was said by Holroyd, J.: "In the case of an insult to (the judge) himself, it is not on his own account that he commits; for that is a consideration which should never enter his mind. But though he may despise the insult, it is a duty which he owes to the station to which he belongs not to suffer those things to pass which will make him despicable in the eyes of others. It is his duty to support the dignity of his station, and uphold the law, so that in his presence, at least, it shall not be infringed;" 4 B. & Ald. 329, 330.

Within this principle it was held to be a contempt to write a letter to a judge, libeling or abusing him in regard to one of his decisions; 18 Kan. 72; or when the judge of an inferior tribunal refuses obedience to processes from a superior one; 18 Wend. 664; 1 Eng. L. & Eq. 516; 2 Caines 97; 2 Johns. Cas. 118; 6 B. Monr. 638; T. U. P. Chart. 43, 815.

It has been held that abusing a judge out of court, with reference to expressions made by him on a trial, was a contempt; 2 Va. Cas. 408; but in another case it was held that newspaper articles in regard to the conduct of a judge during a trial, and charging him with being an abettor of a person against whom an indictment for murder was pending, could not be visited as a contempt; 4 Sm. & M. 751. In the federal courts, and in many states, the subject is regulated by statute: U. S. Rev. Stat. § 725; 16 Fed. Rep. 853; 1 Flipp. 108; 19 Wall. 505; 64 Ill. 195; 89 N. C. 28; 8 W. & S. 77; 110 Ind. 801. The question whether a contempt can be committed otherwise than in court cannot be said to be settled, but Bishop is of the opinion that the English and better American doctrines recognize such contempts, yet, under limitations easily defined; 2 Bish. N. Cr. L. § 258. In all such cases the offense is against the state, not the judge; id. § 269; 7 Wheat. 38; 36 Wis. 355; 86 Ind. 196; 7 Blatch. 23.

In a recent case a judge who was a candidate for re-election, instituted contempt proceedings against the editor of a newspaper and a lawyer who wrote a communication in the newspaper criticizing his judicial conduct. An order adjudging both parties in contempt was entered, but its execution was prevented by a writ of prohibition from the supreme court of Wisconsin, which said: "Truly, it must be a grievous and weighty necessity which will justify so arbitrary a proceeding, whereby a candidate for office becomes the accuser, judge, and jury, and may within a few hours summarily punish his critic by imprisonment. The result of such doctrine is that all unfavorable criticism of a sitting judge's past official conduct can be at once stopped by the judge himself, or, if not stopped, can be punished by immediate imprisonment. If there can be any more effectual way to gag the press and subvert freedom of speech, we do not know where to find it. Under such a rule the merits of a sitting judge may be rehearsed, but as to his demerits there must be profound silence. In our opinion no such divinity 'doth hedge about' a judge—certainly not when he is a candidate for public office." 18 N. Y. L. J. 28, where the subject of contempt out of court is discussed generally.

The question has recently been raised, "Can a judge be guilty of contempt of court?" In a county court in England the judge made some strong observations on the conduct of a bankrupt who applied for his discharge, characterizing him as being guilty of "bare-faced and impudent robbery." It is suggested in this connection that while liable to abuse, on the whole, the rule exempting judges from prosecution of any kind for observations made upon the bench is a rational one; 56 Alb. L. J. 302.

Bribery or attempting to bribe a judge was, at common law, a very grave offence. Indeed the earlier definitions of bribery seem to confine the offence to judicial officers; 4 Bla. Com. 139; 8 Inst. 145; and they have been criticised upon this ground for being too narrow. See 1 East 188; 4

Burr. 2494; 2 Bish. N. Cr. L. § 85, n. 1. Upon the same ground are condemned sinister approaches, with intent to influence judges indirectly, though not amounting to bribery; id.; and on this subject it was said by Lord Cottenham: "Every private communication to a judge, for the purpose of influencing his decision upon a matter publicly before him, always is, and ought to be, reprobated; it is a course calculated, if tolerated, to divert the course of justice, and is considered, and ought, more frequently than it is, to be treated, as what it really is, high contempt of court;" 1 Maon. & G. 116, 122.

Judges are appointed or elected in a variety of ways in the United States. For the federal courts they are appointed by the president, by and with the consent of the senate; in some of the states they are appointed by the governor, the governor and senate, or by the legislature. The judges of the federal courts, and of the courts of some of the states, hold their offices during good behavior; of others, during good behavior, or until they shall attain a certain age; and of others, for a limited term of years. The federal judges must have the tenure of office during good behavior conferred upon them before they can be invested with any portion of the judicial power of the government; 37 Fed. Rep. 587.

Impartiality is the first duty of a judge: if he has any (the slightest) interest in the cause, he is disqualified from sitting as a judge; Aliquis non debet esse iudex in propria causa; 8 Co. 118; 6 Pick. 109; 4 Ohio 675; 17 Ga. 253; 23 N. H. 473; 19 Conn. 585; 43 La. Ann. 924; 41 Cal. 342; 75 Ja. 159. See 38 Ill. App. 491; 83 Tex. 69; such as his relationship to the parties; 142 N. Y. 130; even where such party is administrator only; 37 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 446; (but relationship to plaintiff's attorney will not disqualify him; 38 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 58.) Either party may make the objection that the judge is of kin to one of them; 10 Ind. 299; and it is for the judge to determine, in the exercise of sound judicial discretion, whether by reason of kinship, etc., it would be improper for him to hear a particular case; he cannot be compelled to vacate the bench by the affidavit of the litigant; 84 Ky. 18. A pecuniary interest in the case on trial will incapacitate him from sitting in the cause, both by the common law and the statutes; 12 Fla. 188; 9 Md. 334; 18 Mass. 840; as where he is interested as a stockholder in a railroad corporation making an application for a commission to appraise land, his interest is such as to invalidate the report of the commissioners; 4 Ohio St. 675; and where the lord chancellor who was a shareholder in a company in whose favor the vice-chancellor had made a decree, affirmed this decree, it was reversed on that ground; 3 H. L. Cas. 789; but it has been held that where the interest of the judge is merely that of a corporator in a municipal corporation, the legislature may provide that this shall constitute no disqualification when the corporation is a party, apparently on the ground that the interest is insignificant; 1 Gray 475. But it is doubtful whether even the legislature can go beyond this class of cases and abolish the maxim; Cooley, Const. Lim. 518.

If one of the judges is disqualified on this ground, a judgment rendered will be void, even though the proper number may have concurred in the result, which includes the interested judge; 6 Q. B. 753; or though the parties agree to waive objections to the jurisdictions; 38 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 10. The objection may be raised for the first time in the appellate court; 6 Cush. 332; 2 H. L. Cas. 887; but in Iowa it was held that an objection to a judge of the court of original jurisdiction on the ground of interest must be made in that court; 1 Ia. 498.

In a suit on a collector's bond by the chosen freeholders of a county, one who was an inhabitant, a freeholder, and a taxpayer in the same county was incompetent to sit as judge; 21 N. J. L. 656. A judge is not disqualified to try a case because he has tried an action in trespass concerning the same property; 35 Atl. Rep. (Vt.) 833.

The interest which disqualifies a judge of the supreme court so that a judge of the circuit court may sit in his stead must be immediate, certain, and dependent on the result of the case, and not remote, uncertain, or speculative; 10 Fla. 218.

The general rule that it is irregular and improper for a judge to try any cause in which he has such an interest as would disqualify as a witness does not apply to orders purely formal in their character, and it is doubtful whether it would extend to a case in which no other judge could try and determine the cause. If the judge is deprived of authority to act, by statutory inhibition, the proceedings are void, otherwise voidable only, and therefore valid until avoided; 27 Ala. 428.

It is said to be discretionary with him whether he will sit in a cause in which he has been of counsel; 2 A. K. Marsh. 517; Coxe, N. J. 184. See 2 Binn. 454; 5 Ind. 230; 82 Tex. 484. But the practice is to refuse to sit in such case. And in 5 Coldw. 217, it was held that where the judge who rendered the judgment in the case had been counsel in it, the judgment was a nullity; 30 Fla. 595. The question arose in Delaware at the time of the appointment of Bates, Chancellor, in 1865, whether he was legally disqualified from sitting in such cases, so as to bring them within the constitutional provision, giving jurisdiction to the chief justice in all cases in which the chancellor was interested. In view of the desire of the chancellor not to sit in cases in which he had been of counsel, the question was considered by him and Gilpin, C. J., and the conclusion reached that there was not a legal disqualification. This conclusion was communicated by the chancellor to the legislature with a suggestion that provision should be made for the appointment of a chancellor ad litem in such cases; MSS. notes of Bates, Chancellor. A magistrate authorized to sign writs cannot sign them in his own case; 47 Conn. 316.

Where there is no other tribunal that can act, the judge may hear the case; Freem. Judg. § 146; 5 H. L. C. 88; 19 Johns. 501; contra, Hopk. Ch. 2; 105 Mass. 221. See Cooley, Const. Lim., 2d ed. 207, 508, 509; 25 Mich. 83.

It was held that the absence of a judge from the court-room for a considerable time during the arguments of the jury without the consent of the parties was reversible error; 70 N. E. Rep. (Wis.) 832.

A judge is not competent as a witness in a cause trying before him, for this among other reasons, that he can hardly be deemed capable of impartially deciding on the admissibility of his own testimony, or of weighing it against that of another; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 364; 2 Mart. La. n. s. 812; 2 Cal. 358. See Comyn, Dig. Courts (B 4), (C 2), (E 1), (P 16), Justices (I 1, 2, 3); Bacon Abr. Courts (B); 1 Kent 291, 1899 ed.; CHARGE.

While acting within the bounds of his jurisdiction, the judge is not responsible for any error of judgment or mistake of law; 12 Co. 23; 2 Dall. 160; 2 N. & M'C. 168; 1 Day Conn. 315; 5 Johns. 282; 9 id. 895; 3 A. K. Marsh. 76; 1 South. 74; 1 N. H. 874; 45 La. Ann. 1299; 8 Mo. 148; 21 Me. 550; 26 Ala. 527; 1 Bish. N. Cr. L. § 460; unless, possibly, a mistake was induced by gross carelessness or ignorance partaking of a criminal quality; 12 Mod. 498. An action will not lie against a judge of a court of record for any act done by him in his judicial capacity; 6 B. & C. 611. An action of a judge, to be criminally or even civilly cognizable, must be wilful and corrupt; 1 W. Bla. 19; 2 Mo. 38; 47 Me. 462; 26 Ala. 527; 9 Johns. 395; 8 Mo. 148, 254.

It is a rule sometimes asserted to be absolute and sometimes only prima facie that a judicial officer has no protection against the consequences of an act not within his jurisdiction; 2 Gray 120, 410, 570; 13 Wall. 835; 4 Conn. 407; 1 id. 40. But a distinction has sometimes been suggested between acts in excess of jurisdiction and those outside of it. For the latter it has been said that a judge of a court of superior jurisdiction is not liable: Lord De Grey, C. J., in 2 W. Bla. 1141. Of this case it is said by a writer cited infra, who dissents from the doctrine: "It is true this rule is a mere dictum, and also that the decision has been since overruled; but this dictum has sometimes been referred to with approval in subsequent cases." 15 Am. L. Rev. 440. And Field, J., in 7 Wall. 533, said that such a judge is not liable when he acts in excess of his jurisdiction, except for malice. This expression, like that of Lord De Grey, was obiter, inasmuch as the case sustained the jurisdiction which had been questioned. In 73 N. Y. 12, this point was so decided, but the court drew a distinction between the case where the judge had acquired no jurisdiction at all, and the case where the act was merely in excess of jurisdiction after jurisdiction had been acquired. There the judge of the circuit court had imposed a re-sentence upon a prisoner, and he was accordingly imprisoned; the supreme court held the second sentence illegal, and discharged the prisoner. These cases and the doctrine asserted in them have been doubted and criticised by Arthur Biddle in 15 Am. L. Rev. 442 and note, where the authorities cited and relied on are critically examined. More recently the distinction has been discussed by Bishop, who states the doctrine of distinction between excess and absence of jurisdiction with approval, and even goes further, considering that where the jurisdiction is a close one and it is decided by the judge or magistrate carefully and earnestly in favor of his jurisdiction, "in reason and not quite without support from authority," he should not "suffer, though another or even a higher court held the contrary"; 1 Bish. N. Cr. L. § 460; Bish. Non-Contr. § 783.

There is no distinction between a judge acting in court and acting judicially out of court, that is, in chambers; 3 Moore, P. C. 52; Wilm. 206. See 46 Pac. Rep. (Kan.) 24.

"A judge of a court not of record is not liable for any injury sustained which is the result of an honest error of judgment in a matter wherein the court has jurisdiction, and when the act done is not of a purely ministerial nature." The rule is thus stated in 15 Am. L. Rev. 444. See further an article in Ir. L. T. and Sol. J., Nov. 13, 1880; 6 Am. Dec. 303; 29 Am. Rep. 80, n.; 23 Am. Rep. 690. See CORAM NON JUDICE.

One circuit judge has no power to review and revise the action of another circuit judge; 16 S. C. 362; 35 id. 273; nor has a judge when without the state, power to grant an injunction; 131 Ind. 437.

The acts of a judge de facto are not open to collateral attack; 140 U. S. 118.

A judge who acts corruptly may be impeached; 5 Johns. 282; 8 Cow. 178; 4 Dall. 225. See IMPEACHMENT.

See, generally, JUDICIAL POWER; JUDGE-MADE LAW.

Under the Roman law a judge, by whose act or default in deciding or conducting a lawsuit, a party to the suit was injured, was liable to an action for damages, the amount of which was left to the discretion of the judge. Such action was regarded as quasi-delictual, because it was available, not only in cases of deliberately unfair decisions, but also in cases of less serious errors committed by the judge, as overlooking the day fixed for trial or disregarding the rules of law concerning adjournment and the like (imprudencia iudicis). In such a case he was termed iudex qui litem suam fecit (who makes the suit his own). The action in question, however, could not be taken on the ground that the judgment was unjust in substance; Sohm, Inst. Rom. L. 830; Mack. Rom. L. § 506; Morey, Rom. L. 338.

See a JUDGE OR JUSTICE OF THE PEACE; COUNTY JUDGE; COURT.

JUDGE ADVOCATE. An officer of a court-martial who is to discharge certain duties at the trial of offenders. His duties are to prosecute in the name of the United States; but he shall so far consider himself as counsel for the prisoner, after the prisoner shall have made his plea, as to object to leading questions to any of the witnesses or any question to the prisoner the answer to which might tend to criminate himself. He is, further, to swear the members of the court before they proceed upon any trial, and may also administer oaths for purposes of military justice and other purposes of military administration; U. S. Rev. Stat. 2 Supp. 524.

There are eight judge advocates of the army with the rank of major of cavalry, who perform their duties under the direction of the judge-advocate-general (q. v.), and have power to issue process for witnesses and to appoint reporters of court to which they are assigned; U. S. Rev. St. §§ 1200-2. See Rules and Articles of War, art. 69; 2 Story, U. S. Laws 1001; Holt. Dig. passim.

JUDGE-ADVOCATE - GENERAL.

An officer of the army of the United States, provided for by Rev. St. § 1194, who is the head of the bureau of military justice and has the rank of brigadier-general; id. 1198. His duty is to receive, revise, and cause to be recorded the proceedings of all courts-martial, courts of inquiry, and military commissions, and perform such other duties as have heretofore been incident to the office; id. § 1199.

By the act of July 5, 1884, the bureau of military justice and the corps of judge advocates were consolidated under the title of judge-advocate-general's department, consisting of one judge-advocate-general, with the rank and pay of a brigadier-general, one assistant with the rank and pay of colonel, three deputies with rank and pay of lieutenant-colonel, and three judge advocates, each with rank and pay of a major; U. S. Rev. Stat. 1 Supp. § 457.

A similar officer was provided for the navy under the act of June 8, 1880, with the title of judge-advocate-general of the navy. He has the rank and pay of a captain in the navy, or colonel of the marine corps, as the case may be. His duties are to receive, revise, and have recorded the proceedings of all courts-martial, courts of inquiry, and boards for examination of officers, for retirement and promotion, in the naval service, and such other duties as were heretofore performed by naval judge-advocate-general; U. S. Rev. St. 1 Supp. § 290; 2 id. § 500.

JUDGE'S CERTIFICATE. In Eng-

lish Practice. The written statement of the judge who tried the cause that one of the parties is entitled to costs in the action. It is very important in some cases that these certificates should be obtained at the trial. See Tidd, Pr. 879; 3 Chitty, Pr. 458, 496; 8 Campb. 316; 5 B. & Ald. 796. A statement of the opinion of the court, signed by the judges, upon a question of law submitted to them by the chancellor for their decision.

Under the County Courts Act of 1867, in order to entitle a plaintiff to costs if he brings action in the high court, it is necessary that the judge before whom the action was tried shall certify that there was sufficient reason for bringing the action in the superior court, if he do not recover as much as £20 in an action of contract, or £10 in one of tort.

Under some English statutes the plaintiff is entitled to double or treble costs if the judge before whom the action is tried certifies that he is entitled to them; Archb. Pr. 430. See 8 Bla. Com. 453; CASE STATED.

JUDGE-MADE LAW. A phrase used to indicate judicial decisions which construe away the meaning of statutes, or find meanings in them the legislature never intended. It is sometimes used as meaning, simply, the law established by judicial precedent. Cooley, Const. Lim. 4th ed. 70, n. See Austin, Prov. of Jur. where the necessity of judicial legislation and its uses are discussed in extenso.

The expression judge-made law is undoubtedly more frequently used in the former sense, and as expressing a certain degree of approbrium. It is, however, unavoidable that in the distribution of powers which is now recognized as a necessary element of civilized government, there should be found at times some uncertainty as to the line of demarcation between the legislative and judicial powers as well as between each of them and the executive. The necessity of what is called judge-made law in the proper sense, and the possibility of its existence in the other sense, arises from the power of construction which necessarily exists, and though salutary when properly exercised, is susceptible of abuse, and in such case, difficult, if not impossible, to remedy. Of this power of construction it has been said that it "is a mighty one, and, unrestrained by settled rules, would tend to throw a painful uncertainty over the effect that might be given to the most plainly worded statutes, and render courts, in reality, the legislative power of the state. Instances are not wanting to confirm this. Judge-made law has overrode the legislative department. It was the boast of Chief Justice Pemberton, one of the judges of the despot Charles II., and not the worst even of those times, that he had entirely outdone the parliament in making law." 5 Ind. 41, 46. A recent philosophical writer thus characterizes that kind of judicial legislation which is necessary and proper under such a system as the common law: "Although it is considered necessary in all free states to keep the legislative, executive, and judicial powers for the most part separate, and all our American constitutions provide for this, yet it cannot be completely done. The judges, it is well known, actually make a great deal of law, and this judicial legislation cannot be avoided, and indeed much of the best work that we get in this line is done by them. But this they do as delegates of the sovereign people, as much as congress or the state legislatures;" Terry, Anglo-American Law 11.

Mr. Bishop earnestly contends that there is no judge-made law; he says that "law preceded writing, and no writing can be made comprehensive enough to include all law, and no blundering of the judge is so monstrous as denial of right to a suitor who is simply unable to find his case laid down in the statute law or in a previous decision." His view is that more errors are committed by failure to administer justice according to "the general principles of our jurisprudence and the collective conscience of mankind," for want of statute or precedent, than in all other ways. The common-law system was built up when there were few statutes and the judges derived "principles for their decisions from the known usages of the country and from what they found written by God in the breasts of men." Such, he considers, should be the action of judges now, and he assumes that they will always find principles on which to adjudicate any matter unprovided for by statutes or previous decisions. He argues that in view of "the ceaseless variety of changes in human affairs," while precedents are properly followed, yet, now, as in the earlier periods, they have not covered the entire ground, and it is absurd that questions of right or remedy should depend, not upon the abstract right or the convenience or propriety of a decision either way, but "solely on the accident, whether it arose in early times, received then an adjudication, and the adjudication found a reporter." 1 Bish. N. Cr. L. §§ 18, 19.

In a case for which he could find no precedent, Jessel, M. R., said: "I am afraid that, whatever I may call my decision, it will, in effect, be making law, which I never have any desire to do; but I cannot find that the point is covered by any decided case, or even appears to have been discussed in any decided case. The only satisfaction I have in deciding the point is this, that it will in all probability be carried to a higher court, and it will be for that court to make the law, or, as we say, declare the law, and not for me." L. R. 13 Ch. Div. 788, 805.

It has been said that the phrase judicial legislation carries on its face the notion of judicial usurpation, and is habitually used by the courts as a term of reproach; but it is contended by the writer who admits this current use of the phrase, that, properly used, it means the growth of the law at the hand of the judges, and in that sense, so far from being an evil, "it is a desirable, and indeed a necessary, feature of our system." 5 Harv. L. Rev. 179. In the discussion of the subject the writer last cited considers that with respect to much that has been written on the subject of judicial legislation, the meaning cannot be fully understood without taking into consideration the different theories as to the nature of law. Those writers who accept the theory of Austin and Bentham are naturally found to use the terms judge-made law and judicial legislation as terms meriting contempt, and indeed Bentham so characterizes the whole common law. On the other hand, those writers who take the opposite view and maintain that the origin of law is not command but custom, not only eliminate from consideration the idea of judicial legislation, but go so far as to limit the function of the legislature itself in the effort "to assist society in getting rid of its old customs and forming new ones." Recent supporters of this view are James C. Carter, Rep. Am. B. Assn. 1890, and Prof. Hammond, 1 Bla. Com., Hammond's ed. § 2. See also INTERNATIONAL LAW. The writer in the Harvard Law Review already cited discusses these conflicting views, giving preference to a third theory, intermediate between these two extremes, developed by Lawrence, Essay, Int. L., 2d ed. ch. I. The result is that, in what has been written on the subject of judicial legislation by the advocates of these various theories, there is less difference than is apparent on the surface, and that the process itself is recognized by all, though under different names. The importance of the subject is greatly enhanced in English law by the binding authority which is attributed to former decisions, and the reverence which is accorded to precedent. The conclusion reached is that judicial legislation is a necessary element in the development of the common law, but no precise rules can be laid down either as to the extent to which it should properly go, or how far a judge, in carrying on the process, may undertake to discard old doctrines and substitute new ones. Lord Esher, M. R., in a recent case attempted to distinguish between "fundamental propositions of law" which might be changed only by parliament, and the "evidence of the existence of such a proposition," which was within the disposition of the court; 25 Q. B. Div. 57; but as it is very properly remarked, there is no test suggested to enable a court to make this discrimination. "Even when a reform seems most plainly desirable, the conditions under which the judge works often make it preferable that the change should come from the legislature. One step by the court unless followed up can cause nothing but confusion; and the fact that the actual decision alone is binding makes it often doubtful how far a later court will continue the course upon which its predecessor has entered. Whether such a course should be begun depends on all the circumstances of the case. The only sure guides are common sense, and a knowledge of the law which is founded upon a knowledge of its history." 5 Harv. L. Rev. 201. See JUDICIAL POWER; DICTUM; JUDICIAL DECISIONS; PRECEDENTS.

JUDGE'S NOTES or MINUTES. Short statements, noted by a judge on the trial of a cause, of what transpires in the course of such trial.

They usually contain a statement of the testimony of witnesses, of documents offered or admitted in evidence, of offers of evidence, and whether it has been received or rejected, and the like matters.

In general, judge's notes are not evidence of what transpired at a former trial, nor can they be read to prove what a deceased witness swore to on such former trial; for they are not part of the record, and he is not officially bound to make them. But in chancery, when a new trial is ordered of an issue sent out of chancery to a court of law, and it is suggested that some of the witnesses in the former trial are of an advanced age, an order may be made that, in the event of death or inability to attend, their testimony may be read from the judge's notes; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 186.

JUDGMENT. In Practice. The conclusion of law upon facts found, or admitted by the parties, or upon their default in the course of the suit. Tidd, Pr. 980; 83 Md. 147; 143 Ill. 587. It may be on the main question, or on all of the questions, if there are several; 49 Ohio St. 364.

The decision or sentence of the law, given by the court of justice or other competent tribunal, as the result of proceedings instituted therein for the redress of an injury. 3 Bla. Com. 995; 12 Minn. 487. It is said to be the end of the law; 51 Pa. 373. It affects only parties and privies; 40 Minn. 281; 83 Ala. 171; 97 N. C. 112; 17 Or. 42; 139 U. S. 156.

The language of judgments, therefore, is not that "it is decreed," or "resolved," by the court; but "it is considered" (consideratum est per curiam) that the plaintiff recover his debt, damages, or possession, as the case may require, or that the defendant do go without day. This implies that the judgment is not so much the decision of the court, as the sentence of the law pronounced and decreed by the court, after due deliberation and inquiry.

Litigious contests present to the courts facts to appreciate, agreements to be construed, and points of law to be resolved. The judgment is the result of the full examination of all these.

DEFINITIONS. The various forms of judgment are designated by the following terms:

Judgment of assets in futuro, is one against an executor or heir, who holds at the time no property on which it can operate. See QUANDO ACCIDERINT.

Judgment of cassetur breve or billa (that the writ or bill be quashed) is a judgment rendered in favor of a party pleading in abatement to a writ or action. Steph. Pl., Andr. ed. § 97.

Judgment by confession is a judgment entered for the plaintiff in case the defendant, instead of entering a plea, confesses the action, or at any time before trial confesses the action and withdraws his plea and other allegations.

Contradictory judgment is a judgment which has been given after the parties have been heard; either in support of their claims or in their defence. 11 La. 366. It is used in Louisiana to distinguish such judgments from those rendered by default.

Judgment de melioribus damnis is a judgment entered at the election of the plaintiff for the highest amount where damages have been differently assessed against several defendants. See DE MELIORIBUS DAMNIS.

Judgment by default is a judgment rendered in consequence of the non-appearance of the defendant. The term is also applied to judgments entered under statutes or rules of court, for want of affidavit of defence, plea, answer, and the like, or for failure to take some required step in the cause.

Judgment in error is a judgment rendered by a court of error on a record sent up from an inferior court.

Final judgment is one which puts an end to a suit.

As to judgment in rem, inter partes, or in personam, see those titles.

Interlocutory judgment is one given in the progress of a cause upon some plea, proceeding, or default which is only intermediate and does not finally determine or complete the suit. 8 Bla. Com. 596.

Judgment on the merits is one rendered after argument and investigation, and when it is determined which party is in the right, as distinguished from a judgment rendered upon some preliminary or merely technical point, or by default, and without trial.

Judgment of nul tiel record or per billam is a judgment in favor of the defendant upon an issue raised upon a declaration or peremptory plea.

Judgment by nil dicit is one rendered against a defendant for want of a plea.

Judgment of nolle prosequi is a judgment entered against the plaintiff where after appearance and before judgment he says "he will not further prosecute his suit." Steph. Pl., Andr. ed. § 97.

Judgment of non obstante veredicto is a judgment rendered in favor of one party without regard to the verdict obtained by the other party.

Judgment of non pros. (non prosequitur) is one given against the plaintiff for a neglect to take any of those steps which it is incumbent on him to take in due time. See NON PROS.

Judgment of non suit, a judgment rendered against the plaintiff when he, on trial by jury, on being called or demanded, at the instance of the defendant, to be present while the jury give their verdict, fails to make an appearance. See NON-SUIT.

Judgment by non sum informatus is one which is rendered when, instead of entering a plea, the defendant's attorney says he is not informed of any answer to be given to the action. Steph. Pl., Andr. ed. § 97.

Judgment nunc pro tunc, is one entered on a day subsequent to the time at which it should have been entered, as of the latter date. See NUNC PRO TUNC.

Judgment pro retorno habendo is a judgment that the party have a return of the goods.

Judgment quando acciderint, is such a judgment against an executor or heir as binds only future assets. See QUANDO ACCIDERINT.

Judgment quod computet is a judgment in an action of account-render that the defendant do account.

Judgment quod partitio fiat is the interlocutory judgment in a writ of partition that partition be made.

Judgment quod partes replacent is a judgment for replacer. See REPLEADER.

Judgment quod recuperet is a judgment in favor of the plaintiff (that he do recover) rendered when he has prevailed upon an issue in fact or an issue in law other than one arising on a dilatory plea. Steph. Pl., Andr. ed. § 97.

Judgment of respondeat ouster is a judgment given against the defendant after he has failed to establish a dilatory plea upon which an issue in law has been raised.

Judgment of retraxit is one given against the plaintiff where, after appearance and before judgment, the plaintiff enters upon the record that he "withdraws his suit."

See these several titles where they are separately treated.

CLASSIFICATION. Judgments in civil causes, considered with respect to the method of obtaining them, may be thus classified.

1. When the result is obtained by the trial of an issue of fact. In this case the trial may involve questions both of law and fact, but the law is applied incidentally to the trial of the disputed facts, as in the admission or rejection of evidence, the conduct of the trial, and the instruction of the jury or, it may be, in the determination of the question whether the evidence is sufficient either in quality or quantity to be submitted to the jury. In these cases the law is admitted or applied to facts found by a jury or the court.

Judgments upon facts found are the following:

(1) Judgment of nul tiel record (q. v.) occurs when some pleading denies the existence of a record, and issue is joined thereon; the record being produced is compared by the court with the statement in the pleading which alleges it; and if they correspond, the party asserting its existence obtains judgment; if they do not correspond, the other party obtains judgment of nul tiel record.

(2) Judgment upon verdict (q. v.) is the most usual of the judgments upon facts found, and is for the party obtaining the verdict.

(3) Judgment non obstante veredicto is a judgment rendered in favor of the plaintiff notwithstanding the verdict for the defendant; this judgment is given upon motion (which can only be made by the plaintiff) when, upon an examination of the whole proceedings, it appears to the court that the defendant has shown himself to be in the wrong, and that the issue, though decided in his favor by the jury, is on a point which does not at all better his case; Smith, Act. 161. This is sometimes called a judgment upon confession, because it occurs after a pleading by defendant in confession and avoidance and issue joined thereon, and verdict found for defendant, and then it appears that the pleading was bad in law and might have been demurred to on that ground. The plea being substantially bad in law, of course the verdict which merely shows it to be true in point of fact, cannot avail to entitle the defendant to judgment; while, on the other hand, the plea being in confession and avoidance involves a confession of the plaintiff's declaration, and shows that he was entitled to maintain his action. Sometimes it may be expedient for the plaintiff to move for judgment non obstante veredicto, even though the verdict be in his favor; for, in a case like that described above, if he takes judgment as upon the verdict it seems that such judgment would be erroneous, and that the only safe course is to take it as upon confession; Cro. Eliz. 778; 2 Rolle, Abr. 99; 1 Bingham, N. C. 787. See, also, Cro. Eliz. 214; 6 Mod. 10; 8 Taunt. 413; Rastell, Ent. 622; 1 Wend. 307; 5 id. 513; 6 Cow. 225. See NON OBSTANTE VEREDICTO.

(4) A judgment of repleader is given when issue is joined on an immaterial point, or one on which the court cannot give a judgment which will determine the right. On the award of a repleader, the parties must recommence their pleadings at the point where the immaterial issue originated. See REPLEADER. This judgment is interlocutory, quod partes replacent. See Bacon, Abr. Pleas, 4 (M); 3 Hayw. 159.

2. When the facts are admitted by the parties, leaving only issues of law to be determined, which are as follows:

(1) Judgment upon a demurrer against the party demurring concludes him, because by demurring, a party admits the facts alleged in the pleadings of his adversary, and relies on their insufficiency in law. See DEMURRER.

(2) It sometimes happens that though the adverse parties are agreed as to the facts, and only differ as to the law arising out of them, still these facts do not so clearly appear on the pleadings as to enable them to obtain the opinion of the court by way of demurrer; for on demurrer the court can look at nothing whatever except the pleadings. In such circumstances the statute 3 & 4 Will. IV. c. 42, § 25, which has been imitated in most of the states, allows them after issue joined, and on obtaining the consent of a single judge, to state the facts in a special case for the opinion of the court, and agree that a judgment shall be entered for the plaintiff or defendant by confession or nolle prosequi immediately after the decision of the case; and judgment is entered accordingly, called judgment on a case stated.

(3) Sometimes at the trial the parties find that they agree on the facts, and the only question is one of law. In such case a verdict pro forma is taken, which is a species of admission by the parties, and is general, where the jury find for the plaintiff generally, but subject to the opinion of the court on a special case, or special, where they state the facts as they find them, concluding that the opinion of the court shall decide in whose favor the verdict shall be, and that they assess the damages accordingly. The judgments in these cases are called respectively, judgment on a general verdict subject to a special case, and judgment on a special verdict. See CASE STATED; POINT RESERVED; VERDICT.

3. Besides these, a judgment may be based upon the admissions or confessions of one only of the parties.

(a) Such judgments when for defendant upon the admissions of the plaintiff are:

(1) Judgment of nolle prosequi, where, after appearance and before judgment, the plaintiff says he "will not further prosecute his suit."

(2) Judgment of retrazit is one where, after appearance and before judgment, the plaintiff enters upon the record that he "withdraws his suit," whereupon judgment is rendered against him. The difference between these is that a retrazit is a bar to any future action for the same cause; while a nolle prosequi is not, unless made after judgment; 7 Bingham, 716; 1 Wms. Saund. 207, n.

(3) A plaintiff sometimes, when he finds he has misconceived his action, obtains leave from the court to discontinue, on which there is a judgment against him and he has to pay costs; but he may commence a new action for the same cause.

(4) A stet processus is entered where it is agreed by leave of the court that all further proceedings shall be stayed; though in form a judgment for the defendant, it is generally, like discontinuance, in point of fact for the benefit of the plaintiff, and entered on his application, as, for instance, when the defendant has become insolvent, it does not carry costs; Smith, Act. 162.

(b) Judgments for the plaintiff upon facts admitted by the defendant are:

(1) Judgment by cognovit actionem, cognovit or confession, where, instead of entering a plea, the defendant chooses to acknowledge the rightfulness of the plaintiff's action.

(2) Judgment by confession relata verificatione, where, after pleading and before trial, he both confesses the plaintiff's cause of action to be just and true and withdraws or abandons his plea or other allegations. Upon this, judgment is entered against him without proceeding to trial.

Analogous to this is the judgment confessed by warrant of attorney: this is an authority given by the debtor to an attorney named by the creditor, empowering him to confess judgment either by cognovit actionem, nil dicit, or non sum informatus. This differs from a cognovit in that an action must be commenced before a cognovit can be given; 3 Dowl. 278, per Parke, B.; but not before the execution of a warrant of attorney. Judgments by nil dicit and non sum informatus, though they are in fact founded upon a tacit acknowledgment on the part of the defendant that he has no defence to the plaintiff's action, yet as they are commonly reckoned among the judgments by default, will be explained under that head.

4. A judgment is rendered on the default of a party, on two grounds: it is considered that the failure of the party to proceed is an admission that he, if plaintiff, has no just cause of action, or, if defendant, has no good defence; and it is intended as a penalty for his neglect; for which reason, when such judgment is set aside or opened at the instance of the defaulting party, the court generally require him to pay costs.

(a) Such judgments against the defendant are:

(1) Judgment by default is against the defendant when he has failed to appear after being served with the writ; to plead, after being ruled so to do, or, in Pennsylvania and some other states, to file an affidavit of defence within the prescribed time; or, generally, to take any step in the cause incumbent on him. The practice of permitting judgment to be entered by default for want of a sufficient affidavit of defence, when the cause of action is a record, or is sworn to, has become practically universal. Under it courts usually refuse a judgment in cases in which motion on the affidavits raises a doubtful question. When such decisions can be reviewed, an order refusing judgment will rarely be reversed; 163 Pa. 688.

(2) Judgment by non sum informatus is a species of judgment by default, where, instead of entering a plea, the defendant's attorney says he is "not informed" of any answer to be given to the action.

(3) Judgment by nil dicit is rendered against the defendant where, after being ruled to plead, he neglects to do so within the time specified.

(b) Such judgments against the plaintiff are:

(1) Judgment of non pros. (from non prosequitur) is one given against the plaintiff for a neglect to take any of those steps which it is incumbent on him to take in due time.

A judgment by default is just as conclusive between the parties of whatever is essential to support it as one rendered after answer and contest; 157 U. S. 883.

(2) Judgment of non suit (from non sequitur, or ne suit pas) is where the plaintiff, after giving in his evidence, finds that it will not sustain his case, and therefore voluntarily makes default by absenting himself when he is called on to hear the verdict. The court give judgment against him for this default; but the proceeding is really for his benefit, because after a nonsuit he can institute another action for the same cause, which is not the case except in ejectment, in some states—after a verdict and judgment against him.

Judgments are further classified with reference to the stage of the cause at the time they are rendered.

1. Interlocutory judgments are such as are given in the middle of a cause upon some plea, proceeding, or default which is only intermediate, and does not finally determine or complete the suit. Any judgment leaving something to be done by the court, before the rights of the parties are determined, and not putting an end to the action in which it is entered, is interlocutory; Freeman, Judg. § 12; 3 Bla. Com. 396. A judgment which is not final is called "interlocutory"; that is, an interlocutory judgment is one which determines some preliminary or subordinate point or plea, or settles some step, question, or default arising in the progress of the cause, but does not adjudicate the ultimate rights of the parties, or finally put the case out of court. Thus, a judgment or order passed upon any provisional or accessory claim or contention is, in general, merely interlocutory, although it may finally dispose of that particular matter; 1 Black, Judgm. 21.

Such is a judgment for the plaintiff upon a plea in abatement, which merely decides that the cause must proceed and the defendant put in a better plea. But, in the ordinary sense, interlocutory judgments are those incomplete judgments whereby the right of the plaintiff is indeed established, but the quantum of damages sustained by him is not ascertained. This can only be the case where the plaintiff recovers; for judgment for the defendant is always complete as well as final. The interlocutory judgments of most common occurrence are where a demurrer has been determined for the plaintiff, or the defendant has made default, or has by cognovit actionem acknowledged the plaintiff's demand to be just. After interlocutory judgment in such case, the plaintiff must ordinarily take out a writ of inquiry, which is addressed to the sheriff, commanding him to summon a jury and assess the damages, and upon the return of the writ of inquiry final judgment may be entered for the amount ascertained by the jury. It is not always necessary to have a writ of inquiry upon interlocutory judgment; for it is said that "this is a mere inquest of office to inform the conscience of the court, who, if they please, may themselves assess the damages;" 3 Wils. 82, per Wilmut, C. J.; and accordingly, if the damages are matter of mere computation, as, for instance, interest upon a bill of exchange or promissory note, it is usual for the court to refer it to the master or prothonotary to ascertain what is due for principal, interest, and costs, whose report supersedes the necessity of a writ of inquiry; 4 Term 275; 1 H. Bl. 541; 4 Price 184. But in actions where a specific thing is sued for, as in actions of debt for a sum certain, the judgment upon demurrer, default, or confession is not interlocutory, but is absolutely complete and final in the first instance.

2. Final judgments are such as at once put an end to the action by determining the right and fixing the amount in dispute. Such are a judgment for defendant at any stage of the suit, a judgment for plaintiff after verdict, a judgment for a specific amount confessed upon warrant of attorney, and a judgment signed upon the return of a writ of inquiry, or upon the assessment of damages by the master or prothonotary. Judgment for plaintiff is final also in an action brought for a specific sum, as debt for a sum certain, although entered upon a demurrer or default, because here, the amount being ascertained at the outset, the only question at issue is that respecting the right, and when that is determined nothing remains to be done. The question what is a final judgment becomes material in many cases where as to such there is a right of review on error or appeal, but not as to interlocutory judgments, as under the constitution and laws of the United States the final judgment of a state court of last resort, in which there is a federal question, may be reviewed by the Supreme Court of the United States. The term final judgment has been variously defined. A judgment which puts an end to the action by declaring that the plaintiff has either entitled himself, or has not, to recover the remedy he sues for. 3 Bla. Com. 398. A judgment which determines a particular cause and terminates all litigation on the same right. 1 Kent, Com. 316. A judgment which cannot be appealed from, but is perfectly conclusive as to the matter adjudicated upon. 24 Pick. 300; 2 Pet. 294; 6 How. 201, 209. A judgment is final which completely settles the rights of the parties. 86 Ky. 381.

When by any direction of a supreme court of a state, an entire cause is determined, the decision, when reduced to form and entered in the records of the court, constitutes a final judgment, whatever may be its technical designation, and is subject to review in the supreme court of the United States; 93 U.S. 108; but when the state court remands a cause for further proceedings in the lower court it is not a final judgment; 91 U.S. 1; 124 id. 320; 130 id. 167; 144 id. 197; 146 id. 354.

3. When an issue in fact, or an issue in law arising on a peremptory plea, is determined for the plaintiff, the judgment is "that the plaintiff do recover," etc., which is called a judgment quod recuperet; Steph. Pl. 126; Comyn, Dig. Abatement (14, 1 15); 2 Archb. Pr. 3. When the issue in law arises on a dilatory plea, and is determined for the plaintiff, the judgment is only that the defendant "do answer over," called a judgment of respondent ouster. In an action of account, judgment for the plaintiff is that the defendant "do account," quod computet. Of these, the last two, quod computet and quod respondent ouster, are interlocutory only; the first, quod recuperet, is either final or interlocutory, according as the quantum of damages is or is not ascertained at the rendition of the judgment.

4. Judgment in error is either in affirmation of the former judgment; in recall of it for error in fact; in reversal of it for error in law; that the plaintiff be barred of his writ of error, where a plea of release of errors or of the statute of limitations is found for the defendant; or that there be a venire facias de novo, which is an award of a new trial; Smith, Act. 106. A venire facias de novo will always be awarded when the plaintiff's declaration contains a good cause of action, and judgment in his favor is reversed by the court of error; 24 Pa. 470. Frequently, however, when judgment is reversed, the court of error not merely overturns the decision of the court below, but will give such a judgment as the court below ought to have given; Smith, Act. 196.

NATURE OF THE OBLIGATION. The question whether a judgment is a contract is an old one very much discussed, and in some cases it was held to be such, chiefly upon the authority of Blackstone, who rested his opinion as to the propriety of this classification upon the doctrine of the social compact. The relations of a judgment to the idea of a contract or a quasi-contract have of late received much attention, in connection with the more careful investigation and accurate understanding of that class of obligations known as quasi-contracts. Blackstone said, "Upon showing the judgment, once obtained, still in full force and yet unsatisfied, the law immediately implies that, by the original contract of society, the defendant hath contracted a debt, and is bound to pay it;" 3 Bla. Com. 160. Of this expression it has been said, "This is certainly a very remarkable statement, and involves large assumptions in regard to 'an original contract of society' and its supposed binding force upon a judgment debtor of the nineteenth century;" Howe, Stud. Civ. L. 188. This early theory of an "original contract of society" has been long since abandoned, and after the time of Blackstone's Commentaries Lord Mansfield, in a carefully considered case, said, "A judgment is no contract, nor can it be considered in the light of a contract, as judicium redditur in invitum;" 3 Burr. 1545. The same view of the question was taken by the United States supreme court, which held that a judgment was not a "contract within the meaning of the constitutional prohibition against impairing the obligation of a contract;" 113 U.S. 452. That court has, in two other important cases, discussed the question of the nature of a judgment and the obligation which is created by it, and in both cases it strongly dissents from the view of Blackstone and the earlier text-writers. In Louisiana v. Mayor, 108 U.S. 285, 288, the court said: "A judgment for damages, estimated in money, is sometimes called, by text-writers, a specialty or contract of record, because it establishes a legal obligation to pay the amount recovered, and, by a fiction of law, a promise to pay is implied where such legal obligation exists. It is on this principle that an action ex contractu will lie upon a judgment. But this fiction cannot convert a transaction, wanting the assent of the parties, into one which necessarily implies it. Judgments for torts are usually the result of violent contests, and, as observed by the court below, are imposed on the losing party, by a higher authority, against his will and protest. The prohibition of the federal constitution was intended to secure the observance of good faith, in the stipulation of parties, against state action. Where a transaction is not based upon any assent of parties, it cannot be said that any faith is pledged with respect to it, and no case arises for the operation of the prohibition." In this case it was held that the conversion of a statutory right to demand compensation for damages caused by a mob into a judgment does not make it a contract within the constitutional prohibition against impairing the obligation of a contract. In the more recent case of Hilton v. Guyot, 159 U.S. 113, in referring to the doctrine of Blackstone, with reference to a foreign judgment, the court held that the idea that such judgment imposed or created an obligation or duty was a remnant of an ancient fiction, and "while the theory in question would serve to explain rules of pleading which originated while the fiction was believed in, it is hardly a sufficient guide at the present day in dealing with questions of international law; and it might be safer to adopt the maxim applied to foreign judgments by Chief Justice Weston, speaking for the supreme judicial court of Maine, judicium redditur in invitum, or as given by Lord Coke, in presumptione legis judicium redditur in invitum;" 15 Me. 167; Co. Lit. 248b." In New York it is held that a judgment is in no sense a contract or agreement; 1 Cow. 316; even a judgment founded upon a contract; 50 N. Y. 176; and the same doctrine is asserted with great vigor in a later case; 95 id. 428; this is also the prevailing doctrine in other states; 35 Cal. 155; 38 Ala. n. s. 706; 56 id.

56; 18 Me. 168; 87 N. C. 404; 15 Ohio St. 364; 2 S. C. n. s. 226; 8 G. Greene 489; (and see 80 Ia. 283); 17 Ill. 572; some cases are cited contra: 3 Gray 411; 19 Vt. 43; 4 Keyes 385; s. c. 4 Abb. N. Y. App. Cas. 382. The last case alone was relied on as the authority for the proposition that a judgment is a contract by Harlan, J., dissenting, in Louisiana v. Mayor, supra, but the case so relied upon is in a collection omitted from the regular reports and is in direct contradiction to cases cited supra, in which the opposing doctrine is emphatically stated by the same court, one decided four and the other sixteen years later. See also 9 Kan. 658. The most recent text books concur in supporting the statement already made as to the weight of authority. In one a judgment is said to be not under any circumstances a contract (1 Black, Judgt. § 10), and in another it is said that though a judgment is not a contract, it may be treated in some cases as a contract or as included in that term in certain statutes; 1 Freem. Judgt. § 4. Cases in which the contrary has been held will usually be found within this classification. See CONTRACT.

The civil law conception of the judgment is said to be correctly represented by the Louisiana case of Gustine v. Bank, 10 Rob. La. 412, in which it was held that "a judgment does not create, add to, nor detract from, the indebtedness of a party; it only declares it to exist, fixes its amount, and secures to the suitor the means of enforcing payment, and it is therefore necessary to look to the obligation upon which the judgment is based and ascertain whether it has arisen from contract or quasi-contract, from a delict or quasi-delict, or merely from the operation of law; the obligation is simply enforced and increased or diminished by the decree of the court. "It is declared to exist; it is interpreted; it is applied; it is put in the way of enforcement by the judicial power of the state;" Howe, Stud. Civ. L. 190.

In an interesting criticism upon the terminology adopted by Prof. Keener, in his work on quasi-contracts, a writer in the Harvard Law Review objects very seriously to the use of the term quasi-contract as an expression of the obligation of a judgment, which he says is "founded upon the mandate of the court, and depends for its validity upon the right of a court to adjudicate between contending parties;" 10 Harv. L. Rev. 213.

REQUISITES AND VALIDITY. To be valid, a judicial judgment must be given by a competent judge or court, at a time and place appointed by law, and in the form it requires. A judgment would be null if the judge had not jurisdiction of the matter, or, having such jurisdiction, he exercised it when there was no court held, or out of his district, or if he rendered a judgment before the cause was prepared for a hearing.

"The fact that one judge presided when the cause was heard and another when judgment was rendered, does not invalidate the judgment;" 65 N. W. Rep. (Ia.) 380.

The judgment must confine itself to the question raised before the court, and cannot extend beyond it. For example, where the plaintiff sues for an injury committed on his lands by animals owned and kept carelessly by defendant, the judgment may be for damages, but it cannot command the defendant for the future to keep his cattle out of the plaintiff's land. That would be to usurp the power of the legislature. A judgment declares the rights which belong to the citizen, the law alone rules future actions. The law commands all men, it is the same for all because it is general; judgments are particular decisions, which apply only to particular persons, and bind no others; they vary like the circumstances on which they are founded.

"The validity of a judgment is to be determined by the laws in force when it is rendered, and is not affected by subsequent changes therein;" 24 S. E. Rep. (Va.) 289. "A judgment is not void merely because it is not dated;" 65 N. W. Rep. (Ia.) 380. Courts should not render judgments which cannot be enforced by any process known to the law; 74 Cal. 490. "In an action at law the court cannot render a conditional judgment;" 2 Mo. App. 1191.

The jurisdiction of a foreign court over the person or the subject-matter embraced in the judgment or decree of such court is always open to inquiry, and in this respect a court of another state is to be regarded as a foreign court; 137 U. S. 387; and a judgment in a state court having jurisdiction of the subject-matter and the parties, is binding upon the parties thereto in a suit in another state between the same parties, where the subject-matter and the issues are the same as in the former suit; 147 U. S. 87.

OPERATION AND EFFECTS. The judgment of a court of general jurisdiction is presumed to have been rendered in the due exercise of that jurisdiction over person and subject-matter, unless the contrary be shown; 60 Ill. App. 309; and after twenty years the presumption of due notice to the parties becomes conclusive; 161 Ill. 76.

Final judgments are commonly said to conclude the parties; and this is true in general, but does not apply to judgments for defendant on non suit, as in case of non suit, by nolle prosequi, and the like, which are final judgments in one sense, because they put an end to all proceedings in the suit, but which nevertheless do not debar the plaintiff from instituting another suit for the same cause. With this qualification, the rule as to the effect of a judgment is as follows: The judgment of a court of concurrent jurisdiction directly upon the point is, as a plea, a bar, or, as evidence, conclusive, between the same parties upon the same matter directly in question in another court. The judgment of a court of exclusive jurisdiction directly upon the point is in like manner conclusive upon the same matter, between the same parties, coming incidentally in question in another court for a different purpose. But neither the judgment of a concurrent nor exclusive jurisdiction is evidence of any matter which came collaterally in question, though within their jurisdiction, nor of any matter incidentally cognizable, nor of any matter to be inferred by argument from the judgment. Duchess of Kingston's case, 20 Howell, St. Tr. 538; 2 Smith, L. C. 424; Harr. Cont. 285. See, also, 2 Gall. 229; 4 Watts 183. The rule above given relates to the effect of a judgment upon proceedings in another court; if the court is the same, of course the rule holds a fortiori. Moreover, all persons who are represented by the parties, and claim under them or in privity with them, are equally concluded by the proceedings. All privies whatever in estate, in blood, or in law, are, therefore, estopped from litigating that which is conclusive upon him with whom they are in privity; 1 Greenl. Ev. §§ 523, 536. A decree or judgment on a matter outside of the issue raised by the pleading is a nullity; 45 N. J. Eq. 77; and so is the judgment of a court which is without jurisdiction; 124 U. S. 200.

A further rule as to the conclusiveness of judgments is sometimes stated thus: "A judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction cannot be impeached or set aside in any collateral proceeding except on the ground of fraud." See, generally, 1 Greenl. Ev. pt. 3, ch. 5; 84 Ky. 14; 85 Tenn. 171; 24 Neb. 490; 97 Mo. 406; 130 U. S. 565; 101 Pa. 455. A judgment of a court having jurisdiction both of the subject-matter and the parties, however erroneous it may be, is a valid, binding, and conclusive judgment, as to the matter in controversy, upon the parties thereto and those claiming under them; 82 Ga. 168; 86 Ky. 614; 118 Ind. 845; 83 Va. 129; 29 W. Va. 794; 130 U. S. 503; 144 Id. 610; 146 Id. 279; 152 Id. 827.

This does not prevent a judgment from being attacked directly by writ of error or other proceeding in the nature of an appeal; and its validity may be impeached in other direct proceedings, as by motion to open or set it aside, and in contests between creditors in regard to the validity of their respective judgments; in this latter class of cases the court will sometimes award a feigned issue to try questions of fact affecting the validity of the judgment.

If the record of a judgment show that it was rendered without service of process or appearance of the defendant, or if that fact can be shown without contradicting the recitals of the record, it will be treated as void in any other state; 97 Mass. 588; 46 N. Y. 80; s. c. 7 Am. Rep. 299; 48 Ga. 50; s. c. 15 Am. Rep. 680. But this fact cannot be shown in contradiction of the recitals of the record; Rorer, Int. St. L. 128; 17 Vt. 802; 2 McLean 511; 65 Pa. 105; contra, 46 N. Y. 90; 24 Tex. 551; 18 Wall. 457. See Cooley, Const. Lim., 2d ed. 27. Nor will it be presumed to be void because of the absence of the return of service on the summons; 83 Va. 690. A judgment is not less conclusive because rendered by default; 122 U. S. 806; but a default judgment is void unless service has been had according to law; 7 Mont. 100, 288; 17 Or. 204; 31 W. Va. 364; and a money judgment against a non-resident defendant who is not personally served within the jurisdiction, and who does not voluntarily appear, is void; 78 Tex. 547; 70 Id. 588; 147 Mass. 536. In the leading case of Pennoyer v. Neff, it was held that a personal judgment is without any validity, if it be rendered by a state court in an action upon a money demand against a non-resident of the state, who was served by a publication of summons, but upon whom no personal service of process within the state was made and who did not appear; no title to property passes by a sale under an execution issued upon such a judgment; 95 U. S. 714.

Matters of defence arising since the judgment may be taken advantage of by a writ of audita querela, or, which is more usual, the court may afford summary relief on motion.

Although a judgment is vitiated by fraud it is not thereby rendered absolutely void; it is valid as between the parties to the fraud, and can be avoided only by a person injured by it; 1 Morr. (La.) 467; as where one holding a judgment against a railroad brought a suit to have another judgment, and a lease of the road to secure it, declared void for fraud, and obtained a decree accordingly, it was held, that the decree did not affect the validity of the judgment and the lease as between the parties thereto; 3 Wall. 704.

All the judgments, decrees, or other orders of courts, however conclusive in their character, are under the control of the court which pronounced them during the term at which they are rendered or entered of record, and may then be set aside, vacated, or modified by the court; 24 Neb. 808; 140 U. S. 25; but after the term has ended, unless proceedings to correct the errors alleged have been taken before its close, they can only be corrected by writ of error or appeal, as may be allowed in a court which by law can reverse the decision; 14 Cent. L. J. 250; 102 U. S. 107; 9 Wall. 103. To this rule there is an exception founded on the common-law writ of coram nobis, which brought before the court where the error was committed certain mistakes of fact not put in issue or passed upon by the court, such as the death of one of the parties when the judgment was rendered, coverture if a female party, infancy and failure to appoint a guardian, error in the process, or mistake of the clerk. But if the error was in the judgment itself, the writ did not lie. What was formerly done by this writ is now attained by motion and affidavits when necessary; 14 Cent. L. J. 253; 7 Pet. 147. See 128 Ill. 595; 86 Ky. 128. A judge has the power to amend a record at any time, so as to make it speak the truth; 100 N. C. 297; 84 Ala. 36.

A joint judgment which is void as to one of the parties is void as to all; 6 Mackey 548. A judgment against several persons, one of whom dies before its rendition, is voidable as to all; 129 Ill. 241. See RES JUDICATA.

MERGER. The question how far the cause of action is merged in a judgment sometimes becomes very material, as affecting the right to sue on the former in another jurisdiction. The general principle has been thus stated with respect to the operation of the judgment with both parties to it. "The judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction discharges the obligation which the action is brought to enforce. The judgment may operate either to merge the original obligation, in so far as judgment is rendered for the plaintiff; or to estop the plaintiff from subsequently setting up his original claim, in so far as judgment is rendered for the defendant." Harr. Cont. 295.

The effect of the merger of the cause of action is often very serious; one having a right of action against two or more persons may, by recovering judgment against one of them, lose his remedy against the others. As where the plaintiff, in an action upon a joint contract obligation elected to enter judgment against one defendant, in default of plea or answer, the judgment was held a bar to a subsequent action against the other, the debt being merged in the judgment; 67 N. W. Rep. (Minn.) 1015; 89 Hun 44; but the cause of action does not merge in a void judgment; 38 S. W. Rep. (Tenn.) 378.

Where the cause of action has arisen in a foreign country, the plaintiff has the option to sue on a judgment obtained there, or ignoring the judgment to proceed upon the original cause of action, in both cases subject to certain exceptions, as where the judgment is to enforce a penalty or for a tort on which there is no action here; 2 Curt. C. C. 559. This choice of remedy does not exist in the case of judgments in sister states; a cause of action in such case is merged and the remedy is confined to an action on the judgment; Freeman, Judgments § 241; 105 Mass. 504; 31 N. J. L. 317; 16 Pa. 241; contra, 2 Gratt. 532. The rule as stated is subject to the exception that there is no merger of the cause of action in the judgment unless the latter is general. Where the judgment was in a penal action, the action was held not to abate on the death of a party, because the judgment having been entered, the action thereafter had the attributes of a contract; 119 N. Y. 117.

It has been held that in an action of tort, the tort merges in the judgment, so as to allow an attachment as on the contract; 2 La. 535; although a tort cannot be set up as a counter-claim, the judgment upon it may, as constituting a contract; 4 Keyes 335; so it was held that a judgment so far extinguished the original debt that a set-off available in the suit on the debt by reason of a claim against an assignor of said debt was no longer available after judgment; 38 Ind. 429.

Although a contract could have been attacked as usurious, it was not so after judgment, and a mortgage given to secure the latter could not be objected to on account of the original usury; 12 Mass. 288.

The doctrine of the merger of the cause of action is not carried to such extreme as to defeat the equities or just rights of the defendant or plaintiff. Thus it has been held with some frequency that it can be shown against a judgment that the same was obtained upon a debt which was provable against defendant in proceedings in insolvency, and being so provable was barred by the discharge in insolvency, and as the discharge barred the debt, it barred the judgment resting on the debt; 3 N. Y. 216; 3 Barb. Ch. 360; 3 Barb. 429.

Where the defendant was sued in Massachusetts, in debt on a judgment, he pleaded a discharge under the New York insolvency law, and it was held that the court would look behind the judgment and see whether under the facts giving rise to it, it was so discharged; 12 Pick. 572; and, on the other hand, a judgment apparently discharged by insolvency proceedings, but found to be based on notes executed before the passage of the insolvent law was held not affected by the latter and enforceable; 1 Cow. 316; 3 Id. 147; so it was held that a judgment does not prevent a creditor from taking an attachment as a non-resident creditor: 3 Md. 457.

In this case the principle is very well stated thus: Though a judgment is to some purposes a merger of the original contract, and constitutes a new debt, yet when the essential rights of the parties are influenced by the nature of the original contract, the court will look into the judgment for the purpose of ascertaining what the original contract was.

The principle of the cases last cited has been frequently enunciated. In the case in 3 N. Y. 216, Hurlbert, J., said, that "a judgment, instead of being regarded strictly as a new debt, is sometimes held to be merely the old debt, in a new form, so as to prevent a technical merger from working injustice." In the case in 12 Pick. 572, Shaw, C. J., said: "Although a judgment, to some purposes, is considered as a merger of the former, and as constituting a new cause of action, yet when the essential rights of parties are influenced by the nature of the original contract, the court will look into the judgment for the purpose of ascertaining what the nature of such original cause of action was. Any other decision would carry the technical doctrine of merger to an inconvenient extent and cause it to work injustice."

FORM. The form of the judgment varies according to the nature of the action and the circumstances, such as default, verdict, etc., under which it is obtained. Anciently great particularity was required in the entries made upon the judgment roll; but now, even in the English practice, the drawing up the judgment roll is generally neglected, except in cases where it is absolutely necessary, as where it is desirable to give the proceedings in evidence on some future occasion; Smith, Act. 169. In this country the roll is rarely if ever drawn up, the simple entry on the trial list and docket, "judgment for plaintiff," or "judgment for defendant," being all that is generally considered necessary; and though the formal entries are in theory still required to constitute a complete record, yet if such record should subsequently be needed for any purpose, it may be made up after any length of time from the skeleton entries upon the docket and trial list. See 11 Pa. 399. When the record is thus drawn up in full, the ancient formalities must be observed, at least in a measure.

JUDGMENTS ON VERDICT. A judgment on a verdict virtually overrules all demurrers to the declaration; 37 W. Va. 645. The form of such verdicts varies according to the action and frequently also with the character in which a party sues or is sued.

In account, judgment for the plaintiff is interlocutory in the first instance, that the defendant do account, quod computet; 4 Wash. C. C. 84; 2 Watts 95; 1 Pa. 138.

In assumpsit, judgment for the plaintiff is that he recover the damages assessed by the jury, and full costs of suit; 1 Chitty, Pl. 100. Judgment for the defendant is that he recover his costs. For the form, see Tidd, Pr. Forms 165.

In case, trover, and trespass, the judgment is the same in substance, and differs but slightly in form from that of assumpsit; 1 Chitty, Pl. 100, 147.

A judgment in trover passes title to the goods in question; 53 Mo. App. 632; 16 So. Rep. (Ala.) 704; but only where the value of the thing converted is included in the judgment; 5 H. & N. 298; and it is held that an unsatisfied judgment does not pass the property; L. R. 6 C. P. 584; 3 Wall. 1, 16; 27 Pac. Rep. (N. M.) 377. In a somewhat analogous case it was held that a judgment for the value of horses lost to the owner by negligence of the defendant, of itself passes title to the horses to the defendant becoming liable for their value; 78 Tex. 298. But see 1 Rawle 121. Where personal property had been sold and partly paid for, title being retained by the vendor, and he recovered in trover both the property and instalments due, on appeal it was directed that the judgment be discharged on payment within a time limited of purchase money, interest, and cost, otherwise the original judgment below to stand of full force; 87 Ga. 280.

In covenant, judgment for the plaintiff is that he recover the amount of his damages as found which he has sustained by reason of the breach or breaches of the defendant's covenant, together with costs of suit; 1 Chitty, Pl. 116. Judgment for defendant is for costs.

In debt, judgment for the plaintiff is that he recover his debt, and in general nominal damages for the detention thereof; and in cases under the 8th & 9th Will. III. c. 11, for successive breaches of a bond conditioned for the performance of a covenant, it is also awarded that he have execution for such damages, and likewise full costs of suit; 1 Chitty, Pl. 108. But in some penal and other actions the plaintiff does not always recover costs; Esp. Pen. Act. 154; Hull, Costs 200; Bull. N. P. 383; 5 Johns. 251. Judgment for defendant is generally for costs; but in certain penal actions neither party can recover costs; 5 Johns. 251. See the form, Tidd, Pr. Forms 176.

In detinue, judgment for the plaintiff is in the alternative that he recover the goods or the value thereof if he cannot have the goods themselves, with damages for the detention, and costs; 1 Chitty, Pl. 121, 122; 1 Dall. 458. See the form, Tidd, Pr. Forms 187.

If judgment in any of the above personal actions is against the defendant in the character of executor, it confines the liability of the defendant for the debt or damages to the amount of assets of the testator in his hands, but leaves him personally liable for costs. See the form, Tidd, Pr. Forms 168. If the executor defendant has pleaded plene administravit, judgment against him confines his liability to such amount of the assets as shall hereafter come to his hands. See the form, Tidd, Pr. Forms 174. A general judgment for costs against an administrator plaintiff is against the estate only.

A judgment against an executor or heir where the plea is false, to the defendant's own knowledge, may be a general judgment as if the recovery was for his own debt, but in other cases a judgment against an executor is generally special, to be levied of the goods or land of his testator; 7 Taunt. 580; 5 id. 554.

A judgment on a covenant of a married woman against her separate estate may be entered as a personal judgment against her; 20 S. E. Rep. (W. Va.) 917; such judgment must be entered in a special form; 14 Ch. D. 837; but the record need show no special fact fixing her liability; 2 Pa. Dist. R. 690.

In dower, judgment for demandant is interlocutory in the first instance with the award of a writ of habere facias seisinam, and inquiry of damages, on the return of which final judgment is rendered for the value of the land detained, as ascertained by the jury, from the death of the husband to the suing out of the inquisition, and costs of suit. See the form, 8 Chitty, Pl. 483.

In ejectment, judgment for plaintiff is final in the first instance, that he recover the term, together with the damages assessed by the jury, and the costs of suit, with award of the writ of habere facias possessionem, directing the sheriff to put him in possession. See the form, 8 Bla. Com. App. xii.; Tidd, Pr. Forms 188. A judgment in ejectment is conclusive as to title between the parties thereto, unless the jury find for the plaintiff less than the fee; 78 Ga. 142. A consent verdict in ejectment is conclusive on the parties and their privies; 78 Ga. 142.

In partition, judgment for plaintiff is also interlocutory in the first instance; quod partitio fiat with award of the writ de partitione facienda, on the return of which final judgment is rendered,—"therefore it is considered that the partition aforesaid be held firm and effectual forever," quod partitio facta firma et stabilis in perpetuum teneatur; Co. Litt. 169. See the form, 2 Sell. Pr. 319, 2d ed. 222.

In replevin. If the replevin is in the deti- nuit, i. e. where the plaintiff declares that the chattels "were detained until replevied by the sheriff," judgment for plaintiff is that he recover the damages assessed by the jury for the taking and unjust detention, or for the detention only where the taking was justifiable, and also his costs; 5 S. & R. 133; Hamm. N. P. 488. If the replevin is in the detinet, i. e. where the plaintiff declares that the chattels taken are "yet detained," the jury in giving a verdict for plaintiff find, in addition to the above, the value of the chattels each separately; for the defendant will perhaps restore some, in which case the plaintiff is to recover the value of the remainder; Hamm. N. P. 489; Fitzh. N. B. 159 b; 5 S. & R. 130.

If the replevin be abated, the judgment is that the writ or plaint abate, and that the defendant, having avowed, have a return of the chattels.

If the plaintiff is unsuited, the judgment for defendant, at common law, is that the chattels be restored to him, and that without his first assigning the object of the taking, because by abandoning his suit the plaintiff admits that he had no right to dispossess the defendant by prosecuting the replevin. The form of this judgment is simply "to have a return," pro retorno habendo, without adding the words "to hold irreplevisable," Hamm. N. P. 490. For the form of judgments of unsuit under the statutes 21 Hen. VIII. c. 19, and 17 Car. II. c. 7, see Hamm. N. P. 490; 2 Chitty, Pl. 161; 8 Wentw. Pl. 116; 5 S. & R. 132; 1 Saund. 195, n. 3; 2 id. 286, n. 5. In these cases the defendant has the option of taking his judgment pro retorno habendo at common law; 5 S. & R. 132; 1 Lev. 235; 3 Term 349.

When the avowant succeeds upon the merits, the common-law judgment is that he "have return irreplevisable;" for it is apparent that he is by law entitled to keep possession of the goods; 5 S. & R. 145; Hamm. N. P. 493; 1 Chitty, Pl. 162. For the form of judgment in such case under the statutes last mentioned, see Hamm. N. P. 494.

AFTER VERDICT. The general form of judgment for plaintiff in actions on contracts sounding in damages, and in actions founded on torts unaccompanied with violence, is this: "Therefore it is considered that the said A B do recover against the said C D his damages aforesaid, and also — for his said costs and charges, by the court now here adjudged of increase to the said A B, with his assent; which said damages, costs, and charges in the whole amount to —." And the said C D in mercy, etc." In debt for a sum certain, the general form is "— that the said A B do recover against the said C D his said debt, and also — for his damages which he has sustained, as well on occasion of detaining the said debt as for his costs and charges by him about his suit in this behalf expended, by the court now here adjudged to the said A B, and with his assent. And the said C D in mercy, etc." In actions founded on torts accompanied with violence, the form of judgments for plaintiff is, "— that the said A B do recover against the said C D his damages aforesaid, and also — for his said costs and charges by the court now here adjudged of increase to the said A B, and with his consent; which said damages, costs, and charges in the whole amount to —." And let the said C D be taken, etc."

Final judgment for the defendant is in these words: "Therefore it is considered that the said A B take nothing by his writ but that he be in mercy, etc. (or that he and his pledges to prosecute be in mercy, etc.), and that the said C D do go thereof without day, etc." And it is further considered —. Then follows the award of costs and of execution therefor. See Tidd, Pr. Forms 189.

This is the general form of judgment for defendant, whether it arise upon interlocutory proceedings or upon verdict, and whatever be the form of action. This is sometimes called judgment of nul capit per breve or per billam; Steph. Pl., Andr.

ed. § 97.

The words "and the said — in mercy, etc., or, as expressed in Latin, quod sit in misericordia pro falso clamore suo, were formerly an operative part of the judgment, it being an invariable rule of the common law that the party who lost his cause was punished by amercement for having unjustly asserted or resisted the claim. And on this account pledges of prosecution were required of the plaintiff before the return of the original, who were real and responsible persons and liable for these amercements. But afterwards the amercements ceased to be exacted, — perhaps because the payment of costs took their place, — and, this portion of the judgment becoming mere matter of form, the pledges returned were the fictitious names John Doe and Richard Roe. Bacon, Abr. Fines, etc. (C 1); 1 Ld. Raym. 273.

The words "and let the said — be taken," in Latin, captatur pro fine, which occur above in the form of judgment in actions founded on torts accompanied with violence, were operative at common law, because formerly a defendant adjudged to have committed a civil injury with actual violence was obliged to pay a fine to the king for the breach of the peace implied in the act, and was liable to be arrested and imprisoned till the fine was paid. This was abolished by stat. 5 W. & M. c. 12; but the form was still retained in entering judgment against defendant in such actions. See Gould, Pl. §§ 38, 82; Bacon, Abr. Fines, etc. (C 1); 1 Ld. Raym. 273 Style 346.

These are called, respectively, judgments of misericordia and of captatur.

JUDGMENTS IN OTHER CASES. On a plea in abatement, either party may demur to the pleading of his adversary or they may join issue.

On demurrer, judgment for the plaintiff is that the defendant have another day to plead in chief, or, as it is commonly expressed, that he answer over; quod respondet ouster; and judgment for defendant is that the writ be quashed; quod cassetur billa or breve. But if issue be joined, judgment for plaintiff is quod recuperet, that he recover his debt or damages, and not quod respondet; judgment for defendant is the same as in the case of demurrer, that the writ be quashed. But the plaintiff may admit the validity of the plea in abatement, and may himself pray that his bill or writ may be quashed, quod cassetur billa or breve, in order that he may afterwards sue or exhibit a better one: Steph. Pl. And. ed. § 97; Lawes, Civ. Pl. See the form, Tidd, Pr. Forms 193. Judgment on demurrer in other cases, when for the plaintiff, is interlocutory in assumpsit and actions sounding in damages, and recites that the pleading to which exception was taken by defendant appears sufficient in law, and that the plaintiff ought, therefore, to recover; but the amount of damages being unknown, a court of inquiry is awarded to ascertain them. See the form, Tidd, Pr. Forms 181. In debt it is final in the first instance. See the form, id. p. 181. Judgment on demurrer when for the defendant is always final in the first instance, and is for costs only. See the form, id. 193.

Judgment by default, whether by nihil dicit or non sum informatus, is in these words, in assumpsit or other actions for damages, after stating the default: "wherefore the said A B ought to recover against the said C D his damages on occasion of the premises; but because it is unknown to the court, etc., now hear what damages the said A B hath sustained by means of the premises, the sheriff is commanded, etc." Then follows the award of the writ of inquiry, on the return of which final judgment is signed. See the forms, Tidd, Pr. Forms 165. In debt for a sum certain, as on a bond for the payment of a sum of money, the judgment on default is final in the first instance, no writ of inquiry being necessary. See the form, id.

Plaintiff cannot take a default where there is no declaration on file; 55 Ill. App. 350; and a default cannot be entered after defendant has interposed a plea in bar; 14 So. Rep. (Ala.) 680; but the mere filing of an answer will not prevent a judgment by default, there must also be a subsequent appearance by defendant to protect his rights; 4 Tex. Civ. App. 490.

It is error to enter judgment by default while a plea to part and a demurrer to the rest of the declaration are on file; 50 Ill. App. 131; but the rendition of a judgment by default, where the petition states the facts sufficient to maintain the cause of action, is within the discretion of the trial judge; 8 Ohio, Dec. 87; and so is the opening of a judgment by default; 89 Pac. Rep. (Okl.) 231; 61 N. W. Rep. (Minn.) 824; 17 Misc. Rep. 389; where an answer failed to reach the court in time through the fault of the postmaster, it was held that a default should be set aside; 55 Ill. App. 668.

Judgment by cognovit actionem is for the amount admitted to be due, with costs, as on a verdict. See the form, id. 176. In Pennsylvania by statute, the plaintiff may take judgment for an amount admitted to be due and proceed to trial for the remainder of his claim.

Judgment of non pros. or non suit is final, and is for defendant's costs only, which is also the case with judgment on a discontinuance or nolle prosequi. See id. 189.

MATTERS OF PRACTICE. Of docketing the judgment. By the stat. 4 & 5 W. & M. c. 20, all final judgments are required to be regularly docketed; that is, an abstract of the judgment is to be entered in a book called the judgment-docket; 3 Bla. Com. 398. And in these states the same regulation prevails. See 37 Minn. 533. Besides this, an index is required to be kept in England of judgments confessed upon warrant of attorney, and of certain other sorts of judgments; 8 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 396, n. In most of the states this index is required to include all judgments. The effect of docketing the judgment is to notify all interested persons, including purchasers or incumbrancers of land upon which the judgment is a lien, and subsequent judgment creditors, of the existence and amount of the judgment. Freeman, Judg. § 843. Judgments only become liens from the time they are rendered, or notice thereof is filed in the register's office of the county where the property is situated; 183 U. S. 684. In Pennsylvania, the judgment index is for this purpose conclusive evidence of the amount of a judgment in favor of a purchaser of the land bound thereby, but not against him: if the amount indexed is less than the actual amount, the purchaser is not bound to go beyond the index; but if the amount indexed is too large, he may resort to the judgment-docket to correct the mistake; 1 Pa. 408. A failure to index the abstract of a judgment is fatal to the lien; 70 Tex. 434, 458; 77 Ia. 831.

Now, in England, judgments, in order to affect purchasers, mortgagees, and creditors, must be registered in the common pleas, and renewed every five years. See 2 & 3 Vict. c. 11, s. 6.

Of the time of entering the judgment. After verdict a brief interval is allowed to elapse before signing judgment, in order to give the defeated party an opportunity to apply for a new trial, or to move in arrest of judgment, if he is so disposed. This interval, in England, is four days; Smith, Actions 150. In this country it is generally short; but, being regulated either by statute or by rules of court, it of course may vary in the different states, and even in different courts of the same state.

See ARREST OF JUDGMENT; ASSUMPSIT; ATTACHMENT; CONFLICT OF LAWS; COVENANT; DEBT; DETINUE; EJECTMENT; CASE; DOWER; FOREIGN JUDGMENT; LIEN; REPLEVIN; TRESPASS; TROVER. See Freeman; Black, Judgments.

JUDGMENT. The judgment or decree is not the decision, but follows, and is based upon the verdict of the jury or the decision of the court. 131 Ind. 573-4. See DECISION; IN PERSONAM; JUDGMENT INTER PARTES; JUDGMENT IN REM; MONEY JUDGMENT; VERDICT.

A judgment rendered in personam against a defendant without jurisdiction of his person is not only erroneous but void, and is not to be enforced in other States under full faith and credit clause of the Constitution or the act of Congress passed in aid thereof, § 905, Rev. Stat. 205 U. S. 141.

Conformity to Verdict. A judgment "must follow and conform to the verdict" not only as to the amount of the recovery, but also as to the nature and measure of relief and as to the parties; and, it cannot go beyond the verdict in settling the rights of the parties or admeasuring the recovery, or declaring or foreclosing liens, except that in cases where the evidence would have authorized the court to direct a verdict in adjusting the equities of the parties. 163 Ky. 385, 173 S. W. 1122.

JUDGMENT BOOK. A book which is required to be kept by a clerk among the records of the court, for the entry of judgments. Code N. Y. § 279.

JUDGMENT CREDITOR. See CREDITOR, JUDGMENT.

JUDGMENT DEBT. See DEBT.

JUDGMENT INTER PARTES OR IN PERSONAM. One which operates only upon those who have been duly made parties to the record and their privies, being against a person merely, and not settling the status of any person or thing. See 3 Sm. L. Cas., 9th Am. ed. 2016; JUDGMENT; JUDGMENT IN REM.

A judgment in personam is more accurately called a judgment inter partes for an adjudication upon the status of a particular person is as much a judgment in rem as an adjudication on the status of a thing. (2 Sm. Lead. Cas. 784 et seq.) In an ordinary action (contract or tort, where a judgment given against A. cannot be binding on B. unless he or some one under whom he claims was party to it. Id. 788; R. & L. Dict. See JUDGMENT IN REM; IN REM; IN PERSONAM.

JUDGMENT FOR MONEY. A "judgment for money," is not stricti juris, a contract; but it imposes a civil liability, and is even more conclusive evidence of a debt than any contract by specialty can be. 4 Dana (Ky.) 578.

JUDGMENT NISI. A judgment entered on the return of the nisi prius record with the postea indorsed, which will become absolute according to the terms of the "postea" unless the court out of which the nisi prius record proceeded shall, within the first four days of the following term, otherwise order.

Under the compulsory arbitration law of Pennsylvania, on filing the award of the arbitrators, judgment nisi is to be entered, which judgment is to be valid as if it had been rendered on a verdict of a jury, unless an appeal is entered within the time required by law.

JUDGMENT NOTE. A promissory note given in the usual form, and containing, in addition, a power of attorney to appear and confess judgment for the sum therein named. On this account it is not negotiable; 77 Pa. 131; but see 19 Ohio 130.

It usually contains a number of stipulations as to the time of confessing the judgment; 11 Ill. 623; against appeal and other remedies for setting the judgment aside; see 9 Johns. 80; 20 id. 296; 2 Cowp. 405; 2 Pa. 501; 15 Ill. 856; an attorney's commission for collection, waiver of exemption, and other conditions.

JUDGMENT PAPER. In English Practice. An incipitur of the pleadings, written on plain paper, upon which the master will sign judgment. 1 Archb. Pr. 229, 306, 343.

JUDGMENT INTER PARTES. See JUDGMENT IN REM.

JUDGMENT IN PERSONAM. See JUDGMENT INTER PARTES; IN PERSONAM.

JUDGMENT RECORD. In English Practice. A parchment roll on which are transcribed the whole proceedings in the cause, deposited and filed of record in the treasury of the court, after signing of judgment. 8 Steph. Com., 11th ed. 601. See JUDGMENT ROLL. In American practice, the record is signed, filed, and docketed by the clerk, all of which is necessary to bring out execution; Graham, Pr. 341.

JUDGMENT RECOVERED. A plea by a defendant that the plaintiff has already recovered that which he seeks to obtain by his action. This was formerly a species of snare plea, often put in for the purpose of delaying a plaintiff's action. M. & W.

JUDGMENT IN REM. An adjudication pronounced upon the status of some particular subject-matter by a tribunal having competent authority for that purpose. 8 Sm. L. Cas., 9th Am. ed. 2015.

An adjudication against some person or thing, or upon the status of some subject-matter; which, wherever and whenever binding upon any person, is equally binding upon all persons. 10 Mo. App. 78.

The universal effect of a judgment in rem depends upon the principle that it is a solemn declaration, proceeding from an accredited quarter, concerning the status of the thing adjudicated upon; which very declaration operates accordingly upon the status of the thing adjudicated upon, and ipso facto, renders it such as it is thereby declared to be; 3 Sm. L. Cas., 9th Am. ed. 2015-16, 2032, 2043.

The most frequent cases of such judgment are found in the courts exercising jurisdiction of cases in admiralty. So also a foreign court in a case of divorce which is recognized as establishing the status of a person is a judgment in rem.

In the leading case of Pennoy v. Neff, the United States supreme court said: "It is true that, in a strict sense, a proceeding in rem is one taken directly against property, and has for its object the disposition of property, without reference to the title of individual claimants; but, in a larger and more general sense, the terms are applied to actions between parties, where the direct object is to reach and dispose of property owned by them, or of some interest therein. Such are cases commenced by attachment against the property of debtors, or instituted to partition real estate, foreclose a mortgage, or enforce a lien. So far as they affect property in this state, they are substantially proceedings in rem in the broader sense which we have mentioned." 95 U. S. 734. A judgment against a railway company in favor of an assignee of claims for labor performed for a subcontractor, which forecloses a statutory lien on the property of the company for debt, and orders a sale of the property, cannot be construed as a judgment in personam; 12 Am. & Eng. R. Cas. 258; 59 Tex. 587. See IN REM.

Thus, a court of admiralty having in certain cases a right to condemn ships and goods, its judgment is conclusive against all the world that the property so condemned was liable to seizure. (2 Sm. Lead. Cas. 785.) So, in England, a declaration of legitimacy, and (it would seem) a judgment of outlawry, are in effect judgments in rem. A judgment of divorce pronounced by a foreign court is in certain cases recognized by our courts, and is then a judgment in rem. Id. 784; R. & L. Dict. See JUDGMENT INTER PARTES; IN PERSONAM.

JUDGMENT ROLL. In English Law. A record made of the issue roll (which see), which, after final judgment has been given in the cause, assumes this name. Steph. Pl., Andr. ed. § 97; 3 Chitty, Stat. 514; Freem. Judg. § 75. The Judicature Act of 1875 requires every judgment to be entered in a book by the proper officer.

JUDICARE. To judge; to decide or determine judicially; to give judgment or sentence.

JUDICATIO. In Civil Law. Judging; the pronouncing of sentence; after hearing a cause. Halifax, Civil Law b. 8, c. 8, no. 7.

JUDICATORES TERRARUM. Certain tenants in Chester, who were bound by their tenures to perform judicial functions. In case of an erroneous judgment being given by them, the party aggrieved might obtain a writ of error out of Chancery, directing them to reform it. They then had a month to consider of the matter. If they declined to reform their judgment, the matter came on writ of error before the king's bench; and if the court of king's bench held the judgment to be erroneous they forfeited £100 to the king by the custom. Jenk. Cent. (ii. 34), p. 71.

JUDICATORIES. There are in the Presbyterian system of ecclesiastical government, in regular succession, the presbytery over the session or local church, the synod over the presbytery, and the General Assembly over all. These are called, in the language of the church organs, "judicatories," and they entertain appeals from the decisions of those below, and prescribe corrective measures in other cases. 13 Wall (U. S.) 727.

JUDICATURE. The state of those employed in the administration of justice; and in this sense it is nearly synonymous with judiciary. This term is also used to signify a tribunal; and sometimes it is employed to show the extent of jurisdiction: as, the judicature is upon writs of error, etc. Comyn, Dig. Parliament (L 1). And see Comyn, Dig. Courts (A).

JUDICATURE ACTS. The English acts under which the present system of courts was organized and is continued.

The statutes of 36 & 37 Vict. c. 66, and 38 & 39 Vict. c. 77, which went into force Nov. 1, 1875, with amendments in 1877, 40 & 41 Vict. c. 9, 1879, 42 & 43 Vict. c. 78, and 1881, 44 & 45 Vict. c. 32, made most important changes in the organization of, and methods of procedure in, the superior courts of England, consolidating them together so as to constitute one Supreme Court of Judicature, consisting of two divisions: Her Majesty's High Court of Justice, having chiefly original jurisdiction, and Her Majesty's Court of Appeal, whose jurisdiction is chiefly appellate. To the former was transferred the jurisdiction of the courts of chancery (both at common law and equity), queen's bench, common pleas (at Westminster, Lancaster, and Durham), exchequer (a court of revenue as well as a common-law court), admiralty, probate, divorce, and the assize court, with certain exceptions, of which the most important is the appellate jurisdiction of the court of appeal in chancery. The London court of bankruptcy was included in this list by the act of 1878, but excluded by that of 1879. To Her Majesty's Court of Appeal is transferred the jurisdiction exercised by the lord chancellor and lords justices of the court of appeal in chancery, the court of exchequer chamber, the judicial committee of the privy council on appeal from the high court of admiralty, or from any order in lunacy made by the lord chancellor, or any other person having jurisdiction in lunacy. This was the transfer, by 14 & 15 Vict. c. 33, of the appellate jurisdiction, theretofore exercised by the lord chancellor, to the court of appeal, consisting of the lord chancellor and two lords justices, with an appeal from the master of the house of lords retaining for all practical purposes here, its powers and functions to hear appeals from Her Majesty's Court of Appeal in England, and from the courts of Scotland and Ireland. (See JUDICIAL COMMITTEE OF THE PRIVY COUNCIL.) Her Majesty's Court of Appeal practically takes the place of the exchequer chamber in appeals in common-law actions, and also hears appeals in chancery, previously heard by the chancellor or by the court of appeal in chancery, in the exercise of its appellate jurisdiction, and of the same court as a court of appeal in bankruptcy. It consists of five ex officio judges, viz., the lord chancellor as president, the lord chief justice of England, the master of the rolls, the president for the time being of the probate, divorce, and admiralty division of the High Court of Justice, and five ordinary judges of the court of appeal, to be styled, by the act of 40 & 41 Vict. c. 9, lords justices of appeal, the first three of whom are to be made by the transfer of three judges from the High Court of Justice.

The High Court of Justice originally consisted of five divisions as follows: 1. The chancery division consisted of the lord chancellor, the master of the rolls (but by the act of 44 & 45 Vict. c. 66, the master of the rolls ceases to belong to the high court, and provision is made for a judge in his place, who shall be in the same position as a puisne judge under the acts of 1873 and 1875), and such of the vice chancery lords of the court of chancery as shall not be appointed ordinary judges of the court of appeal. The Judicature Act of 1877, 40 & 41 Vict. c. 9, provides for the appointment of a new judge, to be attached to the chancery division, and entitles the puisne judges, justices of the high court. The lord chancellor is not to be deemed a permanent judge of the High Court of Justice.

2. The queen's bench division, consisting of the lord chief justice of England, and such other of the judges of the court of queen's bench as shall not be appointed ordinary judges of the Court of Appeal.

3. The common pleas division, consisting of the lord chief justice of the common pleas, and such other judges of the court of common pleas as shall not be appointed ordinary judges of the Court of Appeal.

4. The exchequer division, consisting of the lord chief baron of the exchequer, and certain other barons of the court of exchequer.

5. The probate, divorce, and admiralty division, consisting of two judges, one of whom shall be the judge of the court of probate and of the court for divorce and matrimonial causes, and the judge of the high court of admiralty.

Crown cases reserved were decided by the judges of the High Court of Justice, or at least five of them, of whom the lord chief justice of England, and the lord chief justice of the common pleas, and the lord chief baron of the exchequer, or one of them, should sit. Their determination was final, save for some error or lapse upon the record, as to which no question should have been raised after their decision, under 11 & 12 Vict. c. 78.

By an Order in Council of Dec. 10, 1880, the offices of lord chief baron of the exchequer and lord chief justice of the common pleas were abolished, and the common pleas and exchequer divisions were merged in the queen's bench division, so that the judges of the other two divisions were attached to the court, therefore now consists of three divisions only, chancery, queen's bench, and probate, divorce, and admiralty.

Any judge of any of the above divisions may be transferred by Her Majesty from one to another of the said divisions. Divisional courts of the high courts of justice may be held for the transaction of special business, consisting usually of two judges.

The reports of the adjudicated cases were, under the first division of the court, arranged thus:—
1. Cases decided by the court, by the house of lords and privy council, cited as App. Cas. They are reported with the cases of the division from which the appeal was taken, and are indicated as, "In the court of appeal," or "C. A.," chancery division, cited as Ch. Div.; common pleas division, cited as C. P. Div.; exchequer division, cited as Ex. Div.

Probate division. Cases decided by the probate, divorce, and admiralty divisions, cited as P. Div. Queen's bench division, cited as Q. B. Div.

There are now four series: Appeal cases, Chancery, Queen's Bench, Probate. In citing cases since January 1, 1881, the year of the report precedes the reference to the court, as, (1881) 1 Q. B. 479; (1884) 2 Ch. 302, and a new series of volumes is begun each year.

These acts provide for a concurrent administration of legal and equitable remedies, according to seven rules, which substantially provide that any one of the courts, including the court of appeal, shall give the same equitable relief to any plaintiff or defendant claiming it as would formerly have been granted by chancery; equitable relief will be granted against third persons, not parties, who shall be brought in by notice; all equitable estates, titles, rights, duties, and liabilities, will be taken notice of in chancery; no proceeding shall be restrained by injunction, but every matter of equity on which an injunction might formerly have been obtained may be relied on by way of defence, and the courts may in any cause direct a stay of proceedings. Substantially these and certain other provisions of the act, effect shall be given to all legal claims and demands, and all estates, titles, rights, duties, obligations, and liabilities, existing by the common law, custom, or statute, as before the acts; the new courts shall grant, either absolutely or on terms, all such legal or equitable remedies as the parties may appear entitled to; so that all matters may be completely and finally determined, and multiplicity of legal proceedings avoided.

Eleven new rules of law are established, which will be found in the act of 1873, c. 66, § 25, amended by the act of 1879, c. 77, § 10, of the following nature: 1. In the administration of estates, the same rules shall prevail as may be in force under the law of bankruptcy; 2. No claim of a cestui que trust against his trustee, for property held on an express trust, shall be barred by any statute of limitation; 3. A tenant for life shall have no right to commit equitable waste, unless such right is expressly conferred by the instrument creating the estate; 4. There shall be no merger by operation of law only, of any estate, the beneficial interest in which would not be deemed merged in equity; 5. A mortgagee entitled for the time being to the possession of the profits of land, as to which the mortgagee shall have given no notice of his intention to take possession, may sue for such possession, or for the recovery of such profits, or to prevent or restrain the mortgagor in respect of the same, or for any wrong relative thereto, in his own name only, unless the cause of action arises upon a lease or other contract made jointly with any other person; 6. Any absolute assignment of a chose in action, of which express notice in writing shall have been given to the assignee, shall pass the legal right thereto from the date of notice, and all remedies for the same, and the power to give a good discharge; provided, that if the debtor, etc., shall have had notice of any conflicting claims to such chose in action, or if the assignee shall have been given notice of the same, or if the assignee shall have been deemed of the essence of the contract in equity, shall receive the same construction as formerly in equity; 8. A mandamus or an injunction may be granted, or a receiver appointed by an interlocutory order, which may be made either unconditionally or on terms; and an injunction may be granted to prevent the waste or trespass, or to restrain proceedings at law, or to restrain the exercise of legal or equitable, or whether the person against whom the injunction is sought is or is not in possession under any claim of title, or does or does not claim a right to do the act sought to be restrained under claim of title; 9. In proceedings arising from collisions at sea, where both ships are in fault, the rules hitherto in force in the court of admiralty shall prevail; 10. In questions relating to the custody of infants, the rules of equity shall prevail; 11. Generally, in all matters in which there is any conflict between the rules of common law and the rules of equity, the latter shall prevail. As to discovery under the Judicature Acts, see 11 Harv. L. Rev. 137, 206.

By the act of 1861, c. 53, to settle doubts as to exist on the subject, it was enacted that the high court should be a prize court within the meaning of the Naval Prize Act of 1864, and the jurisdiction was assigned to the probate, divorce, and admiralty division of the court. An appeal was given only to the queen in council. By the same act the house of lords was authorized to call in the aid of assessors in admiralty cases.

The act of 1884, c. 16, was directed mainly to the restricting the right of appeal.

The division of the legal year into terms is abolished, so far as relates to the administration of justice, but where they are used as a measure for determining the time at or within which any act is required to be done, they may continue to be referred to. Numerous other regulations are established for the arrangement of business, and a course of procedure under the new system for which reference must be had to the acts. We will merely note that nothing is to affect the law relating to jury trials, and the existing forms of procedure are to be used as far as consistent with these acts. It was provided that no subject should affect the practice or procedure in—1. Criminal proceedings; 2. Proceedings on the crown side of the queen's bench division; 3. Proceedings on the revenue side of the exchequer division; 4. Proceedings for divorce and matrimonial causes. The Chancery Procedure Acts and the Common Law Procedure Acts remain in full force, except so far as impliedly or expressly repealed by the Judicature Acts. Many sections of the former Acts are repealed by subsequent legislation, all which may be found in Chitty's English Statutes, where the acts are published together as amended.

A recent writer on the English courts, in summing up the results of the present system, considers that much advantage has accrued to the public through the rearrangement of the business of the courts; pleading and practice have been assimilated and simplified, and the power of each court to dispose, in one action, of all differences between parties has lessened the cost and delay of litigation. It has not, however, been accomplished what was expected to be the result of the change in the direction of the fusion of law and equity. This, it is thought, results largely from the fact that English law is very much of a customary nature, without statutory sanction, and that there is no code or corpus juris to which disputes may be referred, and, aside from which, there are no legal rights or obligations. Nevertheless, the dividing line between the two jurisdictions, simplified and improved in their course of procedure, has thus become once more clear and accentuated, and there is every indication that the present working of those courts is satisfactory to the public and to all branches of the legal profession; Inderwick, King's Peace 226.

JUDICATURE ACTS (IRELAND).

The act of 40 & 41 Vict. c. 57, which went into operation Jan. 1, 1878, established a supreme court of judicature in Ireland, under which acts and subsequent ones are essentially similar in its constitution to that in England is in force.

JUDICES. See JUDGES.

JUDICIAL. Belonging to the office of a judge; as judicial authority.

JUDICIAL ACT. See ACT.

JUDICIAL ADMISSIONS. Admissions of the party which appear of record in the proceedings of the court. See ADMISSIONS.

JUDICIAL COMMITTEE OF THE PRIVY COUNCIL. In English Law. A tribunal formerly composed of members of the privy council, established by 2 & 3 Wm. IV. c. 92, and subsequent acts, for hearing appeals from colonial and ecclesiastical courts and the courts of admiralty, and from certain orders in lunacy. By 34 & 35 Vict. c. 91, provision was made for the appointment of four additional members; no one was qualified who was not, when appointed, or had not been a judge of the superior courts at Westminster, or a chief justice of the High Court in Calcutta, Madras, or Bombay. The qualification now required is that the appointee must be one who has held "high judicial office," as to the definition of which see JUDICIAL OFFICE.

Much of this jurisdiction, including admiralty and lunacy appeals, has been transferred to the court of appeals. See JUDICATURE ACT; LUNACY ACTS. But the changes under the Judicature and Appellate Jurisdiction Acts do not seem to have disturbed the jurisdiction of the judicial committee over appeals from India and the colonies, which was, and still is, the principal function of that body. It has been said that "as the house of lords is the supreme court of appeal for Great Britain and Ireland, so also is the judicial committee of the privy council and supreme court of appeal for India, the colonies, and the Channel Islands, and as the area of British sovereignty extends, so also is extended the right of appeal to her majesty in council;" 2 Brett, Com. Present Laws, Eng. 775. Recent orders in council extend this right of appeal to include Fiji, Cyprus, and Zululand.

The committee is also empowered upon reference by her majesty in council to hear appeals in ecclesiastical matters, appeals from vice-admiralty courts, petitions against schemes of the charity commissioners, and petitions for the extension of letters patent; id.

See also Macpherson's Practice of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, the introduction of which contains an extract from Lord Brougham's eloquent description of the jurisdiction.

JUDICIAL CONFESSIONS. See CONFESSIONS; PRELIMINARY EXAMINATION.

JUDICIAL CONVENTIONS. Agreements entered into in consequence of an order of court; as, for example, entering into a bond on taking out a writ of sequestration. 6 Mart. La. N. S. 494.

JUDICIAL DECISIONS. The opinions or determinations of the judges in causes before them. Hale, Hist. Cr. Law 68; Willes 666; 3 B. & Ald. 123; 1 H. Bla. 63; 5 M. & S. 185. See DICTUM; JUDGE-MADE LAW; PRECEDENTS.

JUDICIAL DECLARATION. In Scotch Law. The statement made by one of the parties to a suit, when judicially examined as to the particular facts on which the case rests. The term corresponds with admissions (q. v.) in English law.

JUDICIAL DISCRETION. See DISCRETION.

JUDICIAL DOCUMENTS. The papers and proceedings which constitute or become part of the record of a litigation. They include the writs, pleadings, documentary proofs, verdicts, inquisitions, judgment, and decrees incident to a cause or judicial proceeding.

Inquisitions, examinations, depositions, affidavits, and other written papers, when they have become proofs of its proceedings and are found remaining on the files of a judicial court, are judicial documents. A deposition after being received and filed as such is a judicial document and can only be proved as such, and is not admissible as a written statement or confession of deponent. It cannot be received in part and excluded in part; 27 Me. 308.

Judicial documents are thus classified by Starkie: 1. Judgments, decrees, and verdicts. 2. Depositions, examinations, and inquisitions, taken in the course of a legal process. 3. Writs, warrants, pleadings, bills, and answers, etc., which are incident to judicial proceedings.

As to the admissibility and effect of such documents, see, generally, Stark. Ev., Sharsw. ed. [816].

JUDICIAL DUTY. Within the meaning of a constitution, such a duty as legitimately pertains to an officer in a department designated by the constitution as judicial. 115 Mo. 36.

JUDICIAL ETHICS. See ETHICS, LEGAL.

JUDICIAL FACTOR. In Scotch Law. An administrator or steward appointed by the court of session for the management of an estate which for any reason is in custodia legis. See Ersk. Pr. 258.

JUDICIAL FUNCTION. The exercise of the judicial faculty or office.

The capacity to act in the specific way which appertains to the judicial power, as one of the powers of government.

The term is used to describe generally those modes of action which appertain to the judiciary as a department of organized government, and through and by means of which it accomplishes its purposes and exercises its peculiar powers.

JUDICIAL LEGISLATION. See JUDGE-MADE LAW.

JUDICIAL LIABILITY. See JUDGE; 6 Am. Dec. 333.

JUDICIAL MORTGAGE. In Louisiana. The lien resulting from judgments, whether these be rendered on contested cases, or by default, whether they be final or provisional, in favor of the person obtaining them.

JUDICIAL NOTICE. A term used to express the doctrine of the acceptance by a court for the purposes of the case, of the truth of certain notorious facts without requiring proof.

The classes of facts of which judicial notice will be taken are judicial, legislative, political, historical, geographical, commercial, scientific, and artistic, in addition to a wide range of matters arising in the ordinary course of nature or the general current of human affairs which rest entirely upon acknowledged notoriety for their claims to judicial recognition; Wade, Notice 1408.

If unacquainted with such fact, the court may refer to any person or any document or book of reference for his satisfaction in relation thereto; or may refuse to take judicial notice thereof unless and until the party calling upon him to take such notice produces any such document or book of reference; Steph. Ev. Art. 59.

Courts will take judicial notice:—of legislative enactments—which are recognized as public acts within the state or territory in which the court is held; 20 Ind. 82; 137 U. S. 214; 123 id. 1; 117 id. 401; 22 U. S. App. 187; 9 How. 127; 7 Kan. 426; 28 Tex. 452; 17 Md. 309; 13 Mich. 481; 16 Cal. 220; 69 Me. 314; 41 N. J. L. 29; 43 La. Ann. 959; 80 Wis. 407; 75 Mo. 182; and of a private act when expressly recognized and amended by a public act; 6 Ill. App. 157; of a long prevailing construction of a statute by executive officers; 29 L. R. A. (Fla.) 507; of the public statutes of the several states; 16 U. S. App. 332; of the statutes under which city improvements are made; 99 Cal. 17 (but not of a city ordinance; 80 Md. 483); that a city is duly incorporated; 182 Ind. 189; of the corporate existence and names of the counties of a state; 93 Ala. 888.

A court takes judicial notice of its own action in the same cause; 110 Mo. 850; or a state court of the decision of the supreme court of the United States settling the law of the same case; 17 S. W. Rep. (Ky.) 287; of the acts of congress; 70 Cal. 163; 30 Ill. 279; 134 N. Y. 156; 83 Mo. 21; 28 Tex. 452; 10 Ind. 536; 6 Wis. 89; 37 Tex. 13; 16 Gratt. 284; of the rules and regulations of the principal departments of the government under express authority of an act of congress in which the public are interested; 152 U. S. 311; of acts of the executive in relation to declaring a guano island to be within the jurisdiction of the United States; 137 U. S. 234; but not of regulations of the land office; 49 Fed. Rep. 54. The lower courts of the United States and the supreme court, on appeal from their decisions, take judicial notice of the constitution and public laws of each of the states of the Union; 112 U. S. 452; 114 id. 218; 159 id. 657; of the laws of Pennsylvania existing prior to the constitution; 6 U. S. App. 649. Without special enactment, the law merchant, governing the transfer of commercial paper by indorsement, will be noticed by the courts, where such law has not been abrogated by statute; 41 N. J. L. 29; 13 Cl. & F. 787; 3 C. B. 519; as will the general usage and customs of merchants; 91 U. S. 37 (if they are intelligible without extrinsic proof; 23 Beav. 870; military orders of a general character within the district in which the courts are held, when such orders affect judicial proceedings, and are issued by officers of recognized authority, will be noticed; 20 La. Ann. 141; 38 Tex. 141. In states where the common law has been adopted, it will be presumed that the same law prevails in a foreign state, unless otherwise proved; 1 Houst. 538; 28 Miss. 153; 23 Tex. 639; 80 Ind. 185; 11 N. Y. 437; 39 Ala. 468; 28 Vt. 776; but courts will in general refuse to notice a common-law rule different from their own; 19 Mo. 84; 11 Ind. 331; and although the supreme court take judicial notice of the laws of each state in the Union, yet courts of the several states, which are considered as foreign to one another, are not bound to take judicial notice of the laws of any other state; 2 Freem. Judg. § 571. See FOREIGN LAW.

Judicial notice will be taken of the existence and titles of all the sovereign powers in the civilized world which are recognized by the government of the United States, of their respective flags and seals of state; 7 Wheat. 273, 335; L. R. 2 Ch. App. 585; the status of sovereigns; [1894] 1 Q. B. 149; of the law of nations; 14 Wall. 170, 188; of foreign admiralty and maritime courts; 4 Cra. 299, 434; and their notaries public; 8 Wheat. 326, 333; of a treaty with a foreign government; 17 U. S. App. 427; or with Indian tribes; 46 Fed. Rep. 363; 15 id. 489; 8 Wis. 709; of the date of the consummation of such treaties; 5 Minn. 78; 16 id. 525; of the laws and regulations of Mexico prior to the cession under the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo; 141 U. S. 546; of the accession of the chief executive of the nation, and of their own state or territory, his powers and privileges; 33 Miss. 508; 5 Wis. 308; 34 Neb. 435; and the genuineness of his signature; 4 Mart. La. 635; the heads of departments and principal officers of state; 91 U. S. 37; and the public seal; 2 Halst. 553; 3 Johns. 810; the election and resignation of a senator of the United States, or the appointment of a cabinet or foreign minister; 91 U. S. 37; 2 Rob. La. 466; marshals and sheriffs; 27 Ala. 17; 80 Wis. 150; and the genuineness of their signatures; 10 Mart. La. 196; of the law regulating an officer's fee; 129 Ind. 535 (but not their deputies; 10 Ark. 142); of courts of general jurisdiction, their judges; 2 Ohio St. 228; 34 N. E. Rep. (Ind.) 618; their seals, regular terms, rules, and maxims in the administration of justice and course of proceeding; 10 Pick. 470; 17 Ala. 229. The supreme court, on appeal from the circuit court, takes judicial notice of the days of general public elections of members of the legislature, and of members of the constitutional convention of a state, as well as of the time of the commencement of its sitting, and the date when its acts take effect; 159 U. S. 651; see 91 id. 87; 6 Wall. 499; 117 U. S. 401. Courts take judicial notice that primary elections are an essential part of our political system; 125 Ind. 207; see 135 id. 526; of public proclamation of war and peace and special days of fast and thanksgiving; 4 Md. 409; 110 Mo. 286; see 51 Fed. Rep. 260; of the public proclamations of pardon and amnesty; 145 U. S. 546; of the sittings of congress and also of their own state and territorial legislatures and their established and usual course of proceeding, and the privileges of the members, but not the transactions on the journals; 18 Wall. 154; 45 Ill. 119; 8 Ind. 156; 14 Bush 284; contra (as to the journals), 48 Ala. 115; 13 Mich. 481. The English courts have refused to take notice of journals of the house of commons; Hob. 109; but they take notice of the privileges of the house; 9 Ad. & E. 107; 4 Jur. 70; 3 P. & D. 330; and of its standing orders; L. R. 2 Eq. 864.

Courts will take judicial notice of the general geographical features of their own country, or state, and of their judicial district, as to the existence and location of its principal mountains, rivers, and cities; 37 Ind. 238; 128 id. 555; 133 id. 178; 40 N. H. 430; 181 N. Y. 617; 141 Ill. 469; 7

C. C. App. 444; 99 Cal. 577; 19 U. S. App. 266; 121 Pa. 109; 57 Ark. 359; 86 Ala. 88; 150 Mass. 221; and that certain places constitute the chief cities or commercial centres of a state; 88 Tex. 650; and of the geographical position and distances of foreign countries and cities in so far as the same may be fairly presumed to be within the knowledge of most persons of ordinary intelligence and education within the state or district in which the court is held; 91 U. S. 37; and see 58 Fed. Rep. 729; and of the boundaries of the several states and judicial districts; 91 U. S. 37; of the territorial extent of the jurisdiction and sovereignty exercised de facto by their own government; 137 U. S. 214; 117 id. 401; that the districts into which the United States are divided for revenue purposes have defined geographical boundaries; 104 id. 41.

The state courts will take judicial notice of the local political divisions of their own state into counties, cities, townships, and the like; 40 N. H. 420; 22 Me. 453; of the population of cities and towns according to the census reports; 3 Ind. App. 399; 94 Ill. 430; 64 Cal. 87; 81 Wis. 440; 133 Ind. 178; and of the length of time ordinarily required to complete an enumeration of the inhabitants of a state; 135 N. Y. 473; of their relative positions but not of their boundaries, further than described in public statistics; 39 Me. 263; 28 Ind. 429; 19 Ia. 319. As to geographical facts, see 10 Abb. N. C. 116.

Judicial notice is also taken of any matters of public history affecting the whole people, and also public matters affecting the government of the nation, or of their own particular state or district; 16 How. 416; 91 U. S. 37; 56 N. J. L. 696; 147 Ill. 66; 1 Abb. 169; 67 Ga. 260; 50 Ala. 537; 13 Ct. Cl. 117; 64 Ind. 553; 2 Cal. 183; but see 28 Tex. 294; 6 Heisk. 202; of the general facts of natural history; 5 C. C. App. 359; 55 Fed. Rep. 964; of the rules of arithmetic; 97 Ala. 159; of legal weights and measures; 4 Tenn. 314; and coins; 5 M'Lean 23; 10 Ind. 38; the character of the general circulating medium, and the public language in reference to it; 8 Monr. 149; but not the current value of the notes of a bank at any particular time; 40 Ala. 391; of the custom of the road as to passing to the right or left; 8 C. & P. 104; and of the sea, if general and notorious; L. R. 3 P. C. 44; and the United States courts especially take judicial notice of the ports and waters of the United States, in which the tide ebbs and flows; 91 U. S. 37.

Of all things which must have happened according to the ordinary course of nature; as the coincidence of days of the week with those of the month; 97 Ala. 647; 6 Ind. App. 97; 84 Me. 111; the ordinary limitation of human life as to age; 97 Ala. 159; of the average height of a man; 23 N. E. Rep. (N. Y.) 9; of the Carlisle Tables in estimating the probable length of life; 151 U. S. 468; of the period of gestation; 2 East 202; the course of time of the heavenly bodies; 6 Ohio Cir. Ct. R. 230; 61 Cal. 404; 47 Conn. 179; 55 Md. 11; the mutation of seasons, and their general relations to the maturity of crops; 91 U. S. 37; of the meaning of words in the vernacular language, but not of catch-words, technical, local, or slang expressions; 20 Pick. 203; 15 Md. 276; 107 Cal. 187; 3 N. Dak. 407 (although formerly the local use of language was noticed; 11 M. & W. 295; 1 Bul. 174; Rolle, Abbr. Court C., 6, 7; 12 Q. B. 624); such ordinary abbreviations as by common use may be regarded as universally understood; as abbreviations of Christian names, and the like; 91 U. S. 37; 37 Ala. 216; 13 Mo. 89; 54 N. W. Rep. (N. Dak.) 404; but not those which are in any degree doubtful or difficult of interpretation; 8 Tex. 205.

That railroad passenger trains are operated to carry passengers for hire; 32 U. S. App. 182, that a street railway company is a common carrier of passengers; 65 Conn. 201; that two railroads touching the same points are parallel and competing lines; 72 Tex. 404; of notorious customs of railroad companies regarding passengers and freight; 82 Ia. 812; 13 U. S. App. 188; that telegraph lines are necessary to the operation of railroads; 133 Ind. 69; of the relation between the conductor and brakeman of a freight train; 111 N. C. 482; of the duty of passenger conductors to enter and leave their trains while in motion; 103 Mich. 289.

That the attendants of a church are not limited to its members; 101 Mass. 269; that many unincorporated church societies have been in existence; 158 Ill. 631; of the contents of the Bible and the general doctrines maintained by different religious sects; 76 Wis. 177; 18 R. I. 258; but see 16 Kan. 192; 31 Barb. 49.

And, finally, all such matters as may be considered as within the common experience or knowledge of all men; 28 Ala. 83; as, that natural gas is a dangerous agency; 128 Ind. 555; but that it will not explode spontaneously without some other agency acting upon it; id. 335; that leaks occurring in gas pipes require immediate repair; 140 Ind. 107; that horses well broken and kind will take fright at a moving vehicle drawn by an invisible motor; 56 N. J. L. 696; that cattle in Texas are infected with a microbe or germ of the Texas or Spanish fever, which can be communicated to other cattle; 126 Mo. 108; of the objectionable character of an undertaker's establishment, in a residential portion of a city; 139 N. Y. 93; of the ordinary duties of a bank cashier; 31 Fed. Rep. 697; that beer is a fermented liquor; 44 Mo. App. 81; 2 Tex. Civ. App. 296; 54 Fed. Rep. 188; 44 id. 438; that whiskey is an intoxicating drink, as is also a whiskey-cocktail; 75 id. 637; that the selling of a proprietary medicine depends less on its merits than upon advertising; 57 Fed. Rep. 863; that hoppers with chutes beneath them are used for many different purposes; 159 U. S. 611.

It has been said that the courts should exercise this power with caution. Care must be taken that the requisite notoriety exists. Every reasonable doubt upon the subject should be solved promptly in the negative; per Swayne, J., in 91 U. S. 43. In that case the court took judicial notice, in a patent case, of the principle of operation of an ice-cream freezer, and the subject of judicial notice was there fully discussed.

JUDICIAL OFFICE. A term used to define qualifications of additional members of the judicial committee of the Privy Council (v. v.) provided for by 34 & 35 Vict. c. 91. By the later acts the phrase "high judicial office" is defined to mean the office of Lord Chancellor of Great Britain or Ireland, judge of the high courts in England or Ireland, judge of the court of appeal of England, judge of the court of session in Scotland, paid judge of the judicial committee, lord of appeal in ordinary, or member of the judicial committee. 39 & 40 Vict. c. 59, § 25; 50 & 51 Vict. c. 70, § 5.

JUDICIAL POWER. The authority vested in the judges.

The authority exercised by that department of government which is charged with the declaration of what the law is and its construction so far as it is written law.

The power to construe and expound the law as distinguished from the legislative and executive functions.

The use of the term judicial power in sec. 2, Art. III. of the Constitution of the United States furnished an occasion to Mr. Justice Miller for a comment upon the difficulty of defining the term; he says, "It will not do to answer that it is the power exercised by the courts, because one of the very things to be determined is what power they may exercise. It is, indeed, very difficult to find any exact definition made to hand. It is not to be found in any of the old treatises, or any of the old English authorities or judicial decisions, for a very obvious reason. While in a general way it may be true that they had this division between legislative and judicial power, yet their legislature was, nevertheless, in the habit of exercising a very large part of the latter. The house of lords was often the court of appeals; and parliament was in the habit of passing bills of attainder as well as enacting convictions for treason and other crimes.

"Judicial power is, perhaps, better defined in some of the reports of our own courts than in any other place, and especially so in the Supreme Court of the United States, because it has more often been the subject of comment there, and its consideration more frequently necessary to the determination of questions arising in that court than anywhere else. It is the power of a court to decide and pronounce a judgment and carry it into effect between persons and parties who bring a case before it for decision." Miller, Const. U. S. 314.

Another writer directs attention to the absence of a real and just boundary line between judicial and legislative power in the early English jurisprudence. "In the early ages of the English system, however, the line between the judiciary and the legislature was not distinctly marked, and Parliament, consisting of one great chamber, in which sat both lords and commons, not only made but also interpreted the laws. But it has now long been settled in England that the interpretation of statute law belongs to the judiciary alone, and in this country they have claimed and obtained an equal control over the construction of constitutional provisions." Sedg. Const. L. 18.

"The power conferred upon courts in the strict sense of that term; courts that compose one of the great departments of the government; and not power in its judicial nature, or quasi judicial, invested from time to time in individuals, separately or collectively, for a particular purpose and limited time." 1 Blatch. 635; 65 Barb. 444, 448.

"Judicial power is never exercised for the purpose of giving effect to the will of the judge: always for the purpose of giving effect to the will of the legislature; or, in other words, to the will of the law." 9 Wheat. 738.

Nevertheless, leaving out of question the greater necessity of real definition and separation of the legislative and judicial power in American constitutional law there is a distinction between judicial power and political power which was fully recognized in English law, continues to be so in American law, and is entirely independent of the case growing out of the constitutional delimitation and separation of the three powers of government.

The distinction between judicial and political questions was fully considered in Penn v. Lord Baltimore, 1 Ves. Sen. 444, and it was held by Lord Hardwicke, L. C., that while the dispute as to original boundaries between provinces was a political question to be determined by the king and council, yet where the case arose under an agreement between the parties it was a judicial question.

In The Nabob of Carnatic v. East India Co. (1 Ves. Jr. 371) a plea that the defendant was invested with sovereign powers, and therefore not answerable with respect to the exercise of them in a court of justice, was overruled; but after the case came to hearing the bill was dismissed upon the ground that the case involved a treaty between persons acting as independent states, and the circumstance that the defendants were subjects merely with relation to England had nothing to do with the matter which was not a subject of private municipal jurisdiction; 2 id. 56.

The Cherokee nation was held to be a state but not a foreign state in the sense of the constitution, and therefore could not maintain an action against the state of Georgia in the courts of the United States; 5 Pet. 1. In this case Chief Justice Marshall said that the propriety of interposition by the court to control the state legislature "savors too much of the exercise of political power to be within the province of the judicial department." Mr Justice Thompson in a dissenting opinion which upheld the jurisdiction was careful to say, "I do not claim for this court the exercise of jurisdiction upon any matter properly following under the denomination of political power, and again I do not claim as belonging to the judiciary the exercise of political power. That belongs to another branch of the government. The protection and enforcement of many rights secured by treaties most certainly do not belong to the judiciary. It is only where the rights of persons or property are involved, and when such rights can be presented under some judicial form of proceedings, that courts of justice can interpose relief." 5 Pet. 51. See also 4 Dall. 4.

It was very earnestly discussed in one of the early cases concerning the boundary between two states, whether the jurisdiction in such cases, now so well established, was included in the judicial power as understood by the constitution of the United States, and it was held that although the constitution did not in terms extend the judicial power to all controversies between two or more states, yet it in terms excluded none, whatever might be their nature or object; 12 Pet. 657. In this case the court recognized the distinction between political and civil controversies and held that the case in question was the latter because it depended first upon a fact, and second upon the question whether an agreement between the states was void or valid, both of these presenting not a political but a judicial controversy. And it was said that where there was submission by sovereigns or states of a controversy between them, from that moment the question ceased to be a political one but comes immediately within the judicial power for determination by a court.

In Georgia v. Stanton (6 Wall. 50, 71) it was said that the distinction between judicial and political power is so generally acknowledged in the jurisprudence both of England and of this country that we need do no more than refer to some of the authorities on the subject. The suit invoked the power of the court to restrain the Secretary of War and his subordinates from executing acts of congress which, it was alleged, would annul and abolish the existing state government. In refusing the injunction the court said that it could hardly be denied that the case called for the judgment of the court upon political questions and upon rights, not of persons or property, but of a political character. "For the rights for the protection of which our authority is invoked, are the rights of sovereignty, of political jurisdiction, of government, of corporate existence as a state, with all its constitutional powers and privileges. No case of private rights or private property infringed, or in danger of actual or threatened infringement, is presented by the bill, in judicial form, for the judgment of the court." 6 Wall. 77.

The separation of the three departments among which, in modern systems, the sovereign powers of government are distributed, and to some extent the difficulty involved in the effort to distribute those powers, are discussed in the title EXECUTIVE POWER, which, with the title LEGISLATIVE POWER, should be read and referred to in connection with the present title.

Separation of powers, though generally adopted, does not always rest upon a constitutional basis. Whether it does or does not do so affects very materially the judicial power with respect to its stability and independence. In England, not only the supreme legislative authority, but the power of deciding upon the constitutionality of its acts, is vested in parliament, there being no fundamental law in the nature of a written constitution to which that body must conform. The phrase English constitution is one of constant use, and there is, undoubtedly, a body of fundamental principles which are recognized as having been finally accepted as inviolable and which are grouped under that name.

A recent writer says that it "is made up of certain views which have been read out of or read into English history and embodied in certain governmental acts."—"It is in a large part a matter of theory and opinion," and "the substance of it may be summed up in one sentence. All the powers of government are in the hands of parliament." Macy, Eng. Const. 14, 16.

Practically modern opinion is undivided as to this omnipotence of parliament, and under no form of law can its action be restrained or reviewed. Such results as are imposed upon it are a moral one which exists only in the potency of certain principles which, in the United States, have been crystallized into constitutional safeguards, while in England they remain, as it were, in solution, affecting, however, and giving form and tone to the government and the body politic. The highest judicial power in England is subordinate to the legislative power, and bound to obey any law that parliament may pass, although it may, in the opinion of the court, be in conflict with the principles of Magna Charta, the Petition of Rights, Tauney, C. J., in 117 U. S. 690, appendix.

It is doubtful true that the parliament could, as a matter of law, abolish all courts and assume to itself the administration of justice, but even in that case there would still exist the judicial power now administered by courts, and it would be equally distinct as now from the legislative function, even if both were exercised by the same agency of government.

The French constitution of Sept. 3, 1791 (the first written constitution in Europe), recites that the judicial power cannot in any case be exercised by the legislative body or by the king, and that tribunals cannot interfere with the exercise of the legislative power nor suspend the execution of the laws, nor encroach upon administrative functions, nor cite any administrators to appear before them on account of their functions. This comprehensive limitation is attributed by a thoughtful writer on this subject to the French historical associations, which were hostile to any judicial competency to criticize legislation for unconstitutionality. It is to this influence that the writer referred to attributes the different views on this subject which are found in the French constitution referred to and that of the United States. Coxe, Jud. Pow. 78. From a historical point of view the subject the writer concludes that in France long before 1789 the French judicial power had been used to declare legislation to be void because contrary to the views of right entertained by the court; and that, by the further contrast to American views, the judicial power in question existed under an unwritten constitution and was expressly prohibited under a subsequent written constitution.

Under the Swiss constitution the federal government is organized to some extent upon the idea of the separation of powers; but as it has been observed, "the separation of powers is not very strictly observed between the federal assembly and the federal council, nor indeed . . . between the judicial authority and the political federal authorities." Adams v. Cunningham on a Swiss Confederation, 46 Am. Dec. 114. The Swiss federal tribunal is bound by all laws passed by the federal assembly without qualification; which is not competent to decide whether the federal law be constitutional or unconstitutional; this is declared not to be a judicial question, nor is it such a question whether a constitution or a law of a canton contains anything contrary to the constitution of the confederation, such a question is extra-judicial and is decided by the federal assembly; Vincent, Swiss Government 84, 142. Another writer says that the Swiss federal court, although instituted in imitation of the American, differs from it in an essential point, while in the United States judicial power alone extends to declaring a law unconstitutional, under the Swiss constitution some political law cantonal law are reserved and the federal legislature is made the sole judge of its own powers and the authorized interpreter of the constitution; 1 Bryce, Am. Com. 254.

In Germany it is said that the law of a state must yield in case of conflict to the law of the national law of the empire, and that the judicial tribunal must decide between them, but that it was uncertain whether such tribunal can decide upon a question of the constitutionality of a law of the empire; Coxe, Jud. Pow. 96.

In Canada it is said that the supreme court and the privy council in England have concurred in recognizing the rights of provincial courts to pass upon the constitutionality of the laws enacted by the provincial legislatures and the Dominion parliament; Doutré, Const. of Canada, preface.

For an extended historical commentary on previous systems of law, with respect to the limitations of judicial power in passing upon the validity or effect of legislation, see Coxe, Jud. Pow. pt. 1.

The English doctrine of the absolute inviolability of a legislative act never did acquire a footing in this country. It was repudiated by James Otis nearly a quarter of a century before the framing of the American constitution. He contended before the superior court of judicature for the province of Massachusetts, that the validity of statutes must be determined by courts of justice. This doctrine afterwards became the principle of American constitutional law. Before 1787, the colonial courts refused to grant writs of assistance, on the ground that general writs of assistance were unconstitutional; Quin. 504; and see 1 Bay 252, where an act passed by the colonial legislature was declared void; Mart. (N. C.) 49. Judicial questions of a national character were, under the confederation, determined by a court;

Articles of Confederation, Art. 9; and the framers of the constitution ordained and established a judiciary as a necessary department, and used in it the phrase judicial power as one well understood and not needing definition in the instrument itself. Federalist, Nos. 22, 28, 80, 81; 3 Elliott's Deb. 142, 143.

It is the settled law in this country that the judicial power extends to and includes the determination of the constitutionality and validity of legislative acts, although the propriety of this conclusion is still sometimes challenged. For a discussion of the subject, its history, and the authorities, see CONSTITUTIONAL.

But a court has no power to declare a duly enacted statute unconstitutional simply because it may seem to the court that such legislation does not conform to the general theory upon which the government is founded; 51 Fed. Rep. 774.

The constitution of the United States declares that "the judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one supreme court, and in such inferior courts as the congress may from time to time ordain and establish." Art. 3, s. 1.

It has been remarked that the essential character of its judiciary is a distinct recognition by the constitution of the nationality of the federal government; Pom. Const. L. § 108.

By the constitutions of the several states, the judicial power is vested in such courts as are enumerated in each respectively. See the articles on the several states. There is nothing in the constitution of the United States to forbid or prevent the legislature of a state from exercising judicial functions; 2 Pet. 413; but even in the absence of special limitations in the state constitutions, legislatures cannot exercise powers in their nature essentially judicial; 13 N. Y. 391. The different classes of power have been apportioned to different departments, and as all derive their authority from the same instrument, there is an implied exclusion of each department from exercising the functions conferred upon the others; Cooley, Const. Lim. 106. The legislative power cannot from its nature be assimilated to the judicial; the law is made by the one, and applied by the other; 1 N. H. 204; 11 Pa. 494; 19 Ill. 282; 1 Ohio St. 81; 13 N. Y. 391; 54 N. J. L. 288; 29 Fla. 1. In the oft-repeated phrase of Chief Justice Marshall, "the legislature makes, the executive executes, and the judiciary construes, the law." 10 Wheat. 1, 46.

Two capital distinctions have been noted between the judicial power in England and in the United States,—the first grows out of the existence in the latter country of a written constitution restricting the power of the legislature, from which springs the duty of the courts to declare invalid any act which is expressly prohibited by or which is not authorized by the constitution, either expressly or by implication. The other results from the power of construction imposed upon the American judge by the brevity of the constitution. Continuing the last thought, it is said:

"The words of that instrument are general, laying down a few large principles. The cases which will arise as to the construction of these general words cannot be foreseen until they arise. When they do arise the generality of the words leaves open to the interpreting judges a far wider field than is afforded by ordinary statutes, which, since they treat of one particular subject, contain enactments comparatively minute and precise. Hence, although the duty of a court is only to interpret, the considerations affecting interpretations are more numerous than in the case of ordinary statutes, more delicate, larger in their reach and scope. They sometimes need the exercise not merely of legal acumen and judicial fairness but of a comprehension of the nature and methods of government which one does not demand from the European judge who walks in the narrow path traced for him by ordinary statutes. It is therefore hardly an exaggeration to say that the American constitution, as it now stands, with the mass of fringing decisions which explain it, is a far more complete and finished instrument than it was when it came fire-new from the hands of the Convention. It is not merely their work but the work of the judges, and most of all one man, the great Chief Justice Marshall." Bryce, Am. Com. 243.

The American system of leaving constitutional questions to be settled by the courts is considered by the author quoted to secure very great advantages over the theory which was advanced at the time of the formation of the federal government of subjecting the acts of the state legislature to the veto of congress. The result is, as he puts it, that "the court does not go to meet the question; it waits for the question to come to it. When the court acts, it acts at the instance of a party, sometimes the plaintiff or the defendant may be the national government or a state government, but far more frequently both are private persons, seeking to enforce or defend their private rights." He illustrates this by the fact that the doctrine of Fletcher v. Peck, 9 Cra. 87, that a repeal of a grant by the state to an individual impairs the obligation of the contract, was determined in an action between individuals, the result being that the decision upon the validity of the action of the state is relieved from those opinions which might affect its determination, if the state itself were a party; 1 Bryce, Am. Com. 252. A more far-reaching case which might be used as an illustration is the Dartmouth College Case, 4 Wheat. 518, in which an action between an individual and a private corporation, resulted in placing upon the states a limitation of power second to few if any contained in their constitutions.

Under the American constitutional system, there is to be found no force more potent, effective, and far-reaching than this power of constitutional construction which is now unquestionably vested in the courts. Through it the judicial power, in a way, approaches much more nearly to the absolute ultimate authority of the English Parliament than does the legislative power. It has recently been said: "We proceed upon the theory that our constitution is written: and in our written constitutions, state and national, we have provided courts for the purpose of passing upon the laws enacted by the legislatures and determining their constitutionality. We do not know, therefore, whether a governmental act is valid or not until a court of competent jurisdiction has passed upon it. We depend upon our courts to tell us what our constitution means. Our real constitutions are thus found not wholly in the written documents bearing the name, but in the decisions of the supreme court of the United States and in those of the highest courts in the various states. The study of the American constitution is in large part, from beginning to end, a study of judicial decisions." Macy, Eng. Const. 89.

Mr. Bryce considers it a weak point in the federal constitution that a decision of the supreme court may be obtained in reversal of a former one by the appointment of judges to fill vacancies favorable to such reversal, or in case there be no vacancy, by the joint action of congress and the executive in increasing the number of judges. Of the former method, he instances the Legal Tender Cases, 1 Am. Const. 264, 269, 297. This reference served to put in a very definite form the somewhat widespread impression that appointments of judges were made for the purpose of reversing the previous decision of the court. The possibility of such action in any case by the executive is so serious a contingency that this particular charge has been recently made the subject of critical examination by Senator Hoar, whose brother was then attorney general of the United States. His pamphlet is a valuable historical document, and shows by the dates that the appointments in question were made prior to the decision, and from the testimony of members of the cabinet, that they had been agreed upon long before, neither the president nor any member of the cabinet having any knowledge as to the probable decision; see 5 Am. Lawy. 4.

The fact that the suggestion of any motive in the appointment of judges has so rarely been made may be considered strong evidence that the danger alluded to is not a serious one. But even if it were, it is a danger necessarily incident to all human institutions. No system of checks and balances has ever been devised, and probably none ever will be, so perfect as to dispense with the need of integrity and good faith in the administration of government.

It may be noted here, as already stated under CONSTITUTIONAL, that Chief Justice Gibson, in 12 S. & R. 345 (1825), ably contended, after the decision in Marbury v. Madison, 1 Cra. 176, that a state court is bound to execute an act repugnant to the constitution of a particular state, but not one repugnant to the federal constitution; though in 2 Pa. 281, he said to counsel that he had modified his opinion on this subject.

A state legislature cannot annul the judgments nor determine the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States; 5 Cra. 115; 2 Dall. 410; nor authoritatively declare what the law is or has been, but what it shall be; 3 Cra. 272; 4 Pick. 23; 3 Mart. La. 248; 10 id. 1; 3 Mart. La. N. S. 551; 5 id. 519.

Congress cannot interfere with or control state courts except in so far as the federal courts have appellate jurisdiction.

Congress cannot without the consent of the state constrain the state courts to entertain or act upon applications for naturalization; 32 Atl. Rep. (N. J.) 743.

The judicial powers of the United States, first under the constitution as originally adopted, extended to cases "between a state and citizens of another state," but the very early case of Chisholm v. Georgia, 2 Dall. 419, in which the plaintiff as executor brought an action of assumpsit against the state, which was sustained by the court, resulted in the adoption of the 11th amendment. As a consequence it was held that cases past or present in which the state was a party were removed from the jurisdiction of the court; 3 Dallas 378; but the mere fact that a state may be interested does not oust the jurisdiction; 9 Wheat. 738; in a comparatively late case the soundness of the opinion in the case of Chisholm v. Georgia was doubted, the suggestion being that the clause of the constitution giving jurisdiction in such cases was properly limited to cases cognizable in the courts of a state or suits by a state against citizens of another state; 134 U. S. 1. The grant of judicial power in all cases in law and equity, etc., was held not to authorize a writ of error in the circuit court of the District of Columbia in a criminal case; 3 Cra. 159; but this provision is held generally to include criminal as well as civil proceedings, and the power so vested in the federal courts is independent of the judiciary of the states; 100 U. S. 257.

In the United States v. Smith (1 South. N. J. 93) the action was to recover a penalty under the provisions of an act of congress. The question was raised by plea whether under the act jurisdiction would properly be given to a state court. A demurrer to the plea was overruled, and in a dissenting opinion Southard, J., discusses at length the question, what is the judicial power of the United States.

The distinctive features which characterize the three great departments of government are in the main easily recognized. There is little difficulty in determining whether a power is judicial or executive, and the questions arising with respect to those distinctions result not so much from inherent difficulty in the subject as from a tendency in modern constitutions and legislation to confuse the functions of the two departments in the classes of cases of which illustrations have been already cited. So it may be said that ordinarily there ought to be little difficulty in distinguishing legislative and judicial powers. Properly understood, the two functions are entirely different, and yet there are points of contact from which spring disputed cases, such, for example, as the regulation of procedure, the application of rules of evidence, the attempt to regulate judicial discretion, and many others. This may involve, on the one hand, an unconstitutional delegation of legislative power, or, on the other, the assumption by the legislature of some portion of the authority which belongs to the courts. The cases in which it is a question whether a certain power is legislative or judicial are mainly considered under the title of LEGISLATIVE POWER, to which reference should be made. As a reason why there is naturally found much debatable ground between the judiciary and the legislature, it has been suggested that:

"In most countries the courts have grown out of the legislature; or rather, the sovereign body, which, like parliament, was originally both a law and a legislature, has delivered over most of its judicial duties to other persons, while retaining some few to be still exercised by itself." 1 Bryce, Amer. Com. 235. The author just quoted enumerates the points in which America has followed the English practice. There are no separate administrative tribunals, but officials are sued or indicted in the regular courts; judges are secure in their tenure; judicial proceedings are recognized in law and not set aside by a statute within the competence of the legislature. He considers that America has improved on England in forbidding the legislature to exercise the powers of a criminal court, by acts of attainder, etc., and stands behind England in continuing to use a legislative body as a court of impeachment, the trial of disputed election cases by committees, and the disposition of public franchises, or the appropriation of private property, by legislative rather than judicial methods. Thus three pieces of ground debatable between the legislature and the judiciary, which all originally belonged to the legislature, and in America still do, have been in England made the subject of judicial power and method; id. 235-6. The judicial power extends to and includes only such acts as are in their nature judicial. Upon judges, as such, no functions can be imposed except those of a judicial nature." 118 Ind. 83.

It is not a judicial function to entertain appeals from county commissioners upon the propriety of annexing territory to a city, and the act authorizing such appeals is invalid; 71 Fed. Rep. 443; nor to make an arrangement for the business intercourse of common carriers such as in the opinion of the court they ought to make for themselves; 46 Neb. 682; nor to prevent the submission to the people, as directed by the legislature, of a question involving an amendment to the constitution, by enjoining the secretary of state from certifying a question; 68 N. W. Rep. (S. D.) 202.

An act authorizing a court to appoint a municipal board of review to consist of members of different political parties was held to impose political and not judicial powers, and it was not binding on the court; 27 Wkly. L. Bul. 334.

An act of congress of 1792 devolved upon the circuit courts the duty of examining pension claims and certifying them to the secretary of war. In 2 Dall. 409, the attorney general moved for a mandamus to compel the judges to proceed to hear the cases under the act, but the case was not decided, as the act was repealed. The reasons given by the circuit judges for refusing to perform the duties imposed upon them by the act are set forth in 2 Dall. 410, n. Under an act of 1793 the nature of the duties assigned to the judges were somewhat changed. This act came before the supreme court in U. S. v. Yale Todd. Both of these decisions are set forth in a note of Taney, C. J., in 13 How. 52, where it is said that the result of the opinions in these two cases is that the power thus conferred was not a judicial power, and therefore could not be exercised by the courts, and that as the act intended to confer the power on the court as a judicial function, it could not authorize the judges to exercise it out of court as commissioners, and this decision has ever since been regarded as constitutional law.

Acts held valid as not conferring powers other than judicial are, requiring a certificate by the court as to the value of the services of an informer; 70 Fed. Rep. 810; conferring on the court the power to establish towns; 35 S. W. Rep. (Ky.) 1112; to establish county boundaries; 85 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 1030; but merely ministerial powers in relation to committing inebriates cannot be assigned to the judiciary; 67 N. W. Rep. (Minn.) 207. The court has jurisdiction to determine the constitutionality of an act apportioning the state into legislative districts; 42 N. E. Rep. (Ind.) 929.

An act authorizing judges to appoint a bridge committee is not a violation of a constitutional provision prohibiting the judicial department from exercising executive functions; 29 Pac. Rep. (Or.) 356; nor is an act providing for the appointment of jury commissioners by the court in violation of the provision of an express constitutional provision prohibiting the legislature from conferring on the court or judge any power of appointment to an office; 14 S. E. Rep. (W. Va.) 407; in this case it was considered that jury commissioners were not public officers, but officers of the court.

Power may be conferred upon a judge to appoint justices of the peace; 90 Va. 679.

Where the constitution forbids the legislature to create or enlarge municipal bodies by special act, it is competent to confer upon the courts the power to determine whether the conditions prescribed by general law for such creation or enlargement have been complied with; 68 Fed. Rep. 774.

It is within the scope of judicial power to inquire whether rates of compensation, fixed by municipalities and corporations for the use of appropriated water in California, operated to deprive the owner of his property without just compensation; 74 Fed. Rep. 79.

An act authorizing a court on appeal from county commissioners to fix the salary of the county attorney is not unconstitutional as imposing legislative functions and duties on the judiciary; 47 Minn. 219.

The legislature cannot constitute the court a board to try contested elections, that power not being essentially judicial; 51 N. W. Rep. (Neb.) 187.

But while the courts are not permitted to have non-judicial duties imposed upon them, so, on the other hand, are the other departments of the government forbidden to invade or usurp the judicial power. And this is held to extend to and include everything necessarily or even properly incident to the exercise of their jurisdiction.

The power to punish contempts is strictly judicial and cannot be abridged by the legislature; 45 N. E. Rep. (Ohio) 199; 17 Col. 252; 37 Pac. Rep. (Okla.) 829; but reasonable regulations by the legislature touching the exercise of this power are binding; id.; but the power cannot be conferred upon an executive board; 131 Ind. 471; and an order directing a sheriff to commit a person to jail until he answers questions propounded to him by commissioners appointed to take his examination before trial is erroneous as an attempted delegation of judicial power in allowing the sheriff to determine what is compliance with the order; 17 S. E. Rep. (N. C.) 69.

Where an act provided for filling vacancies in municipal offices by a person elected by the council to serve until "the next city election," it was held that a subsequent act providing that the words quoted should be construed to mean the election at which the voters would have elected the successor without respect to the vacancy, was an invasion of judicial power as seeking to compel the courts to construe the previous act in a way contrary to its letter and spirit; 172 Pa. 140. In this case, however, Mitchell, J., filed an able dissenting opinion in which he maintained that the judgment was an "unprecedented and unwarranted invasion by the judiciary of the legislative authority," that expository acts had been in use in Pennsylvania from colonial days, and that they were "a legislative formula never heretofore questioned." See also 122 Pa. 627; where they are held to be a common form of legislative expression to which future effect must be given. In 2 Pa. 22, it was held that "explanatory acts must be construed as operating on future cases alone, except where they are designed to explain a doubtful statute."

A statute providing that certain corporations should be accepted by courts as "sole security" was void as an attempt to control the discretion of the court; 17 Pa. Co. Ct. R. 274.

Wherever a power is given to examine, hear, and punish, it is a judicial power, and they in whom it is reposed act as judges; Holt, C. J., 1 Saik. 200. In this case the censors of the College of Physicians under their charter fined and imprisoned a physician for administering unwholesome pills and noxious medicines, and it was held that a certiorari would lie.

An act declaring that a failure of assessors to comply with certain provisions of the law shall not invalidate the tax is invalid, as an invasion of the judicial function; 46 Wis. 163; but an act making properly certified tax bills prima facie evidence of the validity of charges against the property is not; 106 Mo. 137.

The power to hear and decide proceedings for the summary disposition of tenants was held to be a judicial power, and, as such, included in the powers of the recorder conferred on the city judge of New York, and a writ of prohibition will not lie to restrain him from proceeding; 19 Abb. Pr. 136; 29 How. Pr. 176.

The phrase judicial power, as adopted in American constitutional law, includes the determination of questions of fact in equity cases. The term must be construed as vesting such power as the courts under the English and American system of jurisprudence always exercised in that class of actions, and it is not competent for the legislature to withdraw from the courts invested by the constitution with judicial power, as to matters in equity, the determination of questions in fact, as one of the established elements of that power; 23 Wis. 343, 349.

The power of laying out or altering streets vested in the mayor and aldermen of the city, whenever in their opinion the safety or convenience of the inhabitants shall require it, is judicial, and certiorari lies to remove their proceedings in such a case; 8 Pick. 218.

The court may determine whether a particular regulation of a useful business is a reasonable restriction on the constitutional right of citizens to engage in such business; 98 Cal. 73.

It frequently happens that the courts are concluded by the result of an inquiry, quasi-judicial in its character, which under some very general definitions, such as that of Lord Holt, supra, might be referred to the judicial power, but is required in this particular case and by the legislature or executive as a guide to their own action.

In cases where the existence of certain facts is necessary to be ascertained as a basis for determining whether it is wise to enact a statute, the ascertainment of the fact by the legislature will be considered conclusive, and its decision will not be reviewed by the courts in a collateral proceeding. As where the establishment of a court depended upon the fact that the county had a population exceeding fifty thousand, the court refused to question the action of the legislature, although it appeared by the United States census that the population of the county was less than the required amount; 112 Mo. 591; and where the legislature prohibited parents from procuring or consenting to the employment of a female child under the age of fourteen years as a dancer, the court would not review its decision that such legislation was necessary to protect the health and morals of children on the ground that the law infringed the rights of parents in some particular cases; 8 N. Y. Cr. Rep. 383.

Where a reapportionment of representatives, based upon relative changes of population, was made by act of congress to take effect two years later, it was held to be a political and not a judicial question, and the courts could not give redress for any injustice resulting therefrom; 36 Neb.

181; but with respect to apportionment of the acts of a legislature, it was held that mandamus proceedings to test their validity presented a judicial question of which the courts had jurisdiction, and not a political question with which they would not interfere; 133 Ind. 178; 83 Wis. 90; 19 N. Y. Supp. 978.

The decision of congress recognizing a claim as an equitable obligation of the government and appropriating money for its payment can rarely be the subject of review by the courts; 163 U. S. 427.

A court or judge cannot be authorized to perform legislative duties; 68 Cal. 194.

An act of the legislature provided that before any railway company should construct its roads in the streets of a city, the city authorities, or the superior court, or a judge thereof, on appeal, should approve the plan of construction. It was held that the power which the superior court or a judge thereof was required to exercise was legislative and not judicial, and therefore could not be exercised by them; 37 Atl. Rep. (Conn.) 1680.

The case discusses the question fully.

An act authorizing the court or judge allowing a mandamus to direct the manner of serving it is not a delegation of legislative powers; 68 N. W. Rep. (Minn.) 1085.

The act of July 25, 1882, authorizing judges and clerks of United States courts to issue subpoenas upon the application of the commissioner of pensions for the examination of witnesses concerning pension claims, is constitutional and under it the courts can compel witnesses to appear and testify on that subject; 78 Fed. Rep. 107. A statute authorizing judges to fix salaries of deputies or assistants employed by county officers is not unconstitutional as a delegation of legislative power to a judicial tribunal; 39 S. W. Rep. (Ky.) 49, overruling 28 id. 581.

Questions frequently arise as to the validity of legislative acts requiring of executive officers duties quasi-judicial in their character, the propriety of which is challenged upon the ground that they impose judicial functions upon executive officers. Such are provisions of law authorizing the removal of subordinate officers, the constitution of boards for taxation, assessment, and the like. It is a well-settled principle that "judicial functions or duties can be conferred only upon courts and judicial officers;" 118 Ind. 361; 39 Wis. 390; 83 Cal. 111. But it has been held that there is no invasion of the judicial power in making state executive officers ex officio of a state board of taxation; 133 Ind. 513; id. 609; or charging them with the duty of assessing property or serving on a board of equalization; 21 Nev. 390. So it was held that the act, authorizing the establishment of a public park in the District of Columbia, or providing that in case of disagreement between the land owner and the park commissioners the appraisal should be submitted to the president, if his approval did not impose a judicial function upon the president whose duty was merely to decide whether the United States would have the land at the appraised value, and not to decide whether such value was reasonable as respects the property owner; 147 U. S. 282; such an act merely makes the president the agent of congress to decide whether the proceedings shall be completed or abandoned; 20 D. C. 104.

A constitutional provision prohibiting the legislature from creating other courts than those mentioned in the constitution does not prevent it from authorizing appeals to a court from the decision of a license board; 33 S. W. Rep. (Ky.) 96; and where the judicial power was vested by the constitution in certain named courts, it was still competent for the legislature to provide for the removal of administrative officers in cities by the board of aldermen "sitting as a court," such power being held not strictly judicial; 36 S. W. Rep. (Ky.) 324.

The fact that the law confers on jury commissioners judicial powers in the selection of citizens for jury services does not involve a conflict with the fourteenth amendment of the constitution; 163 U. S. 101.

Judicial powers were not conferred on the governor by authorizing him to investigate charges of official misconduct of state officers with a view to their removal; 56 Kan. 231; or by an act authorizing him to remove any officer appointed by him; 2 Okl. 277; and the action of a governor in removing an officer under such act will not be reviewed by the courts; id. 47 La. Ann. 53.

The power to remove city officers for cause is administrative, not judicial, and may therefore be conferred on a non-judicial body; 90 Wis. 612.

Questions of power between the judiciary and the executive have generally arisen upon applications for a mandamus to compel or an injunction to prevent action of an executive officer.

The question of power to issue a mandamus in such cases is discussed under the title EXECUTIVE POWER, and the authorities are there collected. A discussion of the subject, not strictly in a suit at law, but as the result of one, the participants in which were a judge and a quasi-judicial officer, may be referred to here.

In Gilchrist v. The Collector of Charleston it was held that the circuit court has no power to issue a mandamus to a collector, commanding him to grant a clearance, and that all instructions from the executive which are not supported by law are illegal, and no inferior officer is bound to obey them; 4 Hall, Am. L. J. 429. This decision was the subject of a letter from Cassar A. Rodney, attorney general, to the president criticizing the action of the court and challenging its jurisdiction; id. 433. In reply to this letter Mr. Justice Johnson, who presided at the trial, made some remarks, in the course of which he says: "Jurisdiction in a case is one thing: the mode of exercising that jurisdiction is quite another;" the jurisdiction of the court must be derived from the constitution, and he expressly disclaims "any other origin of our jurisdiction, especially the unpopular grounds of prerogative and analogy to the king's bench."

In asserting the necessity of the recognition of the right of the courts to coerce an executive officer by a judicial order, he insists that such authority is necessarily involved in the use of the term power in the constitution: "The term judicial power conveys the idea both of exercising the faculty of judging and of applying physical force to give effect to a decision. The term power could with no propriety be applied, nor could the judiciary be denominated a department of government, without the means of enforcing its decrees. In a country where laws govern, courts of justice necessarily are the medium of action and reaction between the government and the governed. The basis of individual security and the bond of union between the ruler and the citizen must ever be found in a judiciary sufficiently independent to disregard the will of power, and sufficiently energetic to secure to the citizen the full enjoyment of his rights. To establish such a one was evidently the object of the constitution." He contends that the establishment of a judiciary without power to enforce its decrees would have been to no purpose, and that where a jurisdiction is conferred and no forms prescribed for its exercise, there is an inherent power in the court to adopt a mode of proceeding adapted to the exigency of each case; 4 Hall, Am. L. J. 446.

In Missouri it is held that by reason of the division of the power of government into three departments and the prohibition of the exercise by the one department of powers belonging to another, a mandamus will not lie to compel the governor to perform any duty pertaining to his office, ministerial or political, and whether commanded by the constitution or by law; 25 S. W. Rep. (Mo.) 876. But the mayor of a city is not such an executive officer as is exempt from judicial control; 59 Mo. App. 524.

It has been a subject of controversy how far the decisions of the court of claims control the executive departments of the government of the United States in their action on similar cases. It was said by Richardson, C. J., that the decisions of the court of claims in general, not appealed from, are guides to the executive officers of the government, and furnish precedents for the executive departments in all like cases; 18 Wash. L. Rep. 122. This decision was thus criticised by Comptroller Lawrence: The court of claims undoubtedly had a right (1) to lay down law for itself, but it has no authority to lay down law (2) for the executive officers of the government, yet the opinion referred to assumes to do so. This is the necessary effect of the words employed by it, and whether so intended or not, it is its logical effect. For if the court of claims can prescribe not only its own duties and the rules and principles of law governing its own action, but also the same for accounting officers in the executive administration of the executive business of the government, it may for like reasons do the same for heads of executive departments and even the president himself; 6 Dec. First Comp. 238.

The federal courts will not interfere with the pension officers in the exercise of their discretion; 14 Pet. 499; 7 Wall. 347; 116 U. S. 423.

Questions purely political or arising out of international relations the courts do not assume to determine, but leave them to what they term the political departments of the government and follow the decisions of the executive. Such a question is the recognition of independence or belligerency which is discussed at length under the title of EXECUTIVE POWER.

The power of the courts to enjoin executive officers rests upon the same principles as those applicable to a mandamus. It is the general rule that the official action of the executive department of the government or of the state cannot be controlled by a writ of injunction; 32 W. Va. 1; 3 Pickle 319; 109 Ind. 1. The execution of orders of the president for removing intruders from government land will not be interfered with by injunction; 1 Okl. 454.

An injunction may be obtained to protect a de facto officer whose title is disputed as well as that of one de jure, but it is not an appropriate means of determining a title to an office; 124 U. S. 210; 44 La. Ann. 333. In neither of these cases, however, is there involved any question of conflict between the executive and judicial power, inasmuch as the latter legitimately extends to and includes proceeding for the trial of title to office by quo warranto, which title see.

The power of staying the execution of a death sentence pending an appeal conferred by law on a court is not the granting of a reprieve within the meaning of a constitutional grant of executive power, but is a judicial power included in the separation of government into three independent departments; 35 N. E. Rep. (Ind.) 179. See 97 Ind. 873.

In State ex rel. Drake v. Doyle, Sec. of State (40 Wis. 175), which was an application for a mandamus against the state officer seeking to require him to revoke the license of an insurance company, return was made pleading an injunction of the circuit court of the United States to restrain the Secretary of State from revoking the license, and it was held that "where a suit is prosecuted in a federal court by a private party against a state officer who has no personal interest or liability in the action, but is sued in his official capacity only, to affect a right of the state only, the state is the real defendant, within the prohibition of the 11th amendment to the federal constitution. A circuit court of the United States has therefore no jurisdiction of a suit by a foreign corporation to restrain a state officer from revoking (as required by the law of the state) a license granted the plaintiff corporation to do business in the state."

So also the power to exclude or to expel aliens, being a power affecting international relations, is vested in the political departments of the government and is to be regulated by treaty or by act of congress and to be executed by the executive authority according to the regulations so established, except so far as the judicial department has been authorized by treaty or by statute or is required by the paramount law of the constitution to intervene; 149 U. S. 698.

Of all the instances of what appears to an American legal mind the confusion of powers under the English system, none is more striking than the commingling of executive and judicial duties found in the office of the lord chancellor.

In commenting upon the alteration in his customary position by the powers of an administrative character conferred upon him by the Judiciary Acts, a recent writer says, "It would appear, to the independent observer, that the tenure, the power of appointments, and the administrative duties of the chancellor, though necessarily pertinent to his high office, are inconsistent with his position as chief judge, co-equal and co-ordinate with the others, and that if the intention of the statute was to confer that position upon him, it was contrary to English usage, if not unconstitutional." Inderwick, King's Peace 232.

There has been much recent discussion as to whether the courts, in late decisions dealing with labor strikes and public commotion arising out of them, have extended their jurisdiction beyond recognized principles. In this discussion the phrase "government by injunction" has been constantly used. The cases are cited under the titles: INJUNCTION; CONTEMPT; LABOR UNION; CONSPIRACY; COMBINATION; BOYCOTT; STRIKES; and do not require further discussion here. See also, 13 Law Quart. Rev. 347; 81 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 1, 782; 84 id. 578; 87 id. 1; 8 Va. L. Reg. 625; Rep. Am. Bar. Assn. 1894, p. 299; 29 Am. L. Rev. 282.

JUDICIAL PROCEDURE. That body of rules of evidence, pleading and practice which regulates the application for, and the exercise of official action consistently with the principles of a constitutionalism. Its established and fixed rules of operation safeguard the rights of the citizen. These may be either expressed in a constitution or imported by construction. Hughes, Pro. 1092. See PROCEDURE.

JUDICIAL PROCEEDINGS. Proceedings relating to, practised in, or proceeding from, a court of justice.

Conclusive presumptions are made in favor of judicial proceedings. Thus, it is an undoubted rule of pleading that nothing shall be intended to be out of the jurisdiction of a superior court but that which is so expressly alleged; 1 Saund. 74; 10 Q. B. 411, 455-459. So also, it is presumed, with respect to such writs as are actually issued by the superior courts at Westminster, that they are duly issued, and in a case in which the courts have jurisdiction, unless the contrary appears on the face of them; and all such writs will of themselves, and without any further allegation, protect all officers and others in their acting under them; and this, too, although they are on the face of them irregular, or even void in form; 6 Co. 54 a; 10 Q. B. 411, 455.

The rule is well settled by the authorities, that words spoken in the course of judicial proceedings, though they are such as impute crime to another, and therefore if spoken elsewhere would import malice and be actionable in themselves, are not actionable if they are applicable and pertinent to the subject of inquiry. And this extends not merely to regular courts of justice, but to all inquiries before magistrates, referees, municipal, military, and ecclesiastical bodies; and they are only restrained by this rule, viz., that they shall be made in good faith to courts or tribunals having jurisdiction of the subject, and power to hear and decide the matter of complaint or accusation, and that they are not resorted to as a cloak for private malice. The question, therefore, in such cases is, not whether the words spoken are true, not whether they are actionable in themselves, but whether they were spoken in the course of judicial proceedings, and whether they were relevant and pertinent to the cause or subject of inquiry; Newell, Def. Lib. & Sland. 424; Heard, Lib. & S. § 101. The rule that no action will lie for words spoken or written in the course of any judicial proceeding has been acted upon from the earliest times. In 4 Co. 14 b, it was adjudged that if one exhibits articles to justices of the peace, "in this case the parties shall not have, for any matter contained in such articles, any action upon the case, for they had pursued the ordinary course of justice in such cases; and if actions should be permitted in such cases, those who have just cause for complaint would not dare to complain, for fear of infinite vexation." And it has been more recently decided, that, though an affidavit made in a judicial proceeding is false, slanderous, and malicious, no action will lie against the party making it; 18 C. B. 126; 4 H. & N. 568.

The general rule is subject to this qualification: that in all cases where the object or occasion of the words or writing is redress for an alleged wrong, or a proceeding in a tribunal or before some individual or associated body of men, such tribunal, individual, or body must be vested with authority to render judgment or make a decision in the case, or to entertain the proceeding, in order to give them the protection of privileged communications. This qualification of the rule runs through all the cases where the question is involved; Ogd. Lib. & Sl. 188, n; Heard, Lib. & S. § 104.

Statements made extra-judicially to a magistrate with a view to asking his advice are not a judicial proceeding; 8 B. & C. 24.

Official Records of the States. The constitution provides that full faith and credit shall be given in each state to the public acts, records, and judicial proceedings of every other state. This applies as well to the judgments and records of the courts of the several territories; 48 Minn. 108. Congress may by general laws prescribe the manner in which such acts, records, and proceedings shall be proved and the effect thereof. The term records includes all executive, judicial, legislative, and ministerial acts, constituting the public records of the state; Desty, Fed. Const. 208; 20 How. 250; 16 Tex. 509.

Legislative acts must be authenticated by the seal of the state; 4 Dall. 412.

As to the effect of judicial proceedings under this provision, see FOREIGN JUDGMENTS. As to records generally, see RECORDS.

See generally, JUDGE; JUDGE-MADE LAW; JUDICIAL DOCUMENTS; JUDICIAL POWER; JURY.

JUDICIAL PROCESS. "Judicial process" is but the command of the sovereign by whose authority the tribunal out of which it issues was established, commanding the person or officer to whom it is directed, or who is authorized to execute it, to do certain acts therein specified, and it is, therefore, appropriate that such process shall run in the name of the Government. But whether appropriate or necessary or not, the Constitution requires it, and what that instrument requires should be done without hesitation or inquiry into the question whether, abstractly considered, the thing required is essential or not. 160 Ky. 754, 170 S. W. 171.

JUDICIAL PROOF. See PROOF.

JUDICIAL RATIFICATION. In Scotch Law. The declaration by a married woman before a judge that a disposition or deed of alienation of her heritable property has been made voluntarily and without fear or coercion on her part. See ACKNOWLEDGMENT.

JUDICIAL SALE. A sale, by authority of some competent tribunal, by an officer authorized by law for the purpose. The term includes sales by sheriffs, marshals, masters, commissioners, or by trustees, executors, or administrators, where the latter sell under the decree of a court.

A sale, whether public or private, made by a receiver, pursuant to the direction or authority given by the court, is a judicial sale. 114 N. Y. 621.

It is premature and erroneous to decree a sale of property to satisfy incumbrances thereon before ascertaining the amounts and priorities of the liens binding such property; 23 S. E. Rep. (Va.) 110, reversing 27 id. 838.

A decree confirming a master's sale, and declaring that the title be vested in the purchaser "upon the payment of the purchase money," vests no title in such purchaser until the purchase money is paid; 41 S. W. Rep. (Tenn.) 1078.

The officer who makes the sale conveys all the rights of the defendant, and all other persons legally affected by the proceedings, in the property sold. Under such a sale there is no warranty, either express or implied, of the thing sold; 9 Wheat. 616; 51 N. J. Eq. 135; 104 Ind. 185. A sale of real estate does not conclude one not a party to those proceedings; and whatever title he had to the property so sold remains unaffected by the sale; 147 U. S. 431. Where the property sold under a decree is correctly represented by a plat, referred to in the advertisement and exhibited at the sale, which discloses an encroachment on a street, the purchaser cannot plead ignorance thereof; 91 Va. 114. A purchaser at a judicial sale, not made under compulsory process, can set up eviction of a paramount title as a defence in an action for the purchase money, but where land is sold in equity to pay the debts of an estate, and a judgment has to be rendered against the purchaser for the purchase money, he cannot enjoin its collection because of eviction; 41 S. C. 508.

The doctrine of caveat emptor applies, to a sale under a decree foreclosing a mortgage, and the purchaser cannot rely upon statements made by the officer conducting the sale that he will get a title free from incumbrance; 58 N. W. Rep. (Neb.) 953, aff. 35 Neb. 466.

The purchaser of a leasehold interest at a sheriff's sale is charged with notice of the lease and subject to its covenants and conditions; 158 Pa. 401; and a purchaser at such sale of an heir's interest is bound by notice given at the sale by decedent's heirs that the interest was subject in the purchaser's hands to the right, if any, of decedent's estate to charge the heir's indebtedness against his share; id. 292. Where a conveyance from a life tenant is procured by fraud and the property sold under a judgment against a vendee, a purchaser at that sale with knowledge of the fraud can hold against the devisees in remainder; 94 Ga. 664. The title of a purchaser of land at judicial sale duly confirms any rendered invalid by fraud in prior transfer of a decree of sale if the sale itself was free from fraud; 43 Neb. 156. A decree homologating proceedings at a family meeting to sell a child's property will protect a purchaser in good faith; 47 La. Ann. 882. Equity will not relieve a purchaser from complying with the terms of sale because of a defect in the title, rendering the title unmarketable, of which the purchaser was cognizant; 81 Md. 525. Where land is sold under a condition not authorized by the decree of sale, the purchaser will not be compelled to take the title although his son signed the condition without apprehending its effect; 71 Hun 64. It is well settled that "the title of an innocent purchaser of land at a judicial sale under a mortgage is not affected by the usurious character of such mortgage." Saulsbury, Ch., in 5 Del. Ch. 809; 1 Johns. Cas. 169; 10 Johns. 180; 53 Barb. 285. See as to bona fide purchaser, 21 L. R. A. 88. When real estate is sold by the sheriff or marshal, the sale is subject to the confirmation of the court, or it may be set aside. See 4 Wash. C. C. 45, 322.

An officer at a sale on execution conducted by himself cannot act as agent, with full discretionary powers of an absent person in the purchase of property, since the law casts on him the duty of fidelity to the execution debtor, and such purchase by the officer is void, and confers no title on his principal; 65 Vt. 457.

Any statements made with a purpose to deter bidding may avoid the sale; 86 Mich. 144; 161 Pa. 418; 38 S. C. 357; 68 Ga. 696.

It is generally said to be a rule that mere inadequacy of price is not of itself sufficient ground for setting aside a judicial sale; 49 N. J. Eq. 356; 23 S. W. Rep. (Ky.) 325; 21 Nev. 291; 145 U. S. 349; and that there must be shown in addition to inadequacy some fraud, accident, mistake, or other special circumstance to warrant rescission of the contract; 89 Va. 836. But the general rule as stated is not sustained without qualifications, since the inadequacy may be so gross as to shock the conscience of the court, as it is frequently expressed, and to be regarded as of itself sufficient ground for setting aside the sale; 86 W. Va. 598; 51 N. J. Eq. 304; as where land valued at $3,000, with incumbrances amounting to $2,700, was sold at $2,000; 56 Minn. 12; or where the same land brought at a subsequent sale $1,500; 60 id. 262. Where the price is grossly inadequate, the court will be quick to seize upon any other circumstance impeaching the fairness of the transaction; 161 U. S. 334; or the least irregularity in the proceeding; 68 Mo. App. 456. See as to inadequacy, 2 S. W. Rep. (Ky.) 556.

A sale of property as a whole may be confirmed if the decree that it be so sold is not objected to, and there is no offer of a better bid in case the bidding be reopened; 60 Fed. Rep. 9. The objection that different parcels of real estate were sold together cannot be made by one who has suffered no injury therefrom; 18 So. Rep. (Ala.) 998.

Combinations to prevent competitive bidding, and any conduct at the sale upon the part of interested parties which is fraudulent in fact, or the circumstances attending which induce the court to treat it as fraudulent, will make the sale void, as where there was an agreement between judgment creditors without knowledge of the debtor that one should refrain from bidding, in consideration of a promise to pay his judgment, made by the other, the sale was held void for fraud; 161 Pa. 418; and where a mortgagor publicly announced at the sale that she was a widow dependent upon the premises for support, that she intended to bid, and that she requested no one to bid against her, the sale was set aside; 38 S. C. 357. One intending to purchase commits fraud by hiring another not to bid against him; 48 Neb. 49; 48 Ohio 554; and on disclosure of the facts after sale, payment of purchase money, and conveyance, an administrator's sale may be set aside; 88 Ga. 696; and to show such fraud evidence is admissible of the amount intended to be bid by the competitor who was hired not to bid; id.; but where the competitor is induced by an execution creditor under a secret agreement to refrain from bidding, it is incompetent for the creditor to show on a petition for subrogation that the property brought less than its market value; 24 Pittsb. Leg. J. (Pa.) N. S. 92. Where during an administrator's sale, one of the bidders arranged with the others for a consideration to stop bidding, and he thereby obtained the property for less than its market value, the sale was void; 149 Ill. 163; but where there is an agreement between two persons to prevent bidding, and one of them purchases the land, the sale will not be set aside at the instance of the other on the ground that he was prevented from bidding by reason of inducement offered by the purchaser; 106 N. C. 97. An agreement between five lien holders, any one of whom was financially unable to bid for himself, that one should bid on the property as trustee for them all, was not invalid as a combination to discourage bidding; 41 Neb. 796.

An agreement between parties interested in a judicial sale of land, that one of them shall bid enough to cover certain liens on which the other might be collaterally liable, and that the other shall not bid against him, no plan being formed or means used to procure for either an unjust advantage over third persons, or to prevent bidding by them, is not unlawful.

Upon the refusal of a purchaser at a judicial sale to fulfil his contract, the estate may be resold and such purchaser held liable for any deficiency in price arising upon the second sale; 127 U. S. 518. But it has been held that to be held liable he must be served with a rule, awarded after the sale was reported, to show cause why he should not complete his purchase, or in default, the property to be resold; 23 S. E. Rep. (W. Va.) 571. See as to defaulting purchaser, 27 Alb. L. J. 508.

See an unusually elaborate and valuable note on the subject of injunctions against judicial sales in 80 L. R. A. 98-143; and a similar note upon the protection accorded to purchasers and who is a bona fide purchaser, in 21 id. 38-54.

JUDICIAL SEPARATION. See SEPARATION.

JUDICIAL STATISTICS. Statistics, published by authority, of the civil and criminal business of the United Kingdom, and matters appertaining thereto. Annual reports are published separately for (1) England and Wales, (2) Ireland, (3) Scotland. The statistics for England and Wales contain statements of the police establishments and expenses, and the number of offences committed and offenders apprehended; statements of the number of inquests held by coroners; of the number of persons committed for trial at assizes and sessions, with the result of the proceedings; of the state of prisons, with returns of reformatory and industrial schools, and of criminal lunatics; of the causes in the superior courts of common law and equity, etc., and the county courts; also of the appeals to the Privy Council, and the judicial proceeding of the House of Lords. The same matters, though with some difference in the arrangement, form the bulk of the report for Ireland. Kindred matters are dealt with in the report for Scotland, though there is a wider divergence, rendered necessary by the variation between the laws of Scotland and England; Moz. & W.

JUDICIAL TRUSTEE. See PUBLIC TRUSTEE.

JUDICIAL WRITS. In English Practice. The capias and all other writs subsequent to the original writ not issuing out of chancery, but from the court to which the original was returnable.

Being grounded on what had passed in that court in consequence of the sheriff's return, they are called judicial writs, in contradistinction to the writs issued out of chancery, which were called original writs; 8 Bla. Com. 262.

JUDICIARY. The system of courts of justice in a country. The department of government charged or concerned with the administration of justice. The judges taken collectively; as, the liberties of the people are secured by a wise and independent judiciary. The term is in very current use in designating the method of selecting judges in a state or country,—as, an elective judiciary.

As an adjective: Of or pertaining to the administration of justice or the courts; judicial,—the judiciary act, the judiciary amendment, the judiciary question, etc.

See COURT; JUDGE; 8 Story, Const., 5th ed. § 1576. See MINISTERIAL DUTY.

JUDICIARY ACT. The act of congress of Sept. 24, 1789, establishing the federal courts of the United States.

This act, of which the authorship is attributed to Oliver Ellsworth, has remained in force without substantial change, save in the extension of the system as required by the growth of the nation. Its provisions are embodied in the Revised Statutes.

This act, "considering the complex and highly artificial nature of the federal jurisdiction, is justly regarded as 'one of the most remarkable instances of wise, sagacious, and thoroughly considered legislative enactments in the history of the law.'" 66 Ga. 871, 873.

"The wisdom and forethought with which it was drawn have been the admiration of succeeding generations. And so well was it done that it remains to the present day, with a few unimportant changes, the foundation of our system of judicature, and the law which confers, governs, controls, and limits the powers of all the federal courts, except the Supreme court, and which largely regulates the exercise of its powers." 8 Wall. 407, 412.

The powers conferred by that act on the several courts which it created, and the lines by which it divided the powers of those courts from each other, and limited the powers of all of them under the Constitution, were intended to provide a general system for the administration of such powers as the Constitution authorized the Federal courts to exercise. 3 Wall (U. S.) 407, 414.

JUDICIO SISTI. The caution judicio sisti, given in a Scotch court, is a security to abide judgment within the jurisdiction of the court. By the ordinary form of the bond the surety undertakes that the principal shall appear to answer any action to be brought within six months. Bell. See ERAS. PRIN. III. iii. 23.

JUDICIUM. In Roman Law. The proceeding before a judge or judex (q. v.) to obtain his decision of the legal issue, presented as the result of the proceedings in jure. Sohm, Inst. Rom. L. § 34. See IN JUDICIO; IN JURE.

In Old English Law. This Latin word is used in several senses: for judicial authority or jurisdiction, in the abstract; for a court or tribunal; for a judicial hearing, investigation, or other proceeding; and sometimes in the sense of verdict or judgment. Abbott.

JUDICIUM CAPITALE. In English Law. Judgment of death; capital judgment. Fleta, lib. 1, c. 39, § 2. Called also "judicium vite amissionis," judgment of loss of life. Id. lib. 2, c. 1, § 5.

JUDICIUM DEI (Lat. the judgment or decision of God).

In Old English Law. A term applied to trials by ordeal; for, in all trials of this sort, God was thought to interfere in favor of the innocent, and so decide the cause. These trials are now all abolished.

JUDICIUM PARIUM. In English Law. Judgment of the peers; judgment of one's peers; trial by jury. Magna Charta, c. 29. See JURY.

JUDICIUM VITAE AMISSIONIS. See JUDICIUM CAPITALE.

JUGE. In French Law. A judge. R. & L. Dict.

JUGE D'INSTRUCTION. In French Law. An officer subject to the Procureur-General, who in cases of criminal offences receives the complaints of the parties injured, and who summons and examines witnesses upon oath, and after communication with the procureur-general draws up the forms of accusation. They have also the right, subject to the approval of the same superior officer, to admit the accused to bail. They are appointed for three years, but are re-eligible for a further period of office. They are usually chosen from among the regular judges. The criminal procedure as administered by these officers has been characterized by the most inquisitorial methods, opposed in every sense to English and American ideas on the subject. By the act of December 8, 1897, promulgated while this title is in press, changes of the most radical character have been introduced. Under the new law, within twenty-four hours of his arrest, an accused person must be conducted before the procureur de la république, who must require the juge d'instruction to question him immediately. In case of his refusal, absence, or other obstacle, the accused must be examined without delay by the official designated by the public minister. In default of examination within the time prescribed, the public prosecutor must order him to be set at liberty, and any person kept confined for more than twenty-four hours in the place of detention without examination, or without being brought before the public prosecutor shall be considered as arbitrarily detained, and all violations of this law by officials are to be prosecuted as outrages against liberty. At the examination the magistrate having verified the identity of the accused, is required to make known to him the facts charged against him and receive his declaration, first having warned him that he is free not to make any. Mention of this warning must be made in the procès-verbal. If the accusation is sustained, the magistrate shall inform the accused of his right to choose a counsel, and if he makes no choice, shall himself appoint one, if the accused demands it. Mention of this formality must be made in the procès-verbal. If the accused has been found outside of the arrondissement where the warrant was issued, and at a distance of more than ten myriameters (about 60 miles) from the principal place of the arrondissement, he is conducted before the public prosecutor of the one in which he was found and by him examined. The accused is not removed from this jurisdiction against his consent, and if when the inquiry is made of him, that is refused, information is sent to the officer who signed the warrant, with a statement of facts bearing on the identity of the person. The warning must be given to the accused at this examination that he is free not to make any declarations, and it must be mentioned in the procès-verbal. The juge d'instruction charged with the matter decides immediately upon the receipt of this message whether there is reason to order the transfer. In case of flagrant crime the juge d'instruction can proceed to examine him immediately if there is urgency resulting from the condition of a witness in danger of death, or the existence of indications likely to disappear, or even if he is taken away from the place. If the accused remains in custody, he can immediately have the first examination and communicate freely with his counsel. Provisions of the law of July 14, 1865, amending article 613 of the code of criminal instruction are abrogated in all that concerns places of detention subjected to the cell régime. There may be an interdiction of communication ordered by the juge d'instruction for ten days, which may be once only renewed for ten days more. In each case the interdiction of communication shall not apply to the counsel of the accused. He must make known the name of his counsel, and whether detained or set free, cannot be examined unless with his express consent except in the presence of his counsel. The counsel can only act for him after having been authorized by the magistrate, and in case of refusal, a note should be made of the incident in the procès-verbal. The counsel should be summoned by letter at least twenty-four hours in advance. The counsel is entitled to be informed by the recorder of the inquiries to which the accused is to be subjected and of every order made by the judge. Journal Officiel de la République Française, Dec. 10, 1897.

JUGE DE PAIX. An inferior judicial functionary, appointed to decide summarily controversies of minor importance, especially such as turn mainly on questions of fact. He has also the functions of a police magistrate. Abbott; Ferrière.

JUICIO. In Spanish Law. A trial or suit. White, New Recop. n. 8, tit. 4, c. 1.

JUICIO DE APEO. In Spanish Law. The decree of a competent tribunal directing the determining and marking the boundaries of lands or estates.

JUICIO DE CONCURSO DE ACRE-
DORES. In Spanish Law. The decree obtained by a debtor against his creditors, or by the creditors against their debtor, for the payment of the amount due, according to the respective rank of each creditor, when the property of the debtor is insufficient to pay the whole of his liabilities.

JUMPING BAIL. A colloquial expression describing the act of the principal in a bail bond in violating the condition of the obligation by failing to do the thing stipulated, as, not appearing in court on a particular day to abide the event of a suit or the order of court, but instead, withdrawing or fleeing from the jurisdiction. Anderson's L. Dict.

JUNIOR. Younger. This has been held to be no part of a man's name, but an addition by use, and a convenient distinction between a father and son of the same name. 10 Paige, Ch. 170; 7 Johns. 549; 1 Pick. 388; 17 id. 200; 3 Metc. Mass. 330. See 131 Mass. 184.

Any matter that distinguishes persons renders the addition of junior or senior unnecessary; 1 Mod. Ent. 35; Salk. 7. But if the father and son have both the same name, the father shall be prima facie intended, if junior be not added, or some other matter of distinction; Salk. 7; 6 Co. 20; 11 id. 89; Hob. 330. If father and son have the same name and addition, and the former sue the latter, the writ is abatable unless the son have the further addition of junior, or the younger. But if the father be the defendant and the son the plaintiff, there is no need of the further addition of senior, or the elder, to the name of the father; 2 Hawk. Pl. Cr. 187; Laws of Women 380.

JUNIOR BARRISTER. A barrister under the rank of queen's counsel. Moz. & W. Also the junior of two counsel employed on the same side in a case.

JUNIPERUS SABINA (Lat.). In Medical Jurisprudence. This plant is commonly called savin.

It is used for lawful purposes in medicine, but too frequently for the criminal purpose of producing abortion, generally endangering the life of the woman. It is usually administered in powder or oil. The dose of oil for lawful purposes, for a grown person, is from two to four drops. Farr, Med. Dict. Sabina. Fodéré mentions a case where a large dose of powdered savin had been administered to an ignorant girl in the seventh month of her pregnancy, which had no effect on the fetus. It, however, nearly took the life of the girl. Fodéré, tome iv. p. 431. Given in sufficiently large doses, four or six grains, in the form of powder, it kills a dog in a few hours; and even its insertion into a wound has the same effect. 3 Orfila, Traité des Poisons 42. For a form of indictment for administering savin to a woman quick with child, see 8 Chit. Cr. L. 798. See 1 Beck, Med. Jur. 316.

JUNK-SHOP. A place where odds and ends are purchased and sold. 13 Rich. L. 470. In this case it was said that "it is perfectly immaterial whether it is a large or a small shop," and a person was properly indicted and convicted for keeping such a house without license who bought from other shops, and also from persons bringing to his shop the articles which make a junk-shop. Where a tax was laid upon "stores" in which the stock never exceeds in value $2,000, the term was held to cover a store kept by a dealer in old iron and other metals, old glass, old rope, and old paper stock; 72 Miss. 181.

Acts prohibiting the keeping of such shops without license and prescribing a fine for violation of the act are constitutional; 45 Ohio St. 63; although they impose different licenses upon dealers in general merchandise and those who sell specified articles; 29 La. Ann. 283; but such a tax was held invalid when a municipal ordinance clearly showed that it was for revenue, an act for raising revenue not being an exercise of police power; 72 Miss. 181. See as to Pawnbrokers, Junk-dealers, etc., 83 L. R. A. 116; PAWNBOOKERS.

JUNK SHOP. A place where odds and ends are sold and purchased. 72 Miss. 181, quoting 12 Am. & Eng. Encyc. L. 243; 12 Rich. (S. C.), 476. A place at which is accumulated for shipment and occasional sales old iron, glass, ropes, wool, hides, fur, cotton, old paper and the like, is a store within the meaning of § 3390, code 1892. Id., 184.

JURA. As to titles based on this word, see the corresponding titles under JUS.

JURA FISCALIA (Lat.). Rights of the exchequer. 8 Bla. Com. 45.

JURA IN RE (Lat.). In Civil Law. Rights in a thing, as opposed to rights to a thing (jura ad rem). Rights in a thing which are not gone upon loss of possession, and which give a right to an action in rem against whoever has the possession. These rights are of four kinds: dominium, hereditas, servitus, pignus. Heinemann, Elem. Jur. Civ. § 333. See JUS IN RE.

JURA PERSONARUM (Lat.). In Civil Law. Rights which belong to men in their different characters or relations, as father, apprentice, citizen, etc. 1 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 122, n.

JURA REGALIA (Lat.). Royal rights. 1 Bla. Com. 117, 119, 240; 3 id. 45. See 21 & 22 Vict. c. 45.

JURAMENTA CORPORALES (Lat.). Corporal oaths, q. v.

JURAMENTUM CALUMNIE (Lat.) (oath of calumny). In Civil and Canon Law. An oath required of plaintiff and defendant, whether the parties themselves insist on it or not, that they are not influenced in seeking their right by malice, but believe their cause to be just. It was also required of the attorneys and procurators of the parties. Called, also, juramentum or sacramentum calumnie. Calv. Lex.; Vicat, Voc. Jur. Utr.; Clerke, Pr. tit. 42.

JURAMENTUM JUDICIALE (Lat.). In Civil Law. An oath which the judge, of his own accord, defers to either of the parties.

It is of two kinds: first, that which the judge defers for the decision of the cause, and which is understood by the general name juramentum judiciale, and is sometimes called suppletory oath, juramentum suppletorium; second, that which the judge defers in order to fix and determine the amount of the condemnation which he ought to pronounce, and which is called juramentum in litem. Pothier, Obl. p. 4, c. 3, s. 3, art. 3.

JURAT. In Practice. That part of an affidavit where the officer certifies that the same was "sworn" before him.

The jurat is usually in the following form, viz.: "Sworn and subscribed before me, on the — day of —, 1842. J. P., justice of the peace."

In some cases it has been held that it was essential that the officer should sign the jurat, and that it should contain his addition and official description; 3 Cal. 129; 2 Disn. 472. But see 2 Wend. 283; 12 id. 223; 2 Cow. 553; 3 Johns. 479; 17 Ind. 294; Proff. Not.; 136 Ind. 630. A jurat being no part of an affidavit, a general demurrer to the sufficiency of the affidavit will not reach a failure to add to the name of the person who administered the oath his official designation; 93 Ga. 252.

An officer in some English corporations, chiefly in certain towns in Kent and Sussex, whose duties are similar to those of aldermen in others; stat. 1 Edw. IV.; 2 & 3 Edw. VI. c. 30; 13 Edw. I. c. 26.

Officers in the island of Jersey, of whom there are twelve, members of the royal court, and elected for life; 1 Steph. Com., 11th ed. 108; L. R. 1 P. C. 94.

JURATA (Lat.). In Old English Law. A jury of twelve men sworn. Especially, a jury of the common law, as distinguished from the assize, or jury established or re-established by stat. Hen. II.

The jurata, or common-law jury, was a jury called in to try the cause, upon the prayer of the parties themselves, in cases where a jury was not given by statute Hen. II., and as the jury was not given under the statute of Henry II., the writ of attain provided in that statute would not lie against a jurata for false verdict. It was common for the parties to a cause to request that the cause might be decided by the assize, sitting as a jurata, in order to save trouble of summoning a new jury, in which case "adit assize et vertitur in juratam," and the cause is said to be decided non in modum assize, but in modum jurate. 1 Reeve, Hist. Eng. Law 335, 336; Glanville, lib. 13, c. 20; Bracton, lib. 3, c. 30. But this distinction has been long obsolete.

Jurata were divided into: first, jurata dilatoria, which inquires out offenders against the law, and presents their names, together with their offences, to the judge, and which is of two kinds, major and minor, according to the extent of its jurisdiction; second, jurata judicaria, which gives verdict as to the matter of fact in issue, and is of two kinds, civilis, in civil causes, and criminalis, in criminal causes. Du Cange.

A clause in matrimonial records called the jury clause, so named from the word jurata, with which its Latin form begins. This entry, jurata ponitur in respectu, is abolished. Com. Law Proc. Act, 1852, § 104; Whart. Law Lex.; 9 Co. 32; 59 Geo. III. c. 48; 4 Bla. Com. 342. Such trials were usually held in churches, in presence of bishops, priests, and secular judges, after three days fasting, confession, communion, etc. Du Cange.

A certificate placed at the bottom of an affidavit, declaring that the witness has been sworn or affirmed to the truth of the facts therein alleged. Its usual form is, "Sworn (or affirmed) before me, the — day of —, 18—." A jurat.

JURATORY CAUTION. A security sometimes taken in Scotch proceedings, when no better can be had, viz.: an inventory of effects given up upon oath, and assigned in security of the sums which may be found due. Bell, Dict.

JURE DIVINO (Lat.). By divine right. Divine Right is the name generally given to the theory of government which holds monarchy to be the only legitimate form of government. The monarch and his legitimate heirs being, by divine right, entitled to the sovereignty, cannot forfeit that right by any misconduct, or any period of dispossession. But where the knowledge of the right heir is lost, the usurper, being in possession by the permission of God, is to be obeyed as the true heir. Sir Robert Filmer, the most distinguished exponent of the theory, died about 1650.

JURE PROPINQUITATIS (Lat.). By right of relationship. Co. Litt. 10 b.

JURE REPRESENTATIONIS (Lat.). By right of representation. See PER STRIPES. 2 Shaww. Bla. Com. 219, n. 14, 224.

JURE UXORIS (Lat.). By right of a wife.

JURIDICAL. Relating to administration of justice, or office of a judge. Webster, Dict.

Regular; done in conformity to the laws of the country and the practice which is there observed.

JURIDICAL DAY. A day on which the court is open or in session. 153 Ky. 116, 154 S. W. 931.

JURIDICAL IMPOSSIBILITY. See IMPOSSIBILITY.

JURIDICUS. Belong to law; relating to the administration of justice in, or by a court. See JURIDICAL.

JURIS CONSULTUS (Lat.) skilled in the law). In Civil Law. A person who has such knowledge of the laws and customs which prevail in a state as to be able to advise, act, and to secure a person in his dealings. Cicero.

The early jurisconsults gave their opinions gratuitously, and were also employed in drawing up written documents. From Augustus to Adrian, only those allowed by the emperor could be jurisconsults; before and after those emperors, any could be jurisconsults who chose. If their opinion was unanimous, it had the force of law; if not, the prætor could follow which opinion he chose. Vicat, Voc. Jur. Utr.

There were two sects of jurisconsults at Rome, the Proculians and Labianians. The former were founded by Labeo, and were in favor of innovation; the latter by Capito, and held to the received doctrines. Cushing, Int. Rom. Law. §§ 5, 6.

JURIS ET DE JURE (Lat.). Of right and by law. A presumption is said to be juris et de jure when it is conclusive, i. e. when no evidence will be admitted to rebut it, in contradistinction to a presumption, which is simply juris, i. e. rebuttable by evidence; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 15, note; Wills, Circ. Ev. 29; Best, Pres. 20, § 17; Best, Ev. 48.

JURIS ET SEISINÆ CONJUNCTIO (Lat.). The union of seisin, or possession, and the right of possession, forming a complete title. 2 Bla. Com. 199, 311.

JURIS VINCULUM. A bond of law, or legal tie. Burrill; Bract. fol. 99. The nature of an obligation, as a tying of two persons together, is deeply fixed in Roman Law. It is implied in the old contract of nexum. Hunter, Rom. L. 453.

JURISDICTION. See NOTIO.

JURISDICTION (Lat. jus, law, dicere, to say). The authority by which judicial officers take cognizance of and decide causes. 60 Vt. 618. The power to hear and determine a cause. 8 Ohio 494; 6 Pet. 709; 2 How. 838. The right of a judge to pronounce a sentence of the law, on a case or issue before him, acquired through due process of law. It includes power to enforce the execution of what is decreed. 9 Johns. 289; 8 Metc. Mass. 440; Thach. 202.

The right to adjudicate concerning the subject-matter in the given case. To constitute this there are three essentials: First, the court must have cognizance of the class of cases to which the one to be adjudicated belongs; second, the proper parties must be present; and third, the point decided upon must be, in substance and effect, within the issue; 1 Black, Judg. § 242; 55 Ark. 200.

Ancillary jurisdiction. Where one court of chancery entertains a bill in aid of a suit commenced in another chancery jurisdiction, both being designed to operate upon the same subject-matter or property right, but where the first suit is inadequate to give complete relief for want of territorial jurisdiction over the entire subject of litigation, the subsequent suits are said to be ancillary to the first. A familiar illustration is a bill to foreclose a mortgage on a railroad passing through two or more states, in which ancillary bills are filed in states other than that in which the first suit is brought, without regard to the citizenship of the parties.

Appellate jurisdiction is that given by appeal or writ of error from the judgment of another court.

Assistant jurisdiction is that afforded by a court of chancery in aid of a court of law; as, for example, by a bill of discovery, or for the perpetuation of testimony, and the like.

Auxiliary jurisdiction is another name given to this jurisdiction in aid of a court of law.

Jurisdiction of the cause is the power over the subject-matter given by the laws of the sovereignty in which the tribunal exists.

Civil jurisdiction is that which exists when the subject-matter is not of a criminal nature.

Concurrent jurisdiction is that which is possessed over the same parties or subject-matter at the same time by two or more separate tribunals.

Consultative jurisdiction. Where one court aids another by giving an opinion on a matter which the latter has under consideration the court which gives the opinion is said to exercise a consultative jurisdiction. 4 App. Cas. 80.

Criminal jurisdiction is that which exists for the punishment of crimes.

Exclusive jurisdiction is that which gives to one tribunal sole power to try the cause.

General jurisdiction is that which extends to a great variety of matters. General jurisdiction in law and equity is jurisdiction of every kind that a court can possess, of the person, subject-matter, territorial, and generally the power of the court in the discharge of its judicial duties. 63 Hun 387.

Limit d jurisdiction (called, also, special and inferior) is that which extends only to certain specified causes.

Original jurisdiction is that bestowed upon a tribunal in the first instance.

Jurisdiction of the person is that obtained by the appearance of the defendant before the tribunal. 9 Mass. 443.

Territorial jurisdiction is the power of the tribunal considered with reference to the territory within which it is to be exercised. 9 Mass. 442.

Cooley speaks of "courts of general jurisdiction, by which is meant that their authority extends to a great variety of matters, while others are only of special and limited jurisdiction," that is, have authority extending only to certain specified cases; Const. Lim., 5th ed. 502. The inferior federal courts, though of limited jurisdiction, are not technically inferior courts; 10 Wheat. 192. There are courts which are competent to decide on their own jurisdiction and to exercise it to a final judgment without setting forth in their proceedings the facts and evidence on which it is rendered, whose record is absolute verity, which can be questioned only in an appellate court; other courts are so constituted that their judgments "can be looked through for the facts and evidence which are necessary to sustain them," whose decisions are not evidence of themselves to show jurisdiction and its lawful exercise; 2 How. 841.

Jurisdiction is given by the law; 22 Barb. 323; 8 Tex. 157; and cannot be conferred by consent of the parties; 5 Mich. 331; 28 Conn. 112; 2 Ohio St. 228; 28 Ala. n. s. 155; 34 Me. 238; 4 Cush. 27; 4 Gilm. 181; 6 Ired. 189; 4 Yerg. 579; 3 M'Cord 280; 12 Wis. 549; 32 N. E. Rep. (Ind.) 1025; 82 Wia. 644; 65 Hun 489; 52 Fed. Rep. 770; nor can silence or positive consent of parties confer on a federal court jurisdiction denied by statute; 53 Fed. Rep. 18. Where the jurisdiction of a court as to the subject-matter is limited, the consent of parties cannot confer it; 91 Ill. 319. Where under a contract parties agree that in case of a breach one might be served with a writ in Scotland, the court refused to allow service on the defendant domiciled there; no agreement between individuals can empower a court to do an act which it is, by rules made under a statute, forbidden to do; [1896] 1 Q. B. 35. But a privilege defeating jurisdiction may be waived if the court has jurisdiction over the subject-matter; 14 Ga. 589; 6 Tex. 379; 13 Ill. 432; 1 Ia. 94; 1 Barb. 449; 7 Humphr. 209; 4 Mass. 593; 4 M'Cord 79; 3 McLean 587; 5 Cra. 238; 8 Wheat. 699; see 76 Hun 543; and parties may admit facts which show jurisdiction; 23 Wall. 323, where the files of the record were lost and the court thereupon presumed that they contained all necessary jurisdictional facts.

Jurisdiction given by the law of the sovereignty of the tribunal is held sufficient everywhere, at least as to all property within the sovereignty; 3 Blatchf. 427; 10 Rich. Eq. 19; 27 Mo. 594; 1 R. I. 285; and as to persons on whom process is actually and personally served within the territorial limits of jurisdiction, or who appear and by their pleadings admit jurisdiction; 6 Tex. 275; 4 N. Y. 375; 8 Ga. 33. See 11 Barb. 309; 50 Kan. 732. But the appearance of a person on whom no personal service of process has been made, merely to object to the jurisdiction is not such an admission; 37 N. H. 9; 9 Mass. 462. And see 2 Sandf. 717.

In an action for breach of promise of marriage brought against the sultan of a Malay state, it appeared that the contract had been made in England and the sultan had resided there under an assumed name. It was held that the court would take judicial notice of the status of a foreign sovereign; that the court would accept as conclusive the certificate of the proper department of the government that the sultan was an independent sovereign; that the courts of England would not take jurisdiction over any foreign sovereign, unless he elected to submit to their jurisdiction; that a foreign sovereign does not waive his right by going to England incognito, nor by any act short of submission in court to the jurisdiction. Such submission would be by notice when sued that he would not claim his privilege or by suing in an English court, in which case he must submit to a counter claim; Mighell v. Sultan of Johore, [1894] 1 Q. B. 149.

Jurisdiction must be either of the subject-matter, which is acquired by exercising powers conferred by law over property within the territorial limits of the sovereignty, or of the person, which is acquired by actual service of process or personal appearance of the defendant. The question as to the possession of the former is to be determined according to the law of the sovereignty; Dav. 407; of the latter, as a simple question of fact. See CONFLICT OF LAWS; FOREIGN JUDGMENTS.

Jurisdiction in a personal action cannot be obtained by service on a defendant outside of the jurisdiction; 95 U. S. 714. The courts of one state have no jurisdiction over persons of other states unless found within their territorial limits; 18 Wall. 367. Jurisdiction in rem over a non-resident's property can be obtained by proceedings against it, of which notice should be given in order to give a binding effect to the proceedings; such notice may be actual or constructive; 95 U. S. 714; see 70 Tex. 588. Any judgment obtained in such proceedings has no effect beyond the property in question; no other property can be reached under it; nor can any suit be maintained on it, either in the same court or elsewhere; 10 Wall. 317.

Where the jurisdiction of a court is based upon the amount in controversy, some cases hold that the test is in the amount alleged in the pleadings to be due; 81 Cal. 599; 13 Md. 314; 6 W. & S. 66; but not if the amount is so alleged in bad faith; 83 Mich. 561; it will be determined by the allegations of the complaint and not on ex parte affidavits; 82 Fed. Rep. 209. Where, on an appeal from a justice of the peace, it appears by testimony at the trial that the plaintiff's demand exceeded the statutory jurisdiction, there is no jurisdiction; 37 Pa. 387. Where the amount in controversy appeared by the pleadings to be sufficient to give jurisdiction, but the jury found for a sum less than the jurisdictional amount, it was held that the court did not have jurisdiction; 67 Ind. 546; 43 Wis. 478; but it is also held that in such cases the judgment will stand, but without costs; 18 Md. 314. Where a defence is made to a part of a claim and the jury find for less than the full claim, the jurisdiction is not affected; 42 Fed. Rep. 652.

"By matter in dispute is meant the subject of litigation—the matter for which the suit is brought—and upon which issue is joined, and in relation to which jurors are called and witnesses examined;" 1 Wall. 339. In an action upon a money demand, where the general issue is pleaded, the matter in dispute is the debt claimed; 97 U. S. 565. In actions sounding in damages, the damages claimed give jurisdiction; 116 U. S. 650; in cases impeaching the right to an office, the amount of the salary attached to the office is the criterion; 130 U. S. 175; in ejectment the value of the land claimed determines the jurisdiction; 185 id. 195; and so it is in a bill to set aside a fraudulent conveyance as a cloud on the title; 46 Fed. Rep. 317. In all cases facts on which the jurisdiction of a federal court depends must in some form appear on the face of the record; its jurisdiction is limited, and the presumption is that a cause is without its jurisdiction unless the contrary affirmatively appear; 119 U. S. 287; until it is in some way shown by the record that the sum demanded is not the matter in dispute, that sum will govern in all questions of jurisdiction, but when it is shown that the sum demanded is not the real matter in suit, the sum shown and not the sum demanded will prevail; 108 U. S. 174; the amount of damages laid in the declaration is not conclusive upon the question of jurisdiction; if the court find that the amount of damages stated in the declaration is colorable for the purpose of creating a case within the jurisdiction of the circuit court, the jurisdiction is defeated, and it is the duty of the court to dismiss the proceedings; this may be shown by evidence or depositions taken in the cause; however done it should be upon due notice to the parties to be affected by the dismissal; 129 U. S. 326. If this be made to appear "to the satisfaction of the circuit court at any time after suit has been brought," the court must dismiss the suit; Act of March 3, 1875 (13 Stat. L. 472). It seems that if, from plaintiff's evidence at the trial, the amount laid in the complaint appears to have been beyond reasonable expectation of recovery, the action should be dismissed; 82 Fed. Rep. 209.

A plea of set-off will not deprive the court of jurisdiction, though, if established, it would reduce the plaintiff's recovery below the jurisdictional amount; 9 W. & S. 66; 81 Cal. 599.

In a creditor's bill several judgments held by different creditors cannot be added to make up the jurisdictional amount in the circuit court; 154 U. S. 536. But it is otherwise where several plaintiffs are interested collectively under a common title, the validity of which is before the court; 143 id. 42. A reasonable attorney's fee, stipulated by the parties in case of a suit, may be added to the debt to make up its jurisdictional amount; 80 Fed. Rep. 759. Where the judgment in the supreme court of a territory exceeded $5,000 the supreme court of the United States has jurisdiction though the judgment in the trial court was for a less sum, and the amount is reached, by adding interest to that judgment; 145 U. S. 438. On the appeal it must be shown that the amount in controversy in the appellate court is sufficient; 33 W. Va. 60; the plaintiff in error must show this fact; 119 U. S. 337.

A court of general jurisdiction is presumed to be acting within its jurisdiction till the contrary is shown; Brown, Jur. § 202; 10 Ga. 371; 10 Barb. 97; 8 Ill. 209; 15 Vt. 40; 2 Dev. 431. A court of limited jurisdiction, or a court acting under special powers, has only the jurisdiction expressly delegated; 27 Ala. n. s. 291; 26 Mo. 63; 1 Dougl. Mich. 384; 7 Hill, S. C. 80; and it must appear from the record that its acts are within its jurisdiction; 5 Harr. Del. 357; 1 Dutch. 554; 2 Ill. 534; 27 Mo. 101; 22 Barb. 323; 28 Miss. 737; 26 Ala. n. s. 569; 5 Ind. 157; 21 Me. 840; 16 Vt. 248; 2 How. 819; see 128 U. S. 536; unless the legislature, by general or special law, remove this necessity; 24 Ga. 245; 7 Mo. 873; 1 Pet. C. C. 86. See 1 Salk. 414; Bac. Abr. Courts (C, D).

When the record of a court of general jurisdiction in another state discloses nothing in regard to the method of process or notice, and there is no evidence on the subject, there is a presumption of jurisdiction over the person, the record itself importing sufficient proof of jurisdiction without disclosing the different steps by which it was acquired; 18 N. Y. L. J. 575.

Where one of two courts of concurrent jurisdiction has taken cognizance of a cause, the other will not entertain jurisdiction of the same cause; Brown, Jur. § 95; 10 Ohio 373; 27 Vt. 518; 25 Barb. 513; 8 Md. 254; 4 Tex. 242; 19 Ala. n. s. 438; 1 Fla. 108; 6 McLean 355; 36 Fed. Rep. 337; 93 U. S. 129; 110 Mass. 84. See 4 U. S. App. 438.

The leading general principle as to concurrent jurisdiction is that whichever court of those having such jurisdiction first acquires possession of a cause will retain it throughout; Wells, Jurid. § 156; 19 Ala. 438; 25 Barb. 513; 1 Md. Ch. Dec. 351. A court which has acquired rightful jurisdiction of the parties and subject-matter will retain it for all purposes within the general scope of the equities to be enforced; 93 U. S. 109; 47 Ind. 274; where concurrent jurisdiction may be exercised by the federal and state authorities, the court which first takes jurisdiction can be interfered with by no other court, state or federal. It is a subversion of the judicial power to take a cause from a court having jurisdiction, before its final decision is given; 6 McLean 355; 107 Ill. 554. The supreme court and the common pleas have concurrent jurisdiction in matters of equity; and pending a bill in the common pleas, the supreme court will not entertain jurisdiction for the same cause; 1 Grant 212.

The jurisdiction of the court thus first exercising jurisdiction extends to the execution of the judgment rendered; 10 Bush 431. Courts have no power to interfere with the judgments and decrees of other courts of concurrent jurisdiction; 8 Cal. 20, 60.

The rule that among courts of concurrent jurisdiction, that one which first obtains jurisdiction of a case has the exclusive right to decide every question arising in the case, is subject to some limitations; and is confined to suits between the same parties or privies, seeking the same relief or remedy, and to such questions or propositions as arise ordinarily and properly in the progress of the suit first brought, and does not extend to all matters which may by possibility become involved with it; 3 Wall. 334; 4 Diss. 369.

Where the first court, because of its limited jurisdiction or mode of proceeding, is not capable of determining the whole controversy, another court may take jurisdiction and accomplish it; 19 Ala. 438.

At common law the rule is well established that the pendency of a prior suit in personam in a foreign court, between the same parties for the same cause of action, is no sufficient cause for stay or bar of a suit instituted in a local court. This rule obtains in regard to actions pending in another state of the Union; 1 Curtis 494; 2 W. & S. 129; 44 Pa. 326; but see 3 McLean 221, where it was held that the pendency of a suit between the same parties and respecting the same subject-matter in another state, may be pleaded in abatement in the federal courts, but to make such plea effectual it must show that the court where suit is has jurisdiction. The pendency of an action in a state court will not bar an action in a United States court to determine the same question between the same parties; 50 Fed. Rep. 656, which was a mortgage foreclosure proceeding, with an oral opinion by Hanford, J.

It is provided by federal statute that "every person who commits murder within any fort, arsenal, dockyard, magazine, or in any other place or district of the county under the exclusive jurisdiction of the United States . . . shall suffer death." 1 U. S. Rev. Stat. § 5339. Under this provision the criminal jurisdiction of the United States was held exclusive under an act of cession of land for forts in Nebraska, which provided "that the jurisdiction of the State of Nebraska in and over the military reservation known as Fort Robinson and Fort Niobrara be and the same is hereby ceded to the United States." It was also provided that the jurisdiction ceded should continue no longer than the premises concerned were occupied and used by the federal government: 74 Fed. Rep. 81. So it was held by Tenney, J., that the federal court had jurisdiction in a case of homicide on the battleship Indiana, while she was lying within territory used for naval purposes, under an act ceding "jurisdiction over all the lands used and occupied by the United States as a navy yard and naval hospital, according to the plans furnished by the Navy Department." 18 N. Y. L. J. 518; s. c. 30 Chic. Leg. N. 114, distinguishing 3 Wheat. 336, where the naval vessel was in state waters.

But it has been recently held by the supreme court of New York, appellate division, that the provision of the federal constitution giving to congress exclusive jurisdiction over lands purchased by consent of the state legislature for such purposes (Art. I, § 8, subs. 17), does not oust the jurisdiction of state courts to try civil actions of tort, since congress has not provided for them; 47 N. Y. Supp. 757. The court said further:

"Although the injury to recover damages for which the plaintiff brought this action was sustained on land over which the national government had exclusive jurisdiction, it had no more exclusive jurisdiction over such territory than the respective legislatures of the neighboring States of Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, or Ohio have over their respective territories. Had the injury of which the plaintiff complains occurred within the limits of either of said states, an action could have been maintained. In the supreme court of this state to recover damages therefor (3 Hun 70; 12 N. Y. Supp. 810; 54 Barb. 31; 5 Adm. Proc. 165; 45 Barb. 397; 17 Wend. 323; 9 Johns. 67; 14 Johns. 134; 1 Cow. 543), although it has been held that our courts may, in their discretion, refuse to entertain jurisdiction of an action between citizens of a foreign state for acts committed within their state (130 N. Y. 420). If an action can be maintained in the courts of this state by a citizen thereof for a personal injury suffered in another state or country, we can see no good reason why such an action cannot be maintained when the injury was committed in this state on land purchased by, and ceded to, the United States. The effect of such cession and purchase is merely to create, so to speak, within our territory, a foreign state or territory."

The court of appeals of that state held that jurisdiction of such actions unquestionably remained in the state in the absence of legislation by congress; 135 N. Y. 336. And in reference to the effect of legislation by congress the court said:

"We are not disposed to hold that even then the judicial power of the courts of this state would be powerless to redress private injuries committed thereon, or that the injured party would be compelled to seek justice in some other jurisdiction. The state did cede such political jurisdiction to the federal government with respect to the lands in question, with certain reservations. Congress has not, however, made any new regulations touching the administration of justice in civil cases, with respect to actions arising therein; and, until some such regulations have been made, the municipal laws of the state for the protection and enforcement of private rights through the courts remain unchanged (114 U. S. 542; 114 U. S. 525). The cession of territory by one sovereignty to another does not abrogate the laws in force at the time of the cession for the administration of private justice. Not, at least, until the new sovereignty has abrogated or changed them, do such laws cease to operate, except, possibly, so far as they may be in conflict with the political character, institutions, and constitution of the government to which the territory is ceded."

In the same case the United States supreme court upheld the judgment on the ground that the federal jurisdiction had lapsed under the terms of the cession and declined to determine the other question; 162 U. S. 399. See 18 N. Y. L. J. 740.

In another class of cases it has been held that a jurisdiction executed by the state courts may be entirely ousted by the interposition of congress by a statute conferring on the federal courts exclusive jurisdiction. An action against a foreign consul may be so brought in the state court; 50 Pac. Rep. (Cal.) 758.

Any act of a tribunal beyond its jurisdiction is null and void, and of no effect whatever; 38 Me. 414; 18 Ill. 432; 21

Barb. 9; 26 N. H. 232; whether without its territorial jurisdiction; 21 How. 506; 15 Ga. 457; or beyond its powers; 22 Barb. 271; 13 Ill. 432; 1 Dougl. Mich. 890; 5 T. B. Monr. 261; 16 Vt. 246.

Illegality in the service of process by which jurisdiction is to be obtained is not waived by the special appearance of the defendant to move that the service be set aside; nor after such motion is denied, by his answering to the merits; such illegality is waived only when, without having insisted upon it, he pleads in the first instance to the merits; 98 U. S. 476. The filing of a general appearance is not a waiver of defendant's right to move to dismiss for want of jurisdiction, where that was based on diverse citizenship and the action was brought in the wrong district; 82 Fed. Rep. 337. But where the court had jurisdiction of the subject-matter and service was made in the jurisdiction, a defense on the merits after a motion to quash the service of summons had been overruled was held to waive the objection to the jurisdiction; 49 id. 807.

It is held that the question must be raised before making any plea to the merits, if at all, when it arises from formal defects in the process, or when the want is of jurisdiction over the person; 7 Cal. 584; 19 Ark. 241; 23 Mo. 319; 22 Barb. 333; 6 Cush. 500; 13 Ga. 318; 20 How. 541; 87 Ga. 193; 45 Ill. App. 374; 76 Hun 513. See 2 R. I. 450; 30 Ala. N. S. 62; 16 Colo. 539; 4 U. S. App. 247; 36 Mo. App. 234; 89 Tenn. 304.

Objection to jurisdiction may be taken by motion to dismiss; 37 Pa. 387; 71 Ind. 417; at common law, by a plea in abatement; 144 U. S. 633; 18 Ill. 292; 3 Johns. 103; it can be raised in the federal courts by a plea in abatement; 46 Fed. Rep. 317; and under the codes, by demurrer, if the want of jurisdiction appear in the complaint; Works, Courts and Juris. 106; or if it be in a court of special jurisdiction, by demurrer, answer, or motion in arrest of judgment; id. 109.

Where the subject-matter is not within the jurisdiction, the court may dismiss the proceedings of its own motion; 23 Barb. 271; 4 Ill. 133; 103 Ind. 79; and a remedy may be had by a writ of prohibition; 3 Bla. Com. 13. See PROHIBITION.

If the objection is only to a defective service, it must be raised in the court below; 93 U. S. 714.

Where the citizenship of the parties appears in the petition, defect of jurisdiction on that ground may be raised by demurrer, in the absence of a general appearance; 41 Fed. Rep. 65.

It is rarely, if ever, too late to object to the jurisdiction of a court where the want of power to hear and determine appears on the face of the proceedings; per Bronson, J., 2 Hill, N. Y. 159. Thus, an appellant from chancery to the court of errors may avail himself in the latter court of an objection to the chancellor's jurisdiction, though it was not made before him, when the objection, if valid, is of such a kind that it could not have been obviated, had it been started at an earlier stage in the proceedings; id. See 18 Civil Proc. R. 98. The objection that the complainant has an adequate remedy at law when made for the first time in an appellate court is looked upon with supreme disfavor; 4 U. S. App. 336. See 60 Fed. Rep. 323.

The judgment of a court of another state is always subject to impeachment for the want of jurisdiction, either as to subject-matter or parties. Jurisdiction of the subject-matter of an action or judicial proceeding is the power to decide the general question involved therein, and does not depend upon the facts of a particular case, or the ultimate existence of a good cause of action; 18 N. Y. L. J. 675.

Courts of dernier resort are conclusive judges of their own jurisdiction; 1 Park. Cr. Cas. 360; 1 Bull. 294.

It is a general principle of law that an agreement in advance in which an attempt is made to oust the ordinary jurisdiction of the court is illegal and void; 6 Thomp.

Corp. § 7466. Parties cannot by contract oust the courts of their jurisdiction; 70 Pa. 480; nor can individuals or corporations create judicial tribunals for the final and conclusive settlement of controversies; 102 Ind. 209; but any person may covenant that no right of action shall accrue till a third person has decided on any difference that may arise between himself and the other party to the covenant; 5 H. L. Cas. 811; 4 App. Cas. 674; 10 App. Cas. 229; but it has been held that a provision for submitting the whole question of liability to arbitrators as a condition precedent to a right of action is invalid; L. R. 1 Q. B. D. 503. But this case is said not to be in harmony with the other English authorities, though it follows the doctrine of Coleridge, J., in 8 Exch. 497, a case which was affirmed in 5 H. L. Cas. 811, but upon broader grounds. See 11 Harv. L. Rev. 239. In Massachusetts, the decisions appear to distinguish between agreements to arbitrate all disputes and those for the submission of the question of damages only, or questions of that kind which do not go to the root of the action; the former are invalid; the latter valid; see 135 Mass. 216; 100 id. 117; 153 id. 143. In Maine, parties may, by agreement, impose conditions with respect to preliminary and collateral matters, such as do not go to the root of the action, but cannot be compelled, even by their own agreements, to refer the whole cause of action to arbitration, and thus oust the courts of jurisdiction; 79 Me. 221; see 89 id. 435. It is said that the rule that a general covenant to submit any differences is a nullity, is too well settled to be questioned; 50 N. Y. 250. See 33 Wis. 331. An agreement that the decision of an engineer, in case of any dispute, shall be obligatory, is binding; 4 W. & S. 205; 3 Wall. Jr. 243; contra, 1 Cliff. 430. The subject is ably treated in 11 Harv. L. Rev. 234.

Stipulations in a policy of marine insurance, that any dispute in relation to loss shall be referred to referees; that no policyholder shall maintain any claim thereon until he shall have offered to submit to such reference; and that in case any suit shall be begun without such offer, the claim shall be dismissed and the company exempted from liability under it, are void; 54 Me. 55, 70. A clause in an insurance policy providing for arbitration of any dispute as to loss, and that no action should be maintained till such arbitration was had, does not oust the jurisdiction of the courts; the condition is revocable, though its breach may subject the party to an action for a breach of it; 79 Pa. 476.

A by-law of a mutual fire insurance corporation, to which their policies are expressed to be subject, that any suit on a policy shall be brought in the courts where the company is established, is not binding on the assured; 6 Gray 174.

An agreement by a foreign insurance company, in conformity with a state statute, that if sued in a state court, it will not remove the suit to a federal court, is invalid; 20 Wall. 445.

An Iowa statute which requires that every foreign corporation named in it shall, as a condition for obtaining a permit to transact business in Iowa, stipulate that it will not remove into the federal court certain suits which it would by the laws of the United States have a right to remove, is void because it makes the right to a permit dependent upon the surrender by the foreign corporation of a privilege secured to it by the constitution and laws of the United States; 121 U. S. 186; the state might as well pass an act to deprive a citizen of another state of his right of removal; id. 200. See INSURANCE.

Mutual benefit societies may prescribe regulations as to procedure in enforcing claims, and may require appeals to superior bodies before instituting suit, but they cannot entirely take away the right to invoke the aid of the courts in enforcing claims existing in favor of its members upon contracts; 103 Ind. 269.

An agreement by which the members of an association undertake to confer judicial powers, in respect to the common property, upon its officers, selected out of the association, as a tribunal having general authority to adjudicate upon alleged violations of the rules, and to decree a forfeiture of the rights, to such property, of the parties, is void. The court will not aid in enforcing the judgment of a tribunal sought to be created by private compact, except in case of submission to arbitration of specific matters of controversy; 18 N. Y. 113.

The powers both of courts of equity and of law over their own process to prevent abuse, oppression, and injustice are inherent and equally extensive and efficient; as is also their power to protect their own jurisdiction and officers in the possession of property that is in the custody of the law; 110 U. S. 276.

When a prisoner after pleading guilty is allowed to go out of custody without bail, the court has no further jurisdiction over him, and cannot, at a subsequent term, order his rearrest, and pronounce sentence upon him; 39 N. E. Rep. (Ill.) 568.

As to jurisdiction of a justice of the peace, see that title.

Jurisdiction is the power to decide a justiciable controversy, and includes questions of law as well as of fact. A complaint setting forth a substantial claim under a federal statute presents a case within the jurisdiction of the court as a federal court; and this jurisdiction can not be made to stand or fall upon the way the court may chance to decide an issue as to the legal sufficiency of the facts alleged any more than upon the way it may decide as to the legal sufficiency of the facts proven. Its decision either way upon either question is predicated upon the existence of jurisdiction, not upon the absence of it. 263 U. S. 305. As distinguished from merits, jurisdiction is wanting only where the claim set forth in the complaint is so unsubstantial as to be frivolous or, in other words, is plainly without color of merit. 1d.

Between States. "Jurisdiction" as generally used in compacts between States has more limited sense than "sovereignty." 209 U. S. 473.

See UNITED STATES COURTS; EXECUTOR; THREE MILE LIMIT; HIGH SEAS; SOVEREIGN; FOREIGN JUDGMENTS; EQUITY; COMMON LAW; ADMIRALTY; JUDGMENTS; JUDGE; JUDICIAL POWER; RECORD.

See FOREIGN JURISDICTION; MARTIAL LAW; MILITARY GOVERNMENT; MILITARY JURISDICTION; MILITARY LAW, JURISDICTION UNDER.

JURISDICTION CLAUSE. In Equity Practice. That part of a bill which is intended to give jurisdiction of the suit to the court, by a general averment that the acts complained of are contrary to equity and tend to the injury of the plaintiff, and that he has no remedy, or not a complete remedy, without the assistance of a court of equity, is called the jurisdiction clause. Mitf. Eq. Pl. 43.

This clause is unnecessary; for if the court appear from the bill to have jurisdiction, the bill will be sustained without this clause; and if the court have not jurisdiction, the bill will be dismissed though the clause may be inserted. Story, Eq. Pl. § 84.

JURISPRUDENCE. The science of the law. The practical science of giving a wise interpretation to the laws and making a just application of them to all cases as they arise.

By science, in the first definition, is understood that connection of truths which is founded on principles either evident in themselves or capable of demonstration,—a collection of truths of the same kind, arranged in methodical order. In the latter sense, it is the habit of judging the same questions in the same manner, and by this course of judgments forming precedents. 1 Ayliffe, Pand. 8. See Austin, Amos, Markby, Heron, Phillimore, Lorimer, Lindley, on Jurisprudence.

Analytical. Jurisprudence formed by analysis and comparison of legal conceptions. Stand. Dict.

Comparative. The analytical comparison of systems of law prevailing in different countries and nations, ancient and modern. Stand. Dict.

Equity. See EQUITY JURISPRUDENCE.

Medical. The branch of jurisprudence pertaining to questions, requiring technical knowledge of the medical sciences for their elucidation and determination. Stand. Dict.

JURIST. One versed in the science of the law. One skilled in the civil law. One skilled in the law of nations.

JURISTIC PERSON. The usual form of a juristic person is a corporation. Indeed, corporations are the only juristic persons known to the common law (except the State). Gray, Nature and Sources of Law 47.

JURO. In Spanish Law. A certain pension granted by the king on the public revenues, and more especially on the salt-works, by favor, either in consideration of meritorious services or in return for money loaned the government or obtained by it through forced loans. It is a portion of the yearly revenue of the state, assigned as a rightful indemnity, either in perpetuity or as an annuity.

JUROR (Lat. juror, to swear). A man who is sworn or affirmed to serve on a jury.

Any person selected and summoned according to law to serve in that capacity, whether the jury has been actually impanelled and sworn or not. 43 La. Ann. 907.

JURY (Lat. jurata, sworn). A body of men who are sworn to declare the facts of a case as they are proven from the evidence placed before them.

The term "jury," as used in the constitution, means twelve competent men, disinterested and impartial, not of kin nor personal dependents of either of the parties, having their homes within the jurisdictional limits of the court, drawn and selected by officers free from all bias in favor of or against either party; duly impanelled, and sworn to render a true verdict, according to the law and the evidence; 11 Nev. 39.

A late writer considers that the best theory regards the jury system as having been derived from Normandy, where, as in the rest of France, it had existed since its establishment under the Carolingian kings. It made its appearance in England soon after the Norman Conquest. No trace of it is to be found in Anglo-Saxon times, nor was it, as is often supposed, established by Magna Charta; 10 Harv. L. Rev. 150, by J. E. R. Stephens. The same writer finds the idea of unanimity re-established in the time of Edward IV., a majority verdict having previously sufficed; in the Year Books of 23 Edward III. is the first indication of the jury deciding on evidence produced before them in addition to their own knowledge. Early in the reign of Henry IV. evidence was required to be given at the bar of the court, and the modern practice or method of jury trials had its origin; 1d. 150.

Prof. J. B. Thayer finds the origin of the jury in the Frankish institution; it existed in Normandy and went thence to England in the eleventh century; 5 Harv. L. Rev. 249. The use of a jury both for civil and criminal cases is mentioned for the first time in English statute law in the Constitutions of Clarendon; 1d. 156.

The origin of trial by jury is said by another recent writer to be rather French than English, rather royal than popular, rather a liver of conquest than a badge of freedom. Originally juries were called in, not to hear, but to give evidence. They were the neighbors of the parties and were presumed to know when they came into court the facts about which they were to testify. They were chosen by the sheriff to represent the neighborhood. The verdict was the sworn testimony of the country-side. By slow degrees the jury acquired a new character. Sometimes when the jurors knew nothing of the facts, witnesses who did know the facts would be called in to supply the requisite information. They became more and more dependent on the evidence given in their presence by those witnesses who were summoned by the parties. In the fifteenth century the change had taken place, though in yet later days a man who had been summoned as a juror and sought to escape on the ground that he already knew something of the facts, might be told that he had given a very good reason for his being placed in the jury box. It may well be said therefore that trial by jury, though it had its roots in the Frankish institution, grew up on English soil; 1 Social England 252, 260. See also 1 Pol. & Malt. 117-121.

Another writer finds the foundation in Norman institutions and its establishment by positive legislation in the time of Henry II. Leaser, Hist. of Jury Syst. 172.

A common jury is one drawn in the usual and regular manner.

A grand jury is a body organized for certain preliminary purposes.

A jury de medietate lingue is one composed half of aliens and half of denizens.

Such juries might formerly be claimed, both in civil and criminal cases, where the party claiming the privilege was an alien born, by virtue of 28 Edw. III. c. 18, and by an earlier statute, where one party was a foreign merchant; 37 Edw. III. c. 8. Such a jury was provided in criminal cases by a statute of Edward I. It was abolished by 38 Vict. c. 14. The right has been recognized in this country; 1 Dall. 78; 4 Johns. 381; 11 Leigh 690; contra, 4 Cra. C. C. 573; 4 Hawks 300. It has been generally abolished by statute; Thomp. & Merr. Juries 19; excepting in Kentucky, where it still exists; 1d.

A petit or traverse jury is a jury who try the question in issue and pass finally upon the truth of the facts in dispute. The term jury is ordinarily applied to this body distinctively.

A special jury is one selected by the assistance of the parties.

This is granted in some cases upon motion and cause shown, under various local provisions. The method at common law was for the officer to return the names of forty-eight principal freeholders to the proper officer. The attorneys of the respective parties, being present, strike off each twelve names, and from the remaining twenty-four the jury is selected. A similar course is pursued in those states where such juries are allowed. See 3 Sharw. Bla. Com. 357. The earliest rule of court on the subject was made in 8 Will. III.; 1 Balk. 405. It formerly was granted only in cases of special consequence or great difficulty; but later, a special jury has usually been granted in ordinary cases. In some states such a jury is of course; in New York, statutes provide for such only in cases of special importance or intricacy, as to which the court must decide.

A struck jury is a special jury. See 4 Zab. 843.

Trial by jury is guaranteed by the constitution of the United States in all criminal cases except upon impeachments, and in all suits at common law where the subject-matter of the controversy exceeds twenty dollars in value. The right to such a trial is also provided in many of our state constitutions. It has been held, however, not to be an infringement of this federal constitutional right, where a statute provides that in all criminal prosecutions the party accused, if he shall so elect, may be tried by the court instead of by a jury; Miller, Const. U. S. 494; 5 Ohio St. 57; 30 Mich. 116; 46 Conn. 849; see 16 Am. L. Reg. n. s. 705. It was held by the United States supreme court that a jury trial may be waived when there is a positive legislative enactment giving the right to do so; 146 U. S. 314. This clause of the constitution does not apply to state courts; Hare, Am. Const. L. 860; 134 U. S. 31; 7 Pet. 247; 21 Wall. 537; Cooley, Const. Lim. 410; and therefore the states may in their own constitutions dispense with trial by jury both in civil and criminal cases; Ordron. Const. Leg. 261, and cases supra. It does not apply to cases in the court of claims; 102 U. S. 426; nor to proceedings for disbarring an attorney; 107 U. S. 265; nor for assessing damages; Baldw. 202; nor to equity cases in the federal courts; 104 U. S. 726; nor to cases where the right is antecedently and voluntarily relinquished; 4 Wheat. 235; nor does a like provision in a state constitution apply to any proceedings in which a jury was not required at common law; e. g., a justice's court; 30 Mo. 600; 62 Barb. 16; nor to any court which exercised its functions without the aid of a jury prior to the adoption of a constitution; Thomp. & Merr. Juries 11; 74 N. Y. 406.

A jury trial is not guaranteed by a state constitution providing for "due process of law"; 13 N. Y. 378; nor even by the provision for it in the fourteenth amendment; 92 U. S. 90; "due process of law" simply requires that there shall be a day in court, and the legislature may take away or change a remedy; 70 N. Y. 228; but it has been held in some cases that the expression does guarantee a jury trial; 37 Me. 163; 63 N. H. 400; 8 Gray 329; 110 U. S. 516, opinion of Harlan, J., dissenting.

An act providing for the trial of a contested election to a public office which deprives the party of a trial of disputed facts by jury is not unconstitutional; 48 Pa. 884. In the Delaware constitution of 1897, provision is made for the trial of criminal offences against the election laws, by the court without a jury. See DELAWARE.

The number of jurors must be twelve; and it is held that the term jury in a constitution imports, ex vi termini, twelve men; 20 Ohio 81; 74 N. Y. 406; 6 Metc. 231; 4 Ohio St. 177; 2 Wis. 22; 8 id. 219; whose verdict is to be unanimous; 12 N. Y. 190. See 11 Nev. 39, supra.

Where a constitution preserves the right of trial by jury violate, the legislature cannot change the number of jurors in either civil or criminal cases; Thomp. & Merr. Juries 10; 35 Mo. 408; 51 Ga. 264.

The question whether the common law requirement of twelve jurors may be changed has in recent years received much attention in the courts. There has been a growing tendency, at least, towards the serious consideration of changes in the jury system as administered at common law and secured by the state and federal constitutions. See GRAND JURY. The decided weight of authority is that, where the right to trial by jury is secured by the constitution, the legislature cannot authorize a verdict by a less number than twelve; that the constitutional reservation implies a right to the concurrent judgment of that number, and any statute limiting it is unconstitutional and void; 41 N. H. 550; 33 Fla. 608; 1 Okl. 306; 36 Pac. Rep. (Ariz.) 499. It is held contra in all civil cases in Utah; 37 Pac. Rep. 262; 39 id. 541; 9 Utah 61. In the latest case the question is considered in an elaborate opinion, which argues that the requirement is no more an essential part of the jury system than those common-law qualifications of jurymen which have not been continued in force. The court say: "Wherever this provision has been tried, it has been found to be a distinct benefit. Such a provision is simply a change in the procedure of applying legal remedies. It is general in its application; it is fair and just to all. No man's property rights are injured by it, and no man can be said to have a vested right in the unanimous action of a jury, any more than in the fact that a juror was anciently required to be a freeholder. All litigants could waive in civil trials at common law and under our constitution this unanimity of verdict. If they could waive it, then it was not one of the requisites which must be preserved in order to preserve a jury trial in civil actions. For these reasons because society progresses, and modes and legal procedure must change with that progress, because this enactment is a just and reasonable expression of the public will, because it is calculated to be a great benefit to all classes of litigants, because it reaches justly, fairly, and impartially all classes of men, because it is claimed only to be an infringement of a broad and general statement in the constitution which ought not to be so narrowly construed as to be a bulwark against progress, we hold that this law was a rightful subject of legislation." But see 166 U. S. 464, reversing the supreme court of Utah (10 Utah 147), where it was held that litigants in common-law actions in the courts of the territory of Utah, while it remained a territory, had a right to trial by jury which involved unanimity of verdict, and this right could not be taken away by territorial legislation. As to unanimity of a verdict in a state court see infra. See also 36 Cent. L. J. 437; 89 Ga. 393.

There would seem to be no legal objection to permitting this change by constitutional provision, but even that, it has been held, will not sustain a statute providing that in certain contingencies, at the discretion of the trial court, a jury may consist of less than twelve men; 93 Mich. 899. In California, in civil cases and misdemeanors, the jury may consist of twelve or any number less than twelve upon which the parties may agree in open court. And the number of jurors may be limited in Colorado, Florida, Idaho, Iowa, Louisiana, Michigan, Missouri, Montana, Nebraska,

New Jersey, North Dakota, Washington, and Wyoming. See 36 Cent. L. J. 437.

Unanimity in giving a verdict was not universal in the early days of the common law; at times eleven sufficed; in some cases a majority. Probably it was only in the second half of the fourteenth century that unanimity became an established principle; 5 Harv. L. Rev. 296, by Prof. J. B. Thayer. The requirement of unanimity of twelve jurors arose from the custom which taught men to regard it as the proper amount of evidence to establish the credibility of a person accused of an offence; Forsyth, Trial by Jury 240. At common law, except as above stated, unanimity was essential to a verdict, so that it has been held that a conviction by eleven jurors, even where the accused waived a trial by twelve jurors, would be set aside; 18 N. Y. 128. "Unanimity was one of the peculiar and essential features of trial by jury at common law;" 166 U. S. 464, in which case while the court considered it a matter of dispute as to whether the seventh amendment alone invalidated a statute dispensing with unanimity it was held that, under the constitution and a law that no person shall be deprived of the right of trial by jury, a statute of Utah authorizing a verdict in civil cases on the concurrence of nine jurors was invalid; but the court expressly said that the power of a state to change the rule as to unanimity was not before them, and cited 92 U. S. 90; 110 U. S. 516. Changes in this respect have been made in many states. In civil actions in California, Idaho, Louisiana, Nevada, Texas, and Washington, three-fourths may render a verdict; two-thirds in Montana in civil actions and crimes less than felonies, and five-sixths in Idaho, in all cases of misdemeanor. In Iowa the legislature may authorize a verdict by less than twelve in inferior courts.

Unanimity is still required in England. In a late case before the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, where a British subject was convicted of murder in Japan, the court being comprised of a British judge and five jurors, established under a British treaty, it was argued by Sir Frank Lockwood that the British government could not establish such a court with a jury of less than twelve, but the court held that the conviction was lawful. [1897] App. Cas. 719.

A modification of the jury system, much considered and quite generally adopted, is the provision authorizing the parties to waive a jury and elect to have the facts tried by the court. This course in civil cases is authorized in most of the states, as well as in the federal courts. It is provided for in the constitutions of Arkansas, California, Colorado, Florida, Maryland, Michigan, Minnesota, Nevada, New York, North Carolina, Pennsylvania, Vermont, Wisconsin, Washington, and West Virginia. By statute a like practice obtains in Illinois, Missouri, New Jersey, and Wyoming, and also by the bill of rights in Arizona and by statute in New Mexico. There can be a waiver in civil cases and in criminal cases not amounting to felony in Idaho, Montana, North Dakota, and California.

The general principle is, however, that in criminal cases, the accused can neither waive his right to a trial by a jury of twelve nor be deprived of it by the legislature; 18 N. Y. 128; 54 Ind. 481; 63 Ia. 130 (contra, 51 Ia. 578); 41 N. H. 550; 66 Mo. 684; 44 Ala. 393; 12 Ohio St. 622; 1 Mont. 118; 43 Mich. 443. Judge Cooley, after stating that less than twelve would not be a common-law jury, or such as the constitution guarantees, adds: "And the necessity of a full panel could not be waived—at least in case of felony—even by consent." Const. Lim., 4th ed. 395. It was held that where one juror was an alien the failure to challenge him was not a waiver of the objection, and on the refusal of the court to set aside the judgment, it would be reversed, on error; 16 Mich. 356; contra, 2 Bay 150.

As to waiver of full panel, see 12 Cr. L. Mag. 13; by criminal; 25 Am. L. Reg. n. s. 403; 21 Cent. L. J. 280. On the trial of a misdemeanor, a full jury may be waived; 13 Cush. 80, per Shaw, C. J.; 2 Metc. (Ky.) 1; 59 Fed. Rep. 110; or where the penalty is only a fine; 1 Metc. (Ky.) 385; 41 Mo. 470. A jury may be waived in all civil cases, without any statute; 89 Va. 707.

The fact that a court of chancery may summon a jury to try an issue of fact is not equivalent to the right of trial by jury under the seventh amendment of the constitution; 149 U. S. 451. And the constitutional right does not relate to suits over which equity exercised jurisdiction when the constitution was adopted; 26 S. E. Rep. (W. Va.) 537; but the right cannot be defeated by giving equity jurisdiction over an action in which the right applies; id. It is not impaired by an act giving the appellate court authority to reverse for excessive damages; 36 Atl. Rep. (Pa.) 266; s. c. 178 Pa. 481. In that case it was held that this act which gives the supreme court "power in all cases to affirm, reverse, amend, or modify a judgment, order, or decree appealed from and to enter such judgment," etc., as it may deem proper and just, does not infringe upon the right of trial by jury and is constitutional; and in a later case, this decision was adhered to, and it was further held that where the supreme court had reversed a judgment, without awarding a new venire, it might subsequently amend the judgment of reversal by adding thereto a formal judgment in favor of defendant; 183 Pa. 142.

Qualifications. Jurors must possess the qualifications which may be prescribed by statute, must be free from any bias caused by relationship to the parties or interest in the matter in dispute, and in criminal cases must not have formed any opinion as to the guilt or innocence of the accused.

"1. They are to be good and lawful men. 2. Of sufficient freeholds, according to the provisions of several acts of parliament. 3. Not convict of any notorious crime. 4. Not to be of the kindred or alliance of any of the parties. 5. Not to be such as are prepossessed or prejudiced before they hear their evidence." Cond. Gen. 287. As to bias by reason of opinion, see 15 Wkly. L. Bul. 305; 20 Am. L. Reg. n. s. 117; impressions; 8 Cr. L. Mag. 559.

At common law there was a freehold qualification, but to no certain amount; by 2 Hen. V. it was 40s.; Thomp. & Merr. Juries 20; Proffatt, Jury Trial § 115. See 20 Am. L. Reg. n. s. 436, 497.

An alien may serve as a juror, that is, a foreigner intending to be naturalized; 58 Mich. 154; contra, 3 Ala. 546, and see Proffatt, Jury Trial § 116; 6 Cr. L. Mag. 396. An atheist has been held to be disqualified; 3 Harr. & Mch. 301. Women could not serve as jurors at common law, except upon a jury to try an issue under a writ de ventre inspiciendo (q. v.); 3 Bla. Com. 362. They are now qualified in some states.

The federal constitution provides that in criminal trials the jury shall be taken "from the state and district where the crime shall have been committed." State constitutions usually confine the selection to the county or district, except where, in some states, a provision is made in case jurors cannot conveniently be found in the county. The right to a trial by a jury of the vicinage is an essential part of trial by jury.

In some states the qualifications of jurors are regulated by the constitution; e. g., Florida requires them to be taken from the registered voters. Georgia requires that jurors shall be upright and intelligent persons. Subject to the constitutional provisions as to impairing the right of trial by jury, the legislature has power to define the qualifications of jurors. It may dispense with the freehold qualification required by common law; 96 Ill. 206; 103 Mass. 412; but see 20 Am. L. Reg. 436; Proffatt, Jury Trial § 115.

In some states conviction for certain high crimes disqualifies; some states require citizenship; others that jurors shall be selected from the qualified voters; others impose tests of integrity, or intelligence or education. Freehold or property tests are required in some states. That the jurors shall be over twenty-one years of age is probably a universal requirement; while in some states those past a certain age cannot serve; Proffatt, Jury Trial § 117.

In the federal courts the qualifications are the same as those relating to the highest courts of law in the respective states; U. S. Rev. St. § 800; but this does not require a minute adherence to the state practice; 1 Woods 499, per Bradley, J. A statute confining the selection of jurors to white citizens is invalid under the fourteenth amendment; the right to serve on a jury is an incident of citizenship; 100 U. S. 303; 103 id. 370.

The intelligence and ability of a juror are matters within the sound discretion of the court, and it is sufficient if he knows the English language and can understand the testimony and the argument of counsel; 44 La. Ann. 969. It rests with each state to prescribe such qualifications as it seems proper for jurymen, taking care only that no discrimination in respect to such service be made against any class of citizens solely because of their race; 140 U. S. 291.

As to qualifications generally, see 3 L. Mag. & Rev. n. s. 165; 24 Wkly. L. Bul. 438; disqualifications; 3 Alb. L. J. 81.

The selection of jurors is to be made impartially; and elaborate provisions are made to secure this impartiality. In general, a sufficient number are selected, from among the qualified citizens of the county or district, by the sheriff, or a similar executive officer of the court, and, in case of his disqualification, by the coroner, or, in some cases, by still other designated persons. See ELISONS. From among these the requisite number is selected at the time of trial, to whom objection may be made by the parties.

Sir Matthew Hale says that the writ to return a jury issues to the sheriff who is entrusted to elect and return the jury without the nomination of either party. The jurors were to be such persons as for estate and quality were fit to serve on that employment. They were to be of the neighborhood of the fact to be inquired, or at least of the county. Cond. Gen.

At common law jurors were selected, usually, by the sheriff or coroner. It is done in this country in various ways; by judges of election; by town authorities or by various officials or special boards or commissions. Statutory provisions as to the time and mode of selecting jurors are said to be usually directory only and need not be strictly complied with; Thomp. & Merr. Juries 44; but this is not the case with all such requirements.

In the federal courts the panel of jurors is selected by the clerk of the court and a commissioner appointed by the court, who must be taken from the opposite political party to that to which the clerk belongs; the clerk and the commissioner place names in the jury box alternately without regard to party affiliations. Any judge may order the names to be drawn from the boxes used by the state authorities in selecting jurors in the highest court of the state; no person may serve as a petit juror more than once in a year. See CHALLENGER.

Exemption. Usually public officials are exempt; and persons engaged in various classes of occupations are often exempt; thus in New York, clergymen, physicians, lawyers, professors, and teachers, persons engaged in certain kinds of manufacturing, canal officials, those employed on steam vessels, employees of railroad and telegraph companies, members of the militia and fire department, etc. Exemption is only during actual employment; 79 N. C. 660; and the right of exemption is a personal privilege and usually not a ground of challenge; 10 Kan. 288; 90 Ill. 221; or a disqualification; 11 Tex. 257; 52 Maine 828; 43 N. H. 89.

The members of an association formed to aid in the prosecution of a particular class of offences, and those who are in sympathy with the association, and contribute money for the purposes of its organization, are not competent to sit as jurors on the trial of an indictment for an offence of the class for the prosecution of which the association is formed and the money contributed; 19 So. Rep. (La.) 285. A juror was disqualified at common law by openly declaring his opinion that the party was guilty; 2 Hawk. Pl. C. ch. 43, § 27. Yet if such declaration was made from his knowledge of the case and not out of any ill-will to the party, it is no cause of challenge; 2 id. § 28.

Where a statute disqualifies persons related within certain degrees of affinity from serving as jurors on the trial of a cause to which their affinities are parties, husbands whose wives are second cousins are not affinities; 43 N. E. Rep. (Ind.) 549.

In Tennessee it has been held that a statute disqualifying from service, either on grand or petit juries, persons engaged in a conspiracy against law and order is not unconstitutional; 33 S. W. Rep. (Tenn.) 363. In this case the statute in question was for the suppression of what are known as White Caps, and disqualified for jury duty all persons who had been guilty of any offence under the statute. So also a similar disqualification of all persons violating the act for the suppression of polygamy was held valid; 114 U. S. 477.

Swear the jury. At common law it appears to have been the practice to swear each juror as he is drawn and accepted; Joy, Conf. 220; 18 Conn. 166. The present practice is to swear the entire jury after the panel is completed. Either practice is lawful; 18 Cal. 128. It is not irregular to swear all the jurors when the court opens, to try all the issues that may be brought before them; Thomp. & Merr. Juries 318; 6 Wend. 548. But this practice has been disapproved of in criminal cases on the ground of the salutary effect both on the prisoner and the jury of the formality of administering an oath in the presence of the prisoner; 22 Ill. 160. It is also considered the better practice in criminal cases to have the panel full before the oath is administered; Thomp. & Merr. Juries 319; 9 Fla. 215.

The impanelling and final acceptance of a jury by a court is a judicial determination that the jurors are competent; and if any objection to the qualifications of a juror is known to a party before such determination, it cannot be raised afterwards, unless on exception to the overruling of a challenge; 56 Mich. 184.

Influencing the jury. An attempt to influence a jury corruptly by promises, persuasions, entreaties, money, entertainments, and the like is a misdemeanor at common law; 95 N. C. 685; 2 Bish. Cr. L. 884; 2 Nev. 268; 5 Cow. 503. Arguments of counsel in open court at the trial of a cause are a legitimate use of influence and are not within this rule, but it would be a crime to take advantage of the opportunity afforded in order to influence the jurors corruptly; 70 Cal. 582. Where an attempt to influence a jury, amounting to bribery, is made, it is immaterial whether they give any verdict or not, and if they give a verdict, it is no defence that it is a true one. This crime may be committed by a juror if he corruptly attempts to influence other jurors; Cl. Cr. L. 326; or if he by indirect practices gets himself sworn on the tales to serve on one side; 1 Litt. 573.

As to the effect of improper influence on, or misconduct of, the jury, see NEW TRIAL. "If they eat and drink before or after they are agreed of their verdict, they are to be fined; only with this difference, that if they eat at their own charge, the verdict shall stand; but if at the charge of the party, it shall be set aside; 1 Leon. 133; some of them have been fined for having figs and pippins in their pockets, though they did not eat them; id.; Moor 599.

Separation during trial. At common law the jury was kept together until they had agreed upon their verdict. Even the right to adjourn a trial from day to day was doubted; 24 How. St. Tr. 414. At present jurors in civil cases are allowed to separate each day; and so in trials for misdemeanors, at the discretion of the court. In some cases also in trials for felony, even in capital cases. But in an able work the opinion is maintained that in cases of capital felonies the jury should not be allowed to separate, as they were not at common law; Thomp. & Merr. Juries 867; but absolute isolation is not required; they may be kept under the charge of a sworn officer who shall exercise a reasonable oversight; id. 870. The officer in charge must be sworn; 3 Hale, P. C. 296; and although if he be a sheriff or constable and ex officio in charge of the jury, he need not be specially sworn; 16 Wis. 294.

Affidavits of jurors will not be received to impeach a verdict; Thomp. & Merr. Juries 539, citing numerous cases; 6 Houst. 60; 89 Pac. Rep. (Cal.) 59; 50 Cal. 439; 15 Ark. 403; 45 Ill. 87. Nor will statements of third parties who derived their information from a member of the jury; Thomp. & Merr. Juries 547; 62 N. W. Rep. (Neb.) 43; 22 S. W. Rep. (Mo.) 447. The court may question the jury as to the grounds upon which they based their verdict, if there was more than one ground; 12 Metc. 281. A juror may be heard to show misconduct on the part of third parties; 7 S. & R. 458; and jurymen should report to the court any attempt to influence them; 45 Ill. 37. But affidavits appear to be admissible to impeach the verdict, in Tennessee; 7 Baxt. 273; and to a certain extent in Iowa; 20 Ia. 185; and Kansas; 22 Kan. 277; and to show that a verdict was decided by lot; 35 Ark. 109.

The province of the jury is to determine the truth of the facts in dispute in civil cases, and the guilt or innocence of the person accused in criminal cases. Thorn. Jur. § 133. See CHARGE. If they go beyond their province, their verdict may be set aside; 4 Maule & S. 192; 3 B. & C. 857; 2 Price 282; 2 Cow. 479; 10 Mass. 89.

The question whether the jury are judges of the law as well as of the fact, or whether it is the function of the court conclusively to instruct the jury upon the law, particularly in criminal cases, has been very much discussed from the earliest times and has recently been the subject of critical examination by the United States supreme court. See infra.

Coke says: "As the jury may, as often as they think fit, find a general verdict. I therefore think it unquestionable that they so far may decide upon the law as well as fact, such a verdict naturally involving both. In this I have the authority of Littleton himself, who hereafter writes, 'that if the inquest will take upon themselves the knowledge of the law upon the matter, they may give their verdict generally.'"

He further says in substance: "Questions of law generally and more properly belong to the judges. The immediate and direct right of declaring upon questions of law is entrusted to the judges; that in the jury is only incidental." Co. Litt. 156 a, n. (3).

Though the question had not, until recently, been the subject of a direct decision of the United States supreme court, it had frequently arisen in England and America. In the former country, in the case of the Dean of St. Asaph, the court alluded to the admission by both parties of an ancient rule of the common law, that the law should be determined by the court and the facts by the jury; but they differed as to what was law and what fact, it being contended on one side that the question of guilt in a libel case, after the fact of publication and truth of the innuendoes are found by the jury, was a question of law, and on the other side that the guilt of the defendant was a question of fact. This concurrence of views on the point in question "affords strong proof that, up to the period of our separation from England, the fundamental definition of trials by jury depended on the universal maxim, without an exception, ad questionem facti respondent juratores, ad questionem juris respondent judices."

The doctrine that a jury may disregard the law as declared by the court finds its principal, original support in Bushell's case, Vaughan 185, where the question was on habeas corpus whether jurors were liable to be fined and imprisoned for non-payment of fine for having found a general verdict in opposition to the instructions of the court. Vaughan, C. J., held that because a general verdict of necessity resolves "both law and fact complicately and not the fact by itself," it could not be proved that the jurors did not proceed upon their view of the evidence. This line of argument is implicitly relied upon by the advocates of the extreme right of the jury, but has been rightly characterized as narrow; though conclusive in the case to which it related; 1 Curt. C. C. 38; Hallam, Const. Hist. c. 13; 5 Gray 185. The line of argument in the English case, taken together with the criticisms upon it, well illustrate the difficulties of the subject which arise necessarily in every case which is submitted to a jury upon mixed questions of law and fact. However frankly it may be stated that the jury are bound by the views of the law delivered to them by the court, the obligation to accept those views is rather moral than susceptible of rigid practical enforcement. Early English cases supporting the doctrine that the jury are judges of the fact and not of the law are, 1 Plowd. 111; id. 233; 2 id. 493; 2 Stra. 766; Lord Hardwicke said:—"The thing that governs greatly in this determination is, that the point of the law is not to be determined by juries; juries have a power by law to determine matters of fact only; and it is of the greatest consequence to the law of England and to the subject, that these powers of the judge and the jury are kept distinct; that the judge determine the law, and the jury the fact; and if ever they come to be confounded, it will prove the confusion and destruction of the law of England." Cas. temp. Hardwicke 23. Foster, after stating the rule that the ascertainment of all the facts is the province of the jury, says:—"For the construction the law putteth upon facts stated and agreed, or found by a jury is in this, as in all other cases, undoubtedly the proper province of the court." And he adds that in cases of difficulty, a special verdict is usually found, but, where the law is clear, the jury, under the direction of the court as to the law, may, and, if well advised, always will find a general verdict conformably to such direction; Fost. Cr. L., 8d ed. 255. To the same effect, it has been urged, is the settled current of English authority; Wynne's Eunomus, Dial. III. §§ 53, 523; 1 Steph. Hist. Cr. L. 551; 2 Hawk. P. C. c. 22, § 21; 3 Term. 428; 4 Bing. 195; 8 C. & P. 94; contra, Vaughan 185; 4 B. & Ald. 145.

The question arose most frequently in England in connection with prosecutions for libel, and it was contended that Fox's Libel Act changed the common-law rule, but this was not the case. In a leading case arising under that act, it was held that it was for the judge to define the offence and then for the jury to say whether the publication under consideration was within that definition; 6 M. & W. 104 (see as to this case, 156 U. S. 97; 1 Curt. C. C. 55); 2 Jur. 137. In the House of Lords the unanimous opinion of the judges was given by Tindal, C. J., in answer to a question whether, if a fine were received in evidence, it ought to be left to the jury to say whether it barred an action of quare impedit, that "the judge who tried the cause should state to the jury whether in point of law the fine had that effect, or what other effect on the rights of the litigant parties, upon the general and acknowledged principle ad questionem juris non respondent juratores." 4 Cl. and Fin. 445.

In state courts it has been held to be "a well-settled principle, lying at the foundation of jury trials, admitted and recognized ever since jury trial had been adopted as an established and settled mode of proceeding in courts of justice, that it was the proper province and duty of judges to consider and decide all questions of law, and the proper province and duty of the jury to decide all questions of fact;" 10 Metc. 263; 5 Gray 185; 13 N. H. 536; 29 Mich. 173; 6 R. I. 83; 44 Cal. 65; 65 Vt. 1, 34 (overruling 23 id. 14, and every case which followed it); 3 J. J. Marsh. 132. The citations include both civil and criminal cases. There undoubtedly exists a power in the jury to override the law as declared by the court and to make their action effective by an acquittal in a criminal case which cannot be set aside. This has received frequent expression from judges and courts of great authority. "The unquestionable power of juries to find general verdicts, involving both law and fact, furnishes the foundation for the opinion that they are judges of the law, as well as of the facts, and gives some plausibility to that opinion. They are not, however, compelled to decide legal questions, having the right to find special verdicts, giving the facts, and leaving the legal conclusions, which result from such facts, to the court. When they find general verdicts, I think it is their duty to be governed by the instructions of the court as to all legal questions involved in such verdicts. They have the power to do otherwise, but the exercise of such power cannot be regarded as rightful, although the law has provided no means, in criminal cases, of reviewing their decisions whether of law or fact, or of ascertaining the grounds upon which their verdicts are based;" 26 N. Y. 588; see also 1 Park. Cr. Cas. 147; id. 474. In Pennsylvania there has been, in some cases, a very strong expression of the idea that in criminal cases the juries are judges of the law as well as of the fact. This was very earnestly stated by Sharswood, C. J., who said that the power of the jury to judge of the law in a criminal case was one of the most valuable securities guaranteed by the bill of rights of Pennsylvania; 89 Pa. 522; but this unqualified statement is not sustained by the leading cases in that state. In Commonwealth v. Sherry, reported in Whart. Hom. (App.) 481, Rogers, J., said: "You are, it is true, judges in a criminal case, in one sense, of both law and fact; for your verdict, as in civil cases, must pass on law and fact together. If you acquit, you interpose a final bar to a second prosecution, no matter how entirely your verdict may have been in opposition to the views expressed by the court. . . . It is important for you to keep this distinction in mind, remembering that, while you have the physical power, by an acquittal, to discharge a defendant from further prosecution, you have no moral power to do so against the law laid down by the court. . . . For your part, your duty is to receive the law, for the purposes of this trial, from the court. If an error injurious to the prisoner occurs, it will be rectified by the revision of the court in banc. But an error resulting from either a conviction or acquittal, against the law, can never be rectified. In the first case, an unnecessary stigma is affixed to the character of a man who was not guilty of the offence with which he is charged. In the second case, a serious injury is effected by the arbitrary and irremediable discharge of a guilty man. You will see from these considerations the great importance of the preservation, in criminal as well as in civil cases, of the maxim that the law belongs to the court and the facts to the jury."

Other expressions substantially to the same effect are: "If the evidence on these points fail the prisoner, the conclusion of his guilt will be irresistible, and it will be your duty to draw it;" Gibson, C. J., in 4 Pa. 269.

"The court had an undoubted right to instruct the jury as to the law, and to warn them as they did against finding contrary to it. This is very different from telling them that they must find the defendant guilty, which is what is meant by a binding instruction in criminal cases;" 90 Pa. 503. In 143 Pa. 64, it was held "that the statement by the court was the best evidence of the law within the reach of the jury, and that the jury should be guided by what the court said as to the law," and this, Paxson, C. J., speaking for the court, declared to be in harmony with the court, declared to be the expression of Sharswood, C. J., supra.

In this case Mr. Justice Mitchell filed a vigorous and very able concurring opinion in which he says: "Upon one point I would go further and put an end once for all to a doctrine that I regard as unsound in every point of view, historical, logical, or technical. . . . The jury are not judges of the law in any case, civil or criminal; neither at common law, nor under the constitution of Pennsylvania, is the determination of the law any part of their duty or their right. The notion is of modern growth and arises undoubtedly from a perversion of the history and results of the right to return a general verdict, especially in libel cases, which ended in Fox's Bill." He then considers the question historically, and on the authorities, and says that there is not a single respectable English authority for the doctrine, and that, against a "solid phalanx" of American authorities, there is but a single authority in its favor (23 Vt. 14), which was by a divided bench (and which has been since overruled; 65 Vt. 1, supra). He concludes that "the jury were never judges of the law in any case, civil or criminal, except as involved in the mixed determination of law and fact by a general verdict." In an annotation of the case in 65 Vt. 1, which overruled what is here characterized as practically the only authority in support of the doctrine, it is said: "The ghost of the doctrine that juries in criminal cases are to judge of the law as well as the facts would seem to be effectually laid by the above decision. . . . That solitary authority (23 Vt. 14), which has often been attacked and discredited, is now by the case above reported completely overruled." 19 L. R. A. 145.

In the United States courts, prior to the direct decision of the supreme court already referred to, the question had been frequently examined. The most elaborate discussion of the subject was by Mr. Justice Curtis, whose opinion is very much relied upon by the supreme court. His conclusion was "that when the constitution of the United States was founded, it was a settled rule of the common law that, in criminal as well as in civil cases, the court decided the law, and the jury the facts; and it cannot be doubted that this must have an important effect in determining what is meant by the constitution when it adopts a trial by jury." 1 Curt. C. C. 23. Following in a much later case, also by the supreme court justices, sitting on circuit, the principle was clearly laid down: "There prevails a very general, but an erroneous, opinion that in all criminal cases the jury are the judges as well of the law as of the fact—that is, that they have the right to disregard the law as laid down by the court, and to follow their own notions on the subject. Such is not the right of the jury." "It is their duty to take the law from the court and apply it to the facts of the case. It is the province of the court, and of the court alone, to determine all questions of law arising in the progress of a trial; and it is the province of the jury to pass upon the evidence and determine all contested questions of fact. The responsibility of deciding correctly as to the law rests solely with the court, and the responsibility of finding correctly the facts rests solely with the jury." Field, J., in 4 Sawy. 457; and to the same effect are, 2 Sumn. 240; 5 Blatch. 204; 5 Cra. C. C. 573; 19 Fed. Rep. 633.

The authorities which have been sometimes relied upon to support the contrary view are, 3 Dall. 1; 1 Burr's Trial 470; 2 id. 422; Whart. St. Tr. 43, 84; Chase's Trial App. 44. These authorities received a very critical examination both by Mr. Justice Curtis in 1 Curt. C. C. 23, and by Mr. Justice Harlan, who delivered the opinion of the court in Spart et al. v. United States, 156 U. S. 51; and in the dissenting opinion of Mr. Justice Gray (and except by the latter) they were not considered, when properly read, as sustaining the view in support of which they are usually cited. The opinion of Mr. Justice Harlan, last referred to, contains a full discussion of the subject, and in it will be found most of the authorities herein cited. It was held that where there was no evidence upon which the jury could properly find the defendant guilty of an offence included in it less than the one charged, it is not error to instruct them that they cannot return the verdict of any lesser offence. In support of the rule laid down in this decision, see also Cooley, Const. Lim. 333; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 49; Thomp. Tr. § 1016; and the valuable note by Dr. Wharton in 1 Crim. Law Mag. 51. By way of explanation of some of the expressions so much relied upon in support of a contrary view, Mr. Justice Harlan in his opinion referred to, supra, says: "The language of some judges and statesmen in the early history of the country, implying that the jury were entitled to disregard the law as expounded by the court, is, perhaps, to be explained by the fact that that 'in many of the states the arbitrary temper of the colonial judges, holding office directly from the crown, had made the independence of the jury in law as well as in fact of much popular importance.' Wharton's Cr. Pl. & Pr., 6th ed. § 806; Williams v. State, 32 Miss. 389, 396."

The argument for the right of the jury to decide the law in criminal cases has been most recently fully presented in the dissenting opinion of Mr. Justice Gray, with whom concurred Mr. Justice Shiras, in Spart et al. v. United States. In this opinion from a long and careful examination of the authorities, the conclusion is thus stated: "It is our deep and settled conviction, confirmed by a re-examination of the authorities under the responsibility of taking part in the consideration and decision of the capital case now before the court, that the jury, upon the general issue of guilty or not guilty in a criminal case, have the right, as well as the power, to decide, according to their own judgment and consciences, all questions, whether of law or of fact, involved in that issue." It may be noted that of three cases cited in this opinion as containing the ablest discussion of the subject on both sides, and taking the same views as that advocated by Mr. Justice Gray, two opinions, those of Chancellor Kent and Mr. Justice Thomas in favor of the right, were also dissenting opinions and that of Judge Hall, of Vermont, on the other side, the only one of the three which was an authority, has lately been overruled, as stated supra. The English authorities are very fully discussed, and much attention is given to cases which are claimed as authorities in favor of the views presented which have already been cited, supra, and of which those who argue against the right of the jury to decide the law, question either the authority or the application. The contention of this dissenting opinion is that the result of the English authorities is in favor of the ultimate right of the jury to decide the law, notwithstanding the instructions of the court, and that the earlier American authorities are to the same effect. It is admitted that in the later American cases, "the general tendency of decision in this country has been against the right of the jury, as well as in the courts of the several states, including many states where the right was once established, as in the circuit courts of the United States. The current has been so strong, that in Massachusetts, where counsel are admitted to have the right to argue the law to the jury, it has yet been held that the jury have no right to decide it, and it has also been held, by a majority of the court, that the legislature could not constitutionally confer upon the jury the right to determine, against the instructions of the court, questions of law involved in the general issue in criminal cases; and in Georgia and in Louisiana, a general provision in the constitution of the state, declaring that 'in criminal cases the jury shall be judges of the law and fact,' has been held not to authorize them to decide the law against the instructions of the court" (156 U. S. 169); to those urged with the late constitutional construction should "have far less weight than the almost unanimous voice of earlier and nearly contemporaneous judicial declarations and practical usage." These cases contain all the learning on the subject on both sides and may be referred to for the full statement and full criticism of authorities which is not practicable within the limits of this title.

Directing the verdict. The most frequent expression of the rule is that, where there is no evidence tending to prove the facts set up by the party who sustains the burden of proof, the court is bound, on request, to direct the jury to return a verdict for the opposite party; 15 Ga. 91; 36 Mo. 484; 87 id. 482. On the other hand, where there is any evidence tending to prove such facts, the court cannot so direct the verdict, but must submit the evidence to the jury and leave it to them to determine whether it is sufficient to that end; 63 Mo. 397; 85 id. 247; Thomp. Tr. § 2245.

When the testimony is all in one direction, or when all the evidence for the plaintiff has been given, and it has no tendency whatever to prove the particular issue relied on to recover, and there is no question in regard to the credibility of the witnesses who have given the evidence, the court may determine the whole case as a question of law; 36 Mo. 491; 82 Vt. 612.

It is only where the evidence, with all fair and legitimate inferences, and viewed in the most favorable light, is insufficient to justify a verdict for the plaintiff, that the court may direct a verdict for the defendant; 143 Ill. 242; 147 id. 120; 52 Fed. Rep. 87; 42 Ill. App. 536; 95 Wis. 4; see 141 N. Y. 514. A federal court may direct a verdict for either party whenever, under the state of the evidence, it would be compelled to set aside one returned the other way; 3 C. C. App. 280. Where, from the testimony before the jury, different minds might draw different conclusions, it is error to direct a verdict; 85 Neb. 372; 95 Ala. 397; 98 id. 157; 67 Hun 518; 95 Mich. 140; 8 Miss. Rep. 512. Where the right of recovery depends on questions of fact, there must be a submission to the jury; 160 Pa. 314. A direction to find for the defendant was held proper, in an action against a railroad for interference with the plaintiff's business, where no evidence was offered showing the injury caused by such interference; 154 Pa. 463. Where it is shown by an open statement of counsel for the plaintiff that the contract on which the suit is brought is void, the court may direct the jury to find a verdict for the defendant; 103 U. S. 261. There can be no serious doubt but that the court can at any time direct the jury when the facts are undisputed, and that the jury should follow such direction; id.

Insufficiency of the evidence to convict; 2 Stra. 984; 3 Blackf. 540; 2 Park. Cr. Cas. 676; 2 McLean 114; and sickness or other incapacity of a witness; 1 Crawford & D. 181; 1 Mood. 186; Jebb 270; are not sufficient necessities to warrant the discharge of a jury. See 17 Pick. 399; 2 Gall. 364; 3 Benn. & H. L. Cr. Cas. 337; JEOPARDY.

It is within the discretion of the trial judge to refuse to discharge the jury until they arrive at a verdict; 2 Misc. Rep. 127. A jury may be discharged from giving any verdict, whenever the court is of the opinion that there is a manifest necessity for the act, or that the ends of public justice would otherwise be defeated, and may even order a trial before another jury, and a defendant is not thereby twice put in jeopardy; 153 U. S. 271.

When a jury in a criminal case is discharged during the trial, and the defendant subsequently put on trial before another jury, he is not thereby twice put in jeopardy within the meaning of the fifth amendment to the United States constitution; 142 U. S. 148.

Duties and privileges of. Qualified persons may be compelled to serve as jurors under penalties prescribed by law. They are exempt from arrest in certain cases. See PRIVILEGE. They are liable to punishment for misconduct in some cases.

The federal constitution provides (Am. vii.) that "no fact tried by a jury shall be otherwise re-examined in any court of the United States, than according to the rules of the common law." This includes only a new trial or proceedings in an appellate court; it applies to the facts tried by a jury in a state court, and renders invalid an act providing for the removal of a cause from a state to a federal court after it has been tried in the former; 9 Wall. 274.

A frequent variation from the common-law jury system is to permit the jury to impose the punishment (this being formerly considered a matter for judicial discretion), or, as in some states, to divide the responsibility between the judge and jury; and such legislation is held constitutional; 7 Ind. 382; 70 Ia. 442; 1 Bish. N. Cr. L. § 984.

In criminal cases, in Scotland, a jury consists of fifteen and a majority may convict. In Belgium, criminal and political charges and offences of the press are tried before a jury. Trial by jury has existed in Greece since 1834. In Sweden it exists in cases of offences of the press; and in Italy, in criminal cases, and a majority may convict. In Norway, it was established in 1887, and there also a majority may convict. In Russia, since 1864, all criminal cases involving severe penalties, except political offences, are tried by juries. Hawaii has a jury of twelve, both in civil and criminal cases, of whom nine may render a verdict. In South America, all the states have the jury system. In France, trial by jury exists in cases of felony, and it is provided in Germany, by the imperial code, in all criminal cases except treason, political crimes and offences of the press.

JURY BOX. A place set apart for the jury to sit in during the trial of a cause.

JURY LIST. A paper containing the names of jurors impanelled to try a cause, or it contains the names of all the jurors summoned to attend court.

JURYMEN. A juror; one who is impanelled on a jury. Webster, Dict.

JURY PROCESS. In Practice. The writs for summoning a jury, viz.: in England, venire juratores facias, and distingas juratores, or habeas corpora juratorum. These writs are now abolished, and jurors are summoned by precept. Chitty, Archb. 344; Com. Law Proc. Act, 1852, § 104; 3 Chitty, Stat. 519.

JURY OF WOMEN. A jury of women is given in two cases; viz.: on writ de ventre inspiciendo, which was a writ directed to the sheriff, commanding him that, in the presence of twelve men and as many women, he cause examination to be made whether a woman therein named is with child or not, and if with child, then about what time it will be born, and that he certify the same. It is granted in a case when a widow, whose husband had lands in fee-simple, marries again soon after her husband's death, and declares herself pregnant by her first husband, and, under that pretext, withholds the lands from the next heir; Cro. Eliz. 506; Fleta, lib. 1, c. 15. In that case, although the jury was made up of men and women, the examination was made by the latter; 1 Madd. Ch. 11; 2 P. Wms. 591. Such a writ was issued in the case of In re Blackburn, 14 L. J. N. S. Ch. 336. In New York it is said that an application was made for such a jury in the Rollwagen will case and denied upon the ground that "as the lady was not going to be hanged and did not herself solicit the investigation, there was no power to compel her to submit to it;" 10 Alb. L. J. 3. In the opinion of the court in 141 U. S. 250 the statement is made by Mr. Justice Gray that this writ has never been used in this country. The authorities cited in this title show that this statement is too broad both as to the use of the common-law writ and as to physical examination, which title see further as to this case.

Where pregnancy is pleaded by a condemned woman, in delay of execution, a jury of twelve discreet matrons was called from those in court, who were impanelled to try the fact and report to the court. They chose a fore-matron from their own number. On their returning a verdict of "enfeinte," the execution was delayed until the birth, and in some cases the punishment was commuted to perpetual exile. When the criminal was merely præsumptively enfeinte, and not quick (see QUICKENING), there was no respite. See 2 Hale, Pl. Cr. 412; Taylor, Med. Jur., Bell's ed. 520; Archb. Cr. Pl. 187. The proceeding has been said to be obsolete, though it has been recognized in America; and at a very recent date in England, in Reg. v. Webster, tried before Lord Denman at the Old Bailey in London in July, 1879. The plea of pregnancy was interposed before sentence, and immediately "a jury of matrons selected from a crowd of females in the gallery were impanelled" and sworn, and the inquisition was held forthwith before the judge. The result was a verdict that the prisoner was not quick with child and she was sentenced. The verbatim report of the proceedings may be found in 9 Cent. L. J. 94. In State v. Arden, 1 Bay 487, the plea was allowed and an inquisition held, but the prisoner was found not pregnant and sentenced to death. In State v. Holeman, 13 Ark. 105, the plea was overruled in a larceny case where a woman was convicted of a penitentiary offence. In the case of Mrs. Bathsheba Spooner, who was tried in Massachusetts in 1778 for the murder of her husband, she being under sentence of death, petitioned the governor and council for a respite on account of pregnancy. A writ de ventre inspiciendo was issued by the council to the sheriff directing him to summon a jury of two men, midwives and twelve discreet and lawful matrons "to ascertain the truth of her plea." The verdict was that she "is not quick with child," and she was executed, but a post mortem examination proved that her assertion was true; 3 Harv. L. Rev. 44; 89 Alb. L. J. 326.

It is difficult to see by what reason or authority this proceeding can be assumed not to be available, according to the course of the common law, in jurisdictions in which that system of jurisprudence is in force, particularly where, as in some states, it is imbedded in the constitution. It has been said on this point: "While the cases are very rare, there is no evidence (or authority, it might be added) that a jury of women is not a part of the machinery of the law in those states in which the common law prevails." 12 A. & E. Encyc. of L. 831.

It may be safely affirmed that no woman who pleads pregnancy in delay of execution will in any common-law jurisdiction be sentenced to death without examination into the truth of the fact pleaded, and in the absence of other statutory provision, it is difficult to see how she could be deprived of this common-law right. It is undoubtedly true that the proceeding is antiquated and ill adapted to the purpose, and therefore the subject is well worthy of legislative attention. Doubtless the rarity of such legislation is due to the infrequency of capital trials of women. In one state at least the contingency is provided for. In New York it is provided by statute that if there is reasonable ground to believe that a female defendant sentenced to death is pregnant, a jury of six physicians shall be impanelled to inquire into the fact, and if it is found by the inquisition that she is "quick with child," the execution is to be suspended until the governor issues a warrant directing it, which he may do as soon as he is satisfied that she is no longer "quick with child," or he may commute her punishment to imprisonment for life; N. Y. Code Crim. Proc. §§ 501-3. See DE VENTRE INSPICIENDO; REPRISAL.

JURY WHEEL. A mechanical contrivance, usually a circular box revolving on a crank, in which the names of persons subject to jury duty are placed, by the officers, and at the times and places prescribed by law, and from which the proper number to constitute the jury panels for any particular term of court are drawn by lot.

JUS (Lat.). Law; right; equity. Story, Eq. Jur. § 1. In the Roman law the word had two distinct meanings. It was either a body of law, as the jus honorarium, or an individual right, as the jus suffragii. See Sohm, Inst. Rom. L. § 7, where this distinction is developed in the course of a discussion of fundamental conceptions. A third use of the word was in apposition to judicium, as to which see IN JUDICIO; IN JURE; JUDEX; LEX.

JUS ABUTENDI (Lat.). The right to abuse. By this phrase is understood the right to abuse property, or having full dominion over property. 8 Toullier, n. 66. The right of destruction or consumption, and free disposition. Morey, Rom. L. 283. See DOMINIUM JUS UTENDI.

JUS ACCRESCENDI (Lat.). The right of survivorship. See SURVIVOR.

In Roman Law. The right of accretion. This exists in two cases: According to the general rule a person could not die partly testate and partly intestate, and if any part of the estate was unprovided for, either by the oversight of the testator or any of the heirs, it was ratably distributed among the heirs; Morey, Rom. L. 825; so if the same thing were left to two or more persons each took an equal share; if one of them should die before he had received the legacy, the share of the one so dying passed to the remaining joint legatee or legatees by this right; id. 834. It has been suggested that the germ of this right is to be found in the succession by necessity; Sohm, Inst. Rom. L. § 100.

JUS ACTUS. In Roman Law. A rural servitude giving to a person a passage for carriages, or for cattle.

JUS AD REM (Lat.). In Civil Law. A right to a thing. It is generally treated as a right to property not in possession, as distinguished from jus in re, which implies the absolute dominion. In English law, this distinction is illustrated by Blackstone, by reference to ecclesiastical promotions, where, although the freehold passes to the person promoted, corporal possession is required to vest the property completely in the new proprietor, who acquires jus ad rem, an inchoate, or imperfect, right of nomination and institution, but not the jus in re, or complete and full right, unless by corporal possession; 2 Bla. Com. 312. The distinction expressed by these terms in the Roman law is analogous to the common-law distinction between the effect of a right of entry and that of actual entry, which in English real property law is expressed in the maxim non jus, sed servitus, facit stipitem; id. Jus ad rem is said to be merely an abridged expression for jus ad rem acquirendam, and it properly denotes the right to the acquisition of a thing. Austin, Jur. Lect. 14; Moz. & W.

"On this distinction between claims to things advanced against all men, and those advanced primarily against particular men, is based the division of rights into real and personal expressed by writers of the middle ages, on the analogy of terms found in the writings of the Roman jurists, by the phrases jura in re and jura ad rem. A real right, a jus in re, or, to use the equivalent phrase preferred by some later commentators, jus in rem, is a right to have a thing to the exclusion of all other men. A personal right, jus ad rem, or, to use a much more correct expression, jus in personam, is a right in which there is a person who is the subject of right, as well as a thing as its object, a right which gives its possessor a power to oblige another person to give, or procure, or do, or not do, something." Sand. Inst. Just. Intro. xlviii.

A right which belongs to a person only mediately and relatively, and has for its foundation an obligation incurred by a particular person.

The jus in re, by the effect of its very nature, is independent and absolute, and is exercised per se ipsum, by applying it to its object; but the jus ad rem is the faculty of demanding and obtaining the performance of some obligation by which another is bound to me ad aliquid dandum vel faciendum, vel praestandum. Thus, if I had the ownership of a horse, the usufruct of a flock of sheep, the right of habitation of a house, a right of way over your land, etc., my right in the horse, in the flock of sheep, in the house, or the land, belongs to me directly, and without any intermediary; it belongs to me absolutely, and independently of any particular relation with another person. I am in direct and immediate relation with the thing itself which forms the object of my right, without reference to any other relation. This constitutes a jus in re. If, on the other hand, the horse is lent to me by you, or if I have a claim against you for a thousand dollars, my right to the horse or to the sum of money exists only relatively, and can only be exercised through you; my relation to the object of the right is mediate, and is the result of the immediate relation of debtor and creditor existing between you and me. This is a jus ad rem. Every jus in re, of real right, may be vindicated by the actio in rem against him who is in possession of the thing, or against any one who contests the right. It has been said that the words jus in re of the civil law convey the same idea as thing in possession at common law. This is an error, arising from a confusion of ideas as to the distinctive characters of the two classes of rights. Nearly all the common-law writers seem to take it for granted that by the jus in re is intended the title or property in a thing in the possession of the owner; and that by the jus ad rem is meant the title or property in a thing not in the possession of the owner. But it is obvious that possession is not one of the elements constituting the jus in re; although possession is generally, but not always, one of the incidents of this right, yet the loss of possession does not exercise the slightest influence on the character of the right itself, unless it should continue for a sufficient length of time to destroy the right altogether by prescription. In many instances the jus in re is not accompanied by possession at all; the usufruct is not entitled to the possession of the thing subject to his use; still, he has a jus in re. So with regard to the right of way, etc. See DOMINION.

A mortgage is considered by most writers as a jus in re; but it is clear that it is a jus ad rem: it is granted for the sole purpose of securing the payment of a debt or the fulfillment of some other personal obligation. In other words, it is an accessory to a principal obligation and corresponding right; it can have no separate and independent existence. The immovable on which I have a mortgage is not the object of the right, as in the case of the horse of which I am the owner, or the house of which I have the right of habitation, etc.; the true object of my right is the sum of money due to me, the payment of which I may enforce by obtaining a decree for the sale of the property mortgaged. 2 Marcadé 350.

JUS AELIANUM. A body of laws upon the same plan as the jus flavianum (q. v.) though more complete. It was published about B. C. 200 by Sextus Aelius and consisted of three parts: (1) The law of the XII. Tables; (2) The interpretation of the same; (3) The description of the legis actiones or forms of procedure. Morey, Rom. L. 85.

JUS AESNECIAE. The right of the eldest-born to inherit; primogeniture.

JUS ALBINATUS. The right of the king by confiscation or escheat to the property of a deceased foreigner unless he had a peculiar exemption. This prerogative was abolished in 1790. Moz. & W.; 1 Bla. Com. 372; 2 Steph. Com. 409, n. It was the Droit d'Aubaine of the French law, which title see.

JUS ANGLORUM. The laws and customs of the West Saxons, in the time of the Heptarchy, by which the people were for a long time governed, and which were preferred before all others. Wharton.

JUS AQUAEDUCTUS (Lat.). In Civil Law. The name of a servitude which gives to the owner of land the right to bring down water through or from the land of another, either from its source or from any other place.

Its privilege may be limited as to the time when it may be exercised. If the source fails, the servitude ceases, but revives when the water returns. If the water rises in, or naturally flows through, the land, its proprietor cannot by any grant divert it so as to prevent it flowing to the land below; 2 Rolle, Abr. 140, l. 25; Lois des Bat. part 1, c. 3, s. 1, art. 1. But if it had been brought into his land by artificial means, it seems it would be strictly his property, and that it would be in his power to grant it; Dig. 8. 3. 1, 10; 3 Burge, Conf. Laws 417. See Washb. Easem.; Liver; WATER-COURSE.

JUS AQUAHAUSTUS. In Roman Law. A rural servitude giving to a person a right of watering cattle on another's field, or of drawing water from another's well.

JUS AQUUM. Equitable law. A term used by the Romans to express the adaptation of the law to the circumstances of the individual case as opposed to jus strictum (q. v.).

JUS BELLI. So much of international law as regulates the relations of nations to each other with respect to a state of war, including belligerency and neutrality, which several titles see.

The right of war so far as it concerns the treatment which may be properly accorded to an enemy; Grot. De Bell. et Pac. l. 1, § 3.

JUS BELLUM DICENDI. The right of making a declaration of war.

JUS CIVILE (Lat.). In Roman Law. The private law, in contradistinction to the public law, or jus gentium. 1 Savigny, Dr. Rom. c. 1, § 1.

The local law of the city of Rome. It is said that the twelve tables marked the starting-point in the development of the Roman law so far as it can be historically authenticated, and that its development advanced steadily in uninterrupted progression until it culminated in the corpus juris civilis of Justinian; Sohm, Inst. Rom. L. § 10. It is, however, rather more accurate to say that the culmination of the Roman law, as a system, was not reached until the period of the development side by side of the jus civile and jus gentium. For an interesting discussion of the origin and growth of this system, see Morey, Rom. L. 14, 24. See JUS GENTIUM. JUS SCRIPTUM.

JUS CIVITATIS (Lat.). In Roman Law. The full franchise of citizenship, comprising, on the one hand, public rights, including the right of holding office and the right of voting; and on the other hand, private rights, including the right to hold and dispose of property, according to the forms of the civil law, and the right of marriage, and all domestic relations. Morey, Rom. L. 48.

The collection of laws which are to be observed among all the members of a nation. It is opposed to jus gentium, which is the law which regulates the affairs of nations among themselves. 2 Lepage, El. du Dr. c. 5, 1. It was very much what is understood in modern terminology by municipal law.

JUS CLOACAE (Lat.). In Civil Law. The name of a servitude which requires the party who is subject to it to permit his neighbor to conduct the waters which fall on his grounds over those of the servient estate.

JUS COMMUNE. The common law, applicable to all persons alike. The ordinary law, as opposed to jus singulare (q. v.). Also, common right; natural justice. Abbott.

JUS CORONAE. The right of succession to the throne of Great Britain. See UNITED KINGDOM OF GREAT BRITAIN AND IRELAND.

JUS CURIALITATIS ANGLIÆ. The right of curtesy. See CURTESY.

JUS DARE (Lat.). To enact or to make the law. Jus dare belongs to the legislature; jus dicere, to the judge.

JUS DELIBERANDI (Lat.). The right of deliberating, given to the heir, in those countries where the heir may have benefit of inventory (q. v.), in which to consider whether he will accept or renounce the succession.

In Louisiana he is allowed ten days before he is required to make his election. La. Civ. Code art. 1023.

JUS DEVOLUTUM. A phrase formerly used in Scotch ecclesiastical law to designate the right which devolved on the presbytery to present a minister to a vacant parish or benefice, in case the patron should neglect to exercise his right within the time limited by law, by presenting within six months a properly qualified person. Int. Cy.

JURE DICENDI. In the Roman Law. The right to publish edicts. An attribute of Roman magistrates. English.

JUS DICERE (Lat.). To declare the law. It is the province of the court jus dicere, to declare what the law is.

JUS DISPONENDI (Lat.). The right to dispose of a thing.

In a general sense it means the right of alienation, and is frequently applied in the case of a married woman with respect to her separate estate. In a special or limited sense, it is applied to the reservation by a vendor of chattels or the ultimate ownership of goods with the possession of which he has parted. It is said to be often a matter of great nicety to determine upon a contract of sale, whether or not the vendor's purpose or intention was to reserve a jus disponendi. Benj. Sales, Ch. VI. § 382. See SALE.

The reservation of this right is essential where the property in the thing sold is reserved as a security for deferred payments or purchase-money, and it is permitted in many cases in which it is not permissible at common law. The great increase in the number of transactions in which such reservation is customary, as car trusts, installment sales, etc., makes the subject one of increased importance and interest.

JUS DISTRAHENDI. The right of sale of goods pledged in case of non-payment. See PLEDGE; DISTRESS.

JUS DIVIDENDI. The right of testamentary disposition of real estate.

JUS DUPLICATUM (Lat. double right). When a man has the possession as well as the property of anything, he is said to have a double right, jus duplicatum. Bracton, l. 4, tr. 4, c. 1; 2 Bla. Com. 199.

JUS EDICERE, JUS EDICENDI. The right to issue edicts. It belonged to all the higher magistrates, but special interest is attached to the prætorian edicts in connection with the history of Roman law. See PRÆTOR.

JUS EX NON SCRIPTO. Law constituted by custom or such usage as indicates the tacit consent of the community.

The definition of Ulpian was: "Quidnam consuetudo pro jure et lege in his quæ non ex scripto descendunt, observari solet." D. 1, 3, 33. This is well, though freely, translated thus: "Whatever has existed for a long period of time, and is in harmony with the moral judgments of the community is regarded as having the force of law, and the judicial authority is bound to recognize it as such, even though it has never been expressed in a legal enactment." Morey, Rom. L. 223. The same author says with respect to such law: "It was also a maxim of the Romans, that not only can laws be established by custom; they can also be abrogated by custom—that is, by contrary usage. It is unnecessary to consider here the objections raised by some modern jurists, such as Austin, to this view of customary, or unwritten, law. It is enough for our present purpose to say that this was the conception of the Roman jurists regarding the origin of a portion of the positive law, and a conception which has been adopted by the majority of modern civilians." Id. Another phrase by which the law was known was jus moribus constitutum. See LAW.

JUS FECIALE (Lat.). In Roman Law. Feclal law (q. v.). It has been termed that species of international law which had its foundation in the religious belief of different nations: such as the international law which now exists among the Christian people of Europe. Savigny, Dr. Rom. c. 2, § 11. But the earlier writers on the civil law gave to it more of a characterization as international law than is attributed to it by the more thoughtful modern writers. See FECIAL LAW; INTERNATIONAL LAW.

JUS FIDUCIARUM (Lat.). In Civil Law. A right to something held in trust. For this there was a remedy in conscience.

2 Bla. Com. 828. See FIDEI COMMISSUM.

JUS FLAVIANUM. A publication of the legis actiones or a practical manual of the procedure, including a list of dies fasti (q. v.).

Of this publication it is said: "The first step which led to the decline of the legis actiones was due to their publication. As long as the knowledge of legal forms was restricted to the patrician class, the people at large were helpless in their efforts to obtain an impartial administration of justice." Morey, Rom. L. 86. The author was Cnæus Flavius, who was a scribe or clerk of Appius Claudius. His publication was a. c. 804. It was followed about a century later by the Jus Etianum (q. v.). See also Sohm, Inst. Rom. L. § 14, n. 2.

JUS FODIENDI. In Civil Law. The name of a rural servitude which permits digging on the land of another. Inst. 2, 3, 2; Dig. 8, 3, 1, 1. A similar right was recognized in early English law; Bract. 222.

JUS GENTIUM (Lat.). The law of nations. It has been said that although the Romans used these words in the sense we attach to law of nations, yet among them the sense was much more extended. Falck, Encyc. Jur. 102, n. 42. It has been termed a system made up by the early Roman lawyers of the common ingredients in the customs of the old Italian tribes, for the purpose of adjudicating questions arising in Rome between foreigners or natives and foreigners. Maine, Anc. Law 49.

The jus gentium is differently characterized by the later writers on the civil law from the meaning given to the phrase by the earlier writers who treated it, as more identical with the idea of modern international law than it is now considered to have been.

The distinction between the jus gentium and the jus civile is thus admirably expressed: "The jus gentium, on the other hand, came to be regarded as a universal law of all mankind, common to all nations, because resting on the nature of things and the general sense of equity which obtains among all men, the 'jus gentium quod apud omnes gentes per seque custoditur,' a sort of natural law, exacting recognition everywhere in virtue of its inherent reasonableness. It would, however, be erroneous to suppose that the Romans attempted to introduce a code of nature such as the philosophers had devised. The jus gentium was, and never had been anything else but a portion of positive Roman law, which commercial usage and other sources of law, more especially the prætorian edict (q. v.), had clothed in a concrete form. Nor again must it be imagined that the Romans simply transferred a portion of foreign (Hellenic) law bodily into their own system. In the few quite exceptional cases where they did so (as e. g. in the case of hypotheca), they did not fail to impress their institutions with a national Roman character. The antithesis between jus civile and jus gentium was merely the outward expression of the growing consciousness that Roman law, in absorbing the element of greater freedom, was commencing to discard its national peculiarities and transform itself from the special local law of a city into a general law for the civilized world. The jus gentium was that part of the private law of Rome which was essentially in accordance with the private law of other nations, more especially with that of the Greeks, which would naturally predominate along the seaboard of the Mediterranean. In other words, jus gentium was that portion of the positive law of Rome which appeared to the Romans themselves in the light of a 'ratio scripta,' of a law which obtains among all nations and is common to all mankind." Sohm, Inst. Rom. L. § 13.

The origin of the jus gentium was undoubtedly to be found in the adjustment of the Roman law to the relations existing between Roman citizens and foreigners, and between foreigners themselves. The growth of a different system was a not unnatural result of the administration of law in cases where both parties were not Roman citizens, by the foreign prætors, who were not bound by the strict rules of the jus civile, but from going about from place to place, and administering a kind of equitable jurisdiction in the settlement of disputes, they might not inaptly be termed peripatetic or itinerant arbitrators. The growth of a system of law administered by them alongside of the jus civile was not unlike the growth of the equity jurisprudence alongside of the common law. Then, too, the fact that these officers were constantly engaged in settling disputes, to which at least one party was a foreigner, naturally led to their becoming familiar with the principles of other systems of law, and in applying them to the case in hand, so far as they commended themselves to their sense of justice. The new system was afterwards extended to the whole non-citizen class. And while in the first instance it was treated as an entirely distinct system from the jus civile, it gradually supplanted the latter, and by a process which was originally the absorption of much of the jus gentium into the jus civile, it subsequently became recognized as a constituent part of Roman Law, and was gradually welded into a complete system of jurisprudence. See Morey, Rom. L. 59-71; INTERNATIONAL LAW; JUS CIVILE; JUS NATURAL.

JUS GLADIJ (Lat. the right of the sword). Supreme jurisdiction. The right to absolve from or condemn a man to death.

JUS HABENDI (Lat.). The right to have a thing. The right to be put into actual possession of property to which one is entitled.

JUS HABENDI ET RETINENDI. The right to have and retain the offerings, tithes, and profits of a parsonage or rectory. Toml.; Moz. & W.

JUS HEREDITATIS. The right of succession as an heir, or of inheritance. See DESCENT AND DISTRIBUTION; HERES; HEIR.

JUS HONORARIUM. In Civil Law. A name applied to the prætorian edicts and also to the edicts of the curule ædiles, when on certain occasions they were published. Inst. 1, 3, 7.

This system of law was simply the usual development of an expanding and elastic jurisprudence, which naturally resulted from the increase in Rome of population and power, and the greater complication of her civilization; Howe, Stud. Civ. L. 10; it was spoken of as having a distinct place by the side, and as the complement, of the jus civile; Sand. Introd. Inst. Just. xxi. It was a system of judge-made law (q. v.) in the proper sense. Its vigorous development was coincident with the formulary procedure, which was well adapted to give it scope and effect; Sohm, Introd. Rom. L. 179.

Its place and function in the Roman jurisprudence are thus described: "The prætorian law, being a law made by officials, 'jus honorarium,' was opposed to the jus civile, i. e. law, in the strict and proper sense of the term, the law made by the people, developed by popular enactments and popular customs. Thus both the jus civile and the jus honorarium contained elements of jus gentium, but in the jus honorarium, the influence of the jus gentium predominated. The prætorian edict was, in the main, the instrument by means of which the free principles of jus æquum gained their victory over the older jus strictum. Though at first the edict may merely have served the purpose of giving fuller effect to the jus civile, and then of supplementing the jus civile, nevertheless, in the end, borne along by the current of the times, it boldly assumed the function of reforming the civil law." Id. 54. See JUDEX; PRÆTOR; JUS PRÆTORIUM.

JUS HONORUM. In Roman Law. The right of holding offices. See JUS SUFFRAGII.

JUS IMAGINIS. In Roman Law. The right of displaying the pictures and statues of one's ancestors, somewhat as in the English law of Heraldry, there is a right to the coat-of-arms.

JUS IMMUNITATIS. The law of exemption from the liability to hold public office.

JUS INCOGNITUM (Lat.). An unknown law. This term is applied by the civilians to obsolete laws, which, as Bacon truly observes, are unjust; for the law to be just must give warning before it strikes. Bacon, Aph. 8, a. 1; Bowyer, Mod. Civ. Law 83. But until it has become obsolete no custom can prevail against it. See OBSELETE.

JUS INTRANDI. See JUS RECURRENDI.

JUS ITALICUM. In Roman Law. A right bestowed upon a community by which it acquired "the privileges of a colonia Italica (i. e. an old colony of Roman citizens endowed with full legal rights), that its soil is therefore exempt from the land-tax and capable of quiritary ownership, in other words, is placed on the same footing as the fundus italicus." Heisterberg, Name und Begriff des Jus Italicum (1885). Sohm, Inst. Rom. L. § 22, n. 2.

JUS ITINERIS. In Roman Law. A rural servitude giving to a person the right to pass over an adjoining field, on foot or horseback.

JUS LATII. The right or privilege conferred upon the various communities of Latium.

This has been termed a "kind of qualified citizenship (civitas sine suffragio), such as Rome had in early times, granted to the inhabitants of Cera." Morey, Rom. L. 60. These rights originally included the rights of intermarriage and of commercial intercourse between Rome and the inhabitants of the Latin towns. The author last cited says: "The possession of these rights formed the essential feature of the early Jus Latii or Latinitas. In later times, however, the right which went under this name and which was bestowed upon the Latin colonies outside of Latium, included the commercium only." Id. Sohm says that from the earliest times the members of the town communities of Latium who were the original Latins had the same private marriage law as the Romans. It was, in fact, their original law, and it was because they were allies governed by the same law that they enjoyed the jus commercii and the jus connubii of the Romans. They did not, of course, possess the public rights of a Roman until the powerful interest attaching to these rights resulted in the granting of Roman citizenship first to the Latin allies then to all the Italian communities; Sohm, Inst. Rom. L. § 22. There were two forms of the jus latii, latium majus which was the older and usual one, and the latium minus. In communities in the former, only officials acquired Roman civitas. In those which had the latter it was extended to the decuriones. See DECAVIRI; Id. § 22, n. 2. Another authority confines the two forms to magistrates and defines them thus: "The latium majus relating to the dignity of Roman citizens not only the magistrate himself, but also his wife and children; the latium minus relating to that dignity only the magistrate himself." Bro. L. Dict.

JUS LEGITIMUM (Lat.). In Civil Law. A legal right which might have been enforced by due course of law. 2 Bla. Com. 328.

JUS LIBERORUM. In Roman Law. The privilege conferred upon a woman who had three or four children. In order that she should be able to take all the property given her by will, she must have had this privilege conferred upon her. Sohm, Inst. Rom. L. § 86. In the time of Hadrian, a decree was made conferring upon a mother, as such, who, being an ingenua, had the jus trium liberorum, or being a libertina, the jus quatuor liberorum, a civil law right to succeed her intestate children; Id. § 98.

Another author defines this privilege as one by which exemption was given from all troublesome offices. Brown, L. Dict. And still another ascribes to it exemption from guardianship, priority of office-holding and a treble proportion of corn. Ad. Rom. Ant. 227.

JUS MANENDI. See JUS SPATIENDI.

JUS MARITI (Lat.). In Scotch Law. The right of the husband to administer, during the marriage, his wife's goods and the rents of her heritage.

In the common law, by jus mariti is understood the rights of the husband, as jus mariti cannot attach upon a bequest to the wife, although given during coverture, until the executor has assented to the legacy. 1 Bail. Eq. 214.

JUS MERUM (Lat.). A simple or bare right; a right to property in land, without possession, or the right of possession. See JUS PROPRIETATIS.

JUS MORIBUS CONSTITUTUM. See JUS EX NON SCRIPTO.

JUS NATURALE. The name given to those rules of conduct which are universally binding upon men and which are sanctioned by the dictates of right reason, as opposed to rules of conduct prescribed and enforced by the sovereign power of the state which are called positive law, known to the Romans as jus civile, and in modern jurisprudence as municipal law.

A much quoted definition of Ulpian was that which nature attaches to animals. Of this it has been said that it is peculiar, and the conception exercised little or no influence upon the judicial thought of Rome. Morey, Rom. L. 111, where also are collected many definitions of the Roman jurists. Sandars considers the passage from Ulpian unfortunately borrowed by Justinian and thereby removed from the connection in which it was used, which was a subsidiary and divergent line of thought, and had nothing to do with the main theory. Accordingly "in considering what the Roman jurists meant by jus naturale this fragment of Ulpian may be dismissed almost entirely from our notice." Sand. Inst. Just. 7.

The conception of the jus naturale came from the Stoics and has been termed "by far the most important addition to the system of Roman law, which the jurists introduced from Greek philosophy." Sand. Inst. Just. introd. xxix. And Maine says of it that "the importance of this theory to mankind has been very much greater than its philosophical deficiencies would lead us to expect." Anc. L. 71.

While it is undoubtedly true that the highest conception of law is the natural law and positive law should be entirely harmonious, it is in the domain of international law that this conception more nearly approaches realization. The jus gentium was a system largely based upon the jus naturale, and it is due to that fact that the Roman system so largely formed the basis upon which Grotius commenced to build, the system which has developed into modern international law. It has been said that while he "rejected Ulpian's definition of the jus naturale, he accepted the idea of natural law expressed in the jus gentium of the Romans as a body of principles based upon the common reason of mankind. It was therefore possible for him to extend the equitable principles already developed in the Roman jus gentium to the relations existing between sovereign states. States were looked upon as moral persons—subjects of the natural law, and as equal to each other in their moral rights and obligations." Morey, Rom. L. 208. See JUS GENTIUM: LAW OF NATURE: LAW.

It was distinguished from the jus civile, in being based on natural and universal, rather than artificial and local, precepts. It applied to all living beings, human or otherwise. Hunter's Rom. L. 2nd ed., 117-119. See LAW OF NATURE.

JUS NECIS. See JUS VITAE NECISQUE.

JUS NON SACRUM. In Roman Law. That portion of the jus publicum which regulated the duties of magistrates.

Non-sacred law; that which dealt with the duties of civil magistrates, the preservation of public order, and the rights and duties of persons in their relation to the state. Morey, Rom. L. 228. It was analogous to that which would now be called the police power.

JUS NON SCRIPTUM. See JUS EX NON SCRIPTO.

JUS ONERIS FERENDI. An urban servitude in the Roman Law, the owner of which had the right of supporting and building upon the house wall of another.

JUS PAPIRIANUM. A collection of leges regia said to have been collected from the early periods of Roman history in the time of Romulus, Numa, and other kings.

They were a private compilation described as "fragments of a collection," which, though clearly showing the religious spirit of the early law, are yet meagre and unsatisfactory. Morey, Rom. L. 25. Though a private collection, it is suggested that they received the name of royal laws merely because the regulations which they contained were placed under the immediate protection of the kings. They were concerned in the main with sacred matters, i. e. they were essentially of a religious and moral character, and bear clear testimony to the closeness of the original connection between law and religion; Sohm, Inst. Rom. L. § 11, n. 2.

The civil law of Papirius. The title of the earliest collection of Roman law, also said to have been made in the time of Tarquin, the last of the kings, by a pontifex maximus of the name of Sextus or Publius Papirius. Dig. 1. 2. 2. 2. Very few fragments of this collection now remain, and the authenticity of these has been doubted. Burrill; 1 Kent's Com. 517.

JUS PASCENDI. In Roman Law. The rural servitude giving the right of pasturage on another's land.

JUS PATRONATUS (Lat.). In Ecclesiastical Law. A commission from the bishop, directed usually to his chancellor and others of competent learning, who are required to summon a jury, composed of six clergymen and six laymen, to inquire into and examine who is the rightful patron. 3 Bla. Com. 248.

JUS IN PERSONAM. A personal right. Considered by some writers as a more correct expression for jus ad rem, which see. According to the Roman law, property could not be transferred by mere agreement. The latter, even though in form a legal contract, had the effect only of expressing the intention of the parties and creating a personal right against the one making the agreement in a real right to the property itself. Morey, Rom. L. 807. See JUS AD REM.

A right which gives its possessor a power to oblige another person to give or procure, to do or not to do, something. R. & L. Dict. See IN PERSONAM.

JUS PERSONARUM (Lat.). The right of persons. See JURA PERSONARUM.

JUS PISCANDI. See JUS VENANDI ET PISCANDI.

JUS POSSESSIONIS. The simple right of possession which may exist independently of ownership.

"Possession and ownership may, and generally do, coincide. But as a person may be the owner of a thing and not possess it, so a person may be the possessor of a thing and not be the owner. It is when the possessor is not the legal owner that it becomes important to consider to what rights he is entitled by virtue of his possession." Morey, Rom. L. 208. See JUS POSSESSORIUM.

JUS POSSIDENDI. The right of possessing, which is the legal consequence of ownership. It is to be distinguished from the jus possessionis (q. v.), which is a right to possess which may exist without ownership.

JUS POSTLIMINII (Lat.). The right to claim property after recapture. See POSTLIMINIUM.

JUS PRÆTORIUM. A body of laws developed from the exercise of discretion by the prætors, as distinguished from the leges or positive law. See PRÆTOR.

JUS PRECARIUM (Lat.). In Civil Law. A right to a thing held for another, for which there was no remedy. 3 Bla. Com. 328.

JUS PRESENTATIONIS. The right of presentation.

JUS PRIVATUM. The municipal law of the Romans as distinguished from the jus publicum.

"The relations of power subsisting between persons and the world of things, or the equivalents of things, are the subject-matter of private law. Private law, in other words, has to do with the dominion of persons over things. Its pit is, therefore, contained in the law of property. The subject-matter of public law are the relations of power which subsist between persons and persons. Here, the power is ideal, in the sense that its object is the free-will of another, i. e. something invisible and outwardly intangible. Public law, then, has to do with the dominion of persons over persons. The rights of control with which such private law is concerned are reducible to a money value; the rights of control with which public law is concerned are not thus reducible. In private law, again, the subject of a right appears in his individual capacity, as commanding the world of material things. In public law, on the other hand, the subject of a right appears in his capacity as a member of a community, which it is his part to serve in order that he may share in the benefits it confers. Finally, as against their object, the rights of private law merely confer a power, the rights of public law, on the other hand, impose, at the same time, a duty on the person to whom the right pertains. The distinction is clearly exemplified in the case of the right of ownership in a thing, on one side, and the right of a sovereign over his people on the other." Sohm, Inst. Rom. L. § 7.

JUS PROJICIENDI (Lat.). In Civil Law. The name of a servitude by which the owner of a building has a right of projecting a part of his building towards the adjoining house, without resting on the latter. It is extended merely over the ground. Dig. 50. 16. 242; 8. 2. 25; 8. 5. 8. 5.

JUS PROPRIETATIS. The right of property, as Blackstone phrases it: "the mere right of property without either possession or even the right of possession. This is frequently spoken of in our books under the name of mere right," jus merum (q. v.); 2 Bla. Com. 197. See RIGHT OF PROPERTY.

JUS PROTEGENDI (Lat.). In Civil Law. The name of a servitude: it is a right by which a part of the roof or tiling of one house is made to extend over the adjoining house. Dig. 50. 16. 243. 1; 8. 2. 25; 8. 5. 8. 5.

JUS PROTISESEOS. The right of pre-emption of a landlord in case the tenant wishes to dispose of his rights as a perpetual lessee. Sohm, Inst. Rom. L. § 67.

JUS PROVINCIALIUM. A franchise conferred upon provincials much more limited than that conferred upon the people of Italy.

It has been described as "equivalent to the jus italicum minus the freedom from land taxation which the latter right involved. In short, the provincials possessed no status as Roman citizens; and even their capacity of ownership in their own land was qualified by their tributary obligations to Rome. The civil incapacity of the provincials had reference, however, merely to their exclusion from the strictly legal rights sanctioned by the jus civile." Morey, Rom. L. 8.

JUS PUBLICUM. See JUS PRIVATUM.

JUS QUÆSITUM (Lat.). A right to ask or recover: for example, in an obligation there is a binding of the obligor, and a jus quæsitum in the obligee. 1 Bell, Com. 823.

JUS QUIRTIUM. Quiritarian ownership, so called under the ancient jus civile, because, strictly speaking, there was recognized but this one form of ownership. It could be acquired only through the technical forms of civil law, and never by a foreigner. The strictness which was observed in this respect was due to the fact that this was the form of private ownership, which, under Roman law, was as developed from the general right of dominion and ownership by the state. To prevent hardships and injustice in the strict application of the rules of law, it was permitted to the prætor to issue possessory interdicts to protect the possession of those who had not complied with all the technical conditions of ownership. In this way, legal sanction was given to the right of possession which amounted substantially to a right of property. This affords another illustration of the many points in which the Roman system presents a strict similarity to the English equity jurisprudence as long afterwards developed. Morey, Rom. L. 21, 74, 283; Sand. Inst. Just. introd. xx.

The old law of Rome, that was applicable originally to Patricians only, and under the Twelve Tables, to the entire Roman people, was so called, in contradistinction to the jus prætorium (q. v.) or equity. R. & L. Dict.; Brown.

JUS IN RE (Lat.). A right which belongs to a person, immediately and absolutely, in a thing, and which is the same against the whole world,—idem erga omnes. See JUS AD REM.

"The objection to using the term jus in re is that the expression occurs in the classical jurists as meaning an interest in a thing short of ownership, as the interest of a mortgagee in the thing pledged, and on this ground the term jus in rem, which in this sense is not found in the classical jurists, but is supported by the analogy of the familiar term actio in rem, seems preferable." Sand. Inst. Just. xlix. See JUS AD REM.

JUS IN RE ALIENA. An easement on servitude, or right-in, or arising out of, the property of another.

JUS IN RE PROPRIA. The right of enjoyment which appertains to full and complete ownership of property. Frequently, by relation, the full ownership or property itself.

JUS RECUPERANDI, INTRAN-
DI, ETC. The right of recovering and entering upon land.

JUS RELICTÆ (Lat.). In Scotch Law. The right of a wife, after her husband's death, to a third of movables if there be children, and to one-half if there be none. See Ersk. Prin. III. IX. 6.

JUS RELICTI (Lat.). In Scotch Law. The right of the husband in his wife's estate, which is divided in the same manner as that of the husband, in case of his predecease; one third each to the jus relictæ, legitim, and dead man's part (q. v.).

JUS RERUM (Lat.). The right of things. Its principal object is to ascertain how far a person can have a permanent dominion over things, and how that dominion is acquired.

JUS SACRUM. In Roman Law. That portion of the public law which was concerned with matters relating to public worship and including the regulation of sacrifices and the appointment of priests. There was a general division of the jus publicum into jus sacrum and jus non sacrum (q. v.).

JUS SANGUINIS. The right of blood. Under the Scotch law there was a rule that no right could be lost by prescription unless it had the effect to establish it in another. Hence it was said to be a rule juri sanguinis nunquam præscribitur; Ersk. Prin. III. vii. 17. According to the Roman and early Germanic principle of the jus sanguinis, nationality is based primarily upon descent or parentage. (Cf. Jcs SOLI.) Thus, according to this system, children born outside a state's territory to parents who are citizens, are clothed with the nationality of their parents, whereas those born within a state's territory to alien parents are regarded as foreigners.

This system prevails in Germany, Austria, Hungary, Sweden and Switzerland. Hershey, Essentials Int. Law, 237-8. See Jus SOLI.

JUS SCRIPTA. Written law. After stating that the Roman law was written and unwritten just as it was among the Greeks, Justinian adds: "The written part consists of laws, plebiscita, senatus-consulta, enactments of emperors, edicts of magistrates, and answers of jurists." Sand. Inst. Just. 1, 2, 3. See Jus EX NON SCRIPTA.

In the Roman law, all law actually committed to writing, without regard to its origin or mode of enactment or promulgation. The Roman jus scripta (q. v.) includes statute (lex), decree of the commons (plebiscitum), decree of the senate (senatus-consultum), the decisions of the emperors (principum placita), the edicts of magistrates having the right to issue edicts, and the answers of learned men (responsa prudentium). Abbott; Hunt. R. Law, 40.

In English Law, statute law, as distinguished from the common law; more generally designated as lex scripta. Id.

The terms Jus Scriptum and Non Scriptum, as explained in the Institutes (i. tit. 2), comprehended the whole of the Jus Civile. R. & L. Dict.

JUS SINGULARE. A law which is an exception to the ordinary law. A special rule applicable to an individual case or class of cases. Where it benefits particular classes of persons, it is called privilege, in an objective sense; privilege in a subjective sense is a particular right conferred upon a definite person by leges speciales.

JUS SOLI. The jus soli is of feudal origin and was originally based upon the territorial relation of a fief to its lord. During the middle ages it gradually supplanted the more ancient jus sanguinis (q. v.) which was again given wide currency in Europe through the adoption of the Napoleonic Code.

According to the feudal principle of the jus soli, nationality is primarily determined by the place or locality of birth. Consequently, children born to alien parents within the state's territory are clothed with its nationality. Modern states also claim for children born abroad to its citizens the nationality of their parents. Hershey, Essentials Int. Law, 237.

The jus soli prevails in principle in Great Britain, the United States, Portugal; and most of the states in Latin America. See Jus SANGUINIS.

JUS SPATIENDI ET MANENDI. (The right to stray and remain.) Neither the public at large nor the inhabitants of a particular place have any such right. The public at large may have the right to pass across a particular open space, that is to say, there may be a public right of way, and the inhabitants of a particular place may have the right to play lawful games upon an open space; but the rights of neither the one nor the other so any farther. Byrne.

JUS STILICIDII VEL FLUMINUS RECIPIENDI. In Roman Law. An urban servitude giving the owner a right to project his roof over the land of another or to open a house drain upon it.

JUS STRICTUM (Lat.). A Latin phrase, which signifies law interpreted without any modification, and in its utmost rigor. Jus ÆQUUM.

JUS SUFFRAGII. In Roman Law. The right of voting. This and the jus honorum (q. v.) were the public rights of the Roman citizen.

JUS TERTII. The right of a third person. This is set up by way of defence in many actions where it is sought to establish relations of landlord and tenant, or bailor and bailee, by the plea of setting up the jus tertii.

For example, when a person who is prima facie liable to A., on being sued by him sets up as a defence that the money or property claimed does not belong to A., but belongs by a paramount title to B., he is said to set up the jus tertii (right of a third person).

The general rule is, that a wrongdoer cannot set up the jus tertii. Therefore when A. seized goods in the possession of B., and on being sued by B. set up as a defence that B. had no title because the assignment from C. under which he claimed was fraudulent as against A., and that the goods belonged to A. under a valid assignment from C., it was held that A., being guilty of conversion, and therefore a wrongdoer, could not set up the jus tertii against B. So an agent cannot refuse to account to his principal or otherwise dispute his title by setting up the jus tertii, unless he does so under the authority of the third person. Byrne.

JUS TIGNI IMMITTENDI. In Roman Law. An urban servitude which gave the right of inserting a beam into the wall of another.

JUS TRIPERTITUM. A threefold right. The term is used by Justinian who says that the requisites of the Roman testament seem to have had a triple origin (ut hoc jus tripartitum esse videatur). Sand. Inst. Just. 2, 10, 3. "It is out of regard to this threefold derivation from the prætorian edict, from the civil law, and from the imperial constitutions, that Justinian speaks of the law of wills in his own days as jus tripartitum." Maine, Anc. L. 207.

JUS UTENDI (Lat.). The right to use property without destroying its substance. It is employed in contradistinction to the jus abutendi. 3 Toullier, n. 86.

JUS VENANDI ET PISCANDI. The right of hunting and fishing.

JUS VITÆ NECISQUE. The right of life and death. Under the ancient Roman law in the time of the XII. Tables, this was included in the absolute power of another.

JUST. This word is frequently used in legal phraseology in combination with other words, such as reasonable, equitable, convenient.

Where, as a foundation for an attachment, an affidavit was required that the plaintiff's claim is just, it is not sufficient if it does not state positively, but only inferentially, that his claim is just, and it does not amount to the same thing to say that the plaintiff "ought justly to recover the amount," or that "said several sums are justly due;" 5 Kan. 293.

In the English Traffic Act, in the phrase "just and reasonable," it was said to mean, to the advantage of the customer; 51 L. J. Q. B. 601.

Where conditions of traffic companies are to be just and reasonable, the reasonableness is a question of law, not of fact; 18 C. B. 805, 829.

It is a "just and reasonable" provision in by-laws to disqualify by reason of bankruptcy or notorious insolvency; 10 H. L. Cas. 404.

An agreement to pay what an individual (who was a taxing officer of the court of chancery) should say was a just and reasonable compensation for the services rendered by the complainant's solicitor in a suit commenced in that court, and settled before decree, obliges the party so agreeing to pay the bill of costs regularly taxed by the individual named in the agreement; 1 Den. 508. The terms "just and reasonable," as employed by the legislature in the Practice Act, obviously have reference to the rules of practice then existing by the common law, and contemplate no other or different terms than would be just and reasonable, as judged of by that practice; 1 Bradw. 39.

The words "just and fair" within the meaning of the New York statute, authorizing the imprisonment of a fraudulent debtor, were thus construed: "Where the debtor has procured from the creditor, at whose suit he is imprisoned, property by fraud, even if he has spent the proceeds in any way that would be unobjectionable, if they were his own, and if by loss or accident he is deprived of them, his proceedings are not just and fair, and where the debtor has combined or united with others to fraudulently obtain the property of the creditor, at whose suit he is imprisoned, even if such others got the proceeds of the fraud, and he kept none, his proceedings are not 'just and fair' within the meaning of the statute," authorizing the examination of an imprisoned debtor, in proceedings for his discharge from imprisonment, if it appear that his proceedings have not been "just and fair" towards the creditor under whose judgment he is imprisoned; 59 How. Pr. 136, 145.

Just and equitable may as well apply to authorized as unauthorized expenditures, and a claim for services and materials might be so overcharged, both as to the amount rendered, as well as the price for the same, as to make the aggregate of the demand unjust and inequitable, under an act which permits the credit of so much thereof as is just and equitable; 23 Hun. 50.

In the English Companies Act, 1862, it is "just and equitable" to wind up a company when the whole substratum of the business which was the object of the company had become strictly impossible; 1 Cox 213; 3 K. & J. 78, 20 Ch. Div. 169; Buckley, Comp. Act 215.

In the phrase a "just cause" for a court to do anything, the word just "does not add much weight, though it may add a little; it means some substantial reason must be shown;" Jessel, M. R., in 21 Ch. Div. 397.

To be "just and convenient" to appoint a receiver or grant an injunction or mandamus, respect must be given to what is just according to settled principles, as well as to what is convenient; 9 Ch. Div. 69.

"All my just debts" includes all debts; Wms. Ex. 1719; L. R. 4 H. L. 506. A direction to pay debts or just debts included a mortgage debt in exoneration of the property, but 30 and 31 Vict. c. 69, § 1, did away with that reasoning; 9 Ch. Div. 13, per Jessel, M. R. A direction to pay just debts did not include a note of the testator made before he was of age, and therefore voidable; 9 Mass. 62. See also 1 Binn. 300; 1 Denio 508; 9 N. Y. 383.

JUST BEFORE. "At the time when," was the construction of these words in a plea to justify the killing of a dog; Ir. C. L. 156.

JUST COMPENSATION. See EMMENT DOMAIN.

Just compensation is the sum which, considering all the circumstances—uncertainties of the war and the rest—probably could have been obtained for an assignment of the contract and claimant's rights thereunder; that is, the sum that would in all probability result from fair negotiations between an owner who is willing to sell and a purchaser who desires to buy. 261 U. S. 123.

In fixing just compensation, the court must consider the value of the contract at the time of its cancellation, not what it would have produced by way of profits if it had been fully performed. Id., 523.

JUSTICE. The constant and perpetual disposition to render every man his due. Justinian, Inst. b. 1, tit. 1; Co. 3d Inst. 56. The conformity of our actions and our will to the law. Toullier, Droit Civ. Fr. tit. prélim. n. 5.

Commutative justice is that virtue whose object it is to render to every one what belongs to him, as nearly as may be, or that which governs contracts. To render commutative justice, the judge must make an equality between the parties, that no one may be a gainer by another's loss.

Distributive justice is that virtue whose object it is to distribute rewards and punishments to each one according to his merits, observing a just proportion by comparing one person or fact with another, so that neither equal persons have unequal things nor unequal persons things equal. Tr. Eq. 8; and Toullier's learned note, Droit Civ. Fr. tit. prélim. n. 7, note.

In the most extensive sense of the word, it differs little from virtue; for it includes within itself the whole circle of virtues. Yet the common distinction between them is, that that which considered positively and in itself is called virtue, when considered relatively and with respect to others, has the name of justice. But justice, being in itself a part of virtue, is confined to things simply good or evil, and consists in a man's taking such a proportion of them as he ought.

Toullier expresses the want of utility and exactness in this division of distributive and commutative justice, adopted in the compendium or abridgments of the ancient doctors, and prefers the divisions of internal and external justice,—the first being a conformity of our will, and the latter a conformity of our actions, to the law, their union making perfect justice. Exterior justice is the object of jurisprudence; interior justice is the object of morality. Droit Civ. Fr. tit. prélim. n. 6, 7.

According to the Frederician Code, part 1, book 1, tit. 2, § 37, justice consists simply in letting every one enjoy the rights which he has acquired in virtue of the laws. And, as this definition includes all the other rules of right, there is properly but one single general rule of right, namely: Give every one his own.

In Norman French. Amenable to justice. Kelham, Dict.

In Feudal Law. Feudal jurisdiction, divided into high (alta justitia), and low (simplex inferior justitia), the former being a jurisdiction over matters of life and limb, the latter over smaller causes. Leg. Edw. Conf. c. 26; Du Cange. Sometimes high, low, and middle justice or jurisdiction were distinguished.

An assessment; Du Cange; also, a judicial fine. Du Cange.

At Common Law. A title given in England and America to judges of common-law courts, being a translation of justitia, which was anciently applied to common-law judges, while judex was applied to ecclesiastical judges and others; e. g. judex sacralis. Leges Hen. I. § 24, 63; Ang. Laws & Inst. of Eng. Index; Co. Litt. 71 b.

The judges of king's bench and common pleas, and the judges of almost all the supreme courts in the United States, are properly styled "justices."

The term justice is also applied to the lowest judicial officers: e. g. a trial justice; a justice of the peace. See CORONER; COURT.

JUSTICE AYRES. In Scotch Law. The circuits through the kingdom made for the distribution of justice. Erskine, Inst. 1. 8. 35.

JUSTICE, DEPARTMENT OF. The act of September 24, 1789 (1 Stat. L. 89), organized the judicial business of the United States, made provision for an attorney-general, and charged him with the duty of prosecuting all suits in the supreme court in which the United States was in anywise interested, and of furnishing advice and opinions upon all questions of law when called upon to do so by the president or the heads of the other executive departments of the government. The federal constitution provides that "the executive power shall be vested in the President of the United States," and although it does not specify any subordinate ministerial or administrative officers, yet there is an inferential recognition of such officers in the provision that the president may require the opinion in writing of the principal officer in each of the executive departments upon any subject relating to the duties of his department, and in the provision for the appointment of certain inferior officers "by the heads of departments." The organization of these departments is by the constitution left to the congress, and it was for the purpose of providing for a department which should administer the legal branch of the government that the above act was passed; 6 Op. Att. Gen. 327.

The Department of Justice as it now exists was created by the act of June 22, 1870; 16 U. S. Rev. Stat. 1 Supp. 182; Rev. Stats. U. S. Title VIII., passim. See also 1 U. S. Rev. Stat. 1 Supp. pp. 773, 916, 403, 472, and 560. By this act the attorney-general is made the head of this department. He is the chief law officer of the government. He represents the United States in matters involving law questions; gives his advice and opinion when they are required by the president or by the heads of the other executive departments on questions of law arising in the administration of their respective departments; he exercises a general superintendency and direction over all United States district attorneys and marshals in all judicial districts in the states and territories; he is authorized to provide for special counsel for the United States whenever required by any department of government; he is directed to supervise and direct the defence of actions against officers of either house of congress for official acts; he designates penitentiaries for convicts in United States courts; and has general supervision and control over all United States jails and penitentiaries. In the performance of his duties he is assisted by the solicitor-general, four assistant attorneys-general, and six assistant attorneys, as well as by a certain clerical force for the routine work of the office.

By the act of June 22, 1870, provision was made for "an officer learned in the law to assist the attorney-general in the performance of his duties, called the solicitor-general." He assists the attorney-general in the performance of his general duties, and by special provision of law, in the case of a vacancy in the office of attorney-general or in his absence, exercises all of the duties of that officer. Except when the attorney-general otherwise directs, the solicitor-general conducts and argues all cases in the supreme court and in the court of claims in which the United States is interested; and when he so directs, any such case in any court of the United States may be conducted and argued by the solicitor-general, and in the same way the solicitor-general may be sent by the attorney-general to attend to the interests of the United States in any state court or elsewhere.

By the act of 1870, provision is also made for three officers learned in the law called assistant attorneys-general, who assist the attorney-general and solicitor-general in the performance of their duties. By the act of March 3, 1891, an additional assistant attorney-general was created for the purpose of defending the United States in suits brought in the court of claims under that act, for Indian depredations. Of these assistant attorneys-general, one is charged with the defence of the United States in suits brought against the government in the court of claims under its special and general jurisdiction. And he is assisted in the performance of his duties by six assistant attorneys, who, under his general supervision and direction, represent the interests of the United States in the preparation and argument of all cases in that court. The solicitor-general and assistant attorneys-general are appointed by the president of the United States by and with the advice and consent of the senate, while the assistant attorneys are appointed by the attorney-general.

The act creating the Department of Justice also provides for a solicitor of the treasury, an assistant solicitor of the treasury, solicitor of internal revenue, a naval solicitor, and an examiner of claims for the Department of State, commonly called the Solicitor of the Department of State. They are appointed by the president by and with the advice and consent of the senate, and exercise their functions under the supervision and control of the head of the Department of Justice, although they are assigned to duty in the respective departments for which they are appointed. There is also provided an assistant attorney-general for the Department of the Interior and for the Post Office Department, who likewise perform their duties under the general supervision and control of the attorney-general.

The opinions of the attorney-general are reported and have authority the same in kind, if not in degree, with the decisions of courts of justice; 6 Op. Att. Gen. 333.

JUSTICE IN EYRE, CHIEF. See CHIEF JUSTICE IN EYRE.

JUSTICE IN EYRE OF THE FOREST. See CHIEF JUSTICE IN EYRE.

JUSTICE, FLEEING FROM. In order to come within the exception of "fleeing from justice" in R. S. 1045, it is sufficient that there is a flight with the intention of avoiding prosecution whether a prosecution has or has not been begun. It is not necessary that there should be an intent to avoid the justice of the United States; it is enough that there is an intent to avoid the justice of the state which has jurisdiction over the same act; 160 U. S. 128. See FUGITIVE FROM JUSTICE.

To be a fugitive from justice, as that term is used in the Constitution of the United States, it is not necessary that the party charged should have left the State in which the crime is alleged to have been committed, after an indictment found, or for the purpose of avoiding a prosecution anticipated or begun, but simply that having within a State committed that which by its laws constitutes a crime, when he is sought to be subjected to its criminal process to answer for his offence, he has left its jurisdiction and is found within the territory of another. 116 U. S. 97. EXTRACTION; REEDITION.

JUSTICE OF THE PEACE. A public officer invested with judicial powers for the purpose of preventing breaches of the peace and bringing to punishment those who have violated the laws.

These officers, under the constitution of some of the states, are appointed by the executive; in others, they are elected by the people and commissioned by the executive. In some states they hold their office during good behavior; in others, for a limited period.

Justices of the peace were created by 86 Edw., cap. 12. By 12 Rich. 2, cap. 10, it was provided that there should be no more than six in every county. They were said to be judges of record. They were required to be men of the best reputation, the most prevalent men in the county, together with some lawyers; substantial persons dwelling in the county, men of good governance. They were "not qualified unless they have £12 per annum, except Men of the Law;" Cond. Gen. 145.

In People ex rel. Burley v. Howland, it was held by the New York appellate division of the supreme court that the legislature could not abolish the office of justice of the peace; 55 Alb. L. J. 319. The court said: "The office of justice of the peace is one of the oldest known to the English law. Originally it was merely a peace office, with no civil jurisdiction, but from a time long antedating the constitution (of New York) it was an office with both civil and criminal jurisdiction. Its most important functions are those of conservators of the peace, and administrators of the criminal law. The statutes conferring the powers and duties of the office date so far back in the history of English law that they may be said to be common-law powers, adopted by us with the office and inseparable therefrom."

At common law justices of the peace have a double power in relation to the arrest of wrong-doers: when a felony or breach of the peace has been committed in their presence, they may personally arrest the offender, or command others to do so, and; in order to prevent the riotous consequences of a tumultuous assembly, they may command others to arrest affrayers when the affray has been committed in their presence. If a magistrate be not present when a crime is committed, before he can take a step to arrest the offender an oath or affirmation must be made, by some person cognizant of the fact, that the offence has been committed, and that the person charged is the offender, or there is probable cause to believe that he has committed the offence.

Probably the most important function of justices of the peace, in the administration of criminal law, is their power of committing magistrates. This they have always, and in most states they have also jurisdiction, either sole or concurrent, with some criminal court of petty offences.

The constitution of the United States directs that "no warrants shall issue but upon probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation." Amendm. IV. After his arrest, the person charged is brought before the justice of the peace, and after hearing he is discharged, held to bail to answer to the complaint, or, for want of bail, committed to prison.

In some states it is held that where there are criminal courts of record in the county, justices of the peace have no trial jurisdiction in criminal cause, but can act only as committing magistrates; 33 Fla. 620; 45 La. Ann. 1012.

A justice who erroneously and in good faith excludes persons from a criminal case as spectators is not liable therefor; 86 Me. 80.

In some of the United States, justices of the peace have jurisdiction in civil cases, given to them by local regulations. The jurisdiction is usually confined to actions of contract, express or implied, replevin, and the like, where a small amount is involved. The limit ranges from $100 to $300, and usually torts and actions for unliquidated damages are not included. The local statutes must be consulted, but the statutes regulating the jurisdiction are sufficiently similar to make the citation of a few cases fairly illustrative of the principles generally applied.

In Philadelphia, under the constitution of 1878, police magistrates take the place of justices of the peace.

The civil jurisdiction of a justice of the peace did not exist by the common law, but depends upon the constitutional warrant or statutory enactment, and there are no intendment in favor of his jurisdiction; 90 Ala. 450.

Where a justice of the peace has been appointed by the proper authorities, his qualifications cannot be questioned before him; 44 Pac. Rep. (Wash.) 270; but where one elected a justice before his term begins files his bond but does not take the oath or perform any official function, a writ of replevin by him before his term actually begins is void; 8 So. Rep. (Miss.) 545. Where a justice has no jurisdiction the filing of an answer by defendant after the overruling of a motion to dismiss will not give him jurisdiction; 61 Ia. 41. Where the appointment was void the consent of parties cannot give jurisdiction to the justice; 29 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 102.

Where an action would lie in either contract or tort and suit is begun before a justice, in order to sustain the jurisdiction the action will be presumed to have been brought upon the contract; 24 S. E. Rep. (N. C.) 709.

Jurisdiction is sufficiently shown if it appears from the entire record of the proceeding; 63 Mo. App. 44.

It is no objection to the jurisdiction that plaintiff remitted a part of his claim to bring it within the jurisdiction; 60 Ark. 146; 115 N. C. 298; 20 S. E. Rep. (S. C.) 91; even where unliquidated damages are claimed; 23 S. E. Rep. (W. Va.) 527. But where the sum claimed is in excess of the amount limited by statute the defect cannot be cured and jurisdiction given by a stipulation that the justice may render judgment for the amount to which his jurisdiction is limited; 50 N. W. Rep. (S. D.) 961.

And where lumber was delivered by instalments and the total amount exceeded the jurisdiction, the claim could not be split up into separate actions for the different deliveries in order to bring it within the jurisdictional amount; 109 N. C. 571.

Where a stipulated attorney's fee would increase the amount beyond the jurisdiction the fee may be considered in estimating the amount in controversy; 17 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 1085; even if the stipulation for the fee is void; 64 N. E. Rep. (S. D.) 525.

Justices of the peace have been held to have no jurisdiction in trespass for the negligent killing of an animal; 16 Pa. Co. Ct. R. 548; or negligently allowing a dangerous animal to go at large; 2 Lack. Leg. N. Pa. 143; or for injuries to a horse by a defective culvert; 5 Pa. Dist. R. 78; or in a suit on a foreign judgment; 7 Houst. 327; in an action on the case for nuisance; 4 Pa. Dist. 290; or for consequential damages due to negligence; id. 83. But the jurisdiction was sustained in an action for the destruction of fruit in baskets, run over and crushed by the wheels of defendant's wagon, consequential damages not being involved; 8 Houst. 19; so also there was jurisdiction of an action for killing a horse by a railroad company, because of a breach of contract to maintain cattle guards; 38 W. Va. 711.

The jurisdiction of a justice in a garnishment proceeding does not depend upon the amount the garnishee may owe; 59 Ill. App. 329; in an attachment the jurisdiction is determined by the amount in controversy, not the value of the property attached; 35 S. W. Rep. (Ark.) 214; 24 S. E. Rep. (N. C.) 671. Where the justice has jurisdiction in "matters of contract," it will cover an action for unliquidated damages for breach of contract within the jurisdiction; 55 Ark. 547.

A justice of the peace has no power to vacate a judgment unless it be one of default or non-suit; 61 Mo. App. 288; nor to settle a bill of exceptions; 44 Neb. 10; for the purpose of preserving testimony on a hearing of a motion to discharge the attachment; 43 id. 280; nor to grant a nonsuit where a case is on trial before a jury; 24 S. E. Rep. (Ga.) 407.

The court of a justice of the peace has been held a court of record; 57 Ind. 56; 12 Conn. 49; for the reason that it is bound to keep a record of its proceedings and has power to fine and imprison; 7 Blackf. 272. But it has also been held contra; 1 Pa. 807; 10 id. 157; Hempst. 20; Ga. Dec. pt. II. 60.

Justices of the peace are within the principle that judicial officers are not liable for damages for judicial acts, and only on ministerial acts in cases of intentional violation of law or gross negligence; 7 D. C. 284; 67 N. W. Rep. (Mich.) 992. It was held that he is not liable for rendering a judgment and issuing an order of sale in an action on which he had no jurisdiction, unless he knowingly acted outside of it; 35 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 416; or unless he did not act in good faith; 61 N. W. Rep. (Ia.) 1004.

The refusal of a justice to approve an appeal is a ministerial act, for which an action will lie against him if he acted corruptly or maliciously; 8 Houst. 154.

Though magistrates and other quasi-judicial and sometimes ministerial officers are within the principle that an error of judgment or mistake of law is not punishable, in proceedings against them for acting corruptly in their office, their misapprehensions of the law may be set up in answer to the charge of corruption; 1 Term 653; 13 Q. B. 240; 4 Harring. 555, 556; 75 N. C. 281; 2 Bay 1, 385; 36 Ia. 499; 1 Mass. 227; 1 Bish. N. Cr. L. § 299.

If the action of a justice of the peace is strictly judicial and he has jurisdiction, he is not liable to a civil action, however, it may be as to criminal prosecution, though corruption is alleged; 8 Cow. 178; 33 Me. 530; 21 Barb. 207; 11 Allen 31; 22 Ill. 100; 7 Jones N. C. 525; 65 Ind. 106.

All the acts of a justice of the peace from the commencement to the close of a suit seem to be considered judicial, rather than ministerial, so far as concerns questions of his responsibility; 1 Bish. N. Cr. L. § 463, n. 3; 30 Mo. 420; see 12 Md. 340; but he is liable for exercising authority where he has none; 3 A. K. Marsh. 70; where he acts upon inadequate allegation, but has jurisdiction over the subject-matter, he is not liable; 21 Wend. 552.

As to the powers of justices of the peace, see 3 Ohio, L. J. 671; their jurisdiction; 16 Am. St. Rep. 919; summary jurisdiction; 3 L. Mag. & Rev. n. s. 1007; liability; 15 Am. L. Rev. 492; 25 Am. In English Law. One of several persons who are appointed by the Crown to be, or who ex officio are, justices within a certain district, as a county or a borough, for the conservation of the peace, and for the execution of divers things comprehended within their commission and within divers statutes committed to their charge. They act either ministerially or judicially, ministerially in cases of felony or misdemeanor, where they merely initiate the proceedings by issuing a warrant of apprehension, taking the depositions, and committing for trial; judicially in quarter sessions (q. v.), and in all cases where they have summary jurisdiction, whether criminal or civil. Byrne. See COURT OF THE GENERAL QUARTER SESSIONS OF THE PEACE; CUSTOS ROTULORUM; CLERK OF THE PEACE; COUNTY COUNCIL.

JUSTICES OF THE BENCH. The justices of the Court of Common Bench or Common Pleas. R. & L. Diet.

JUSTICES COURTS. In American Law. Inferior tribunals, with limited jurisdiction, both civil and criminal. There are courts so called in the states of Massachusetts and New Hampshire, and probably other states.

JUSTICES IN EYRE. Certain judges established, if not first appointed, A. D. 1176, 22 Hen. II.

England was divided into certain circuits, and three justices in eyre—or justices itinerant, as they were sometimes called—were appointed to each district, and made the circuit of the kingdom once in seven years, for the purpose of trying causes. They were afterwards, when the judicial functions assumed greater importance, directed, by Magna Charta, c. 12, to be sent into every county once a year. The itinerant justices were sometimes more justices of assize or dower, or of general jail delivery, and the like.

Speaking of the 13th century it is said that "the visitation of the counties by itinerant justices has been becoming systematic." The holding of the assize on circuit was evidently committed to judges of great prominence. "From the early years of the reign (Henry II.) we hear of pleas being assigned by Richard Lucy the chief justiciar, by Henry of Essex the constable, and by Thomas Becket the chancellor. . . . In 1170, to execute the assize of Northampton, sixteen justices were employed, and the country was divided into six circuits; in 1174, twenty-one justices were employed, and the country was divided into four circuits; indeed from 1170 onwards hardly a year went by without there being a visitation of some part of England. These itinerant justices seem to have been chiefly employed in hearing the pleas of the crown (for which purpose they were equipped with the power of obtaining accusations from the local juries), and in entertaining some or all of the new possessory actions. The court that they held was, as already said, curia regis, but it was not curia regis, and probably their powers were limited by the words of a temporary commission. They were not necessarily members of the central court, and they might be summoned before it to hear record of their doings; still it was usual that each party of justices should include some few members of the permanent tribunal." 1 Pol. & Mait. 134.

These justices in eyre in the reign of Henry III. are thus described: "But we may distinguish the main types of the commissions. What was commonly treated as the humblest, is the commission to deliver a jail. This . . . is done very frequently; generally it is done by some three or four knights of the shire, and thus long before the institution of justices of the peace, the country knights were accustomed to do high criminal justice. In order to dispose of the possessory assizes of novel disseisin and mort d'ancestor, a vast number of commissions were issued in every year. Early in Henry's reign this work was often entrusted to four knights of the shire; as late as Edward's reign, permanent justices would usually be named and allowed to associate some knights with himself. Apparently a justice of assize had often to visit many towns or even villages in each county; he did not do all his work at the county town. It must have been heavy work for these actions were extremely popular. In the second year of Edward's reign some two thousand commissions of assize were issued. Just at that time the practice seems to have been to divide England into four circuits, and to send two justices of assize round each circuit; but a full history of the circuits would be to intrude and wearisome. Above all the other commissions rank the commission for an oyer and tenor placita, or more briefly for an oyer, or eyre, as it came to be called, a long and laborious business. In the first place, it was supposed an eyre in Cambridgeshire announced, this has the effect of stopping all Cambridgeshire business in the bench. Litigants who have been told to appear before the justices at Westminster will now have to appear before the justices in eyre at Cambridgeshire. There is no business before the bench at Westminster if an eyre has been proclaimed in all the counties. Then again the justices are provided with a long list of interrogatories (capitula itineris), which they are to address to local juries. Every hundred, every vill in the county must be represented before them. These interrogatories—their number increases as time goes on—ransack the memories of the jurors, and the local records for all that has happened in the shire since the last eyre took place some seven years ago; every crime, every invasion of royal rights, every neglect of police duties must be presented. The justices must sit in the county town from week to week and even from month to month before they will have got through the tedious task and inflicted the due tale of fines and amercements. Three or four of the permanent judges will be placed in the commission; with them will be associated some of the magnates of the district: bishops and even abbots, to the scandal of strict churchmen, have to serve as justices in eyre. Probably it was thought expedient that some of the great freeholders of the country should be commissioned, in order that no man might say that his judges were not his peers. An eyre was the business of the men of Cornwall held before the face of the justices; we hear sometimes of a binding custom that an eyre shall not take place more than once in seven years. Expedients are being adopted which in course of time will enable the justices of assize to preside in the country over the trial of actions which are pending before the benches; thus without the terrors of an eyre, the trial of civil actions can take place in the counties and jurors need no longer be ever journeying to Westminster from their remote homes. But these expedients belong for the most part to Edward's reign; under his father a jury wearily travelling from Yorkshire or Devonshire towards London must have been very uncommon sight." 1 Pol. & Mait. 179, 180, 181.

See 3 Bla. Com. 58; Crabb, Eng. Law 108; Co. Litt. 283.

JUSTICES OF THE JEWS. See JEWS.

JUSTICES OF THE PAVILION (justicarii pavilionis). Certain judges of a pypreod court, of a most transcendent jurisdiction, authorized by the bishop of Winchester, at a fair held at St. Giles Hills near that city, by virtue of letters-patent granted by Edw. IV. Pryne's Animadv. on Coke's 4th Inst. fol. 191.

JUSTICES OF TRAIL BASTON. Justices appointed by Edward I. during his absence in the Scotch and French wars, about the year 1305. They were so styled; it is said, from trailing or drawing the baston (q. v.), or staff of justice. They were a sort of justices in eyre, with large and summary powers. Their office was to make inquisition, throughout the kingdom, of all officers, and others, touching extortion, bribery, and such like grievances of intruders into other men's lands, barrators, robbers, breakers of the peace, and divers other offenders; Cowel; Toml.; Holt; Old. N. B. fol. 53; 19 Co. 55.

JUSTICIABLE. A dispute of a justiciable nature is one which can properly be determined in a judicial proceeding. 185 U. S. 388. Controversies justiciable in their nature are those the parties to which or the property involved in which may be reached by judicial process. Speaking generally, the judicial power of a nation extends to all controversies of a justiciable nature. 206 U. S. 83.

JUSTICIAR, JUSTICIER. In Old English Law. A judge or justice. Baker, fol. 118; Mon. Angl. One of several persons learned in the law, who sat in the aula regis, and formed a kind of court of appeal in cases of difficulty.

The chief justiciar (capitulis justiciarius totius Anglie) was a special magistrate, who presided over the whole aula regis, who was the principal minister of state, the second man in the kingdom, and by virtue of his office, guardian of the realm in the king's absence. 8 Bla. Com. 37; Spelman, Gloss. 380; 2 Hawk. Pl. Cr. 6. The last who bore this title was Philip Basset, in the time of Hen. III.

JUSTICIARII ITINERANTES (Lat.). Justices in eyre (q. v.).

JUSTICIARII RESIDENTES (Lat.). Justices or judges who usually resided in Westminster: they were so called to distinguish them from justices in eyre. Co. Litt. 293.

JUSTICIARY. Another name for a judge. In Latin, he was called justiciarius, and in French, justicier. Not used. Bacon, Abr. Courts (A).

JUSTICES (from verb justificare, 3d pers. pres. subj., do you do justice to).

In English Law. A special writ, in the nature of a commission, empowering a sheriff to hold plea in his county court of a cause which he could not take jurisdiction of without this writ: e. g. trespass vi et armis for any sum, and all personal actions above forty shillings. 1 Burn, Just. 449. So called from the Latin word justities, used in the writ, which runs, "præcipimus tibi quod justities A. B." etc.; we command you to do A. B. right, etc. Bracton, lib. 4, tr. 6, c. 13; Kitch. 74; Fitzh. N. B. 117; 8 Bla. Com. 3, 6.

JUSTIFIABLE HOMICIDE. That which is committed with the intention to kill, or to do a grievous bodily injury, under circumstances which the law holds sufficient to exculpate the person who commits it. A judge who, in pursuance of his duty, pronounces sentence of death, is not guilty of homicide; for it is evident that, as the law prescribes the punishment of death for certain offences, it must protect those who are entrusted with its execution. A judge, therefore, who pronounces sentence of death, in a legal manner, on a legal indictment, legally brought before him, for a capital offence committed within his jurisdiction, after a lawful trial and conviction of the defendant, is guilty of no offence; 1 Hale, Pl. Cr. 496.

Magistrates, or other officers intrusted with the preservation of the public peace, are justified in committing homicide, or giving orders which lead to it, if the excesses of a riotous assembly cannot be otherwise repressed; 4 Bla. Com. 178, 179. So a homicide is justifiable, when committed by an officer in defending a judge of the United States, engaged in the discharge of his judicial duties; 135 U. S. 1.

An officer intrusted with a legal warrant, criminal or civil, and lawfully commanded by a competent tribunal to execute it, will be justified in committing homicide, if in the course of advancing to discharge his duty he be brought into such perils that without doing so he cannot either save his life or discharge the duty which he is commanded by the warrant to perform. And when the warrant commands him to put a criminal to death, he is justified in obeying it; Cl. Cr. L. 184. See 113 N. C. 722. In endeavoring to make an arrest an officer has the right to use all the force that is necessary to overcome all resistance, even to the taking of life; 90 Mo. 666.

A soldier on duty is justified in committing homicide, in obedience to the command of his officer, unless the command was something plainly unlawful.

A man may be justified in killing another to prevent the debauching of his wife; 90 Ga. 472.

A private individual will, in many cases, be justified in committing homicide while acting in self-defence; 184 Ind. 46; 80 Fla. 142; 97 Ala. 32; 31 Tex. Cr. R. 58. If a trespass on the person or property of another amounts to a felony, the killing of the trespasser will be justifiable, if necessary in order to prevent it; 90 Ga. 701. It is not true as a general proposition that one who is assaulted by another with a dangerous weapon is justified in taking the life of the party so assaulting him; 45 La. Ann. 14. The same circumstances that will justify or excuse the homicide where the assault is upon one's self, will also excuse or justify the slayer if the killing is done in defence of his family or servant; 32 Fla. 56. See 86 Ky. 440. See DEFENCE.

An instruction to a jury requiring a justification of homicide to be established beyond a reasonable doubt is erroneous; 65 Hun 420.

To establish a case of justifiable homicide it must appear that the assault upon the prisoner was such as would lead a reasonable person to believe that his life was in peril; 164 U. S. 492.

See, generally, 4 Bla. Com. 178; 1 Hale, Pl. Cr. 496; 1 East, Pl. Cr. 219; 1 Russ. Cr. 588; 2 Wash. C. C. 515; Mass. 391; 1 Hawks 210; 1 Coxe, N. J. 424; 5 Yerg. 459; 9 C. & P. 22; ARREST; HOMICIDE; JUSTIFICATION.

JUSTIFICATION. In Pleading. The allegation of matter of fact by the defendant, establishing his legal right to do the act complained of by the plaintiff.

Justification admits the doing of the act charged as a wrong, but alleges a right to do it on the part of the defendant, thus denying that it is a wrong. Excuse merely shows reasons why the defendant should not make good the injury which the plaintiff has suffered from some wrong done. See AVOYD.

Trespasses. A warrant, regular on its face, and issued by a court of competent jurisdiction, is a complete justification to the officer to whom it is directed for obeying its command, whether it be really valid or not. But where the warrant is absolutely void, or apparently irregular in an important respect, or where the act done is one which is beyond the power conferred by the warrant, it is no justification. See ARREST; TRESPASS. So, too, many acts, and even homicide committed in self-defence, or defence of wife, children, or servants, are justifiable; Archb. Cr. P. by Pom. 681, n.; see SELF-DEFENCE; DEFENCE; JUSTIFIABLE HOMICIDE; or in preserving the public peace; see ARREST; TRESPASS; or under a license, express or implied; 3 Cai. 261; 2 Bail. 4; 8 McLean 571; see 13 Me. 115; including entry on land to demand a debt, to remove chattels; 2 W. & S. 225; 12 Vt. 273; see 2 Humphr. 425; to ask lodgings at an inn, the entry in such cases being peaceful; to exercise an incorporeal right; 21 Pick. 272; or for public service in case of exigency, as pulling down houses to stop a fire; Year B. 13 Hen. VIII. 16 b; destroying the suburbs of a city in time of war; Year B. 8 Edw. IV. 85 b; entry on land to make fortifications or in preservation of the owner's rights of property; 14 Conn. 255; 4 D. & B. 110; 7 Dana 220; Wright, Ohio 333; 25 Me. 438; 6 Pa. 318; 12 Metc. 58.

Libel and slander may be justified in a civil action, in some cases, by proving the truth of the matter alleged, and generally by showing that the defendant had a right upon the particular occasion either to write and publish the writing or to utter the words: as, when slanderous words are found in a report of a committee of congress, or in an indictment, or words of a slanderous nature are uttered in the course of debate in the legislature by a member, or at the bar by counsel when properly instructed by his client on the subject. Comyns, Dig. Pleader. See SLANDER.

Matter in justification must be specially pleaded, and cannot be given in evidence under the general issue. See LICENSE. A plea of justification to an action for slander, oral or written, should state the charge with the same degree of certainty and precision as is required in an indictment. The object of the plea is to give the plaintiff, who is in truth an accused person, the means of knowing what are the matters alleged against him. It must be direct and explicit. It must in every respect correspond with, and be as extensive as the charge in, the declaration.

The justification, however, will be complete if it covers the essence of the libel. But it must extend to every part which could by itself form a substantive ground of action. Where the slander consists in an imputation of crime, the plea of justification must contain the same degree of precision as is requisite in an indictment for the crime, and must be supported by the same proof that is required on the trial of such an indictment. It is a perfectly well-established rule that where the charge is general in its nature, yet the plea of justification must state specific instances of the misconduct imputed to the plaintiff. And, even for the purpose of avoiding prolixity, a plea of justification cannot make a general charge of criminality or misconduct, but must set out the specific facts in which the imputed offence consists, and with such certainty as to afford the plaintiff an opportunity of joining issue precisely upon their existence. Heard, Lib. & Sl. § 240. See LIBEL.

When established by evidence, it furnishes a complete bar to the action.

In Practice. The proceeding by which bail establish their ability to perform the undertaking of the bond or recognizance.

It must take place before an authorized magistrate; 5 Binn. 461; 6 Johns. 124; 13 id. 422; and notice must, in general, be given by the party proposing the bail, to the opposite party, of the names of the bail and the intention to justify; 3 Harr. N. J. 503. See 3 Halst. 369.

It is a common provision that bail must justify in double the amount of the recognizance if exceptions are taken; 2 Hill, N. Y. 379; otherwise, a justification in the amount of the recognizance is, in general, sufficient.

It must be made within a specified time, or the persons named cease to be bail; 1 Cow. 54. See Baldw. 148.

JUSTIFICATORS. A kind of compurgators, or those who, by oath, justified the innocence or oaths of others, as in the case of wages of law.

JUSTIFYING BAIL. In Practice. The production of bail in court, who there justify themselves against the exception of the plaintiff. See BAIL; JUSTIFICATION.

JUSTITIUM. In Civil Law. A suspension or intermission of the administration of justice in courts; vacation time. Calv. Lex.

JUSTIZA. In Scotch Law. The name anciently given to a high judicial magistrate, or supreme judge, who was the ultimate interpreter of the laws, and possessed other high powers.

JUSTLY. The words "to act justly" or "do justice" to relatives do not create a precatory trust; 4 Ch. Div. 238.

JUSTS or JOUSTS. Exercises between martial men and persons of honor, with spears, on horseback; different from tournaments, which were military exercises between many men in troops. 24 Hen. VIII. c. 13.

JUVENILE COURTS. Courts to regulate the treatment, control, and custody of dependent, neglected and delinquent children. This jurisdiction is, in some states, conferred on the county courts, in which case, strictly speaking, no new court is created, and no jurisdiction heretofore conferred upon the courts to try offenses is taken away. Additional duties are placed upon the county courts, and a different method of bringing children before the courts to be dealt with is provided. 60 Okl. Cr. 495 et seq.

The purpose of acts conferring such jurisdiction is generally that the care and custody and discipline of the child shall approximate, as nearly as may be, that which should be given by its parents, and that, as far as practicable, any delinquent child shall be treated, not as a criminal, but as misdirected and misguided, and needing aid, encouragement, help and assistance. Id., 503.

Commitments of children to juvenile institutions can be distinguished into three essential classes: Commitments as a punishment for crime, commitments where the proceedings are quasi criminal; and commitments for care and guardianship.

The object of detention of incorrigible children is not punishment, but reform and moral training. Proceedings under statutes authorizing such commitment have been held valid on ground that sovereign right to care for the education of its members belongs of strict right to the state, under whose sanction the custody or charge of the minor is thus transferred from the guardian, who declares his inability to fulfill the purposes of guardianship. 6 Okl. Rep. 507; 31 Md. 329.

JUXTA (Lat.). According to.

JUXTA CONVENTIONEM. According to the covenant. Fleta, lib. 4, c. 16, § 6.

JUXTA FORMAM STATUT. According to the form of the statute.

JUXTA TENOREM SEQUENTEM. According to the tenor following. 2 Salk. 417. A phrase used in the old books when the very words themselves referred to were set forth. Id.; 1 Ld. Raym. 415.

JUEGADO. In Spanish Law. The collective number of judges that concur in a decree, and more particularly the tribunal having a single judge.

K. B. King's Bench. Anderson. See COURTS OF ENGLAND.

K. C. King's council, or counsel. Anderson.

KALAGIUM (Lat.). Kayage or wharfage.

KAIN. In Scotch Law. A payment of fowls, etc., reserved in a lease. It is derived from canum, a word used in ancient grants to signify fowls or animals deliverable by the vassal to his superior as part of the reddendum. Erskine, Inst. 11. 10. 32; 2 Ross, Lect. 236, 405.

KALENDÆ. Rural chapters or conventions of the rural deans and parochial clergy, formerly held on the calends of every month. Kenn. Paroch. Antiq. 604.

KALENDARIUM. In Civil Law. A book containing a list of such capital sums as were lent out at interest. Sohm, Rom. L. 305.

KANSAS. The name of one of the states of the United States of America.

The state was carved out of a portion of the Louisiana purchase, and a small portion of the territory ceded to the United States by Texas. The territory of Kansas was organized by an act of congress, dated May 30, 1854.

The constitution was adopted at Wyandotte July 29, 1859, and Kansas was admitted into the Union as a state, by an act of the congress, approved, January 30, 1861.

Under the constitution, the powers of the state government are divided into three departments, viz.: executive, legislative, and judicial.

"The body of the laws of England as they existed in the fourth year of the reign of James I. (1607) constitutes the common law of this state." 9 Kan. 252.

KAVIL. In Scotch Law. A lot. Originally the stick or rune-staff used in casting lots. Written also cavel. See Ersk. Prin. 230; Cent. Dict.

KEELAGE. The right of demanding money for the bottom of ships resting in a port or harbor. The money so paid is also called keelage.

KEELS. This word is applied, in England, to vessels employed in the carriage of coals. Jacob, Law Dict.

KEEP. To heed; to observe; regard; attend to.

Neither a single act of play at a gaming-table, called a sweat cloth, at the races, nor even a single day's use of it on the race-field, is a keeping of a common gaming-table, within the Penitentiary Act for the District of Columbia; 4 Cr. C. C. 659. When it is said that a certain man keeps a woman, the popular inference is, that the relation is one which involves illicit intercourse; 36 Ala. 717. See 3 Allen 101; 52 N. H. 369. To keep a street in safe condition, means to have it so; to make and remake it so; 76 Ga. 585. To keep premises in repair is to have them at all times in that condition; 1 B. & Ald. 583.

Keep down interest. To pay interest periodically as it becomes due, but the phrase does not extend to the payment of all arrears of interest which may have become due on any security from the time when the instrument was executed. 4 El. & Bl. 211.

KEEPER. To warrant the conviction of one as the keeper of a common gaming house, he need not be the proprietor or lessee; it is sufficient if he has the general superintendence. 47 Ill. 567.

KEEPER OF A FERRY. In the Act of 1820 means, not the ferryman, but a grantee, lessee, or other person having a beneficial interest in, and control over, the ferry. 8 Dana (Ky.) 159.

KEEPER OF THE FOREST (called, also, the chief warden of the forest). An officer who had the principal government over all officers within the forest, and warned them to appear at the court of justice-seat on a summons from the lord chief-justice in eyre. Manw. For. Law, part 1, p. 156; Jacob, Law Dict. See FOREST LAW.

KEEPER OF THE GREAT SEAL (lord keeper of the great seal). A judicial officer who is by virtue of his office a lord, and a member of the privy council. Through his hands pass all charters, commissions, and grants of the crown, to be sealed with the great seal, which is under his keeping. The office was consolidated with that of lord chancellor by 5 Eliz. c. 18; and the lord chancellor is appointed by delivery of the great seal, and taking oath; Co. 4th Inst. 87; 1 Hale, Pl. Cr. 171, 174; 3 Bla. Com. 47. See CANCELLARIUS; CHANCELLOR.

KEEPER OF THE KING'S CONSCIENCE. The lord chancellor—formerly an ecclesiastic. Anderson.

KEEPER OF THE PRIVY SEAL. The officer through whose hands go all charters, pardons, etc., signed by the king before going to the great seal, and some which do not go there at all. He is of the privy council virtute officii. He was first called clerk of the privy seal, then guardian, then lord privy seal, which is his present designation. 12 Ric. II. c. 13; Rot. Parl. 11 Hen. IV.; Stat. 34 Hen. VIII. c. 4; 4 Inst. 55; 2 Bla. Com. 847.

KEEPING. In an insurance policy a clause prohibiting the keeping or having benzine in insured premises, was held to be intended to prevent the permanent and habitual storage of the prohibited articles, and that taking it on the premises for the purpose of cleaning machinery was not within the prohibition; 92 Pa. 15.

KEEPING BOOKS. Preserving an intelligent record of a merchant's or tradesman's affairs with such reasonable accuracy and care as may properly be expected from a man in that business. An intentional omission, or repeated omissions, evincing gross carelessness will vitiate; an accidental failure to make a proper entry will not; 16 Bankr. Reg. 152.

KEEPING HOUSE. In English Law. As an act of bankruptcy, it is when a man absents himself from his place of business and retires to his private residence, so as to evade the importunity of creditors. The usual evidence of "keeping house" is denial to a creditor who has called for money. Robson, Bkcy.; 6 Bing. 363.

KEEPING OPEN. A statute prohibiting shops to be kept open on Sunday is violated where one allows general access to his shop for purposes of traffic, though the outer entrances are closed. 11 Gray 308; 16 Mich. 472.

KEEPING THE PEACE. See SURETY OF THE PEACE.

KEEPING TERM. In English Law. A duty performed by students of law, consisting in eating a sufficient number of dinners in hall to make the term count for the purpose of being called to the bar. Moz. & W.

KEEPING A TIPPING HOUSE. "Keeping a tipping house" imports an unlawful selling of spirituous liquors by retail, without license. 5 Bush (Ky.) 312.

KELP - SHORE. The land between high and low water mark. Stroud, Jud. Dict.

But when the conveyance, "with the kelp-shore" by the metes and bounds given, manifestly excluded the land between high and low water mark, it was held to be excluded, and parol proof could not be received of the intention to include it; 10 Ir. C. L. 150.

KENILWORTH, DICTUM OF. An award made by Henry III. and parliament in 1266 for the pacification of the kingdom.

This is printed (under this title) in the Statutes of the Realm as 51 and 52 Hen. 3. In the Statutes at Large (vol. 9, App., p. 1), it is printed simply as the Dictum de Kenilworth. It was not in fact a statute: it was merely a declaration of the terms arranged between Edward I. (then Prince Edward) and the barons who had been on the side of Simon de Montfort. Byrne.

KENNING TO THE TERCE. In Scotch Law. The ascertainment by a sheriff of the just proportion of the husband's lands which belongs to the widow in virtue of her terce or third. An assignment of dower by sheriff. Erskine, Inst. 11. 9. 50; Bell, Dict.

KENO OR FABO BANK. A "keno or fabo bank" is the implement of a professional gambler. 13 S. W. 108.

KENTLEDGE or KINTLEDGE. The permanent ballast of a ship. Ab. Sh. 6.

KENTUCKY. The name of one of the states of the United States of America.

This state was formerly a part of Virginia, which by an act of its legislature, passed December 18, 1793, consented that the district of Kentucky within the jurisdiction of the said commonwealth, and according to its actual boundaries at the time of passing the act aforesaid, should be formed into a new state. By the act of congress of February 1794, 1 Story, Laws 168, congress consented that, after the first day of June, 1792, the district of Kentucky should be formed into a new state, separate from and independent of the commonwealth of Virginia. And by the second section it is enacted, that upon the aforesaid first day of June, 1792, the said new state, by the name and style of the state of Kentucky, shall be received and admitted into this Union, as a new and entire member of the United States of America.

KEPT. In § 21 of the National Prohibition Act, denouncing as a nuisance, "any room, house, building, . . . or place where intoxicating liquor is manufactured, sold, kept," etc., the word "kept" means kept for sale or barter or other commercial purposes. 254 U. S. 92.

KEROSENE. A rock or earth oil. 69 N. Y. 26; 30 Wis. 634.

It is, in a commercial sense, a refined coal or earth oil, and is embraced within those terms as used in an insurance policy. 81 N. Y. 372.

It is not petroleum, but made from the latter by a process of a distillation and refinement; 69 N. Y. 26; 81 id. 273.

A court will not take judicial notice that kerosene is an "inflammable fluid" within the meaning of an insurance policy, it must be proved as a fact; 46 N. Y. 421; nor that it comes under the words "burning fluid"; 24 Hun 565. See 30 Wis. 534.

It is a question for the jury whether kerosene is a burning fluid or chemical oil;

93 Pa. 15; or a drug; 58 Vt. 418; where the court, after quoting Webster's definition of a drug, as "any mineral substance used in chemical operations," declined to say as matter of law that benzine is not included in that term. See RISKS AND PERILS; OIL.

KEY. An instrument made for shutting and opening a lock.

The keys of a house are considered as real estate, and descend to the heir with the inheritance; Mitch. R. P. 21; 1 Co. 50 b; 80 E. L. & Eq. 598; but although they follow the inheritance, they are not fixtures, so far as that the taking of them is not larceny; 5 Blackf. 417; 5 Taunt. 518.

When the keys of a warehouse are delivered to a purchaser of goods locked up there, with a view of effecting a delivery of such goods, the delivery is complete. The doctrine of the civil law is the same; Dig. 41. 1. 9. 8; 18. 1. 74; Benj. Sales, 6th Am. ed. § 1043; 1 East 192; 3 Term 464. See DONATIO MORIS CAUSA; GIFT.

Keys are implements of housebreaking within statute 14 & 15 Vict. c. 19, § 1; for, though commonly used for lawful purposes they are capable of being employed for purposes of housebreaking; and it is a question for the jury whether the person found in possession of them by night had them without lawful excuse, with the intention of using them as implements of housebreaking; 3 C. & K. 250; 2 Den. Cr. Cas. 472; and the statute was held to include skeleton, or any other kind of key used for purposes of housebreaking; id. Entering by a key left in the door locked on the outside is not housebreaking; 1 Swint. Jus. Cas. 433. See BURGLARY.

KEY OR QUAY. "Key" or "quay" is defined to be a wharf to land or ship goods or wares at. 8 B. Mon. (Ky.) 253.

KEYAGE. A toll paid for loading and unloading merchandise at a quay or wharf.

KEYS. The twenty-four chief commoners in the Isle of Man who form the local legislature. 1 Steph. Com., 11th ed. 100.

KIDEL or KIDDLE. An open weir whereby fish are caught. 2 Inst. 38.

"Weirs (kidelli or gurgites) were the means usual in ancient times for appropriating and enjoying several fisheries in tidal waters." Lord Selborne, L. C., in 8 App. Cas. 144.

KIDNAPPING. The forcible abduction or stealing away of a man, woman, or child from their own country and sending them into another. 4 Bla. Com. 219. At common law it is a misdemeanor; Comb. 10.

There is no wide difference in meaning between kidnapping, false imprisonment, and abduction. The better view seems to be that kidnapping is a false imprisonment, which it always includes, aggravated by the carrying of the person to some other place; Archib. Cr. P. by Pom. 884; 2 Bish. Cr. L. § 750. See 85 Cal. 309. It has been held that transportation to a foreign country is not necessary, though this conflicts with Blackstone's definition, supra; 8 N. H. 550. See 1 East, P. C. 429. The consent of a mature person of sound mind prevents any act from being kidnapping; otherwise as to a young child; a child of nine years has been held too young to render his consent available as a defence; Cl. Cr. L. 221; 41 N. H. 53; 5 Allen 518; Thach. Cr. Cas. 488; 74 Ga. 191; 17 Blatchf. 423; but a female fourteen years of age is not kidnapped, if taken away with her consent for the purpose of marriage, and she actually marries; 91 Ga. 763; so, going away by previous arrangement with an unmarried woman who, becoming intoxicated, remained for some days, in illicit intercourse, and was then brought back at her request, was not kidnapping; 35 N. E. Rep. (Ind.) 1023. Physical force need not be applied, threats will suffice; 8 Allen 69; or fraudulently acquiring consent; 109 N. Y. 226; 88 id. 192. The crime may be ef-fectured by means of menaces; 20 Ill. 815; or by getting a man drunk; 25 N. Y. 373. Where the custody of a child is assigned to one of two divorced parents, and the other, or a third person employed for the purpose, carries it off, it is kidnapping; 41 N. H. 58; 5 Allen 518. It was held that within the meaning of the statute against kidnapping, any place where a child has a right to be is its residence; Wallace v. State, 47 N. E. Rep. (Ind.) 13. In this case two children who were acrobats had been sent away from home for the purpose of giving exhibitions to raise money with which to relieve the necessities of the family. While absent from their parents they were decoyed away by defendant, who was indicted for kidnapping under the Indiana statute. The court held that they had not acquired a permanent residence, but they were at a place they had a right to be—to which they had been sent by their parents, engaged in the business for which they had been sent. "The purpose of the statute here under consideration certainly was not that a child might be kidnapped at its father's house, but not if it were on a visit at a friend's in a near or distant city. The evident purpose was rather to provide against the kidnapping of a person from any place where he has a right to be, whether that be the place of his 'temporary sojourn or permanent domicile.' A child may be kidnapped, not only from its domicile or the home of its parents, but likewise from a neighbor's house, from church, or school, or hotel, from a hall of public entertainment, or, in fact, from any place where it has a right to be; and it is in that sense that the word 'residence' is here used." 17 N. Y. L. J. 842.

One who takes his child of tender years out of the state, with its consent and with the consent of the mother to whom its custody has been awarded in divorce proceedings, to prevent its presence at a criminal trial in which it had been subpoenaed as a witness, is not guilty of kidnapping; 44 Pac. Rep. (Wyo.) 51. New York, Illinois, and other states have passed statutes on kidnapping. See ABDUCTION; 1 Russ. Cr. 962; 3 Tex. 282; 12 Metc. 56; 2 Park. Cr. Ca. 590; 47 Hun 308; 146 Pa. 24. Where defendant procured an adjudication that the person alleged to have been kidnapped was insane, and, without using force, publicly conveyed her to a lunatic asylum, though she was not insane at the time, he was not guilty of the offence of kidnapping; 139 N. Y. 87.

The indictment must be found in the county in which the person was seized and not in one through which he was carried; 3 Harring. 538.

It has been held, however, that the carrying away is not essential; 8 N. H. 550. The crime includes a false imprisonment; 2 Bish. Cr. Law § 871. See 1 Russ. Cr. 716; 2 Harr. Del. 538; 3 Tex. 282; 12 Metc. 56; ABDUCTION.

It has been held that in order to rescue a kidnapped person his friends may use such force as will be necessary, and that where there is an attack upon the rescuers, a killing of the kidnapper in self-defence is excusable homicide; 25 S. W. Rep. (Ky.) 830.

Kidnapping Act, 1872. The stat. 35 & 36 Vict. c. 19, for the prevention and punishment of criminal outrages upon natives of the islands of the Pacific Ocean. Amended by the 38 & 39 Vict. c. 51.

KILDERKIN. A measure of capacity, equal to eighteen gallons.

KILL (Dutch). Originally the bed of a river or creek, and by relation used to mean the stream itself. It is so used in Delaware and New York, but has been said to have no distinct legal signification. 1 N. Y. 90.

An Irish word, signifying a church or cemetery, which is used as a prefix to the names of many places in Ireland. R. & L. Diet.; Ency. Lond.

KILL (v.) To deprive of life. It is appropriate to express privation of life of any and all beings; if taking human life, distinctively, is intended, homicide (q. v.) is the appropriate technical word. Abbott.

KIN. Legal relationship; properly relations by blood, but often including those by marriage. It has been held to include a son-in-law under a statute disqualifying a justice of the peace, in cases to which his kin were parties; 16 Wis. 635; and a second cousin, of a mother under a statute disqualifying jurors in cases where persons of kin were parties; 74 Mo. 271. See NEXT OF KIN.

KIND. The agreement that a collector of taxes was to receive his commission "in kind" means the same kind of funds in which the tax is collected; 51 Ark. 213.

Another kind quoted is not synonymous with another quality quoted; 3 Q. B. D. 341. In this case the reference was to a loan of property to be repaid "in kind," see IN KIND; LOAN FOR CONSUMPTION.

KINDS KINDER. "Kindes kinder" is a German idiom corresponding with our words "children's children." 152 Ky. 731, 154 S. W. 11.

KINDRED. Relations by blood. 2 Jarm. Wills 643; 62 Ga. 144; quoting 2 Wms. Ex. 815. It is in some cases, however, used to include relations in law, as children by adoption in a statute; 85 Ky. 671; but not a grandson adopted as a son, so as to make kindred include the adopting parent; 148 Mass. 619. It was held that as the word kindred in the statute of descents means lawful kindred, that term did not include the mother of a bastard, when the right accrued prior to the act enabling illegitimate children to inherit; 38 Me. 153. See 100 Ind. 280; 50 Ia. 532; 129 id. 243; 144 Ill. 40. See BASTARD; DESCENT AND DISTRIBUTION.

Nature has divided the kindred of every one into three principal classes. 1. His children, and their descendants. 2. His father, mother, and other ascendants. 3. His collateral relations; which include, in the first place, his brothers and sisters, and their descendants; and, secondly, his uncles, cousins, and other relations of either sex, who have not descended from a brother or sister of the deceased. All kindred, then, are descendants, ascendants, or collaterals. A husband or wife of the deceased, therefore, is not his or her kindred; 14 Ves. 372. See Wood. Inst. 50; Ayliffe, Parerg. 425; Dane, Abr.; Toul-lier, Ec. 382; 2 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 516, n.; Pothier, Des Successions, c. 1, art. 3.

KING. The chief magistrate of a kingdom, vested usually with the executive power. See REGAL; SOVEREIGN.

KING CAN DO NO WRONG. This maxim means that the king is not responsible legally for aught he may please to do, or for any omission. Aust. Jur. sect. VI. It does not mean that everything done by the government is just and lawful, but that whatever is exceptionable in the conduct of public affairs is not to be imputed to the king; 2 Steph. Com., 11th ed. 486; Moz. & W.

This maxim has no place in the system of constitutional law of the United States, as applicable either to the government or any of its officers, or of the several states or any of their officers; 101 U. S. 343. Our government is not liable for the wrongful and unauthorized acts of its officers, however high their place, and though done under a mistaken zeal for the public good; 21 Alb. L. J. 397; 2 Wall. 661; 7 id. 123; 8 id. 269. See, generally, 114 U. S. 290.

KING'S BENCH. See COURT OF KING'S BENCH.

KING'S CHAMBERS. Those portions of the seas, adjacent to the coasts of Great Britain, which are inclosed within headlands so as to be cut off from the open sea by imaginary straight lines drawn from one promontory to another. They appear to have always formed part of the territorial waters of the Crown. Byrne.

KING'S or QUEEN'S COUNSEL. Barristers or sergeants who have been called within the bar and selected to be the king's counsel. They answer in some measure to the advocati fisci, or advocates of the revenue, among the Romans. They must not be employed against the crown without special leave, which was, however, always granted, at a cost of about nine pounds; 3 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 27, note.

KING'S EVIDENCE. An accomplice in a felony, who, on an implied promise of pardon if he fully and fairly discloses the truth, is admitted as evidence for the crown against his accomplices. 1 Phill. Ev. 81. A jury may, if they please, convict on the unsupported testimony of an accomplice; Tayl. Ev. 830; 4 Steph. Com. 393. On giving a full and fair confession of truth, the accomplice has a strong claim to a recommendation to mercy. He cannot be admitted to testify as king's evidence after judgment against him; 3 Russ. Cr. 956. In the United States, this is known as state's evidence. See ACCOMPLICE.

KING'S PEACE. See CONSERVATOR OF THE PEACE; PEACE.

KING'S PROCTOR. See QUEEN'S PROCTOR.

KING'S SILVER. A fine or payment due to the king for leave to agree in order to levy a fine (fnalis concordia). 2 Bla. Com. 350; Dy. 320, pl. 19; 1 Leon. 249, 250; 2 id. 56, 179, 233, 234; 5 Co. 39.

KING'S WIDOW. A widow of the king's principal tenant, who was obliged to take oath in chancery not to marry without the king's consent. Whart. Lex.

KINGDOM. A country where an officer called a king exercises the powers of government, whether the same be absolute or limited. Wolff. Inst. Nat. § 994. In some kingdoms, the executive officer may be a woman, who is called a queen.

KINSBOTE (from kin, and bote, a composition). In Saxon Law, a composition for killing a kinsman. Anc. Laws & Inst. of Eng. Index, Bote.

KINSMAN. A man of the same race or family; one related by blood. Webster.

KIRBY'S QUEST. An ancient record remaining with the remembrancer of the English exchequer; so called from being the inquest of John de Kirby, treasurer to Edward I.

KISSING THE BOOK. A ceremony used in taking the corporal oath, the object being, as the canonists say, to denote the assent of the witness to the oath in the form it is imposed. The witness kisses either the whole Bible, or some portion of it; or a cross in some countries. See the ceremony explained in Oughton's Ordo. tit. lxxx.; Consett, on Courts, part 3, sect. 1, § 3; Junkin, Oath 173, 180; 2 Pothier, Obl., Evans ed. 284. In Pennsylvania, by act of 1795, the witness places his right hand on the Bible, but does not kiss it.

KLEPTOMANIA. Insanity in the form of an irresistible propensity to steal. Wharton. See 10 Tex. Cr. App. 520. A form of insanity which is said to manifest itself by a propensity to acts of theft; Tayl. Med. Jur., Bell's ed. 766. It is said to be often shown in cases of women, laboring under their peculiar diseases or of those far advanced in pregnancy. There have been instances of well-educated persons who have taken articles of no value and without apparent motive. If it appears that the accused was incompetent to know that the act was wrong, the facts may establish a plea of insanity; id., quoting Tindal, C. J.

A sharp distinction is made between kleptomania and the tendency to steal so commonly observed in the well defined forms of insanity; the former is a defective mental characteristic approaching the confines of insanity on one subject alone, while the individual, on all other subjects, is perfectly sane. It differs from shoplifting in that the shoplifter steals for a purpose, and only those articles which are of value, while the kleptomaniac takes goods of any description, often of no use to herself and with no motive for their possession; 4 Am. Lawy. 533.

In determining the responsibility of such persons for their acts, the principal subjects to be considered are the absence of any real motive, the knowledge of previous acts of a similar character, the history of hereditary taint, and the presence of a neurotic condition; 3 With. & Beck. Med. Jur. 279.

Kleptomania is regarded as similar to homicidal insanity; 18 Tex. App. 287; 10 id. 520; 1 Bish. N. Cr. L. § 388; and it has been held a valid defence; 18 Tex. App. 287; but when it was rejected as a defence, the court would not disturb the verdict; 9 Co. Ct. Rep. Pa. 164.

As to irresistible impulse as a defence in criminal cases, see INSANITY.

In an English case, tried in 1875, a clergyman charged with stealing, had taken goods when the shopkeeper's back was turned and concealed them in his pocket. He at first denied taking them, then offered to pay for them and then attempted to leave. At the trial there was medical evidence that he had suffered from brain disease, and had been quite deranged at times. The opinion of medical experts was that the accused did not know the nature or quality of the act he had committed, at the time he had committed it, and he was acquitted. Tayl. Med. Jur., Bell's ed. 767.

KNACKER. "A person whose trade or business it is to kill any cattle not killed for the purpose of being used as butchers meat" (Protection of Animals Act, 1911, s. 15 e). "Cattle" includes any horse, ass, mule, bull, sheep, goat or pig" (ib.).

No knacker's yard can be established anew in the metropolis since 31st December, 1891, without the consent of the county council, and every knacker's yard must have an annual license from the county council. Outside the metropolis, knackers are licensed annually by the district councils. No one licensed as a knacker can be a horse dealer while so licensed. Every knacker must observe the conditions set out in the First Schedule to the Protection of Animals Act, 1911 s. 5. Byrne.

KNAVE. A false, dishonest, or deceitful person. This signification of the word has arisen by a long perversion of its original meaning, which was merely servant or attendant.

To call a man a knave has been held to be actionable; 1 Rolle, Abr. 52; 1 Freem. 277; 5 Pick. 244.

KNAVESHIP. In Scotch Law. A certain quantity of grain or meal to which the servant of the mill was entitled as of right. See SEQUEL.

KNEEL. To bend the knees in worship without resting on them is to kneel. 36 L. J. Ecc. 10.

KNIGHT. In English Law. The next personal dignity after the nobility. In the administration of royal justice, much of the work was formerly done by the knights; as for the more solemn, ancient, and decisive processes. To swear to a question of possession, free and lawful men were required, but to give the final and conclusive verdict about a matter of right, knights were necessary. In administrative law, therefore, knights were liable to special burdens, but in no other respect did he differ from the mere free man; 1 Poll. & Maitl. 394. Of knights there are several orders and degrees. The first in rank are knights of the Garter, instituted by Edward III. in 1344; next follows, a knight banneret; then come knights of the Bath instituted by Henry IV., and revived by George I.; and they were so called from a custom of bathing the night before their creation. The last order are knights bachelors, who, though the lowest, are yet the most ancient order of knighthood; for we find that King Alfred conferred this order upon his son Athelstan. 1 Bla. Com. 403. These are sometimes called knights of the chamber, being such as are made in time of peace, and so called because knighted in the king's chamber, and not in the field. Co. 2d Inst. 666. Knights were called equites, because they always served on horseback; auxili, from the gilt spurs they wore; and milites, because they formed the royal army, in virtue of their feudal tenures.

KNIGHT - MARSHAL. See MARSHAL-SEA.

In Old English Law. An officer of the king's house having jurisdiction and cognizance of transgressions within the king's house, and in the neighborhood thereof; also of contracts made within the house to which members of the household were a party. Jacob. See COURT OF MARSHAL-SEA.

KNIGHT'S FEE was anciently so much of an inheritance in land as was sufficient to maintain a knight; and every man possessed of such an estate was obliged to be knighted, and attend the king in his wars, or pay a pecuniary sum in lieu thereof, called escuage. In the time of Henry II. the estate was estimated at twenty pounds a year; but Lord Coke, in his time, states it to be an estate of six hundred and eighty acres. Co. Litt. 69 a. See 1 Poll. & Maitl. 232.

KNIGHT'S SERVICE. Upon the Norman conquest, all the lands in England were divided into knight's fees, in number above sixty thousand; and for every knight's fee, a knight was bound to attend the king in his wars forty days in a year, in which space of time a campaign was generally finished. If a man only held half a knight's fee, he was only bound to attend twenty days; and so in proportion. But this personal service, in process of time, grew into pecuniary commutations, or aids; until at last, with the military part of the feudal system, it was abolished at the restoration, by the statute of 12 Car. II. c. 24. 1 Bla. Com. 410; 2 id. 62; Will. Real Pr. 144; 1 Poll. & Maitl. 230.

A species of feudal tenure, which differed very slightly from a pure and perfect feud, being entirely of a military nature; and it was the first, most universal, and most honorable of the feudal tenures. To make a tenure by knight-service, a determinate quantity of land was necessary, which was called a knight's fee (q. v.) (feodum militaire). The measure of which was estimated at twelve plough-lands. Abbott; Spelm. 219; 2 Co. Inst. 596.

KNOCKED DOWN. A phrase used with reference to an auction, when the auctioneer by the fall of his hammer, or by any other audible or visible announcement, signifies to the bidder that he is entitled to the property on paying the amount of his bid, according to the terms of the sale. 7 Hill 439.

KNOW ALL MEN BY THESE PRESENTS. See PRESENTS.

KNOW. To have knowledge; to possess information, instruction, or wisdom. 106 Mo. 133.

"It may fairly be assumed that one who has reason to believe a fact exists, knows it exists. Certainly if he be a reasonable being." Strong, J., in 101 U. S. 557.

KNOWINGLY. In a statute imposing a penalty upon any one who shall knowingly sell, supply, etc., actual personal knowledge. 4 Lans. 17. In an indictment, a charge that one wilfully testified falsely, includes the assertion that he knowingly so testified; 51 N. W. Rep. (Minn.) 474. The word "knowingly," or "well knowing," will supply the place of a positive averment, in an indictment or declaration, that the defendant knew the facts subsequently stated; if notice or knowledge be unnecessarily stated, the allegation may be rejected as surplusage. See Cornyns, Dig. Indictment (G 6); 2 Cush. 577; 2 Stra. 904; 2 East 452; 1 Chitty, Pl. 367.

KNOWLEDGE. Information as to a fact.

The act of knowing: clear perception of the truth; firm belief; information. Knowledge "is not confined to what we have personally observed or to what we have evolved by our own cognitive faculties." 106 Mo. 135. Where in a charge in a homicide case the court used the expression "knowledge to explain," circumstances proven "tending to show that the defendant was connected with the homicide," it was held to be synonymous with "ability to explain"; 28 Fla. 511.

"Knowledge is information and information knowledge." 1 Heming, 1; 5 Esp. 58. "Absolute knowledge can be had of but few things." 8 Allen, 35.

"In a legal sense it may be classified as positive and imputed—imputed, when the means of knowledge exist, known and accessible to the party, and capable of communicating positive information. When there is knowledge, notice, as legally and technically understood, becomes immaterial. It is only material when, in the absence of knowledge, it produces the same results. However closely actual notice may, in many instances, approximate knowledge and constructive notice may be its equivalent in effect, there may be actual notice without knowledge; and when constructive notice is made the test to determine priorities of right, it may fall far short of knowledge and be sufficient." 81 Ala. 145.

Many acts are perfectly innocent when the party performing them is not aware of certain circumstances attending them; for example, a man may pass a counterfeit note, and be guiltless, if he did not know it was so; he may receive stolen goods, if he were not aware of the fact that they were stolen. In these and the like cases it is the guilty knowledge which makes the crime.

Such guilty knowledge is made by the statute a constituent part of the offence; and therefore it must be averred and proved as such. But it is in general true, and may be considered as a rule almost necessary to the restraint and punishment of crimes, that when a man does that which by the common law or by statute is unlawful, and in pursuing his criminal purpose does that which constitutes another and different offence, he shall be held responsible for all the legal consequences of such criminal act. When a man, without justifiable cause, intends to wound or maim another, and in doing it kills him, it is murder, though he had no intention to take life. It is true that in the commission of all crimes a guilty purpose, a criminal will and motive, are implied. But, in general, such bad motive or criminal will and purpose, that disposition of mind and heart which is designated by the generic and significant term "malice," is implied from the criminal act itself. But if a man does an act, which would be otherwise criminal, through mistake or accident, or by force or the compulsion of others, in which his own will and mind do not instigate him to the act or concur in it, it is matter of defence, to be averred and proved on his part, if it does not arise out of the circumstances of the case adduced on the part of the prosecution. Per Shaw, C. J., in 2 Metc. Mass. 192. Thus, it is not necessary, in an indictment against an unmarried man for adultery with a married woman, to aver that he knew, at the time when the offence was committed, that she was a married woman; nor is it necessary to prove such knowledge at the trial; 2 Metc. Mass. 190. See, as to the proof of guilty knowledge, 1 B. & H. Lead. Cr. Cas. 185-191. See INTENTION; IGNORANCE OF LAW. As to the doctrine of imputed knowledge, see NOTICE.

The statement that one has "no knowledge or information" is equivalent to saying that one has no sufficient knowledge or information to form a belief. 8 S. W. 876.

See ACTUAL KNOWLEDGE; NO KNOWLEDGE OR INFORMATION; FAIR KNOWLEDGE.

KNOWN HEIRS. In a statute relating to the sale of property of unknown heirs, it has been held to mean those persons who are known, and whose right to inherit, or the extent of whose right, to inherit, is dependent on the non-existence of other persons nearer or as near as the ancestor in the line of descent. 65 Hun 175.

L. The twelfth letter of the alphabet. As a Roman numeral it stands for 50. In the English money the small l is the sign for pounds. It is also an abbreviation for labor (book), law, lord. L. 8. means Long Quinto, which is the designation of one of the parts of the Year Books.

LA CHAMBRE DES ESTRIERES. The Star chamber. See COURT OF STAR CHAMBER.

LABES REALIS, or VITIUM REALIS, in the law of Scotland, is an inherent vice or defect in the title by which anything has been acquired, which affects even the rights of purchasers and creditors who have obtained it innocently. Bell; Mos. & W.

LABEL. A slip of ribbon, parchment, or paper, attached to a deed or other writing to hold the appended seal.

In the ordinary use of the word, it is a slip of paper attached to articles of manufacture for the purpose of describing them or specifying their quality, etc., or the name of the maker. The use of a label has been distinguished from a trade-mark proper; Browne, Trade-Marks §§ 133, 587, 588. The use of labels will be protected by a court of equity under some circumstances; id. 538. See TRADE-MARK; INFRINGEMENT; UNION LABEL LAWS.

A copy of a writ in the English Exchequer. Tidd, P. *156.

LABOR. Work requiring exertion or effort, either physical or mental; toil.

Labor and business are not synonymous; labor may be business, but it is not necessarily so, and business is not always labor. Making an agreement for the sale of a chattel is not within a prohibition of common labor on a Sunday, though it is (if by a merchant in his calling) within a prohibition against business; 2 Ohio St. 387. See SUNDAY.

The labor and skill of one man are frequently used in a partnership, and valued as equal to the capital of another.

The act of February 28, 1885, forbids any person or corporation to prepay transportation or in any way assist or encourage the importation of aliens into the United States, under contract of any kind made previous to their importation, to perform labor or service therein; such contracts are declared void. The penalty is $1,000, which may be sued for by the United States or any person (including the alien) who may first bring his action therefor, as debts of like amount are now recovered in the circuit court, the proceeds to go to the treasury. The district attorney is required to prosecute the suit at the expense of the United States. Masters of vessels knowingly infringing the act are made liable to fine and imprisonment. The act does not extend to foreigners temporarily resident here who may employ servants or clerks; nor to skilled workmen imported to carry on some new industry not at present established, if such cannot be obtained here; nor to actors, artists, lecturers, or singers, nor to strictly domestic servants; nor to persons who may assist relations or friends to emigrate here. The amendment of Feb. 28, 1887, provides for the detention and return of such aliens.

The act is a constitutional exercise of the power to regulate commerce; 28 Fed. Rep. 795; it was passed to protect the health, morals, and safety of the people of this country; 5 U. S. App. 656. It must appear that the alien did in fact emigrate, and that the person who assisted him knew that he was under contract; 41 Fed. Rep. 751; there must have been a contract made previous to the importation, to perform labor here; 18 U. S. App. 472. Where an alien writes to a resident proposing to come here and enter the service of the resident and the latter accepts the offer and pays his passage, it is not within the act; 4 U. S. App. 41. A laborer on a dairy farm is not a domestic servant; 32 Fed. Rep. 75; a milliner is not a professional artist; 41 Fed. Rep. 28; a clergyman brought to this country under contract to take charge of a church as a rector is not within the act; 148 U. S. 457. One is not liable to deportation as a laborer who at the time of the passage of the act requiring alien laborers to register was a merchant and who subsequently became a laborer on a fruit farm which he leased; 71 Fed. Rep. 680; nor is a chemist on a sugar plantation, though his expenses are paid; 163 U. S. 258.

A clause in the constitution of California forbidding the employment by a corporation of any Chinese or Mongolian has been held in conflict with the treaty of the United States with China and void; 1 Fed. Rep. 481; so in New York a statute forbidding a contractor on public work to employ an alien was held a violation of the treaty with Italy and unconstitutional; 34 N. Y. Suppl. 942. See ALIEN; CITIZEN. As to new industries, see 53 Fed. Rep. 554, where the court, in charging the jury, held that the manufacture of lace, in which two or three concerns were "struggling for existence, experimenting, hoping," was a new industry, within the meaning of the act, and that it was a question of law for the court, and directed an acquittal. See LABORER; MASTER AND SERVANT; WAGES.

LABOR ARBITRATION. The investigation and determination of disputed matters between employers and employees.

In many of the states, state boards of arbitration have been provided by statute for the hearing and adjustment of differences between employers and their employees, and a recent federal statute applying only to railroad and transportation companies authorizes the executive to appoint commissioners for such investigation and to determine the best methods of righting the grievances of the employees; U. S. Laws, 1888, ch. 1063.

In Missouri, Colorado, and North Dakota the functions of the state board of arbitration are filled by the labor commissioner, and in New York, Ohio, New Jersey, California, Maryland, Texas, Massachusetts, Wisconsin, and Montana, there are statutory provisions for private boards of arbitration. The constitution of Wyoming provides that appeals from the decisions of compulsory boards of arbitration may be taken to the supreme court of the state, and the manner of taking such appeals must be prescribed by law; Const. Wyo. ch. 19, sec. 2.

Objections to bringing labor troubles before the state board of arbitration must be urged before such board before application to the courts; 47 La. Ann. 874, and it devolves on the board in the first instance to pass on questions of regularity and compliance with statutory provisions in the steps taken to bring the matter to its notice; id. See Stimson, Lab. L. §§ 67, 68.

It is a curious fact that during the struggle in this country to devise some effective system of labor arbitration, little or no attention seems to have been paid to some very successful efforts in that direction in England which long antedated any American legislation. At a very early period the regulation of wages was controlled by two masters and two journeymen, or, in default of agreement, by a magistrate after hearing both sides, but this was terminated by the separation of the masters and journeymen into two classes, and thereafter wages were fixed either by the employers or the magistrates. The latter system prevailed under the apprenticeship law of Elizabeth, and this continued until early in the eighteenth century, except in the cotton factories, which were not within the law. In this industry, there was satisfactory regulation by a joint committee of laborers and employers, but towards the latter end of the eighteenth century, the latter obtained general control and the apprenticeship law was repealed. From then until about 1860, this condition remained undisturbed except by frequent petitions to parliament, although in the book printing business the trades unions secured an arrangement for setting price lists by a joint committee of employers and laborers, which was in operation with good success since 1805.

In 1860 the system of arbitration and agreement originated by a manufacturer, Mr. Mundella, successfully dealt with the labor problem in the various branches of trade involved in the stocking, weaving and glove industries of the three counties of Nottingham, Leicestershire, and Derbyshire. The system, in brief, provided for a court of arbitration and agreement to decide every question relative to wages. It consisted of nine employers and nine laborers, selected respectively by an assembly of their own class for one year. The court had a regular organization with a standing executive committee by which all disputes were disposed of so far as practicable, the final judgment, however, being sent by the court. The two interests involved negotiated with each other on perfect equality and the decisions were binding. Under this system, there was no umpire and no provision for the execution of the judgment, the reliance being entirely upon the moral force of the statute, conscience, and the pressure of public opinion. The practical working of these courts was very successful and, quoting Mr. Mundella, July 4, 1884, "during eight years we had not a single strike, and never in the history of our city and our industry did there exist such a hearty good understanding between employers and laborers as now." The rules may be found in detail in chap. 18 of The Relation of Labor to the Law of Today, by Brentano, translated by Porter Sherman, from which the historical facts here stated are mainly taken.

Another system of courts of arbitration and agreement was that of Rupert Kettle, a judge of the county court of Worcestershire; the statutes drawn by him were adopted by the employers and laborers in the building trades in Wolverhampton. They were in their main features similar to the Mundella courts, but differed from the latter in the fundamental point of providing an impartial umpire, and through legal provisions, the judgments were made binding in law. These provisions, however, were not always required in practice, as the presence of an impartial umpire had a tendency to produce an agreement without calling upon him; id. The result of the actual working of these two systems for many years is that they have approached each other, in that those of Kettle have become mere courts of agreement and those of Mundella have in most cases elected an impartial umpire who decides in case of a tie. The relation between the trades unions and the courts of arbitration in many districts has become very intimate, the former making provision in their organization for the labor representation in the latter, paying the laborer's share of the expenses of the courts and enforcing the judgments by expelling members who do not obey them. The courts are similarly supported by societies of employers; id.

The work cited sums up the result:—"And from those industries at Nottingham and Wolverhampton since that time the organization of peace has extended from industry to industry and from city to city, until the system has been adopted in a greater or less degree in the most important centres of British industry. But everywhere, where in an industry a court of arbitration according to one or the other of the two systems has been established, there has been since that time neither a strike nor a lockout."

LABOR A JURY. To tamper with a jury; to persuade jurymen not to appear. It seems to come from the meaning of labor, to prosecute with energy, to urge; as to labor a point. Dy. 48; Hob. 294; Co. Litt. 157 b; 14 & 20 Hen. VII. 80, 11. The first lawyer that came from England to practise in Boston was sent back for laboring a jury. Washb. Jud. Hist.

LABOR UNION. A combination or association of laborers for the purpose of fixing the rate of their wages and hours of work, for their mutual benefit and protection, and for the purpose of righting grievances against their employers.

In England when the rate of wages was fixed by law or by the determination of a magistrate, and when there was a statutory provision that all conspiracies and covenants among workmen not to make or do their work except at a certain rate or price, it was held a criminal conspiracy for a combination of workmen to refuse to work for so much per diem, though the matter about which they conspired might be lawful for one of them or for any of them to do had they not conspired to do it; 8 Mod. 11; but in the United States, though this decision was followed in the case of the Boot and Shoemakers of Philadelphia; Pamphlet 1806; The Pittsburgh Cordwainers; Pamphlet, 1816; and in 14 Wend. 9, and 2 Wheel. Cr. Cas. 262; yet they were decided by inferior courts, and in the first case before the supreme court of Pennsylvania (Com. v. Carlisle) that court held that a combination of employers to reduce the wages of their employes was not unlawful; Bright, 36. In the case of the Master Stevedores v. Walsh, Daly, J., upheld this principle and denied the authority of the English case; 2 Daly 1; as did Shaw, J., in 4 Metc. 111; and these cases may be considered as having definitely settled the law in this country that a combination of laborers for a lawful purpose does not amount to a conspiracy.

In England, however, the Journeymen Tailors case, 8 Mod. 11, was followed as late as 1855, when it was held that a bond signed by eighteen employers to conduct their business as to rates of wages, time of work, etc., was a combination in restraint of trade and null and void at common law; 6 El. & Bl. 47; and in 1869 the court was divided as to whether a labor union whose by-laws countenanced strikes was not thereby rendered illegal; L. R. 4 Q. B. 602. In 1824 the first act was passed in England which legalized the combination of workmen; 5 Geo. IV. c. 99; but this was repealed the following year, and by the repealing act the combination of workmen was made lawful for the purpose of agreeing upon the prices which they might demand and the hours during which they would work, but making punishable any attempt to enforce the laws of the combining workmen by violence and intimidation; 6 Geo. IV. c. 129. In 1871 two acts were passed for the purpose of consolidating and settling the law; 34 & 35 Vict. c. 81; and these were supplemented by the Trades Union Amendment Act of 1876; these statutes going so far as to declare such combinations lawful even when acting (peaceably) in restraint of trade.

The right of entering and leaving the service of an employer is one that every man possesses and is one of the corollaries of personal liberty, and it has almost uniformly been held that the same right might be exercised by any number of men jointly, if conducted in a peaceable and orderly manner and attended with no infringement of the rights of others; 28 Fed. Rep. 748; 106 Mass. 1; 54 Minn. 223; 2 Daly 1; 88 Pac. Rep. (Ore.) 547; contra, 32 N. J. L. 151; and labor unions have been recognized by act of congress authorizing their incorporation; U. S. Rev. Stat. 1 Suppl. 498; and by the statutes of most of the states. It has been held that such unions have an entire right to seek to compel employers to deal solely with men belonging to their union by all proper means, as by persuasion or even by a properly conducted strike; 60 How. Pr. 163; that if the means are not unlawful, they have a right to endeavor to persuade those who have been accustomed to deal with an employer to withdraw their trade; 77 Hun 215; that they may agree not to teach their trade to others; 113 Mass. 179; and that where the combination is peaceable and without intimidation, employees may peaceably assemble to argue and persuade concerning a reduction of wages with the expectation of a strike, and the employees will not be charged with any loss resulting from their quitting work; 24 U. S. App. 240; and they may lawfully pay the expenses of those who leave their employment and may post in their places of assembly the names of those who have contributed to the fund for the support of the workmen who have left; 17 N. Y. S. 264.

But other cases have held differently: A labor union may not prevent an employer from employing certain workmen; 50 Vt. 278; or from obtaining workmen; 54 Fed. Rep. 40; or prevent workmen from obtaining work; 5 Cox, C. C. 163; 110 N. Y. 633; or threaten a boycott; 80 Atl. Rep. (N. J.) 881; 55 Conn. 46; 45 Fed. Rep. 185; 8 R. & Corp. L. J. 561; or carry out a boycott; 63 Fed. Rep. 808; 147 Mass. 213; or strike with the intention of forcing others to join the union; 10 N. Y. St. Rep. 790; or picket the premises of an employer during a strike with the usual accompaniments of insulting and threatening words and gestures to those who work for him; 10 Cox, C. C. 593; 84 L. T. N. S. 58; 152 Pa. 593; [1896] 1 Ch. 811; but the illegality of the action and the irreparable nature of the injury must be clearly alleged; 144 N. Y. 199; 20 Ore. 527. Leaders of a labor union who receive money from an employer for ending a boycott are guilty of extortion; 138 N. Y. 649; 137 id. 29; and it has been held unlawful for an officer of a labor union to order the members thereof not to work for an employer; [1893] 1 Q. B. 715 (but in this case the officer was supplying the employer with goods, and his action was for the purpose of forcing his customer to refrain from acts which he had a right to do, and the action of the officer was held induced for malice); or for a delegate (requested by some of the members of the union) to induce an employer to discharge workmen; [1895] 2 Q. B. 21. If, by threats and intimidation, a labor union drives away the customers of an employer and destroys his trade, it thereby injures him by an unlawful act and is liable for damages to him whether the action was malicious or not; 13 Tenn. 521; and if such union compels a non-union man to leave his employment and prevents him from securing another situation, it is civilly liable for damages to him; 77 Md. 596.

An officer of a labor union may be enjoined from ordering the members to carry out one of the rules of the union; 54 Fed. Rep. 730; and equity may compel a labor union to recall an order to its members; id.

A district delegate appointed by the members of a labor union to confer with and advise them in disputes is not the servant or agent of the officers or of the members of the union; [1895] 2 Q. B. 21; and the chairman and secretary of a labor union will not be liable for the action of the district delegate in causing non-union men to be discharged from employment, or for threats of calling upon all union men to strike; id.

In a recent English case a trades-union district delegate notified a corporation that if it did not discharge certain of its employees, certain other employees would strike; the former were thereupon discharged and sued the district delegate. The jury found for the plaintiffs and also that the defendant maliciously induced the company to discharge the plaintiffs. Judgment thereon was affirmed by the court of appeals, but was reversed by the house of lords, by a majority of six to three; it was held that malice does not constitute a cause of action in such a case, unless there is some act of actual unlawfulness; and that the gist of this action is procuring a breach of contract, which was not present in this case; Allen v. Flood, 43 Sol. Journ. 108 (Dec. 18, 1897). Few legal decisions have been awaited with more interest than this one. Sir Frederick Pollock says of it: "The House of Lords never deserved better of the Common Law;" 14 Law Quart. Rev. 1. And another English law journal says that the decision "is accepted by the profession as sound. . . . In spite of numbers, the weight of judicial opinion is preponderantly in favor of the law as now stated. The two ablest judges in courts of first instance agreed with the four greatest lawyers in the House of Lords—perhaps we should say of our generation. This is enough. It is curious that politics took sides—perhaps involuntarily; and it is also curious that trades unionism should have to be thankful that there is a House of Lords." 104 Law Times 143 (Dec. 18, 1897).

Under recent acts of congress (the Interstate Commerce Act and the Anti-trust Act of 1887 and 1890 respectively), a labor union may be guilty of criminal conspiracy or forming a combination in restraint of trade if their actions tend to obstruct interstate or foreign commerce, though they consist in merely quitting the service of an employer or preventing others from working for him; 64 Fed. Rep. 994; 55 id. 149; 63 id. 801, 824; 64 id. 27; or in delaying a train carrying the mails; 65 id. 210; 67 id. 686; 63 id. 834, 840; and equity will interfere to compel striking railroad employees to perform their duties "so long as they remain in the employment of the company;" 62 Fed. Rep. 796. That a labor union was in its origin lawful was held no ground of defence; 54 id. 994. But in the circuit court for the District of Massachusetts, it was held that it is not sufficient for an indictment to allege a purpose to drive certain competitors out of the field; it must show a conspiracy in restraint of trade by engrossing or monopolizing the market; 65 id. 803; but see 62 id. 801, where the former case was expressly disapproved.

Where the action of a labor union becomes a criminal conspiracy, the remedy is by injunction; and the equitable jurisdiction to prevent conspiracies by combinations of organized labor is justified upon the ground that, though equity will not interfere to prevent the commission of a crime, as such, yet where the acts complained of amount to an infringement of a property right, the court may act; 8 De G. F. & J. 233; or to a nuisance; 147 Mass. 212; or to a boycott; 45 Fed. Rep. 130; or to an intimidation; 51 Fed. Rep. 260. One apprehending injury from such a combination may bring a bill against one or more persons, and obtain at once without waiting for any hearing, or answer by the defendant, a preliminary injunction against not only the defendants named, but all other agents, servants, and subordinates named or unnamed; and, finally, against any person whatever who may have knowledge that such injunction has been granted; 64 Fed. Rep. 320. A disregard of such an injunction amounts to a contempt and subjects the offender to fine and imprisonment, and such offender is not entitled to a jury trial; 58 N. H. 60; 98 Ind. 239; 134 U. S. 31; and from an order in contempt there is no appeal from the court issuing it to a higher court; 71 Wis. 64; although it has been held in some jurisdictions that there may be an appeal where the injunction was issued to protect private interests and not the public; 18 Stew. (N. J.) 873; but even this appeal only goes so far as to give the appellate court the right to investigate and see whether the court below had jurisdiction of the subject-matter; 63 Mich. 75. The person in contempt may, in some jurisdictions, take the matter up by writ of certiorari; 34 Pac. Rep. (Mont.) 39; he may not have a writ of habeas corpus; 153 U. S. 564; 64 Fed. Rep. 724. Jurisdiction was expressly conferred upon the United States circuit court by the Anti-Trust Act of 1890.

A receiver appointed to take charge of property is an officer of the court; any interference with his possession is an interference with the possession of the court and is a contempt, so that a strike by a labor union which tends to interfere with the traffic of a railroad in the hands of a receiver is a contempt; 23 Fed. Rep. 544, 748; 24 id. 217; and it was further held that while the employees of receivers may freely quit their employment, they cannot do it in such a way as intentionally to disable the property, nor can they combine nor conspire to quit without notice, with the object and intent of crippling the property and its operation; 27 Fed. Rep. 443.

where the object of the strike was to compel recognition of a secret labor organization and the right of its officers to control the operations of a railroad, the officers being not even employees; Pardee, J., said: "This intolerable conduct goes beyond criminal contempt of court into the domain of felonious crimes."

Statutes pronouncing a penalty against an employer for discharging an employee for being a member of a labor union have been passed in Massachusetts, 1892; California, Illinois, Indiana, Idaho, Missouri, and New York, 1898; Ohio and New Jersey, 1894; Wisconsin, 1895; Kansas and Pennsylvania, 1897; England, 1874; and they have been held constitutional; 80 Wily, L. Bul. 842; but contra in Missouri on the grounds that such statutes are in contravention of the fifth and of the fourteenth amendments to the constitution of the United States and of the state constitution which provide that no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, and also because it is special legislation in that it does not relate to persons and things as a class—to all workmen, etc.—but only to those who belong to some lawful organization or society, evidently referring to a labor union; and the court said further: "It has none of the elements or attributes which pertain to a police regulation, for it does not in terms or by implication promote or tend to promote the public health, welfare, comfort, or safety, and if it did the state would not be allowed, under the guise and pretence of the police regulation, to encroach or trample upon any of the first rights of the citizen which the constitution intended to secure against diminution or abridgment." 31 S. W. Rep. (Mo.) 781.

He who performs with his own hands the contract he made with his employer. 46 Pa. 57.

One who labors in a toilsome occupation; a man who does work that requires little skill as distinguished from an artisan. Weber. In this sense the word is held to be used in an act giving a lien to laborers; 27 Ark. 567; and in an act exempting the wages of laborers from garnishment; 17 Ill. App. 196. In an act giving preference to employees of an insolvent corporation, it is construed to be equivalent to employee; 29 N. J. Eq. 255; and the term has been held not to embrace any officer for whom an annual salary is specifically named and appropriated; 47 Kan. 147.

Under a mechanic's lien law which extends to those who perform labor, an architect has been held to be included; 76 N. Y. 50; 26 N. J. Eq. 29; 13 Minn. 476; contra, 6 Mo. App. 445; a house painter; 51 Ill. 422; a teamster; 35 Kan. 11; a drayman; 30 N. J. C. 340; an agent employed at a monthly salary to superintend the erection of buildings; 9 Mont. 443. One who furnishes labor and material is held not a laborer; 81 Ill. 496; and labor of oxen cannot be included in a lien for labor; 34 Me. 266; contra, 44 Mich. 588; 30 N. J. Eq. 598; nor can one who is employed to pay off laborers; 17 Mo. 271.

Under statutes giving a preference to laborers, servants, and employees against insolvent corporations, the word laborer is defined to include all persons doing labor or service of whatever character for or as employees in the regular employ of such corporation; N. J. Rev. Stat. 188, § 63. A superintendent of a natural gas company is a laborer under the act preferring claims of laborers; 124 Ind. 159; an assistant bookkeeper; 52 Hun 151; a head miller; 83 Mich. 513; a drayman and the services of his horses; 30 N. J. Eq. 588; an attorney; 38 N. Y. 367; contra, 106 N. Y. 631. A bookkeeper of a corporation, who, though occupying a position as one of the directors thereof, and for that purpose having been made a nominal holder of stock, yet has no pecuniary interest in the corporation, has been held to be a laborer and entitled to a lien for services; 35 Atl. Rep. (N. J.) 157.

Those held not within the meaning of such a statute are the president of a corporation; 41 N. J. Eq. 470; even if he were also its general manager; 35 Fed. Rep. 438; the secretary of a corporation; 1 Fed. Rep. 270; a travelling salesman; 109 N. Y. 631.

Under the statutes making stockholders individually liable for debts owing to laborers and servants, a contractor is not included in the term; 24 N. Y. 493; 46 id. 521; 39 Mich. 596; or a secretary; 37 N. Y. 640, overruling 43 Barb. 163; or a consulting engineer; 38 Barb. 390; or a superintendent; 17 Hun 463; or an assistant superintendent; 82 N. Y. 626, affg. 16 Hun 166; or a general manager; 90 N. Y. 213; or a travelling salesman; 50 Mich. 326; 88 Tenn. 400; but one who acted as a foreman, performed manual labor, kept the time of the men, and collected bills was held within the meaning of the statute; 29 Hun 39.

Under acts exempting the wages of laborers from garnishment a superintendent of the erection of a building; 14 Md. 559; a shipping clerk; 46 Ga. 406; an overseer of a plantation; 25 id. 571; the forwarding clerk of a railroad company; 51 id. 578; 71 id. 748; a bookkeeper; 77 Ga. 306; a teacher; 54 id. 106 (contra, 58 Conn. 502); a private secretary to the president of a corporation; 90 Ga. 570; and a telegraph operator; 45 Minn. 81; are held to be included in the term "laborers"; but the "boss" of a department of a factory who directs the operatives and employs and discharges them; 73 Ga. 343; a travelling salesman; 17 Ill. App. 196; 43 La. Ann. 423; an agent who sells goods by sample; 42 Minn. 112; and a railroad conductor; 77 Ga. 386; are not laborers so as to entitle them to an exemption from garnishment.

As to who are laborers under the federal contract importation act, see LABOR.

LABORERS, STATUTES OF. 1. Stat. 38 Edw. III. passed in 1349 by the king in council. After reciting in the preamble that many of the operative class had died of the plague, and the survivors seeing the necessity to which the masters were reduced for want of servants, refused to work unless for excessive wages, it was enacted that all able-bodied persons (free or bond) under the age of three-score years, not exercising any craft, nor having the means of living or land of his own, should if required to serve in a station suiting his condition be bound to serve for the wages usual in the 30th year of the king under penalty of imprisonment. It was also provided that victuals should be sold at reasonable rates, and that no person should give to a beggar who was able to work and preferred to live in idleness, under pain of imprisonment. This statute was partially repealed by stat. 5 Eliz. c. 4; see infra; and finally repealed by stat. 26 & 27 Vict. c. 125, passed in 1863. 2. Stat. 12 Rich. 2, which was passed at Cambridge in 1868, forbidding a servant at the end of his term to go out of his district without a letter under the king's seal, on pain of being put in the stocks. The amount of wages was regulated and penalties inflicted on masters who gave more than the legal amount. There was also provision for the punishment of beggars except religious people and approved hermits, who had testimonial letters from their ordinaries. 3. Stat. 5 Eliz. c. 4, passed 1562, repealing most of the before mentioned statutes, and regulating workmen and apprentices. The justices of the peace were required to hold special sessions for fixing rates of wages, and a justice absenting himself without any lawful excuse was to be fined £10. For giving more wages than the legal amount masters were to be imprisoned for ten days and to forfeit £5. This statute was substantially repealed by subsequent ones; Moz. & W. See FACTORY ACTS.

LAC or LAKH. One hundred thousand. It is used in India, as—a lac of rupees is 100,000 rupees, or about £10,000 or $50,000; Wils. Gloss. Ind.; Moz. & W.

LACHES (Fr. lacher). Unreasonable delay; neglect to do a thing or to seek to enforce a right at a proper time.

The neglect to do that which by law a man is obliged or in duty bound to do. 30 Fla. 612.

The neglect to do what in law should have been done, for an unreasonable and unexplained length of time and under circumstances permitting diligence. 21 S. E. Rep. (S. C.) 277.

Unlike a limitation, it is not a mere matter of time, but principally a question of the inequity of permitting the claim to be enforced; an inequity founded upon some change in the condition or relation of the property of the parties; 10 U. S. App. 227; 145 U. S. 868. It has been said to involve the idea of negligence; the neglect or failure to do what ought to have been done under the circumstances to protect the rights of the parties to whom it is imputed, or involving injury to the opposite party through such neglect to assert rights within a reasonable time; 88 Mich. 177.

Courts of equity withhold relief from those who have delayed the assertion of their claims for an unreasonable time, and the mere fact that suit was brought within a reasonable time does not prevent the application of the doctrine of laches when there is a want of diligence in the prosecution; 5 Col. App. 391; 153 U. S. 449; 160 id. 171. The question of laches depends not upon the fact that a certain definite time has elapsed since the cause of action accrued, but upon whether, under all the circumstances, the plaintiff is chargeable with want of due diligence in not instituting the proceedings sooner; 160 U. S. 171; it is not measured by the statute of limitations; 155 U. S. 449; but depends upon the circumstances of the particular case; 141 U. S. 260. Where injustice would be done in the particular case by granting the relief asked, equity may refuse it and leave the party to his remedy at law; 168 U. S. 41; or where laches is excessive and unexplained; 34 U. S. App. 50. In the absence of negligence by the plaintiff, in the prosecution of his claim, no period short of the legal statute of limitations will bar an action on an equitable claim; 28 S. E. Rep. (Va.) 238; and see 78 Fed. Rep. 155, where it was held that "mere delay, for the full period of four years allowed by a state statute of limitations, in bringing a suit in rem to recover damages to a cargo, is not of itself, and in the absence of exceptional circumstances from which laches would be imputable, sufficient to justify the court in declining to entertain the suit," but where the complainant has remained silent for a longer time, after the discovery of the material facts than the time limited by the statute of limitations, it is laches; 12 U. S. App. 137. Where a statute provides that no claim is barred until the limitation of the statute has accrued, a complainant cannot be denied relief because the action lacks but a few days of being barred by limitation, on the ground of gross laches; 19 So. Rep. (Miss.) 707. Where an equitable right of action is analogous to a legal right of action, and there is a statute of limitations fixing a limit of time for bringing an action at law to enforce such claims, a court of equity will, by analogy, apply the same limit of time to proceedings taken to enforce the equitable right; L. R. 6 H. L. 384. One in possession of land may wait until his title and possession are attacked before setting up equitable demands, without being chargeable with laches; 71 Fed. Rep. 618; as where an unauthorized franchise in a street is given, adjoining property owners are not required to attack the validity of the franchise until their rights are actually invaded; 2 U. S. App. 488. Mere lapse of time not sufficient to bar the corresponding legal remedy will not constitute laches barring a suit, there having been no change in the condition or relation of the property or parties which renders the enforcement of the claim inequitable; 18 So. Rep. (Ala.) 154.

Laches in seeking to enforce a right will, in many cases in equity, prejudice such right, for equity does not encourage stale claims nor give relief to those who sleep upon their rights; 4 Wait, Act. & Def. 472; 9 Pet. 405; 91 U. S. 512; 124 id. 188; 180 id. 43; 142 id. 236; 150 id. 193; 1 App. D. C. 36; 157 Mass. 46; this doctrine is based upon the grounds of public policy which requires for the peace of society, the discouragement of stale claims; 137 U. S. 556. The question whether one is precluded from equitable relief by the staleness of his demand is for the court and not for the jury; 27 Ore. 219.

It has been held to be inexcusable for 86 years; 16 U. S. App. 391; 27 years, unexplained; 145 U. S. 317; 23 years; 146 U. S. 103; 22 years during which the defendant company spent much labor and money in improvements; 181 U. S. 573; 22 years after knowledge of the facts; 178 U. S. 412; 19 years, on a bill to establish a trust; 7 U. S. App. 481; 14 years, in the assertion of title to lands which meantime had been sold to settlers; 4 U. S. App. 160; 10 years, in proceedings to enforce a trust in lands; 158 U. S. 416; 10 years, after the foreclosure and sale of a railroad in a bill by a stockholder to set aside the sale for collusion and fraud which were patent on the face of the proceedings; 146 U. S. 89; 9 years in a suit to have a deed declared a mortgage on the ground that it was obtained by taking advantage of the grantor's destitute condition; 7 U. S. App. 233; 8 years' acquiescence in a trade-mark for metallic paint, during which the defendant had built up an extended market for his product; 17 U. S. App. 145; 8 years in proceedings where complainant in consideration of $10,000 had released certain claims and sought to set the release aside on the ground that it was entitled to a much larger sum than it received; 159 U. S. 243; 3 years, where a person bought property of uncertain value and after three years brought suit to rescind the contract on the ground of fraudulent representation; 81 U. S. App. 103.

To constitute laches to bar a suit there must be knowledge, actual or imputable, of the facts which should have prompted action or, if there were ignorance, it must be without just excuse; 88 Minn. 197; see 173

Pa. 1; 148 U. S. 390; but where there is ignorance of the party's right, laches may be excused; 3 Mer. 363; 3 Ball & B. 104; 46 Fed. Rep. 35; 66 id. 504; 146 U. S. 68; 153 id. 413; 67 N. W. Rep. (Ia.) 268. Evidence that complainant had arranged to dispose of land bequeathed to her, is evidence that she knew of the existence of a will, and a delay of twenty years in bringing an action to set aside its probate is laches; 68 N. W. Rep. (Mich.) 139. Defense of laches on the ground that one might by inquiry have learned the facts relied on and filed his bill accordingly, is not available to one who is under obligation to disclose such facts without inquiry; 63 Fed. Rep. 869.

One who seeks to impeach a transaction on the ground of fraud must seek redress promptly; 173 Pa. 1; 2 Del. Ch. 247; 63 Fed. Rep. 490; 180 Pa. 539; 160 id. 359. Mere lapse of time will sometimes render a fraudulent transaction unimpeachable; 9 Pet. 405; 38 Va. 451; 87 W. Va. 315; 143 Ill. 409; 153 id. 298; but when the fraud is secret and suit is begun within a reasonable time after its discovery, laches is not a defense; 87 U. S. App. 61. Laches was held not imputable to a delay of more than ten years in filing a bill to set aside a fraudulent conveyance; 62 Ill. App. 198. See 61 Ark. 527. It is not so much the duty of a suitor in equity to be diligent in discovering his rights as to be prompt in asserting them after they become known; 27 U. S. App. 594; and a delay of eleven months in asking for the reformation of a mortgage on the ground of mutual mistakes was held not such laches as to bar the right of a subsequent mortgagee with knowledge of the mistake; 43 N. E. Rep. (Ind.) 259. Laches in assailing a fraud will not be imputed until the discovery of the fraud by the party affected thereby; 34 Fla. 149; and it has been held that delay will not defeat the right to relief in case of fraud, unless the fraud is known or ought by due diligence to have been known; 22 U. S. App. 12. Ignorance of facts complained of as fraud has been held no excuse for laches when the facts were evidenced by public records accessible to all, unless some affirmative act of deception be shown or some misleading device intended to prevent inquiry and exclude suspicion; 71 Fed. Rep. 7.

Laches may also be excused from the obscurity of the transaction; 2 Sch. & L. 487; see 93 Mich. 285; by the pendency of a suit; 1 Sch. & L. 415; and where the party labors under a legal disability, as insanity; 2 Yerg. 193; infancy; 80 Ala. 402; 71 Mo. 358; 65 Ark. 85; 17 R. I. 519; or coverture; 55 Md. 277; 9 N. J. Eq. 572; 19 Ves. 640; poverty is no excuse for laches; 71 Fed. Rep. 21; 149 U. S. 287; nor are ignorance and absence from the country; 4 U. S. 642; and no laches can be imputed to the public; 4 Mass. 522; 148 id. 424; 8 S. & R. 291; 97 Ill. 91; 93 Ind. 107; 85 Ky. 198. Laches on the part of its officers cannot be imputed to the government and no period of delay on the part of the sovereign power will serve to bar its right either in a court of law or equity when it seems fit to enforce it for the public benefit; 9 Wheat. 720; 97 U. S. 594; 130 id. 268; 15 C. C. A. 117; 67 Fed. Rep. 969; but though not ordinarily a defense to a suit brought by the government, where such suit is brought solely to benefit a private individual or where the government sues to enforce a right of its own, growing out of some ordinary commercial transaction, it may be set up as a defense; 137 U. S. 339; 91 id. 389; 67 Fed. Rep. 975; 71 id. 260. It is not a rule of universal application that laches cannot be set up in defense of a suit to enforce a charitable trust; 71 Fed. Rep. 250. Laches of a testator will be imputed to his executor; 34 U. S. App. 50.

The defense of laches may be raised by a general demurrer; 89 Md. 459; 8 App. D. C. 219; 83 Atl. Rep. (R. I.) 676; 157 Ill. 482; 160 id. 568; or by plea or answer, or presented by argument either upon a preliminary or final hearing; 87 U. S. App. 109. That the defense to laches must be made by answer and not by demurrer, see 147 N. Y. 241. Even though laches is not pleaded or the bill demurred to, courts of equity may withhold relief from those who have delayed the assertion of their claims for an unreasonable time; 164 U. S. 502. See INJUNCTION.

LACTA. A lack of weight; deficiency in the weight of money. The verb lactare said to have been used in an assize of statute in the 6th year of King John. Spel. Gloss.

LACUS. In Old English Law. An alloy of silver with base metal. Fleta l. 23, § 6. In Civil Law. A lake, a receptacle for water which is never allowed to get dry. Dig. 43, 14, 1, 8.

LADA. A method of trial by purgation. In vogue among the Saxons by which a person was purged of an accusation, as of an oath or ordeal. Spel. Gloss. In Old English Law. A laide or load. A water course, a trench or canal for draining marshy lands. Spel. Gloss.

A court of justice. A laide or lath. Cow.

LADEN IN BULK. In Maritime Law. Having the cargo loose in the hold, and not enclosed in boxes, bales, bags, or casks.

LADY. In England, the proper title of any woman whose husband is higher in rank than baronet or knight, or who is the daughter of a nobleman not lower than an earl, though the title is given by courtesy also to the wives of baronets and knights. Cent. Dict.

The word lady is derived from laoef dig (loaf day), which being applied to the mistress of a house came to be softened into the familiar term lady. On that day, it was the custom for the mistress of the manor to distribute bread to her poorer neighbors. Townsend, Manual of Dates, title Lady; 1 Chamb. Book of Days 154.

In England, the recognised courtesy title of the daughters of dukes, marquises, and earls and of the wife of anyone entitled to the courtesy title of lord. It is the customary title of the wife of a knight or of a baronet; but the formal title of those ladies is Dame; and, except formally, a marchioness, viscountess, or baroness is always spoken of or to as, Lady, instead of as the Marchioness, etc. Byrnes.

The word is derived from the Saxon laoef dig, or loaf-day, which words have in time been contracted into the present appellation. As to the original application of this expression, it may be observed, that heretofore it was the fashion of those families of affluence, to live constantly at their mansions in the country, and that once a week, or oftener, the lady of the manor distributed to her poor neighbors, with her own hands, a certain quantity of bread; but the practice which gave rise to this title is now as little known as the meaning of it; however, it may be from that hospitable custom, that to this day the ladies in England serve the meat at their own tables. A woman of rank. The title properly belongs to the wives of knights, and of all degrees above them, except the wives of bishops. Wharton; Ency. Lond.

LADY-DAY. The 25th of March, the feast of the Annunciation of the Blessed Virgin Mary. In parts of Ireland, however, they so designate the 15th of August, the festival of the Assumption of the Virgin.

Upon a parcel demise, rent to take place from the following Lady day, evidence of the custom of the country is admissible to show that by Lady day the parties meant Old Lady Day; 4 B. & Ald. 698.

LADY'S FRIEND. Previous to the act of 1857, abolishing parliamentary divorces, a functionary in the British house of commons. When the husband sued for a divorce, or asked the passage of an act to divorce him from his wife, he was required to make a provision for her before the passage of the act; it was the duty of the lady's friend to see that such a provision was made. Macq. H. & W. 218.

LAEN. Old Eng. Law. An estate held in trust for the maintenance of divine service. Stand. Dict.

LAENLAND. Land held of a superior whether much or little. 1 Poll. & Matl. 38. Land given to the lessee and to two or three successive heirs of his; synonymous with loan land. This species of tenure seems to have been replaced by that of holding by book or bockland. See Matl. Domesday Book and Bevoind 318. See FOLCLAND.

In the late Anglo-Saxon period this, as distinguished from bockland and fokland—both of which were held, but on different titles, from the king—meant land held of a superior other than the king. It thus corresponded more or less to land which, after the Norman Conquest, was held of, not by, a tenant, in capite. Byrne.

LÆSA MAJESTAS (Lat.). Læse-majesty, or injured majesty; high treason. It is a phrase taken from the civil law, and anciently meant any offence against the king's person or dignity, defined by 25 Edw. III. c. 6. See Glanv. lib. 5, c. 2; 4 Bla. Com. 75; Br. 118; CRIMEN LÆSÆ MAJESTATIS.

LÆSIO ENORMIS. The injury sustained by a party to an owner's contract who is overreached by the other to the extent of more than one-half the value of the thing sold. A rescript of Diocletian permitted a rescission of the sale by a vendor unless the purchaser agreed to the additional amount required to make up the value of the thing sold. Solm. Inst. Rom. L. § 69. It was sometimes called læsis ultra dimidium. Colq. C. L. § 2004.

LÆSIONE FIDEI, SUITS PRO. Proceedings in the ecclesiastical courts for spiritual offences against conscience, for non-payment of debts, or breaches of civil contracts. This attempt to turn the ecclesiastical courts into courts of equity was checked by the Constitution of Clarendon, A. D. 1164, q. v., 3 Bla. Com. 52; Whart. Lex.

LAET. In Old English Law. One of a class between servile and free. 1 Palg. Rise & Prog. 334.

Of this class a very recent work says: "Thus degree of servility are possible. A class may stand, as it were, half-way between the class of slaves and the class of free men. The Kentish law of the seventh century as it appears in the dooms of Æthelbert, like many of its continental sisters, knows a class of men who perhaps are not free men and yet are not slaves; it knows the laet as well as the freow. From what race the Kentish laet has sprung, and how, when it comes to details, the law will treat him—these are obscure questions, and the latter of them cannot be answered unless we apply to him what is written about the laeti, liti, and lidi of the continent. He is thus far a person that he has a small werild but possibly he is bound to the soil. Only in Æthelbert's dooms do we read of him. From later days, until Domesday Book breaks the silence, we do not obtain any definite evidence of the existence of any class of men who are not slaves but none the less are tied to the land." Matl. Domesd. 87. The laete were afterwards termed by the Normans burri, burrs or coliberti; id. 88. "His services, we are told, vary from place to place; in some districts he works for his lord two days a week and during harvest-time three days a week; he pays gafol in money, barley, sheep, and poultry; also he has ploughing to do besides his week work; he pays hearth-penny; he and one of his fellows must between them feed a dog. It is usual to provide him with an outfit of two oxen, one cow, six sheep, and seed for seven acres of his yardland, and also to provide him with household stuff; on his death all these chattels go back to his lord. Thus the boor is put before us as a tenant with a house and a yardland or virgate, and two plough oxen. He will therefore play a more important part in the manorial economy than the cottager who has no beasts. But he is a very dependent person; his beasts, even the poor furniture of his house, his pots and crocks, are provided for him by his lord. Probably it is this that marks him off from the ordinary villanus or townsmen, and brings him near the serf. In a sense he may be a free man." id. 87. In an earlier work of the same author it is said: "Once and only once, in the earliest of our Anglo-Saxon text; id. 80. We find mention, under the name of laet, of the half-free class of persons called liti and other like names in continental documents. To all appearance there had ceased to be any such class before the time of Alfred; it is there, fore needless to discuss their condition or origin." 1 Poll. & Matl. 12.

LAGA. The Law. The word was also extensively used to designate loss; observed in particular districts as Mercen lage, West Saxon lage, Dane lage.

LAGAN (Sax. lignan, cubare). See LIGAN.

LAGEDAY or LAGH DAY. A day of open court; a day of the county court. Cow.; Toiml.; Moz. & W.

LAGEMAN or LAGA MAN. A juror. Cow. In Old English Law. A man vested with or at least qualified for the exercise of jurisdiction, or sao and soc. Co. Litt. 53 a. See LAWMAN.

LAGEMANNUS. See LAHMAN.

LAGEN or LAGHNA. A measure of six sextarii. Flota l. 2, c. viii. It was generally used as a measure of viii. Lieutenant of the Tower had the privilege to take one lagen of wine, of all the wine-ships that come up the Thames. Cunningham. Lagena vini, a bottle of wine. Id.; Peter Leycester, Ant. of Cheshire.

LAGENA VINI. See LAGEN.

LAGER BEER. See BEER.

LAGHSLITE or LAHLSLIT (Sax.). A breach of law. Cowel. A mulct for an offence, viz.: of twelve "ores." 1 Anc. Inst. & Laws of Eng. 169.

LAGU. See LAQA.

LAHMAN. Anciently a lawyer. Matl. Domesd. 189. It seems to be another form of lage man, which see.

LAICUM FEODUM. See LAICUS.

LAICUM TENEMENTUM. See LAICUS.

LAICUS (Eccl. Lat.). A layman; laic; one not belonging to the priesthood. Harper's Lat. Dic.

Laicum feodum; a lay fee. Burrill; Magna Charta, 9 Hen. III. c. 18. Laicum tenementum; a lay tenement. Id.; Mag. Chart. c. 14.

LAID OUT. Used in reference to ways, it describes all conditions of a way, such as a way voted to be built, a way being built, or a way built. The context usually determines the meaning of the expression. 83 Me. 514.

LAIRWITE (from the Sax. legan, to lie together, and wite, a fine, etc.). A fine for the offence of adultery and fornication which the lords of some manors had the privilege of imposing on their tenants. Co. 4 Inst. 206; Flota, lib. 1, c. 47.

LAIS GENTS (O. Fr.). Secular people; laymen; a jury.

LAITY. Those persons who do not make a part of the clergy. They are divided into three states: 1. Civil, including all the nation, except the clergy, the army, and navy, and subdivided into the nobility and the commonalty. 2. Military. 3. Maritime, consisting of the navy. Whart. Lex. In the United States the division of the people into clergy and laity is not authorized by law, but is merely conventional.

LAIZ, LEEZ (O. Fr.). A legate. Kelh.

LAKE. A body of water surrounded by land, or not forming part of the ocean, and occupying a depression below the ordinary drainage level of the region. Cent. Dict. The fact that there is a current from a higher to a lower level does not make that a river which would otherwise be a lake; and the fact that a river swells out in broad pond-like sheets with a current does not make that a lake which would otherwise be a river; 14 N. H. 477.

The earlier decisions of the courts in this country tended to support the doctrine that no riparian owner could acquire title to the bed of any lake however small; 7 Allen 158; 13 Pick. 261; 30 Me. 47; 18 id. 198; but they were based upon the Massachusetts ordinance of 1647 (when the territory of Maine was a part of Massachusetts) which provided that all lakes more than ten acres in extent should be the property of the state for the benefit of the public. Other state courts followed these decisions, however, and while it is a recognized principle in this country that the title to the soil below the waters of a navigable lake is in the state and not in the owner of the abutting soil; 92 N. Y. 463; 34 Ohio St. 492; 34 La. Ann. 838; 19 Barb. 484; 45 Vt. 215; it has been also held that this principle applies to the bed of a non-navigable lake; 43 Wis. 248; 76 Ind. 302; 61 N. W. Rep. (la.) 250; 54 N. Y. 377; 120 Ill. 509; but see as to the last case, 140 U. S. 371, which held that the Illinois case did not establish in that state the doctrine that the bed of small lakes does not belong to riparian owners, there being another ground on which the decision was also based; therefore, although it is the practice of the federal courts to follow the decisions of the state courts, they refused in this instance so to do, reversing 16 Fed. Rep. 823. Later decisions in New York also overruled the case of Wheeler v. Spinola, 54 N. Y. 377; and hold that the bed of a non-navigable inland lake belongs to the abutting riparian owner; 134 N. Y. 353, reversing 11 N. Y. S. 87; and see in support of this doctrine, 62 Mich. 626; 32 N. J. L. 869; 58 Ind. 248; 61 N. W. Rep. (S. D.) 479; 47 Ohio St. 326.

Where a non-navigable inland lake is the subject of private ownership, neither the public nor an adjacent land owner has a right to boat upon it or to fish in its waters; 24 N. E. Rep. (Ohio) 686; and such an owner may lease his interest in the bed of the lake for a term of years, reserving to himself the right of fishing therein during such term; 11 Ohio Cir. Ct. Rep. 508.

In North Carolina it has been held that the bed of a lake may be the subject of private ownership, but if the waters are navigable in their natural state, the public have an easement of navigation in them which cannot be obstructed; 100 N. C. 477. The riparian proprietor upon a navigable lake has the exclusive right of access to and from the lake in front of his land and of building wharves in aid of navigation not interfering with the public easement; 42 Wis. 214; 10 Mich. 125. See 45 Vt. 215. In England, a non-tidal lake is the subject of private ownership; L. R. 3 App. Cas. 641.

Where the ownership of the bed of the lake is in the state it has no power to arbitrarily destroy the rights of the riparian owner on such lake without his consent and without due process of law, for the sole purpose of benefiting some other riparian owner or for any other merely private purpose; and an act authorizing the drainage of such a lake without the consent of a riparian owner is unconstitutional; 67 N. W. Rep. (Wis.) 918; nor have a board of supervisors, in the absence of a statute directly conferring it, the right to construct a bridge over such a lake; 42 N. W. Rep. (la.) 506.

In the case of a meandered lake the riparian proprietor is held entitled to the middle thereof; 61 N. W. Rep. (S. D.) 479; but in Illinois the title to such waters and the land covered by them is held to be in the state in trust for the people; 161 Ill. 462. Meander lines do not cut off land between such lines and the waters of a meandered lake; 131 Ind. 51; 42 Wis. 238; 44 Mich. 408; 65 Miss. 46; 140 U. S. 871; and deroiled land left by the receding waters of a meandered lake is held to belong to the riparian owners; 25 Ark. 120; 32 Pac. Rep. (Utah) 690; but not where the lake is artificially drained; 61 N. W. Rep. (la.) 250; and in Illinois, gradual recession of the waters of a meandered lake is held to give the riparian proprietors the right to the new land by following the recession of the waters to their edge; but a considerable body of new land suddenly or perceptibly formed by reliction is held to belong to the state; 161 Ill. 462.

LAMANEUR (Fr.). In French Law. A harbor or river pilot. Ord. Mar. liv. 4, 3.

LAMB. A sheep, ram, or ewe, under the age of one year. 4 C. & P. 216.

LAMBARDE'S ARCHAION. A discourse upon the high court of justice in England, by William Lambarde, published in 1635. Marv. Leg. Bibl.

LAMBARDE'S ARCHAIONOMIA. A collection of the laws of the Anglo-Saxons, William the Conqueror and Henry I. published in 1508 by the same author, keeper of the records in the tower. See Marv. Leg. Bibl.; Allibone, Dict. Authors.

LAMBARDE'S EIRENARCHA. A work by the same author upon the office and duties of a justice of the peace. Editions were published in Latin in 1579 and 1581, and in English it was published in 1590. See Marv. Leg. Bibl.; Allibone, Dict. Authors.

LAMBETH DEGREE. A degree given by the archbishop of Canterbury. 1 Bla. Com. 381, n. Although he can confer all degrees given by the two universities, the graduates have many privileges not shared by the recipients of his degrees.

LAMMAS DAY. The 1st of August. Cowel. It is one of the Scotch quarter days, and is what is called a "conventional term." Moz. & W.

"This was one of the four great pagan festivals of Britain, the others being on 1st November, 1st February, and 1st May. The festival of the Gule of August, as it was called, probably celebrated the realization of the first fruits of the earth, and more particularly that of the grain-harvest. When Christianity was introduced, the day continued to be observed as a festival on these grounds, and, from a loaf being the usual offering at church, the service, and consequently the day, came to be called Hlaf-mass, subsequently shortened into Lammas. . . . This we would call the rational definition of the word Lammas. There is another, but in our opinion utterly inadmissible, derivation, pointing to the custom of bringing a lamb on this day, as an offering to the cathedral church of York. Without doubt, this custom, which was purely local, would take its rise with reference to the term Lammas, after the true original signification of that word had been forgotten." Chamib. Book of Days.

LAMMAS LANDS. Open, arable, and meadow land which was kept open and by many owners in severalty during so much of the year as was necessary to receive and remove the crop of the several owners, after which they were held and used in common, not only to the owners, but to inhabitants of the parish, manor, or borough. Since Sept. 2, 1732, such lands are open August 12th, under 24 Geo. II. c. 23, § 5; but their name was derived from the earlier practice of keeping them open from Lammas Day to Lady Day. See Cooke, I. A. 47; Elton, Commons 86; 6 Ch. D. 500.

These lands were thus recently defined: "Lands belonging to the owner in fee simple who is absolutely the owner in fee simple, to all intents and purposes for half the year; and the other half of the year he is still the owner in fee simple, subject to a right of pasturage over the land by other people." Jessel, M. R., in 46 L. J. Ch. 721; 6 Ch. D. 507.

LANA (Lat.). Wool for carding and spinning. Dig. 7, 8, 12; Harper's Lat. Dict.

LANCASTER. See COURTS OF THE COUNTY PALATINE.

LANCETI. Vassals who were obliged to work for their lord one day in the week from Michaelmas to Autumn, either with fork, spade, or flail at the lord's option.

Spel. Glos.

LANES, DEZ (O. Fr.). Of the laity. Kelh.

LANNS MANNUS (O. Fr.). A lord of the manor. Kelh.

LAND. Any ground, soil, or earth whatsoever: as, meadows, pastures, woods, waters, marshes, furzes, and heath. 45 N. H. 818.

An estate of frank tenement at the least. Shepp. Touch. 92.

In a technical sense, freeholds are not included in the term lands; 3 Madd. 535. The term terra in Latin was used to denote land from terendo quia vomere teritur (because it is broken by the plough), and accordingly, in fines and recoveries, land, i. e. terra, was formerly held to mean arable land. Salk. 250; Cowp. 340; Co. Litt. 4 a. But see Cro. Eliz. 476; 4 Bingh. 80; Burt. R. P. 106. See also 2 P. Wms. 458, n.; 5 Ves. 476; 20 Vin. Abr. 203.

At common law the term land has a twofold meaning. In its more general sense, it includes any ground, soil, or earth whatsoever, as meadows, pastures, woods, marshes, furze, etc.; 1 Inst. 4 a; 2 Bla. Com. 18. In its more limited sense, the term land denotes the quantity and character of the interest or estate which the tenant may hold in land. The land is one thing, and the estate in land is another thing, for an estate in land is a time in land or land for a time. Plowd. 555.

Generally, in wills, "land" is used in its broadest sense; Schoul. Wills § 498; 1 Jarm. Wills 604, n.; 1 Pow. Dev. 186; 10 Paige 140. A freehold estate in reversion or remainder will pass under the term; 2 Vern. 461; 3 P. Wms. 55; 17 Barb. 86; or in a deed; 10 Paige, Ch. 156. But as the word has two senses, one general and one restricted, if it occur in connection with other words which either in whole or in part, supply the difference between the two senses, that is a reason for taking it in its less general sense: e. g. in a grant of lands, meadows, and pastures, the former word is held to mean only arable land. Cro. Eliz. 476, 659; 5 Johns. 440.

If one be seized of some lands in fee, and possessed of other lands for years, all in one parish, and he grant all his lands in that parish (without naming them), in fee-simple, or for life, by this grant shall pass no more but the lands he hath in fee-simple; Shepp. Touchst. 92. But if a man have no freehold estate, "lands," in a will, will pass his leasehold; and now, by statute, leasehold will pass if no contrary intent is shown, and the description is applicable even if he have freehold; 1 Vict. c. 26; 2 B. & P. 303; Cro. Car. 292; 1 P. Wms. 286; 11 Beav. 237, 250.

Incorporeal hereditaments will not pass under "lands," if there is any other real estate to satisfy the devise; but if there is no other such real estate they will pass, by statute; Moore 359, pl. 49. See REAL PROPERTY; FIXTURES. Incorporeal hereditaments have been held not land; 3 Sandf. Sup. Ct. N. Y. 552. See 39 N. Y. 87; contra, 46 N. Y. 46; 82 id. 459; 101 id. 322. The word land does not comprehend rents which are incorporeal, which are not lands, but mere rights or profits issuing out of lands and tenements corporeal; 4 Watts 109; 5 Denio 324. In a statute the term has been held to include an easement, if such construction appears to have been in accordance with the intention of the legislature; 15 L. J. Chan. 806. Land has been held to include servitudes, easements, rents, and other incorporeal hereditaments, and all rights thereto and interests therein, equitable as well as legal; 51 N. W. Rep. (Ia.) 18; 19 N. Y. S. 890; and to be synonymous with the terms real estate and real property; 49 Fed. Rep. 549; and to include leases for years, remainders, reversions, rent-charges, tithes, advowsons, and titles of honor; 80 Ch. Div. 186.

Land has an indefinite extent upward as well as downward; therefore, land legally includes all houses or other buildings standing or built on it, and whatever is in a direct line between the surface and the centre of the earth; 8 Kent 378, n. See Co. Litt. 4 a; 37 Minn. 4; 9 Day 374; Wood, Inst. 120; 2 Bla. Com. 18; 1 Cruise, Dig. 58; REAL PROPERTY.

The right to develop the natural resources of land. All land is held subject to the right, in the state, of taxation and eminent domain. The right to put his land to the most profitable use for his own benefit is one of the landowner's privileges, but how far this right extends has been the subject of much adjudication by the courts. He may develop its natural resources by mining, even if by so doing he injure the property of an adjacent landowner; 8 Atl. Rep. (Pa.) 620; 113 Pa. 126 (overruling 86 id. 401; and see 24 id. 298, where Black, C. J., laid down the rule that "the necessities of one man's business cannot be the standard of another's rights in a thing belonging to both"); he may make use of springs on his land, even if he thereby drain a stream in which others have a property right; 25 id. 528; he may increase the volume of water in such a stream by draining his own swamp land; 26 id. 407; and if by any of these methods, he injure another, it is a damnum absque injuria.

He may not collect upon his land or suffer to accumulate there anything which, if it escape, may do injury to others, without being liable for all the damage it may do; L. R. 3 H. L. 330; he may not erect upon his land a manufacturing establishment, which is not intended to develop its natural resources, without being liable for any nuisance it may create to others; 23 Atl. Rep. (Md.) 845; 62 Hun 306; 145 Pa. 324; and he may be enjoined from maintaining a nuisance on his land, where such nuisance can be avoided, without proof of damage to plaintiff or negligence on the part of defendant. See FIRE.

He may not divert the water of a stream to an unusual course, even if the quantity of water is not diminished thereby; 43 N. Y. S. 29.

He may not obstruct a passway over his land which has been continuously used by the public for more than 15 years; 38 S. W. Rep. (Ky.) 690.

He may explode nitro-glycerine for the purpose of increasing the flow of natural gas, although by so doing he draw gas from the land of another; 31 N. E. Rep. (Ind.) 57, 61; but he is held liable in damages where he uses for that purpose an explosive so powerful as to injure the property of an adjoining owner; 17 N. Y. S. 22; and he may be enjoined from so doing where he can obtain the same result, although at an increased cost to himself; 43 N. Y. Suppl. 1.

As to acts by an adjoining owner, whereby the right of vertical and lateral support to one's land by the subjacent or adjacent soil is interfered with, see LATERAL SUPPORT.

As to acts by an adjoining owner interfering with light and air, see ANCIENT LIGHTS.

As to what covenants run with the land, see COVENANTS.

LAND AGENCE, LAND-HLA-FORD, LAND-RICA. A proprietor of land; lord of the soil. Wharton; Anc. Inst. Enk. See LANDEFRICUS.

LAND BOOK. See LANDBOC.

LAND CEAP, LAND CHEAP (land, and Sax. ceapan, to buy). A fine payable in money or cattle, upon the alienation of land, within certain manors and liberties. Cowel, Gloss.

LAND CERTIFICATE. A certificate given to a registered proprietor of freehold land under the English Land Transfer Act of 1875. A similar certificate is given to the transferee on every subsequent transfer. It contains a description of the land as it appears on the register and the name and address of the proprietor, and is prima facie evidence of the truth of the matters therein set forth.

LAND COP. The sale of land which was evidenced in early English law by the transfer of a rod or fustica (q. v.) as a symbol of possession which was handed by the seller to the reeve and by the reeve to the purchaser. The conveyance was made in court, it is supposed, for securing better evidence of it, and barring the claims of expectant heirs: Maitl. Domest. B. 333.

LAND COURT. In American Law. The name of a court which formerly existed in the city of St. Louis, state of Missouri, having sole jurisdiction in St. Louis county in suits respecting lands, and in actions of ejectment, dower, partition. As to the United States courts for the determination of land claims, see UNITED STATES COURTS.

LAND GABEL. A tax or duty on land. See GABEL. It is said to have been originally a penny for a house: Spel. Gloss.; and by another authority, in Domesday Book it was a quit-rent for a house site similar to the modern ground rent. Whart. L. Dict. Spelled also Land Gable. Moz. & W.

LAND GABLE. See LAND GABEL.

LAND GRANT. A legislative appropriation of a portion of the public domain either for charitable or eleemosynary purpose, or for the promotion of the construction of a railroad or other public work.

Although the public lands of the United States and of the various states have been to a great extent conveyed by deeds or patents issued in virtue of general laws, many specific grants have also been made, and were the usual method of transfer during the colonial period. See 3 Wash. R. P. 181; 4 Kent 450, 494; 8 Wheat. 543; 6 Pet. 519; 16 id. 367.

It is always to be borne in mind in construing a congressional grant that the act by which it is made is a law as well as a conveyance, and that such effect must be given to it as will carry out the intent of congress; and this intent should not be defeated by applying to the grant the common-law rule making grants applicable only to transfers between private parties; 97 U. S. 491. Followed in 10 Am. & Eng. R. Cas. 552. To ascertain that intent courts will look to the condition of the country at the time of making the grants, as well as the purpose of the grants as expressed on their face; 26 Am. & Eng. R. Cas. 513; 113 U. S. 618.

All government grants are to be strictly construed against the grantees. Nothing passes but what is conveyed in clear and explicit language, and nothing can be implied; 23 How. 66; 23 N. J. Eq. 441.

The provisions of various acts of congress that the land-grant railroads "shall be and remain a public highway for the use of the government, free from all toll or other charge for transportation of any property or troops of the United States," mean that the government may use the roads, with all fixtures and appurtenances, but not that it may compel the roads to transport property and troops without compensation; 12 Ct. of Cl. 35. Such a railroad is under a perpetual contract made by the Land Grant Act of May 17, 1856, to carry the mails at such rates as congress may by law direct or the post-master-general determine; 21 Ct. of Cl. 153.

Priority of grant settles the title of the railroad where the claims conflict and not the priority in filing maps of definite location; 146 U. S. 570; and when grants are made to two railroads, none of the land passes to the second which comes within the prospective rights of the first; id. 615.

Title does not vest until the lands are actually selected and set apart under the direction of the secretary of the interior; 141 U. S. 858; 32 Minn. 397.

In case of conflict between railroad land grants the elder title must prevail. So held, where the Northern Pacific Railroad claimed land in Minnesota under a grant of July 3, 1864, and the St. Paul and Pacific Railroad claimed part of the same lands under acts of congress of March 8, 1865, and March 3, 1871; 139 U. S. 1.

Where lands are granted by acts of congress of the same date, or by the same act, in aid of two railroads that must necessarily intersect, each grantee takes an undivided moiety of the lands within the conflicting limits; 159 id. 349, 372.

Where congress grants the odd-numbered sections of land for a given distance on each side of a railroad, before the road is located, the title does not pass to any particular sections until the line of the road is made certain, which makes certain also the sections granted; 9 Wall. 95.

Where an act of congress makes a grant of land of the odd-numbered sections within a certain distance of a railroad, the title of the corporation to the land vests at once, and can only be thereafter divested by the government for a failure to perform conditions imposed, or upon a proper proceeding instituted to revest the title in the government; 32 Fed. Rep. 457.

The revocation of a land grant to a corporation which has become dormant, and the transfer thereof to another corporation by an act of the state legislature, is not an invasion of private rights and does not, unless so expressed or clearly implied, burden the transfer with the debts of the dormant corporation; 163 U. S. 31.

Where land is granted to a railroad company before its tract is located, the title to the specific land attaches by a location of the road, and takes effect by relation as of the date of the grant, so as to cut off intervening claims of other roads, claiming under other grants, unless the lands are specially reserved in the statute; 97 U. S. 491.

The grant to the Northern Pacific R. R. of certain public lands is a grant in presenti. Yet it is in the nature of a float, and the title does not attach to any specific section until capable of identification; but when once identified, the title attaches as of the date of the grant; 15 U. S. App. 279. A railroad company takes title to the land upon complying with the act and not before; 15 id. 359.

In acts making land grants to railroad companies, conditions are usually imposed which must be complied with to make the grant operative. Among such conditions are frequently named such as make the grant dependent upon the amount of net earnings, and accordingly, the phrase has been frequently the subject of construction in that connection. "Net earnings," within the meaning of such a law, are ascertained by deducting from gross earnings all ordinary expenses of organization and of operating the road, and expenditures bona fide made in improvements, and paid out of earnings, and not by the issue of bonds or stock; but not deducting interest paid on any of the bonded debt of the company; 99 U. S. 402. Followed in 20 Ct. of Cl. 70; 29 Am. & Eng. R. Cas. 384; 27 Fed. Rep. 1. See LANDS, PUBLIC.

LAND-MARK. A monument set up in order to ascertain the boundaries between two contiguous estates. For removing a land-mark an action lies. 1 Thomas, Co. Litt. 787. See MONUMENTS.

LAND OFFICE. A government bureau established in 1812, originally connected with the treasury, but since 1849 forming a division of the department of the interior.

The commissioner of the general land office performs, under direction of the secretary of the interior, all executive duties appertaining to the surveying and sales of the public lands of the United States, or in any wise respecting such public lands, and also such as relate to private grants of land, and the issuing of patents for all land under the authority of the government; Rev. Stats. U. S. secs. 446-461; he has absolute jurisdiction of any particular grant of public land; 158 U. S. 155; he has the power to supervise the action of the officers of a local land office and to annul a fraudulent entry, but his action is not conclusive; 4 U. S. App. 332; and the courts are not concluded by the decision of the land department on a question of law; 159 U. S. 46.

The general land office has charge of the record of title to the vast area known as the public domain, and all business pertaining to the survey, disposition, and patenting of the public lands of the United States is transacted through it or under its order and supervision. All questions of fact decided by the general land office are binding everywhere, and injunctions and mandamus proceedings will not lie against its officers; 9 Wall. 575; 7 id. 347; 9 id. 298; but a court of equity, after the title has passed from the United States, may relieve against mistakes of law in collateral proceedings, but it must be clear that a mistake of law has been committed; 96 U. S. 535; and if the alleged mistake be a mixed one of law and fact so that the court cannot separate it so as to see clearly where the mistake of law is, the decision is conclusive; 101 id. 476.

Decisions of the land office upon questions of fact within their jurisdiction cannot be reviewed in a collateral proceeding; 159 U. S. 240. Its construction upon an act of congress and its usage for eighteen years is entitled to considerable weight; 148 U. S. 562. Its decisions upon questions of fact are conclusive; 158 U. S. 155. Its rules and regulations have the effect and force of law on the due observance of which all citizens have the right to rely; 19 U. S. App. 10.

In all matters confided by law to their examination and decision the United States land officers act judicially, and their decisions are as final as those of other courts; 5 Minn. 223; and although such action is generally conclusive, the land office, up to the issuing of the patent in their divestiture of title, cannot by its subsequent action upon a fictitious claim defeat rights already vested. See LAND PATENT.

In a bill which seeks to show that a decision of the land department was procured by fraud, it must be shown that some trick or deceit was practised on the officers of the department. Where such a bill attacks such a decision on the ground that the officers of the department have misconstrued and misapplied the law, it must set out the evidence and what the department found the facts to be, so that the court can separate the department's finding of facts from its conclusions of law. It is not necessary to give notice of a contest before the land department to the predecessors in title of a claimant; 80 Fed. Rep. 425.

LAND PATENT. A muniment of title issued by a government or state for the conveyance of some portion of the public domain.

The issue of a land patent is the conveyance of public lands to the person or persons who, by compliance with the law, have become entitled thereto under a land grant (q. v.). It is a conveyance by the government when it has any interest to convey. 121 U. S. 488.

A patent issued under the act of congress of March 3, 1851, to settle land titles, under the Mexican grant, "is not only the deed of the United States, but it is a solemn record of the government, of its action and judgment with respect to the title of the claimant existing at the date of the cession. By it the sovereign power, which alone could determine the matter, declares that the previous grant was genuine; that the claim under it was valid and entitled to recognition and confirmation by the law of nations and the stipulations of the treaty; and that the grant was located, or might have been located, by the former government, and is correctly located by the new government, so as to embrace the premises as they are surveyed and described. Whilst this declaration remains of record, the government itself cannot question its verity, nor can parties claiming through the government by title subsequent." Field, C. J., in 18 Cal. 11, 26.

Nature and effect of patents generally. A grant of land is a public law standing on the statute books of the state, and is notice to every subsequent purchaser under any conflicting sale made afterward; 2 U. S. App. 581. The final certificate or receipt acknowledging the payment in full by a homesteader or pre-emptor is not in legal effect a conveyance of the land; 4 id. 832. It transfers the full equitable title; 159 U. S. 68. A patent alone passes land from the United States to the grantee; 13 Pet. 498; 20 Mo. 108; 1 Ohio 281; not only as it was at the time of the survey, but as it is at the date of the patent; 134 U. S. 178; and nothing passes a perfect title to public lands but a patent, except where congress grants lands in words of present grant; 13 Pet. 498; though its delivery to the patentee is not essential to pass the title; 103 U. S. 378; and the United States cannot by authority of its own officers invalidate that patent by the issuing of a second one for the same property; 135 U. S. 236; see 21 Wall. 600; 9 Cra. 87; 5 Wheat. 293; 11 id. 330; or divest the title by giving a patent to another; 8 Mo. 526. Its office is to define the land; 9 Cal. 332; it has been said to be equivalent to a deed; 20 id. 387. After land has been sold by certificate, the United States holds the legal title until the patent issues, but only in trust for the purchaser; and the officers can only act ministerially and issue it to him, and cannot act judicially and determine that another claimant is entitled to it; 2 La. 1. A patent is conclusive against all whose rights commence subsequently to its date; 7 Wheat. 212; it conveys the legal title and leaves the equities open; 15 Pet. 93. It relates back to the date of purchase, and title to real estate, acquired under an execution sale, cannot be defeated by the issuing of a patent to the execution defendant, bearing date subsequent to the sale by the sheriff; 5 La. 157. But a patent for public land will not be held to take effect by virtue of the doctrine of relation, as of the date of the initial step taken by the patentee, where it appears that the rights by him acquired under such initial step were lost by his lack of diligence, and third parties' rights had intervened; 80 Fed. Rep. 433.

Where the United States has parted with title by a patent legally issued, and upon surveys legally made by itself and approved by the proper department, the title so granted cannot be impaired by any subsequent survey made by the government for its own purposes; 13 La. Ann. 128. A patent founded on a void entry and survey nevertheless passes the legal title from the government to the patentee, but the commencement of the title is the patent; 2 Ohio 218. It passes to the patentee everything connected with the soil, forming any portion of its bed, or fixed to its surface; in short, everything connected with the term "land"; 17 Cal. 199.

A patent for land is the highest evidence of title and is conclusive as against the government, and all claiming under junior patents or titles, until set aside or annulled, unless it is absolutely void on its face; 2 Wall. 525; 13 id. 72; id. 92; 19 id. 646; 23 How. 235; 104 U. S. 636; the presumption being that it is valid and passes the legal title; 18 How. 87. When issued upon confirmation of a claim or a previously existing title, it is documentary evidence, having the dignity of a record of the existence of that title or of such equities respecting the claim as justify its recognition and confirmation; 121 U. S. 488; it must be interpreted as a whole; its various provisions in connection with each other and the legal deduction drawn therefrom must be conformable with the document; 21 How. 305.

A patent for unimproved lands, no part of which was in the possession of any one at the time it was issued, gives a legal seisin and constructive possession of all the lands within the survey; 5 Pet. 466. The identity of the land must be ascertained by a reasonable construction of the patent, but if rendered wholly unnecessary by inaccurate description the grant is void; 6 id. 328.

Government documents are not evidence of titles as against parties claiming pre-existing adverse and paramount title; 124 U. S. 261. A patent issued by the United States cannot be avoided or impeached for fraud in a collateral action; 26 La. 498; but it may be collaterally impeached in any action, and its operation and conveyance defeated, by showing that the department had no jurisdiction to dispose of the lands; 121 U. S. 488. Where issued by mistake, inadvertence, or other cause, to parties not entitled to it, they will be declared trustees of the true owner and decreed to convey the title to him; 147 id. 242. A patent is void at law, if the grantor state had no title to the premises embraced in it, or if the officer who issued the patent had no authority to do so; 142 id. 161. In cases of ejectment, where the question is who has the legal title, the patent of the government is unassailable; 139 id. 642.

The patent is conclusive evidence that the patentee has complied with the act of congress as concerns improvements on the land, etc.; 3 La. Ann. 203; it is prima facie evidence that all legal requirements have been complied with; 7 U. S. App. 507; but a patent fraudulently obtained by illegal sale is void; 4 La. Ann. 262; 2 How. 284; 5 Har. & J. 223.

Patents for mines. The fee of all mineral lands remains in the United States until patent issues therefor; 24 Cal. 339; 1 Mont. 410; Copp's Mining Law 37. The locator possesses only the right to purchase until the payment of the purchase money and the issuance of a receipt by the register and receiver of the local land office; 33 Fed. Rep. 562.

The method of procedure for the application for patent is provided for in U. S. Rev. Stats. § 2325. It requires that the applicant shall file under oath in the proper land office an application showing a compliance with the above-mentioned statute, together with a plat and field notes made by or under the direction of a United States surveyor general, and shall post a copy of the plat, together with a notice of the application, on the land, and then file an affidavit of the posting of such notice and copy in the land office. The act also requires that the register of the land office shall post said notice in his office for sixty days, and shall publish it for the same period in a newspaper nearest to the claim. If at the expiration of the said sixty days no adverse claim shall have been filed with the register and receiver of the local land office, the applicant shall be entitled to a patent upon the payment of $5.00 per acre for a lode location, and $2.50 per acre for a placer location, and after the expiration of said sixty days third persons cannot be heard to make objection to the issuance of the patent; see 9 Colo. 208; 4 Sawyer 302; 12 Nev. 320.

The issuance of such a patent is conclusive as to title of land described therein upon a court of law and in controversies between individuals; 3 Mont. 282; 6 id. 397; 8 Fed. Rep. 300; 34 id. 515. By the act of March 3, 1881, Rev. Stats. 1 Supp. p. 324, it is provided that if in any action brought pursuant to section 2326 of the Revised Statutes, title to the ground in controversy shall not be established by either party, the jury shall so find, and judgment shall be entered according to verdict. In such case no costs shall be allowed, and the claimant shall not proceed in the land office or be entitled to a patent for the land in controversy until he shall have perfected his title.

Where an application is pending for a patent to mineral lands, any adverse claim must be filed within the sixty days granted by the statute, and must be under the oath of the adverse claimant; Rev. Stat. §§ 2325-2326; 21 Pac. Rep. 492. If such adverse claim be filed, proceedings upon the patent shall be stayed until the controversy shall have been determined by a court of competent jurisdiction, or the adverse claim is waived; 33 Fed. Rep. 562; 114 U. S. 576. This procedure in the court must be begun by the adverse claimant within thirty days after filing his adverse claim, or his claim will be deemed to have been waived; U. S. Rev. Stats. § 2326; 114 U. S. 576; 2 Mont. 421. The person in whose favor a decision is rendered in such a proceeding is entitled to the patent upon compliance with the provisions of law; U. S. Rev. Stats. § 2326; and it is given to the party establishing the better title, the only question before the court being one of the right of possession of the premises; 21 Fed. Rep. 167. It is necessary for an adverse claimant in such a procedure to prove right of possession as against the United States, as well as against the applicant for a patent; 115 U. S. 45; and where neither party shows title neither can receive a patent; 21 Fed. Rep. 167; 9 Colo. 589.

How cancelled and annulled. It is not permissible for courts of law to inquire into the validity of a patent or into any question of fraud in connection with its issuance; 16 Fed. Rep. 829; see 104 U. S. 636. This, of course, applies only to the cases where the department has jurisdiction to act. If such jurisdiction was wanting or if the patent be void upon its face, it may, of course, be collaterally impeached; 104 U. S. 636; 8 Colo. 179. The United States may bring an action to set aside a patent upon allegations of fraud, and such action is triable under the same principles and rules which would obtain between individuals; 114 U. S. 233; 128 id. 673; 16 Fed. Rep. 810; id. 829, that is when the question arises as to patenting the land to the wrong person; in which case the government merely becomes the instrument by which the right of the individuals can be established and is merely a formal complainant; but if the patent has been obtained from the government by fraud or covers lands which were not subject to patent, the government sues in its sovereign capacity; U. S. v. Amer. Bell Tel. Co. (Berliner Case), where the subject is fully discussed and all the cases cited. See PATENT.

It may proceed by bill in equity for a decree of nullity, and an order of cancellation of a patent issued by the government itself, ignorantly, or in mistake, for lands reserved from sale by law, and a grant of which by a patent was therefore void; 2 Wall. 525; or where a patent issued in mistake, and the government has a direct interest or is under an obligation respecting the relief invoked; 141 U. S. 358; or when the patent was issued by mistake or obtained by fraud; 146 id. 120; the initiation and control of such a suit lies with the attorney-general; 125 id. 273; 127 id. 338.

Misrepresentations knowingly made by the applicant for a patent will justify the government in proceeding to set it aside, as it has a right to demand a cancellation of a patent obtained by false and fraudulent representations; 128 id. 673; see 137 id. 161; but courts of equity cannot set aside, annul, or correct patents or other evidence of title obtained from the United States by fraud or mistake, unless on specific averments of the mistake or fraud, supported by clear and satisfactory proof; 121 id. 325. A bill in equity is the proper remedy; 11 How. 553; although a patent fraudulently obtained by one knowing at the time that another person has a prior right to the land may be set aside by an information in the nature of a bill in equity filed by the attorney of the United States for the district in which the land lies; id. A court of equity, upon a bill filed for that purpose, will vacate a patent of the United States for a tract of land obtained by mistake from the officers of the land office, in order that a clear title may be transferred to the previous purchaser; 4 Wall. 232; but a patent for land of the United States will not be declared void merely because the evidence to authorize its issue is deemed insufficient by the court; 18 Ohio 61. A state can impeach the title conveyed by it to a grantee only by a bill in chancery to cancel it, either for fraud on the part of the grantee or mistake of law; and until so cancelled, it cannot issue to any other party a valid patent for the same land; 146 U. S. 79.

After the issue of a patent, assignment and transfers of the pre-emption right will not be inquired into; 4 McLean 866. The issue of a patent of public lands to a person not equitably entitled to it does not preclude the owner of the equitable title from enforcing it in a court of equity; 147 U. S. 47; and fraud on the part of a grantee under a patent does not prevent the legal title from passing to a bona fide purchaser; 7 U. S. App. 138; unless the purchaser had sufficient information to put him on inquiry of fraud, in which case he is not a bona fide purchaser; 146 U. S. 120. A patent to a deceased person is void; 13 Pet. 264; 7 Ohio 268. On the acquisition of the territory from Mexico, the United States acquired the title to lands under tidewater, in trust for future states that might be erected out of the territory; but this doctrine does not apply to lands that had been previously granted to other parties by the former government; 143 U. S. 161. See LANDS, PUBLIC; LAND WARRANT; LAND GRANT.

LAND POOR. A phrase used to indicate the possession of a large quantity of unproductive lands, the payment of taxes and loss of interest on which keeps the owner poor. "A man land-poor may be largely responsible;" 46 Mich. 387; s. c. 9 N. W. Rep. (Mich.) 445.

LAND REEVE. One whose business it is to overlook parts of an estate. Mon. & W.

LAND REGISTRY. See LAND TITLE AND TRANSFER; REGISTRATION; RECORDING.

LAND REVENUES. An income derived from crown lands in Great Britain. These lands have been so largely granted away to subjects that they are now contracted within very narrow limits. The crown was so much impoverished in this manner by William III. that the stat. 1 Anne, c. 7, § 5, was passed, with the stat. 34 George III. c. 75, which amends and continues it, makes void all grants or leases from the ground of royal manors or other possessions connected with land for a period exceeding thirty-one years, or three lives. Long prior to this a Scottish stat. 1455, c. 41, had made necessary the consent of parliament in case of the alienation of crown property. It is said that none of these statutes have succeeded in checking the practice. Early at the beginning of the reign of George III. the hereditary crown revenues derived from ecclesiastical manors held in capite, tithes, fines, etc., were surrendered by the king to the general fund, and in the place of them he received a specified sum annually for the civil list.

The supervision of such property as still belongs to the crown is vested in commissioners appointed for the purpose, called the commissioners of woods, forests, and land revenues.

LAND STEWARD. An agent who has the management and control of landed estate belonging to an individual or state.

LAND TAX. A tax on the beneficial proprietor of land such as is imposed in many of the states; so far as a tenant is beneficial proprietor, and no farther, does it rest on him. It was first imposed in 1693, a new valuation of the lands in the kingdom having been made in 1692, which has not since been changed. In 1798 it was made perpetual, at a rate of four shillings in a pound of valued rent. Under the provisions of the stat. 16 & 17 Vict. c. 74; this tax is now generally redeemed. See Encyc. Brit. Taxation.

LAND TENANT (commonly called tenet, tenant, c. v.). He who actually possesses the land.

LAND TITLE AND TRANSFER. The existing system of land transfer is a long and tedious process involving the observance of many formalities and technicalities, a failure to observe any one of which may defeat title. Even where these have been most carefully complied with, and where the title has been traced to its source, the purchaser must buy at his peril, there always being, in spite of the utmost care and expenditure, the possibility that his title may turn out bad. Yeakle, Torrens System 209.

For the past 50 years the project of simplifying land titles and transfer has been agitated in England. For the purpose of considering the best method of so doing, a royal commission was appointed in 1864, and its report in 1837 recommended a limited plan of registration of title. In 1862 the Lord Westbury Act, 25 & 26 Vict. cc. 53, 57, provided for the registration of indefeasible titles, but they were confined to good marketable titles. In 1875 the Lord Cairns bill was passed, which provided for the permissive use of a scheme for the registration of title, and was a modified form of the Torrens system, but, as the friends of that system pointed out, the provisions of the bill were not stringent enough, and comparatively little use has been made of it.

This act was amended in several particulars by the Land Transfer Act, 1897. In addition to these changes this amendatory act of 1897 makes some very vital changes in the real estate law of England; it provides as follows: "Where real estate is vested in any person without a right in any other person to take by survivorship, it shall, on his death, notwithstanding any testamentary disposition, devolve to and become vested in his personal representative or representatives from time to time as if it were a chattel real vesting in them or him." This applies to any real estate over which the testator "has a general power of appointment." Probate and letters of administration may be granted in respect of real estate only, although there is no personal estate. Subject to the powers, rights, duties, and liabilities imposed in the act, the "personal representatives hold the real estate as trustees for the persons by law beneficially entitled thereto, and those persons shall have the same power of requiring a transfer of real estate as persons beneficially entitled to personal estate have of requiring a transfer of such personal estate." "All enactments and rules of law relating to the effect of probate or letters of administration as respects chattels real, and as respects the dealing with chattels real before probate or administration, and as respects the payment of costs of administration, etc., of personal estate and the powers, rights, etc., of personal representatives in respect of personal estate, shall apply to real estate so far as the same are applicable, as if that real estate were a chattel real, etc., save that some or one only of such joint personal representatives" cannot sell or transfer the real estate without the authority of court.

"In the administration of the assets of a person dying after the commencement of the act, his real estate shall be administered in the same manner, subject to the same liabilities for debts, costs, and expenses, etc., as if it were personal estate, provided that nothing herein contained shall alter or affect the order in which real and personal assets respectively are now applicable in and towards the payment of funeral and testamentary expenses, debts, or legacies, or the liability of real estate to be charged with the payment of legacies." In granting letters of administration the court "shall have regard to the rights and interests of the persons interested in the real estate, and his heir-at-law, if not one of the next-of-kin, shall be equally entitled to the grant with the next of kin."

At any time after the death of the owner "his personal representative may assent to any devise contained in his will, or may convey the land to any person entitled thereto as heir, devisee, or otherwise, . . . either subject to a charge for the payment of any money which the personal representatives are liable to pay, or without any such charge; and on such assent or con-voyance, subject to a charge for all moneys (if any) which the personal representatives are liable to pay, all liabilities of the personal representatives in respect of the land shall cease, except as to any acts done or contracts entered into by them before such assent or conveyance." After the expiration of a year from the owner's death, "if the personal representatives have failed on the request of the person entitled to the land to convey the land to that person, the court may, if it thinks fit, on the application of that person and after notice to the personal representatives, order that the conveyance be made, or in case of registered land, that the person so entitled be registered as proprietor of the land, either solely or jointly, with the personal representatives. The production of an assent by the personal representatives to the registrar is authority to him to register the transfer. The personal representatives, etc., may, in the absence of any express provision to the contrary . . . with the consent of the person entitled to any legacy . . . or to a share in his residuary estate, etc., appropriate any part of the residuary estate in or towards satisfaction of that legacy or share," placing their own valuation on "the whole or any part of the property of the deceased person," first giving notice to all persons interested in the residuary estate. In case of registered land such appropriation is authority to the registrar to register the person to whom the property is appropriated as proprietor. The act provides that the title to registered land, adverse to or in derogation of the title of the register proper, shall not be acquired by any length of possession."

It also repeats the act of 33 Hen. 8, c. 6, which prohibits sales and other dispositions of land of which the grantor or his predecessor in title had not been in possession for one whole year previously to the disposition's being made.

It provides that the queen may, by an order in council, as respects any county or part of a county, declare registration of title to be compulsory or sale.

Six months' notice before the order in council is made is required to be given to the council of the county in question, and if within three months after receipt of notice with a draft of the proposed order, two-thirds of the members of the county council notify the Privy Council that, in their opinion, compulsory registration of title would not be desirable, the order in council shall not be made. The first order in council made under this act shall not affect more than one county. The act reserves to parliament certain rights to disapprove of any order in council by which it shall become void. The act makes provision for an indemnity payable thereunder by setting apart a portion of the receipts from fees taken in the land register. If the indemnity fund is insufficient the deficiency is charged to the consolidated fund of the United Kingdom.

Provision is made for regulations by the lord chancellor, with the advice and assistance of certain officials, for the conduct of official searches, and for enabling the registered proprietor to apply for such searches, etc., by telegraph and to receive reply by telegraph.

The act went into effect January 1st, 1898, and is to be cited as the Land Transfer Act, 1897, and construed with the Land Transfer Act, 1875, and the two together are to be cited as Land Transfer Acts, 1875 and 1897.

The system of registration of deeds prevails in Scotland, in Middlesex and Yorkshire, in Ireland, France, Belgium, Italy, Spain, part of Switzerland, and the British colonies, excepting Australasia and most of Canada, and in the South American republics, as well as in the United States. The system of registration of title prevails in Germany, Austria-Hungary, Australasia, part of Switzerland, and the greater part of Canada; 9 Jurid. Rev. 155. The Torrens system, so called from its author, Sir Robert Torrens, has been in use in New South Wales and Victoria since 1862; in South Australia, 1858; Queensland, 1861; Tasmania, 1863; New Zealand and British Columbia, 1870; Western Australia, 1874; Ontario, 1884; Manitoba, 1888; Duffy & Eggleston, Land Transfer Act, 1890, § 8.

The essential point of this system is an official guarantee of title; it is the registration of title as distinct from the registration of deeds. The latter ascertains the deeds which must be examined under every transfer, while the former renders such examination unnecessary; 9 Jurid. Rev. 153. Under the Torrens system the registrar holds the same relation to the landowner that a company or bank holds to the shareholder.

In Germany the state keeps what may be called a ledger account for each property, and pledges itself to keep it correctly and in such plain fashion that any person of ordinary intelligence can at once, and without examining any deed of any kind, ascertain who stands as owner of the property (which means that his title is perfect), and what debts or other incumbrances exist. In Prussia all transfers are made by word of mouth, without any deed or conveyance. The simplest way is to have both parties to appear before the registrar, and declare their contract, and the purchaser is then entered as owner; 9 Jurid. Rev. 155. For a detailed account of the system of registration of title in Central Europe, see 2 Jour. Com. Leg. 112 (June, 1897).

In the United States the subject of registration of land titles has been considered in many of the states. In New York city the accumulation of record books has become so great in the registry of deeds that searches of title can no longer be carried on by private persons. In that state an attempt was made to simplify and classify these records, by adopting what is known as a block system of registration by which deeds and other instruments are classified and indexed according to the location of the property. While this is a partial relief, it by no means remedies the evils due to a lengthening chain of title, where no part is stronger than its weakest link; Yeakle, Torrens System 215. See Rep. Am. Bar Assn. (1890) 265.

With some modifications, in order to obviate the constitutional questions which might arise under it in this country, the Torrens system was recently adopted in California, Illinois, and Ohio, but in the last two states it has been adjudged unconstitutional, in that it attempts to confer judicial power upon the registration officer; 47 N. E. Rep. (Ohio) 551; 165 Ill. 527; 29 Chic. Leg. N. 93.

In 1897 Illinois passed an act to remedy these defects in the statute, and California passed an amendatory act to the effect that the original act shall be liberally construed by the court. Massachusetts indicated a disposition favorable to this system by providing for the appointment of a committee to draft and prepare an act and report to the next legislature.

LAND TRANSFER ACT. See LAND TITLE AND TRANSFER.

LAND WAITER. In English Law. A custom-house officer who superintends the landing of goods, and who examines, measures, tastes, or weighs them and takes account of it. They are also sometimes required to superintend the shipment of goods where drawbacks are allowed, and to certify the shipping of them on the debentures. They are sometimes called Coast Waiters or Landing Waiters.

LAND WARRANT. A negotiable government certificate entitling its holder to be put in possession of a designated quantity of public land, under a land grant or other appropriation of land by congress. The possession of a warrant at the land office is sufficient authority to make locations under it, and letters of attorney are unnecessary; 4 Pet. 832. The locator of a warrant undertakes himself to find waste and unappropriated land, and his patent issues under his information to the government and at his own risk; he cannot be considered as a purchaser without notice; 5 Cra. 284. A power of attorney given by the holder of a land warrant from the general court authorities, the attorney to locate the land for his own sole use and benefit, and to sell the same and receive payment therefor, is manifestly designed to transfer the interest of the holder of the warrant in violation of the act of congress in that respect, and is void; 3 Chand. 189. Evidence of the payment of the purchase money due the state of Pennsylvania on a land warrant clothes the person paying it with the ownership of the warrant and with the right to maintain ejectment for the land; 153 U. S. 896. Land warrants are not to be regarded as real estate in a probate settlement; 44 Me. 57. See LANDS, PUBLIC; LAND PATENT.

The evidence in writing which the state, on good consideration, gives that the person therein named (the warrantee) is entitled to the quantity of land specified. Anderson; 6 Yerg. 205.

The issue of the warrant and the rights of the warrantee are regulated by statute. The application marks the inception of the title, and prevails against a later settler with notice; but not so as to a warrant and survey which differ from the application. Id.; 7 Pa. 75. Presumption of abandonment from neglect to return a warrant is rebutted by possession in the warrantee. Id.; 53 Pa. 427. A warrant descriptive of the land confers title from date, if followed up with diligence in obtaining a survey. Id.; 27 Pa. 9.

The first survey, under a military land-warrant, in Virginia, gave the prior equity. The survey is the act of appropriation. The certificate of survey was sufficient evidence that the warrant was in the hands of the surveyor. 5 Cra. (U. S.) 233.

LANDBOC. A charter or deed whereby lands or tenements were given under early English law. Cow.; Moz. & W. See BOCLAND.

Occasionally it is said a bishop or abbot in support of claims of the highest jurisdictional powers "would rely on the vague large words of some Anglo-Saxon land book. But to do this was to make a false move; the king's lawyers were not astute paleographers or diplomats, but any charter couched in terms sufficiently loose to pass for one moment as belonging to the age before the conquest could be met by the doctrine that the king was not to be deprived of his rights by 'obscure and general words.'" 1 Poll. & Maitl. 571.

LANDEA. In Old English Law. A ditch to drain marshy land. Spel. Gloss.; Du Cange.

LANDED. As used in a revenue act levying tolls on goods, the clear meaning and purport is "substantially imported," and stones shot from boats to the shore below high-water mark, there to remain until shipped for exportation, were not landed. L. R. 4 Ex. 260.

Timber, floated into a salt water creek, where the tide ebbs and flows, leaving the ends resting in mud at low water and prevented from floating away at high water by booms, is landed; 8 Cra. 110.

When merchandise is sent on shore, and afterwards being in the ship's boat for the purpose of being re-shipped, it is violently seized and detained, either by the orders of a sovereign or by thieves, it is not safely landed, under an insurance on the goods, until the same should be discharged and safely landed; 6 Mass. 197, 204.

LANDED ESTATE OR PROPERTY. A colloquial or popular phrase to denote real property (q. v.). Landed estate ordinarily means an interest in and pertaining to lands. 10 La. Ann. 676. In a tax law it "clearly embraces not only the land, but all houses, fixtures, and improvements of every kind thereon, and all machinery, neat cattle, horses, and mules, when attached to and used on a plantation or farm." Id.

A person holding such an estate is termed a landed proprietor, and it is immaterial whether the lands are improved or not; 10 La. Ann. 676. A devise of "all my landed property" carries the fee; 1 N. H. 183; and so does "my landed estate"; 12 Wend. 603; but a devise of "all my landed estate," followed by a particular description of tracts devised, does not include a lot not enumerated, which descends to the heir at law, though excluded from all testator's estate with a shilling legacy; 2 McCord, Ch. 214, 264.

Landed securities are mortgages or other incumbrances affecting land, and this is what must be implied from the direction in a will to lay out a fund in some real security; 3 Atk. 805, 808.

LANDED ESTATES COURT. In English Law. Tribunals established by statute for the purpose of disposing more promptly and easily than could be done through the ordinary judicial machinery, of incumbered real estate. These courts were first established in Ireland by the act of 11 & 12 Vict. c. 48, which being defective was followed by 12 & 13 Vict. c. 77. The purpose of these was to enable the owner, or a lessee for any less than 63 years unexpired, of land subject to incumbrance, to apply to commissioners who constituted a court of record to direct a sale. This court was called the Incumbered Estates Court. A new tribunal called the Landed Estates Court was created by 21 & 22 Vict. c. 72, which abolished the former court and established a permanent tribunal. It is said that these statutes facilitated a great revolution in the tenure of land in Ireland, supplying the means by which a great part of the soil passed rapidly from cottier tenants and an embarrassed and non-resident gentry to capitalist farmers and to landlords who cultivated the soil themselves. The result was agricultural prosperity, but great hardship to the tenants, upon whom in Ireland rested the burden of permanent improvements which elsewhere would be borne by the landlord. The sales under the Landed Estates Act deprived the tenants of opportunity to make claim for compensation in the adjustment of rent. Demands for increased rent under penalty of eviction compelled small farmers to emigrate, move to the towns, or remain as servants on their old farms. The acts of retaliation for these changes led to the passage of the Irish Land Act of 1870, followed by that of 1881. Under the latter the tenant farmers obtained very unexampled privileges, and a new court was created for fixing rent. See Int. Cyc., tit. Incumbered Estates Court, and authorities there cited.

A similar court was established for West Indian estates by 17 & 18 Vict. c. 117, the sittings of which were held at Westminster.

LANDEFRICUS, LANDAGENDE. The lord of the soil; landlord (q. v.).

LANDEGANDMAN. An inferior tenant of a manor. Spel. Gloss.

LANDGRAVE. In Germany, in the middle ages a graf or count entrusted with special judicial functions, extending over a large extent of territory; later, the title of sovereign princes of the empire who inherited certain estates called land-graves, of which they were invested by the emperor. Cent. Dict.; Lond. Encyclo.

LANDHILFORD. A proprietor of land; lord of the soil. Anc. Inst. Eng. See LANDEFRICUS. See LAND AGENDE.

LANDMERS. Measures of land. Cow. In Scotch Law. Measurers of land. Skene.

LANDING. A place for loading or unloading boats, but not a harbor for them. 74 Pa. 878.

LANDING PLACE. A place laid out by a town as a common landing place and used as such, but not designated as for the particular benefit of the town, is a public landing place. It is not, however, a town-way and liable to be discontinued as such by the town. If a public landing place is no longer of use the power to discontinue it is in the legislature; 2 Pick. 44.

A place on a river or other navigable water for lading and unlading goods, or for the reception and delivery of passengers. The terminus of a road on a river or other navigable water, for the use of travelers, and the loading and unloading of goods. Anderson; 1 Strobb. 111. Whether it is public or private, depends on the character of the road which leads to it. Id.; 1 Strobb. 111. Either the bank or wharf to or from which persons or things may go from or to some vessel in the contiguous water; or the yard or open place used for deposit and convenient communication between the land and the water. Id.; 15 Rich. L. 310. A road to it is essential to make it public, unless where it may be used only in connection with transportation by water. Obstructing the road one hundred yards from the landing is not obstructing the landing itself. Id.; 15 Rich. L. 310.

The public use of the land of an individual, adjoining navigable waters, as a landing place, for a period of twenty years, with the knowledge of the owner, will not confer a right, nor raise a presumption of a dedication; 20 Wend. 111; 23 id. 425, 559; 1 Greenl. 111. When a highway is extended to navigable waters, the riparian owner has no exclusive right of landing; 19 Barb. 204.

Under authority to regulate landings and watering places, commissioners of highways have no right to lay out and establish a new landing place; 17 Wend. 9; but when a road has been laid out and used as a highway to a public landing place for twenty years prior to March 21, 1797, but not sufficiently described, they may ascertain, describe, and enter of record such road, if it was constantly worked and used for six years next preceding; id. The selectmen of a town have no authority to lay out a public landing; 1 Greenl. 111.

LANDIRECTA. Rights charged upon land. Toml. See TRINODA NECESSITAS.

LANDLOCKED. Wholly surrounded by land of some other person or persons, as when the owner of a close surrounded by his own land grants the land and reserves the close. L. R. 13 Ch. Div. 798. In that case it was held that the implied right to a way of necessity operated by way of a grant from the grantor of the land, and was limited by the necessity which created it; it was not a way of necessity for all purposes, but only such as the close was used for in the condition it happened to be at the time of the grant. Semble, the same rule applies if the grant is of the landlocked close with an implied grant of a way of necessity over the surrounding land; id.

LANDLORD. The lord or proprietor of land, who, under the feudal system, retained the dominion or ultimate property of the feud, or fee of the land; while his grantee, who had only the possession and use of the land, was styled the feudatory, or vassal, which was only another name for the tenant or holder of it. In the popular meaning of the word, however, it is applied to a person who owns lands or tenements which he rents out to others.

LANDLORD AND TENANT. A term used to denote the relation which subsists by virtue of a contract, express or implied, between two or more persons, for the possession or occupation of lands or tenements either for a definite period, from year to year, for life, or at will.

When this relation is created by an express contract, the instrument made use of for the purpose is called a lease. See LEASE. But it may also arise by necessary implication from the circumstances of the case and the relative position of the parties to each other; for the law will imply its existence in many cases where there is an ownership of land on the one hand and an occupation of it by permission on the other; and in such cases it will be presumed that the occupant intends to compensate the owner for the use of the premises; 4 Pet. 84; 89 Ill. 578; 60 N. Y. 102. In an action for possession of land and damages for holding over after expiration of a term, proof that plaintiff was owner, that defendant paid rent to him, and that he was duly notified to surrender possession, establishes the relation of landlord and tenant; 3 Ind. App. 207. A tenancy is created by the occupation or temporary possession of land, the title to which is in another; 84 Ill. App. 857.

The intention to create. This relation may be inferred from a variety of circumstances; but the most obvious acknowledgment of its existence is the payment of rent; and this principle applies even after the expiration of a lease for a definite term of years; for if a tenant continues to hold over, after his term has run out, the landlord may, if he chooses, consider him a tenant, and he is, in fact, understood to do so, unless he proceeds to eject him at once. If the landlord suffers him to remain, and receives rent from him, or by any other act acknowledges him still as tenant, a new tenancy springs up, usually from year to year, regulated by the same covenants and stipulations entered into between the parties at the creation of the original term in so far as they are applicable to the altered nature of the tenancy; 15 Johns. 505; 4 M'Cord 59; 2 C. & P. 848; 43 Ind. 212; 43 Md. 446; 43 Cal. 816.

The payment of money, however, is only a prima facie acknowledgment of the existence of a tenancy; for if it does not appear to have been paid as rent, but has been paid by mistake or stands upon some other consideration, it will not be evidence of a subsisting tenancy; 4 Bingh. 91; 3 B. & C. 413; 4 M. & G. 143. Neither does a mere participation in the profits of land, where the owner is not excluded from possession, nor the letting of land upon shares, unless the occupant expressly agrees to pay a certain part of the crop as rent, in either case amount to a tenancy; 1 Gill & J. 266; 3 Zabr. 390; 2 Rawle 11; 43 Vt. 94; 60 N. Y. 221; 21 Ill. 200. The relation of landlord and tenant did not exist where the occupancy was simply by military force during the war of the rebellion; 23 Ct. Cls. 188.

But the relation of landlord and tenant will not be implied when the acts and conduct of the parties are inconsistent with its existence; 142 U. S. 396; nor will it be inferred from the mere occupation of land, if the relative position of the parties to each other can, under the circumstances of the case, be referred to any other distinct cause; as, for instance, between a vendor and vendee of land, where the purchaser remains in possession after the agreement to purchase falls through. For the possession in that case was evidently taken with the understanding of both parties that the occupant should be owner, and not tenant; and the other party cannot without his consent convert him into a tenant, so as to charge him with rent; Wood. L. & T. 12; 6 Johns. 46; 21 Me. 325; 8 M. & W. 118; 10 Cush. 259; 16 Vt. 267; 11 N. H. 148; 60 Barb. 468; 46 Me. 456; 12 B. Monr. 504; 16 Pet. 25; 17 Ind. 509; under such a contract the fact that a note given for the first instalment recites that it is given in part payment for rent, does not imply that in default of payment at maturity the relation of landlord and tenant becomes substituted for it; 54 Ark. 16. Where one entered on land under a bond for title, proof of declarations that he had agreed to pay rent is not evidence of abandonment, when he subsequently refused to surrender the bond for his notes, as a condition to renting the premises for another year; 112 N. C. 27. Where, by the terms of a trust deed, the grantor sold and delivered the possession to the trustee, and the latter leased to the grantor at a given rate until sale thereof, the grantor binding himself to surrender possession within ten days of that sale, it was held that the instrument created the relation of landlord and tenant; 45 Mo. App. 359. But see 75 Cal. 843.

The same principle applies to a mortgagor and mortgagee, as well as to that of a mortgagor and an assignee of the mortgage; for no privity of the estate exists in either case; and, as a general rule, a tenancy by implication can never arise under a party who has not the legal estate of the premises in question; 2 M. & R. 308; 6 Ad. & E. 265; Thyl. Landl. & T. § 25; 16 Vt. 871.

Where mortgages gave notice of the existence of the mortgage to the tenant of the mortgagor, and required him to pay them the rent thereafter, and the tenant remained in possession after the receipt of the notice, these circumstances alone were not sufficient to support an inference of an agreement that he should become tenant to the mortgagees; 2 Q. B. 484.

The question whether a transaction is a sale on instalments, with a pledge or mortgage to secure purchase money, or a tenancy, is one which frequently arises under the multiplicity of sales on instalments which are now made of both real and personal property. As, where real estate was mortgaged for a sum payable in instalments, with interest, and there was a provision that "the mortgagees lease to the mortgagor the said lands," the rent to be paid precisely as to amounts and times as was appointed for payment of the money secured, and to be in satisfaction thereof, with no clause authorizing distress or possession by the mortgagor until default, and the instrument was not executed by the mortgagees, it was held not to create the relation of landlord and tenant; 18 Can. S. C. R. 463. See SALE.

The relation of landlord and tenant has been held to exist, where a ranch was let, by a written covenant for a term of years, for a share of the produce, with provision for the sale of stock and produce, and division of profits; 96 Cal. 95; also under an agreement between the owner of stone quarry and another person that the latter shall work the quarry, sell the stone, and pay one-fifth of the proceeds to the former; 1 Misc. Rep. 240; 69 Hun 88; where a husband and wife live separately and he is in possession of her land with her knowledge; 38 Neb. 756; under a contract for a number of years at a certain rental per year, provided that all crops that may be made on said land are bound for said rent; 113 N. C. 444; where an occupant of land who without dissent hears the owner say that he would be considered as a tenant for a year at a specified rental unless he vacated immediately; 60 Mo. App. 80; where one had purchased land under a power of sale in a mortgage, which provided that the completion of the sale shall entitle the purchaser to immediate possession of the premises, and any holding of the same thereafter should be as tenant; 36 S. C. 274. The relation of landlord and tenant exists, so as to authorize a forcible detainer against a tenant in possession, whose lease was not enforceable because the premises were leased knowingly for immoral purposes; 26 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 812. So where mortgagees of a stock of goods in a leased store building took possession of the goods therein, by permission of the mortgagors, and used the building to display and sell the goods, and kept the usual accounts of a retail store, they took possession of and occupied the building as tenants of its owner, and not as licensees of the mortgagors; 34 Atl. Rep. (N. J.) 938.

But a riparian owner holding the lease of a water-right of another riparian proprietor is not a tenant; 70 Cal. 103. Nor does the relation exist where a father deeds lands in fee-simple to his son, who is to give the father one-third of his crops until the latter should be in better financial condition, the son meanwhile to go ahead and improve the land as his own; 138 Ind. 349. Where the owner of a farm rented a house for one year for the use of his tenant who farmed on shares, and at the end of his term held over for a few weeks and then rented the farm under a new lease from the grantee, the latter was held not liable for the rent of the tenant-house for the new year; 84 Ill. App. 808. Occupation of lands by a person without recognizing the owner as his landlord, or any agreement to hold under and in subordination to him, is merely a trespass and does not create the relation of landlord and tenant; 21 Nev. 65. One in possession and use of premises under an agreement to keep off trespassers is practically a tenant; 79 Mich. 86. Where the crop growing on leased premises was sold under execution, the purchaser, who was also assignee of the judgment for rent under which the crop was sold, did not become a tenant of the lessor and could go upon the land to harvest the crop without incurring any liability to the lessor for the use of the land while the crop was ripening; 43 Kan. 216. One who rented from a mere occupant (the title being in a third person), could recover possession against the lessor who had entered upon the premises under proceedings for forcible entry and detainer; 8 Houst. 507.

Where a husband leased his wife's land for one year, with the option to the tenant for a further term of four years without authority from her, the receipt by the wife of the share of the farm products reserved by the lease for the first year did not operate by way of estoppel to create a five-years' term, not being an assent in writing as required by the statute of frauds; 30 Atl. Rep. (N. J.) 619.

The possessor of real estate under an unrecorded lease has no rights as against an attaching creditor; 45 La. Ann. 833. One who takes a secret lease from a third party without the knowledge of his landlord will not thereby change his possession; 33 W. Va. 236.

One who, when applying to lease a building, pays one month's rent which is returned to him upon the termination of negotiations for said rent without any lease being signed, has no rights in the premises; 148 Ill. 192.

A tenant who rents his half of the premises to his co-tenant is his landlord and entitled to a preference lien on the tenant's goods for his rent; 26 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 486.

A tenant for life may lease his estate for the term of his life, and so retain his landlord's rights, on the lessee's default in an annual payment, to sue to remove him as a tenant holding over, and to recover the rent due; 90 Ga. 482.

Generally, the rights and obligations of the parties will be considered as having commenced from the date of the lease, if there be one, and no other time for its commencement has been agreed upon; or, if there be no date, then from the delivery of the papers. If, however, there be no writings, it will take effect from the day the tenant entered into possession, and not with reference to any particular quarter-day; 4 Johns. 230; 15 Wend. 656; 3 Camp. 510; Tayl. Landl. & T. 135 (11th ed.). And these rights and duties attach to each of the parties, not only in respect to each other, but also with reference to other persons who are strangers to the contract. The landlord retains certain rights over the property, although he has parted with its possession, while the tenant assumes obligations with respect to it which continue so long as he is invested with that character.

After the making of a lease, the right of possession, in legal contemplation, remains in the landlord until the contract is consummated by the entry of the lessee. When the tenant enters, this right of possession changes, and he draws to himself all the rights incident to possession. Where in a store building the lofts above were unconnected with the store and the access to them was by a separate door, the delivery of the store key with the continued use and occupation of the store was not a symbolical delivery of the lofts above, the separate keys of the door leading to them not being delivered; 3 App. Div. N. Y. 511. The landlord's rights in the premises during the term of the lease are confined to those expressly or impliedly derived from the contract of lease and to the protection of his reversionary interest. And he would have no right, in the nature of an easement, to use a sewer under the premises leased, in such manner as to make the latter untenable; 147 N. Y. 248. He may maintain actions for such injuries as would, in the ordinary course of things, continue to affect his interest after the determination of the lease. But such injuries must be of a character permanently to affect the inheritance; such are breaking the windows of a house, cutting timber, or damming up a rivulet, whereby the timber on the estate becomes rotten; Woodf. L. & T. 973; 11 Mass. 519; 1 M. & S. 234; 8 Ma. 6; 5 Duer 404; 26 How. Fr. 105.

The landlord usually reserves the right to go upon the premises peaceably, for the purpose of ascertaining whether any waste or injury has been committed by the tenant or other persons, first giving notice of his intention. But he has no such right unless he reserves it in the lease. He may also use all ways appurtenant thereto, and peaceably enter the premises to demand rent, to make such repairs as are necessary to prevent waste, or to remove an obstruction; 1 B. & C. 8; 7 Pick. 76; 5 Harr. 378. The entry of a landlord into demised premises for the purpose of rebuilding does not operate as an eviction, where it was with the tenant's assent and not to his entire exclusion; 151 Pa. 101. But if the rent is payable in hay or other produce, to be delivered to him from the farm, he is not entitled to go upon the land and take it, until it is delivered to him by the tenant, or until after it has been severed and set apart for his use; 9 Me. 187; 5 Blackf. 817.

Where the tenant abandoned the land, and executed a bill of sale of the crops, and the landlord entered before the delivery of the bill of sale, the latter passed no title as against the landlord, whose entry was held justified by the abandonment; 1 Marvel, Del.

The landlord's responsibilities in respect to possession, also, are suspended as soon as the tenant commences his occupation; 4 Term 318; 2 Sandf. 301; 2 Mo. App. 66. But if a stranger receive injuries from the ruinous state of the premises at the time of the demise, or from any fault in their construction, or from any nuisance thereon, even though it be created by a tenant's ordinary use of the premises, the landlord remains liable; 43 Barb. 482; L. R. 2 C. P. 311; 116 Mass. 67; 4 Hun 24; 20 Pa. 387; 3 Colo. App. 534; and if the landlord has undertaken to keep the premises in repair, and the injury be occasioned by his neglect to keep up the repairs, or if he renew the lease with a nuisance upon it, he will be likewise liable; 2 H. Bla. 350; 1 Ad. & E. 222; 67 Ill. 47. See 65 Hun 625. The landlord may be liable for not disclosing a concealed source of danger not discoverable by the tenant, if he not only knows the source of danger but also knows, or common experience shows, that it is dangerous; 147 Mass. 471. In an action by lessee for breach of covenant in a lease to repair, the measure of damages is the difference between the rent the lessee agreed to pay and the rental value of the premises without the repairs having been made; 76 Md. 409.

The principal obligation on the part of the landlord, which is, in fact, always to be implied from the operative words of the lease, but is also usually inserted as a distinct covenant, is that the tenant shall enjoy the quiet possession of the premises,—which means, substantially, that he shall not be turned out of possession of the whole or any material part of the premises by one having a title paramount to that of landlord, or that the landlord shall not himself disturb or render his occupation uncomfortable by the erection of a nuisance on or near the premises, which the law holds tantamount to an eviction; Jack. & Gr. L. & T. § 935; 8 Co. 80 b; 18 N. Y. 151; 5 Day 282; 29 Md. 35; 10 Gray 258; 3 Duer 404; 6 Dowl. & R. 349. But express covenants for quiet enjoyment are framed usually only against eviction by a paramount title and against the lessor, his heirs, and those claiming under them; implied covenants have a similar effect. So that if the tenant be ousted by a stranger, that is, by one having no title, or if the molestation proceeds from the acts of a third person, the landlord is in neither case responsible for it; 1 Term 671; 5 Hill, N. Y. 599; 18 East 72; 25 Barb. 594; Tayl. Landl. & T. § 304. See 160 Mass. 421.

Another obligation which the law imposes upon the landlord, in the absence of any express stipulation in the lease, is the payment of all arrears of ground-rent, or interest upon mortgages to which the property leased may be subject. The tenant of property subject to ground-rent is not personally liable unless by express contract in writing he has assumed payment of it; 86 Atl. Rep. (Pa.) 923. The same rule applies as regards all taxes chargeable on the premises, though, as regards these, statutes, both in England and in almost all the United States, have been passed expressly imposing the duty of paying them on the landlord. Sometimes covenants to that effect are inserted in the lease. In general, every landlord is bound to protect his immediate tenant against all paramount claims; and if a tenant is compelled, in order to protect himself in the enjoyment of the land in respect of which his rent is payable, to make payment which ought, as between himself and his landlord, to have been made by the latter, he may call upon the landlord to reimburse him, or he may set off such payment against the rent due or to become due; 8 B. & Ald. 647; 8 M. & W. 312; 19 Mo. 501.

There is no implied warranty on the part of the landlord that the premises are safe or reasonably fit for habitation, for the purpose for which they are intended; 25 Wend. 669; 71 Pa. 383; 3 Gray 323; 48 Me. 316; 147 Mass. 471; 70 Tex. 727; 147 U. S. 418 (but see 8 Rob. La. 52). In the absence of fraud or deceit the landlord is not liable for damages suffered by the lessee because of the unfitness of the premises; 65 Vt. 478; and a railroad company letting a house on a mountain side where snow-slides sometimes occurred, was held not bound to notify the tenant of the danger, although the company knew of it, but the tenant did not and had never lived in a region where snow-slides occurred, and, in the absence of deceit or misrepresentation, the company was not liable for injuries to the tenant or death of members of her family, by the destruction of the house by snow-slide; 147 U. S. 418; but where a building is let to different tenants, the landlord is charged with the duty of keeping the halls and those portions of the building which are for the common use of the tenants in safe condition, and properly furnished with light at night; 34 Atl. Rep. (N. J.) 886. So the landlord is charged with the duty of guarding an elevator shaft for the protection of persons properly in and about the premises, if he rents the building to different tenants; 18 Misc. Rep. 496; or retains control of a portion of the premises himself; 40 Pac. Rep. (Cal.) 950; and where the premises were let with a nuisance on them, which was the cause of an injury to a third person, the owner was liable; 81 Pac. Rep. (Col.) 607; 64 Hun 179. So the owner is liable to one injured by the falling of a fire wall and cornice when the building was leased to several tenants, the portions falling not being in the control of any one of them and there being no agreement for repairs by the tenants; 19 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 953. But where the owner of an apartment house failed to light the hall in which were two adjacent doors, one opening on the stairs and the other into a water-closet used by all the occupants of the house, and a visitor opened the wrong door, and fell downstairs, it was held that the owner was not negligent in failing to light the hall and to keep the stair door locked; 131 N. Y. 674. And the owner of an apartment house was held not liable for injuries, caused by defective steps, received by a visitor going from a wake held in the house to which she had neither an express invitation nor one by implication as a relative or friend of the deceased; 156 Mass. 475; nor was a landlord liable for injuries received by a third person by falling into a coal-hole where there was no fault in its construction, and it was not out of repair; 17 R. I. 137.

Subject to such expressions as those indicated above, it has been the rule that the occupant and not the owner of premises is liable for injuries caused by failure to keep them in repair; 156 Mass. 84; and accordingly, the landlord is not liable to third persons, rightfully upon the premises, for injuries caused by the defective condition thereof unless charged with notice, or by reasonable diligence he could have acquired knowledge; 37 Ill. App. 160; 44 Id. 103; whether such third persons be in a hotel kept by the tenant; 83 Wis. 839; 156 Mass. 329; or persons visiting the tenant socially; 66 Hun 633; or servants of the tenant; 3 Wash. 722; 156 Mass. 511; but where the landlord is in control of machinery within the leased building and furnishes the power for it, and is negligent in that regard, an employee of the tenant is entitled to recover; 154 Mass. 539. See APARTMENT; FLAT.

The English court of appeal has recently laid down two rules. One is "that the landlord of a house let on a weekly tenancy is under no liability to the tenant to let or to maintain it in good repair." The other is, "that such landlord is not responsible to a person who is in the house on the tenant's business for injuries caused by a structural defect in the premises which existed at the time of the letting." The landlord may be held liable for an injury to a passer-by due to a defect which dates from the time the house was let; [1894] 1 Q. B. 164; and he is liable to a stranger on the highway for injuries caused by a defect in a coalplate, which was not proved to have existed at the beginning of the tenancy; 57 L. J. Q. B. 507; but the ground of this decision has been questioned; 55 Alb. L. J. 27.

The landlord is, in the absence of any express covenant or agreement, under no obligation to make any repairs; 42 Neb. 376; 152 Pa. 626; and a promise to repair, made by the landlord during the tenancy without any other consideration than the existence of such tenancy, is without consideration and cannot be enforced; 16 Misc. Rep. 528; but a provision in the lease by which the lessee is "to keep the fences in repair, the material for which to be furnished by the lessor" creates an express covenant of the lessee to repair, performance of which was not excused by the lessor's failure to furnish the material; 174 Pa. 588.

Where the lease provides that repairs shall be made at the tenant's expense "unless by special agreement the lessor undertakes to pay for the same," a subsequent agreement by lessor to pay for repairs is binding upon him; 29 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 166. Where the lessor covenants to keep the outside of the building in good repair, he is obliged to put it in good repair where that is needed at the time of the execution of the lease; 33 Atl. Rep. (R. I.) 445. In Philadelphia, by custom, certain substantial repairs are to be made by the landlord; 7 Phila. 472; and it is said that a covenant by the lessor to repair includes the duty of rebuilding in case of fire; 58 Ill. App. 87. And it is not in the power of a tenant to make repairs at the expense of his landlord, unless there be a special agreement between them authorizing him to do so; for the tenant takes the premises for better or for worse, and cannot involve the landlord in expense for repairs without his consent; 6 Cow. 475; 1 Ry. & M. 357; 7 M. & G. 579; 52 N. Y. 512; 51 Ill. 492; 38 Cal. 341; 1 Sandf. 321; 22 Ind. 114; 26 Vt. 40; 7 Ind. App. 581; 20 S. W. Rep. (Ark.) 193. Even if the premises have become uninhabitable by fire, and the landlord, having insured them, has recovered the insurance money, the tenant cannot compel him to expend the money so recovered in rebuilding, unless he has expressly engaged to do so; nor can he, in such an event, protect himself from the payment of rent during the unexpired balance of the term;

Jack. & Gr. L. & T. §1049; 8 Paige 437; 1 Sim. 146; 1 E. & E. 474; 52 N. Y. 512; 81 Ill. 607; 85 Ala. 99. See 40 La. Ann. 264; 134 N. Y. 349; 8 Misc. Rep. 237.

It has been held that even where the owner of a building had recovered on a fire policy the full loss sustained by the burning of his building caused by the storage of cotton by his tenants in violation of their lease, he may sue and recover from the lessees for the damage to the building; 83 S. W. Rep. (Tenn.) 615.

On the part of the tenant, we may observe that on taking possession he is at once invested with all the rights incident to possession, and is entitled to the use of all privileges and easements appurtenant to the premises.

A tenant has an implied right to use appurtenances of a building, a portion of which is rented by him; 125 Mass. 287; 145 Id. 1; 138 Id. 577. Where the lease of a saleroom provided that the lessee should be allowed the use of the elevator to bring goods from an upper floor in an adjoining estate connecting with the elevator, and subsequent leases were made letting rooms in an upper part of the building to the same lessee, with "one-horse power only," and no lease gave the express right to use the elevator to carry goods from the basement to the sidewalk or vice versa, it was held that there was no evidence from which the right to such use could be implied, although the lessor permitted it; 47 N. E. Rep. (Mass.) 618. The tenant may also maintain an action against any person who disturbs his possession or trespasses upon the premises, though it be the landlord himself; 2 B. & Ad. 97; 1 Den. 91; 17 C. B. N. S. 678; 8 Cosh. 119; 1 Ohio 251; 4 Wash. 749; 3 Tex. Civ. App. 483; he is entitled to an injunction to restrain a nuisance affecting health and comfort in the use of the premises; 46 La. Ann. 78; and may sue for damages to his crops by the overflow of his lands caused by the wrongful construction of a railroad bank; 55 Ill. App. 251; and even after the expiration of his term may recover for injuries done during the period of his tenancy; 2 Rolle, Abr. 551; Holt, N. P. C. 553. One who enters upon land by the permission, sufferance, or consent of the tenant, is at once charged by the law with the allegiance due from the tenant to his lessor; 99 N. C. 551. As occupant, he is also answerable for any neglect to repair highways, fences, or party-wall. He is liable for all injuries produced by the mismanagement of his servants, or by a nuisance kept upon the premises, or by an obstruction of the highway adjacent to them, or the like; for, as a general rule, where a man is in possession of property, he must so manage it that other persons shall not be injured thereby; 3 Q. B. 449; 2 Ld. Raym. 792; 22 N. Y. 355; 65 Ill. 160; 1 M. & W. 435; 51 Pa. 429; 3 Hun 708.

Another obligation which the law imposes upon every tenant, independent of any agreement, is to treat the premises in such a manner that no substantial injury shall be done to them, and so that they may revert to the landlord at the end of the term, unimpaired by any wilful or negligent conduct on his part. In the language of the books, he must keep the buildings wind-and-water-tight, and is bound to make fair and tenantable repairs, such as the keeping of fences in order, or replacing doors and windows that are broken during his occupation. Except where the lease contains a special exemption from that duty, the tenant is responsible for any waste committed on the demised premises; 57 Ill. App. 639. If it is a furnished house, he must preserve the furniture, and leave it, with the linen, etc., clean and in good order; 5 C. & P. 239; 4 M. & G. 95; 13 M. & W. 827; 55 Md. 71.

Where he had a covenant to keep the premises in a cleanly and healthy condition, he was justified in abandoning them where the landlord constantly rendered them uninhabitable by filling up an open sewer under the premises after the tenant had cleaned it out; 147 N. Y. 248. A covenant to keep in repair imposed on the tenant is ordinarily one to keep the premises in as good repair as they were when the lease was made; 36 S. W. Rep. (Mo.) 602.

But he is not bound to rebuild premises which have accidentally become ruinous during his occupation; nor is he answerable for ordinary wear and tear, nor for an accidental fire, nor to put a new roof on the building, nor to make what are usually called general or substantial repairs. Neither is he bound to do painting, whitewashing, or papering, except so far as they may be necessary to preserve exposed timber from decay. In general he need do nothing which will make the inheritance better than he found it; 6 C. & P. 8; 12 Ad. & E. 478; 1 Marsh. 567; 10 B. & C. 299; 2 Daly 140; 10 Q. B. 135; Jack. & Gr. L. & T. §965.

There is no implied contract binding the lessee to restore buildings which have been destroyed by accident; 180 Pa. 409. Under a covenant by the lessee to deliver up the premises in as good condition as when the lease was made, unavoidable (or inevitable) accident excepted, the landlord is not liable for the repairs to a window broken by a storm; 42 Neb. 376; or for one broken by a stone kicked by a passing horse; 43 Ill. App. 360. If there be an express covenant by the tenant to repair, he must do so though the premises be destroyed by fire; 91 Pa. 88; contra, if there is no express covenant to repair; 94 U. S. 53. Where the lease required the tenant to "cash any repairs" on the leased premises to a specified amount, the landlord acquires no right to charge the tenant with repairs made by himself; 44 Neb. 818. Under a covenant that the tenant shall "make the necessary repairs," he is liable for the breaking of a plate glass in the building, though without his fault; 9 Misc. Rep. 328. Where an explosion occurred in a leased building, the landlord was not relieved of the burden of showing negligence of the lessee; 36 Atl. Rep. (Pa.) 928.

Where the tenant had covenanted to make the repairs but the landlord authorized his agent to do some repairing in the course of which, by reason of unskillful workmanship, the wall fell upon a tenant's goods, the landlord was liable; 28 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 1017.

With respect to farming leases, a tenant is under a similar obligation to repair; but it differs from the general obligation in this, that it is confined to the dwelling-house which he occupies,—the burden of repairing and maintaining the out-buildings and other erections on the farm being sustained either by the landlord, or the tenant, in the absence of any express provision in the lease, by the particular custom of the country in which the farm is situated. He is always bound, however, to cultivate the farm in a good and husband-like manner, to keep the fences in repair, and to preserve the timber and ornamental trees in good condition; and for any violation of any of these duties he is liable to be proceeded against by the landlord for waste, whether the act of waste be committed by the tenant or through his negligence, by a stranger; Co. Litt. 53; 1 Taunt. 198; 1 Denio 104; 55 Pa. 347; 70 Ill. 527; 94 U. S. 53; 5 Term 373. As to what constitutes waste, see WASTE.

The tenant's general obligation to repair also renders him responsible for any injury a stranger may sustain by his neglect to keep the premises in a safe condition; as, by not keeping the covers of his vaults sufficiently closed, so that a person walking in the street falls through, or is injured thereby. If he repairs or improves the building, he must guard against accident to the passers-by in the street, by erecting a suitable barricade, or stationing a person there to give notice of the danger; 109 Mass. 898; 22 N. Y. 860; 65 Barb. 214; L. R. 2 C. P. 311; L. R. 5 Q. B. 501. For any unreasonable obstruction which he places in the highway adjoining his premises, he may be indicted for causing a public nuisance, as well as rendered liable to an action for damages, at the suit of any individual injured. Nor may the tenant keep dangerous animals on the premises; 4 Den. 500; 15 Vt. 404. At common law, if a fire began in a dwelling-house and spread to neighboring buildings, the tenant of the house where the fire began was liable in damages to all whose property was injured. But by a statute of Queen Anne, amended by stat. 14 Geo. III. c. 78, this right of action has been taken away. The statute is generally re-enacted in the United States; vide Tayl. L. & T. § 190.

The tenant's chief duty, however, is the payment of rent, the amount of which is either fixed by the terms of the lease, or, in the absence of an express agreement, is such a reasonable compensation for the occupation of the premises as they are fairly worth. If there has been no particular agreement between the parties, the tenant pays rent only for the time he has had the beneficial enjoyment of the premises; but if he has entered into an express agreement to pay rent during the term, no casualty or injury to the premises by fire or otherwise, nothing, in fact, short of an eviction, will excuse him from such payment; Woodf. L. & T. 819; 4 Paige, Ch. 335; 1 H. & J. 42; 16 Mass. 240; 7 Gray 580; 10 M. & W. 321; 6 Phila. 457; 72 Pa. 685; 61 N. Y. 356; 80 Ill. 532; 4 Harr. & J. 564. See 1 App. D. C. 447; 8 Misc. Rep. 307. But this is not the law in South Carolina; 1 Bay 499; 4 McCord 447. But, if he has been deprived of the possession of the premises by the landlord, or by a third person, under a title paramount to that of the landlord, or if the latter annoys his tenant, or erects or causes the erection of such a nuisance upon or near the premises as renders the tenant's occupation so uncomfortable as to justify his removal, he is in either case discharged from the payment of rent; 4 N. Y. 217; 4 Rawle 339; Co. Litt. 148 b; 75 Ill. 536; 117 Mass. 262; 106 Mass. 201; 18 N. Y. 509; 63 Ill. 430; 2 Ired. Eq. 350; 17 C. B. 30. If, however, part only of the premises be recovered by paramount title, the rent is apportioned, and the tenant remains liable in proportion to the part from which he has not been evicted; Woodf. L. & T. 1115; 2 East 575; 39 Barb. 59; 1 Allen 489. See RENT. A tenant's liability for rent is not affected by condemnation of part of the demised premises, but it ceases where the estate in the entire premises is extinguished; 136 Ill. 37; 144 id. 537.

The obligation to pay rent may be apportioned; for, as rent is incident to the reversion, it will become payable to the assignees of the respective portions thereof whenever that reversion is severed by an act of the parties or of the law. But the tenant's consent is necessary for an apportionment when made by the landlord, unless the proportion of rent chargeable upon each portion of the land has been settled by the intervention of a jury; 22 Wend. 121; 5 B. & Ald. 876; 1 M. & G. 577; 6 Halst. 262; 23 Pick. 569. A tenant, however, cannot get rid of or apportion his rent by transferring the whole or a part of his lease; for if he assigns it, or underlets a portion of it, he still remains liable to his landlord for the whole; Cro. Eliz. 633; 24 Barb. 333. Instances of an apportionment by act of law occur where there is a descent of the reversion among a number of heirs, or upon a judicial sale of a portion of the premises; for in such cases the tenant will be bound to pay rent to each of the parties for the portion of the premises belonging to them respectively. So, if a man dies, leaving a widow, she will have a right to receive one-third of the rent, while the remaining two-thirds will be payable to his heirs; so, if a part of the demised premises be taken for public purposes, the tenant is entitled to an apportionment; Co. Litt. 148 a; 25 Wend. 456; 18 Ill. 625; 20 Mo. 24; 57 Pa. 271; 3 Whart. 357. At common law rent could not be apportioned as to time; 2 Ves. Sr. 672; 3 Watts 394. But various statutes, such as 11 Geo. II. c. 19, both in England and the United States, have mitigated the hardships resulting from an enforcement of this rule. See Tayl. L. & T. § 389; Mitch. R. P. 69.

A tenant is estopped to deny the validity of his landlord's title; 8 U. S. App. 149; 38 W. Va. 607; 8 Misc. Rep. 268; 147 Ill. 269; 113 N. C. 410; 4 App. Div. N. Y. 528; 3 Okl. 223, 260; 16 So. Rep. (Ala.) 14; 89 Wis. 394; 107 Cal. 107; unless he first surrenders to him the possession; 98 id. 422. Under this rule one who goes into possession under the guardian of minor heirs cannot question their title; 62 N. W. Rep. (Mich.) 174; even after the expiration of the lease, the tenant is bound by the same rule, unless he surrenders possession or gives notice that he will thereafter claim under another and valid title; 26 Or. 494; this applies to persons who have entered by the owner's permission, and while in possession never denied his title, and their assignees are likewise estopped; 8 Wash. 603. After the termination of the lease, the lessee may, without a surrender of possession, assert a claim to a superior title; 2 Tex. Civ. App. 441; but a tenant in possession under a lease, who afterwards obtains an outstanding title to an undivided interest in the premises, cannot sue the lessor for partition without first surrendering the possession to the lessor; 97 Ala. 414. Where a widow joined in a lease with heirs, who conveyed to the tenant, the latter was still estopped to deny the tenancy as to the widow and was liable to her for her share of the rents; 6 Misc. Rep. 413. A lessee who takes a lease from an adverse claimant to the title is estopped to deny the title of the latter when sued for rent; 158 Pa. 457. The tenant is not estopped from showing that the title under which he entered has expired or been extinguished by operation of law; 34 Fla. 610; 32 id. 304; or that the landlord has parted with his title; 24 Ore. 475; although one who enters under a tenant cannot deny the title of the landlord without surrendering possession, yet if he enters under a valid lease, he is not estopped from defending his possession under it, but the landlord is estopped in such a case from denying the right of the lessee to possession under a lease expressly conferring such a right; 107 Cal. 455; nor is the lessee estopped to deny the lessor's title where the land was public domain, not the subject of lease without right from the state; 30 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 822.

The fact that by inadvertence or mistake the tenant paid rent to the landlord after his interest terminated does not constitute a continuance of the tenancy; 53 Mo. App. 662. Where there was a fraudulent agreement between the landlord and tenant to evade the homestead laws, it was held that a general rule did not apply, and that the tenant might set up and prove the fraudulent agreement in an action of ejectment by the landlord; 55 Kan. 259; so where the landlord has induced one to become his tenant by fraud or mistake the latter may contest the title of the former; 118 Mo. 288. A third person having brought goods upon the land by permission of the tenant, and not claiming possession, is not estopped from disputing the title of the landlord; [1893] 2 Q. B. 168.

One who is a tenant of the grantee by a dower right, and as such in possession of lands, will be, after the death of the reversioner, a tenant at sufferance of the reversioner, and if he permits the lands to be sold for taxes, he cannot purchase them and set up the title against the reversioner without notice, but his purchase is to be considered a redemption in favor of the landlord; 19 So. Rep. (Miss.) 348.

These rights and liabilities are not confined to the immediate parties to the contract, but will be found to attach to all persons to whom the estate may be transferred, or who may succeed to the possession of the premises, either as landlords or tenants. This principle follows as a necessary consequence of that privity of estate which is incident to the relation of landlord and tenant. A landlord may not violate his tenant's rights by a sale of the property; neither can a tenant avoid his responsibilities by substituting another tenant in his stead without the landlord's consent. The purchaser of the property becomes in one case the landlord, and is entitled to all the rights and remedies against the tenant or his assignee which the seller had; while in the other case the assignee of the lessee assumes all the liabilities of the latter, and is entitled to the same protection which he might claim from the assignee of the reversion; in the case of express covenants, the original lessee is not by the transfer discharged from his obligations; 24 Barb. 385; 19 N. Y. 68; 1 Ves. & B. Ch. 11; 4 Term 94; 17 Vt. 628; 2 W. & S. 556; 12 Miss. 43; 3 Misc. Rep. 95; 47 Mo. App. 45; 155 Pa. 38; 34 Pac. Rep. (Col.) 840. In case of implied covenants he is discharged if the landlord specially accept the assignee as his tenant; 9 Vt. 191; 3 Rep. 22; 1 Sm. L. Cas. *176; and the liability of the assignee may be at any time terminated by him, by a transfer of the estate assigned, even if the transfer be made to a pauper with express intent to evade liability; 3 Y. & C. 96; 9 Cow. 88; 9 Vt. 181. A tenant who accepts a lease from and attorns to one who succeeds to the ownership of the land, is estopped, in an action to recover possession, from setting up any defence under a lease from a former owner, under which he had entered; 167 Ill. 594, aff'd 68 Ill. App. 361. And it has been held that a tenant is under a legal obligation to pay rent to one to whom the lease is assigned by the landlord, without any formal act of attornment; 71 N. W. Rep. (Mich.) 836. A lessor who accepts rent from an assignee of the lease thereby waives a provision of the lease that it shall be void if assigned without the lessor's consent; 78 Hun 443.

The relation of landlord and tenant may be terminated in several ways. If it is a tenancy for life, it will of course terminate upon the decease of him upon whose life the lease depends; 6 Misc. Rep. 377; but if it be for life, or for a certain number of years, and depend upon some particular event, the happening of that event will determine the tenancy. So if it be for a certain number of years, independent of any contingency, it will expire at the last moment of the last day of the tenancy. See 55 N. J. L. 217; 76 Hun 67. And in all these cases depending upon the express conditions of the lease, no notice to quit will be necessary in order to dissolve the relation of the parties to each other; Co. Litt. 216; 9 Ad. & E. 879; 5 Johns. 128; 1 Pick. 43; 2 S. & R. 49; 18 Me. 264; 7 Halst. 99. A tenant after the expiration of his term becomes a trespasser, though his holding is in good faith under a color and reasonable claim of right; and the landlord without legal process may forcibly enter, therefore, and eject him; 10 R. I. 524; 17 id. 731; and by holding over after the expiration of the term, a tenant for years does not become a tenant for another year, unless the landlord so elects; 157 Ill. 90; if he holds over after a notice of increase of rent, the effect is to make him a tenant for another year upon the terms of the old lease with the single exception of the increased rent; 58 Ill. App. 228; and a tenant for one year, with the privilege of three, is bound for the latter if he elects to hold over; 2 Mo. App. 1047.

But a tenancy from year to year, or at will, can only be terminated on the part of the landlord by a notice to quit. This notice might at common law be by parol, but by statute in England and in most of the United States must now be in writing; 8 Burr. 1603; 2 Brewst. 528; it must be explicit, and require the tenant to remove from the premises; 2 Clark, Pa. 219; 2 Gray 833; Dougl. 175; 5 Ad. & E. 850; it must be served upon the tenant, and not upon an under tenant; it must run in the name of the landlord, and not of his agent; 10 Johns. 270. But personal service of the notice on the tenant is not absolutely essential, and it is sufficient if the notice be left at the tenant's usual residence with his wife or servant; 4 Tenn. 404; L. R. 5 H. L. 134; 103 Mass. 154; 44 Mo. 581. An estate at will must be mutual; if one party can terminate the lease at any time, so can the other; 83 Va. 517. Such a tenancy is terminated by the alienation of the prem-ices, without notice to the tenant; 88 Atl. Rep. (Me.) 540. Whether a tenant from year to year is in any event bound to give notice to determine the tenancy seems doubtful. See the authorities collected in Bright, Pa. 463. At common law this notice was required to be one of half a year, ending with the period of the year at which the tenancy commenced; 1 W. Bla. 596; 7 Q. B. 639; 4 Bing. 363; and this rule prevails in Kentucky, Tennessee, North Carolina, Vermont, Illinois, and New Jersey as to tenancies from year to year; 1 Johns. 323; 33 Vt. 88; 4 Ired. 291; 8 Green, N. J. 181; 4 Kent 113; 6 Yerg. 431; 8 Cow. 13; 39 Ill. 378. In Delaware, Pennsylvania, South Carolina, New Hampshire, Massachusetts, and Michigan, three months' notice is required; Del. Rev. Code Ch. 120, § 4; 4 Fost. 219; 2 Rich. S. C. 346; 11 Pa. 473; 34 Md. 96; 113 Mass. 214; while the New York statutes provide for its termination by giving one month's notice wherever there is a tenancy at will or by sufferance, created by the tenant holding over after the term or otherwise; 1 R. S. 745, § 7; 3 Misc. Rep. 99.

In case of such a tendency, in default of notice, the landlord has no right of entry until the term granted has terminated by legal notice, and in default of such notice, the tenant may hold over; 8 Houst. 507. The subject is in general governed by statutory rules too numerous and complicated to set forth. Where a lease provides for the termination of a tenancy upon the tenant's ceasing to work for the landlord and the tenant voluntarily ceases so to work, no notice of the termination of the lease to the tenant is necessary; 8 U. S. App. 149.

The relation of landlord and tenant will also be dissolved when the tenant incurs a forfeiture of his lease by the breach of some covenant or condition therein contained. At common law a forfeiture was incurred if the tenant did any act which was inconsistent with his relation to his landlord; as if he impugned the title of his lessor by affirming by matter of record the fee to be in a stranger, claimed a greater estate than he was entitled to, or undertook to alienate the estate in fee; Co. Litt. 251 b, 252 a; 12 East 444. But these causes of forfeiture, founded upon strict feudal principles, have been generally abolished in the United States; and a forfeiture of a term of years now only occurs in consequence of a breach of some express stipulation contained in the lease, as for the commission of waste, non-payment of rent, or the like; 7 Paige, Ch. 350; 5 B. & C. 855; 22 Md. 122; 20 Ill. 125; 33 Mich. 315. In order to work a forfeiture for non-payment of rent, a demand must be made for the rent, though such demand may be in the form of a notice to quit; 35 Neb. 706; 140 U. S. 25. A delay of a few days in declaring a lease forfeited for non-payment of rent does not constitute a waiver of the right of forfeiture; 145 Ill. 238. A provision of a lease that failure of the lessee to make a payment when due should render the lease null and void, and not binding on either party, does not make the lease void, except at the option of the lessor; 159 Pa. 184. A forfeiture may be waived by an acceptance of, or distraining for, rent which became due after a breach committed by the tenant, or by giving a notice to quit, or by any other act which acknowledges the continuance of the tenancy; 8 Watts 51; 2 N. H. 163; 8 H. & M. 436; 1 M. & W. 408; 6 Wisc. 323; L. R. 7 Q. B. 344; 21 Wend. 537; 40 Mo. 449; 96 Cal. 93; 6 Misc. Rep. 408; and will be relieved against by the courts in all cases where it happened accidentally, or where the injury is capable of compensation, the damages on equitable principles being a mere matter of computation; 12 Ves. Ch. 475; 2 Price 209; 9 Mod. 22; Story, Eq. § 1814; 62 N. Y. 496; 44 Vt. 285; and it is always at the election of the lessor to avail himself of his right of re-entry for conditions broken or not as he pleases; 6 B. & C. 519; and vide 7 W. & S. 41; 39 Pa. 346; 12 Barb. 440; 5 Cush. 281; 29 Conn. 331; 1 Wall. 64.

Another means of dissolving a tenancy is by an operation of law, termed a merger,—which happens where a tenant purchases the fee of the reversion, or the fee descends to him as heir at law, the lease becoming thereby merged in the inheritance, the lesser estate being absorbed in the greater. To produce this result, however, it is necessary that the two estates should meet in the same person and in the same right; for if he who has the reversion in fee marries the tenant for years, or if a tenant makes the landlord his executor, the term of years is in neither case merged, because in either case he holds the fee for his own benefit, while the term of years is taken in one case for his wife's use, and in the other for the benefit of the estate he represents as executor; Woodf. L. & T. 1188; 12 N. Y. 526; Co. Litt. 288 b; 1 Washb. R. P. 854; 13 Pa. 16; 35 N. Y. 279. See 86 Tenn. 642. But the universal current of opinion now sets against the operation of the doctrine of merger wherever a result will be produced contrary to the intentions of the parties or prejudicial to the interests of third parties; 34 N. Y. 320; 4 Gray 885; 4 De G. M. & G. 474; 3 Hill 96; 4 Paige 403.

In addition to the several methods of putting an end to a tenancy already mentioned, we may add that it is, of course, competent for a tenant at any time to surrender his lease to the landlord; 117 Mass. 357; 18 Johns. 28; 19 Cal. 354; but a mere agreement to surrender a lease, is inoperative unless accompanied by the act; 41 Ill. App. 223. An express surrender can only be made by deed in England, since the Statute of Frauds, and this provision is in some of the states re-enacted; 8 Taunt. 270; 11 Wend. 616; 8 Allen 202; 8 Wisc. 141. But a surrender by operation of law is a case excepted out of the statute; as, for example, where, during the period of the old lease, a new one, inconsistent with it in its terms, is accepted, the old lease is at an end; 8 Johns. 394; 99 Mass. 18; Tayl. L. & T. 512; 117 Mass. 357; 53 Minn. 480. If the subject-matter of the lease wholly perishes; 26 N. Y. 498; 118 Mass. 125; 38 Cal. 259; or is required to be taken for public uses; 38 Mo. 143; 20 Pick. 159; 57 Pa. 271; 119 Mass. 28; 43 N. Y. 377; or the tenant disclaims to hold under his landlord, and therefore refuses to pay his rent, asserts the title to be in himself or unlawfully attorns to another, the tenancy is at an end, and the landlord may forthwith resume the possession; 3 Pet. 43; 4 Wend. 633; 21 Cal. 342; 8 Watts 55; 5 Dana 101; 23 Gratt. 332.

Where the tenant, by consent of his landlord, continues in possession after the expiration of his term, in the absence of a new agreement, the law will imply a tacit renewal of the former one; 41 Ill. App. 209; 88 Ga. 610; (1893) 1 Q. B. 736. See 49 Mo. App. 631; 38 W. Va. 607.

After the tenancy has ended, the right of possession reverts to the landlord, who may re-enter upon the premises if he can do so without violence. But if the tenant holds over and the landlord takes possession forcibly, so as to endanger a breach of the peace, he runs the risk of being punished criminally for a forcible entry (see FORCIBLE ENTRY AND DETAINER) as well as of suffering the consequences of an action of trespass; 121 Mass. 309; 59 Me. 568; 4 Am. Law Rev. 429; 1 M. & G. 644; 1 W. & S. 90. The landlord should, therefore, in all such cases, call in the law to his assistance, and receive possession at the hands of the sheriff.

The tenant, on his part, is bound quietly to yield up the possession of the entire premises; 148 Ill. 192. And for refusal to perform this duty he will be liable for rent; 51 N. Y. 509; 84 Ill. 62; 62 Me. 248; E. B. & E. 336.

If the tenant, after surrendering possession, resumed it under any agreement with his landlord or his agent, though made by the latter without authority, he is not liable for holding over; 1 App. Div. N. Y. 449; and where a tenant vacated a building and delivered up the key, leaving a press on the premises, which was used by his employees, who had entered the building some days after without his knowledge, he did not hold over; 5 id. 124. Where the lessee holds over, he may be treated by the landlord at his option as a tenant or a trespasser; 15 Pa. Co. Ct. R. 248; 12 Misc. Rep. 848. The tenant cannot avoid his responsibility for the rent of another term by notice that he is going to quit, and then not doing it; 169 Pa. 460. Where the agent of the lessor failed to make an answer to the tenant's proposition to hold over as tenant by the month, he was not thereby relieved from the consequences of holding over; 168 Pa. 541. The burden is on the tenant to relieve himself from an action for unlawful detainer by showing the agreement for the renewal of the tenancy; 56 Mo. App. 440.

But where a tenant for years had planted a crop, after a decree foreclosing a mortgage on the leased land under which the land was sold before the crop matured, and the purchaser having notified the tenant that he would expect rent in money or in kind, the latter was held entitled to the crop; 62 N. W. Rep. (Neb.) 32. Upon the abandonment of a farm by a tenant before the end of the term, the possessory right in whatever property is on the farm, including harvested crops, reverts to the lessor; 9 Houst. 281.

The tenant has a reasonable right of egress and regress for the purpose of removing his goods and chattels; 2 Bla. Com. 14; 24 Me. 424; L. R. 5 C. P. 334. He may, also, in certain cases, take such estovers as are attached to the estate and the emblements or annual profits of the land after his tenancy is ended, as to which his rights are largely affected by local customs (see ESTOVERS; EMBLEMMENTS); 86 Ala. 508; 56 Conn. 374; but a tenant for years is not entitled to them; 48 Mo. App. 480; nor where the landlord re-enters and takes possession because of the failure of the tenant to pay rent; 69 Hun 588; and, unless restricted by some stipulation to the contrary, may remove such fixtures as he has erected during his occupation for his comfort and convenience, particularly if for trade purposes. As between landlord and tenant, whatever is affixed to the land by the tenant for the purpose of trade, whether it be made of wood or brick, is removable at the end of the term; 142 U. S. 396; 139 N. Y. 432. See FIXTURES.

The ordinary common-law remedy by which a landlord proceeds to recover the possession of his premises is by an action of ejectment, and in these cases it is a general rule that the tenant is never permitted, for reasons of sound public policy, to controvert his landlord's title, or to set up against him a title acquired by himself during his tenancy which is hostile in its character to that which he acknowledged in accepting the demise; 8 B. & C. 413; 2 Denio 451; 8 Ad. L. & E. 188; 15 N. Y. 327; 61 Me. 590; 54 Pa. 196; 42 Md. 81; 72 N. C. 294; 18 Wall. 431; 133 Ind. 14. But to this rule there are some exceptions: of these the chief are cases where the landlord's interest has expired during the lease; 2 Zab. 261; Tayl. L. & T. § 708; or where he has sold and conveyed the land; 10 Md. 333; 50 Ill. 232; 99 Mass. 15; or where the tenant has been evicted by title paramount, and accepted a new lease under the real owner of the premises; 69 Pa. 316; 66 Me. 167; 82 Mich. 285.

But the slow and measured progress of the action of ejectment in most cases affords a very inadequate remedy to the landlord; and in order, therefore, to obviate the evils arising from its delays, the statutes of the different states provide a summary proceeding, by which a landlord may be speedily reinstated, upon short notice, in cases where a tenant abandons the premises before the end of the term without surrendering the lease, leaving rent in arrear, continues to hold over after the expiration of his term, or has become unable or unwilling to pay rent for the use of the premises; 23 Wend. 611; Tayl. L. & T. § 713.

See, further, on the subject of this article, Woodfall; Smith; Taylor; Archbold; Comyns; Coates; and Smith & Soden, on the Law of Landlord and Tenant; Platt on Leases; Washburn on Real Property, 5th ed. *292.

LANDLORD'S WARRANT. A warrant of distress. A written authority from a landlord to a constable or bailiff authorizing him to make a distress upon the tenant's goods and chattels in order to force the payment of rent or some covenant in a lease. See DISTRESS; LANDLORD & TENANT.

LANDMARKS. Objects or monuments fixing the boundary of an estate or piece of property. R. & L. Dict. See MONUMENTS.

LANDS. See LAND; LANDS, PUBLIC.

LANDS CLAUSES CONSOLIDATION ACTS. Important acts, beginning in 1843, and last amended by 32 & 33 Vict. c. 18, the object of which was to provide legislative clauses in a convenient form for incorporation, by reference in future special acts of parliament, for taking lands, with or without the consent of their owners, for the promotion of railways, and other public undertakings. Moz. & W.

These statutes or some designated part thereof are incorporated in all acts of parliament, authorizing public works which require the acquisition of land, and they correspond to the grant of the delegated right of eminent domain in legislative charters in the United States. The scope of these acts of parliament includes provision for the purchase of lands by agreement between the promoter of an undertaking of a public nature and the owners of the land required; and also for the acquisition of the land otherwise than by agreement, in which contingency the compensation to be paid is settled either by the verdict of a jury or by arbitrators. In the case of persons under disability or absent from England, provision is made for the valuation of their compensation. Forms of covenants are prescribed, and upon their execution the fee-simple of the lands is vested free of all terms for years and other qualifications; or in case of copyholds, the covenants must be enrolled on the court rolls, and must be thereafter enfranchised. Mortgages on the lands purchased may be redeemed and released of rent charges, and the surrender of leases may be procured upon such terms as may be agreed upon, or in default of agreement as may be settled by the verdict of a jury or by arbitration. The acts also authorize the sale of superfluous lands by the promoters, the original owner having the option to repurchase them, and next after him the nearest adjoining owners unless the land is built upon, suitable for building, or situated within a town. It is usually provided that the costs are borne by the promoters. See 2 Brett, Com. 661; PROEMPTA.

LANDS, PUBLIC. Under the title public lands of the United States is comprised such land as is open to sale or other disposition under general laws. 145 U. S. 538; 92 id. 763; 10 Nev. 260. In a statute authorizing location of script, it does not include tidelands; 153 U. S. 273. Nor does the term include lands to which any claims or rights of others have attached; 145 id. 538.

GOVERNMENT OWNERSHIP. The public domain embraces lands known in the United States as "public lands," lying in certain states and territories known as "land states and territories," and was acquired by the government of the United States by treaty, conquest, cession by states or other nations, and purchase, and is disposed of under and by authority of the national government, when the Indian title thereto (which is one of possession merely) has been extinguished by treaty stipulations or otherwise.

The fee in unsold lands is either in the federal or state governments. The Indians have only a right of use, which, however, cannot be divested, except by purchase or war; 2 McLean 412.

They have the unquestionable right to the lands which they occupy until extinguished by a voluntary cession to the government; 92 U. S. 733; id. 760; while the claim of the government extends to the complete ultimate title, charged with the right of possession by the Indians, and to the exclusive power of acquiring that title of possession; 8 Wheat. 603; 6 Cra. 87; 17 Wall. 211; 95 U. S. 517.

The English possessions in America were not claimed by right of conquest, but by right of discovery. The discoveries were made by persons acting under the authority of the government for the benefit of the nation; and the crown, according to the principles of the British constitution, was the proper organ to dispose of the public domain; 16 Pet. 409. See also 8 Wheat. 595. The United States hold the public lands within the new states by force of the deeds of cession and the statutes connected with them and not by any municipal sovereignty which it may be supposed they possess or have reserved by compact with the new states, for that particular purpose; 3 How. 224.

The interest of the United States in lands held by it within state boundaries is simply proprietary, the sovereignty residing within the state, and its rights differ from those of any ordinary land-holder in the state, only as provided in the constitution of the United States, and by the terms of the compact between the general and the state government at the time of the admission of the latter into the Union; 5 Minn. 223.

All lands in the territories not appropriated by competent authority before they were acquired are, in the first instance, the exclusive property of the United States, to be disposed of to such persons, at such times and in such modes and by such titles, as the government may deem most advantageous to the public; 20 How. 561.

The United States is the sole owner of the soil, and has entire and complete jurisdiction over it. Through congress, it provides the methods of disposition under grants, settlement laws, or sales, public or private; may prevent trespasses, and in all methods retain the entire control over it until sold or otherwise disposed of. Congress has the same power over it as over any other property belonging to the United States, and this power is vested in congress without any limitation; 6 McLean 517; 13 Wall. 92; 20 How. 558; 14 Pet. 526; 13 id. 436; and any change of political condition, as in a territory becoming a state, or change of boundary of a territory or state, in no wise affects the absolute and complete proprietary power of the national government over the public domain. It remains until the last acre is disposed of. It cannot be taxed by a state; 4 How. 169; nor can a state exercise any power or control over the public lands which may lie within its limits; 5 McLean 844; 14 Pet. 526; 4 How. 169; 6 McLean 517.

The control of the United States over their own property is independent of locality, and no state or territory can interfere with their control, enjoyment, or disposal of such property; nor are the contracts of the government with respect to subjects within its constitutional competency, local, or confined in their effect and operation strictly to the status of the subjects to which they relate; 20 How. 558.

For the amount of the public lands and the manner in which it was acquired by the national government, see Donaldson's History of the Public Domain, p. 10; H. R. Misc. Docs. No. 45, part 4, 2d Sess. 47th Cong., vol. 10.

NATIONAL CONTROL AND DISPOSITION. The constitution of the United States (Article 4, section 3, par. 2) provides that: "The congress shall have the power to dispose of and to make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States," the word property in the above quotation meaning lands; 6 McLean 517. Under the authority thus conferred upon it, the congress has provided a complete system for the regulation and disposal of the public domain. In the early stages of the history of the government the public domain was put within the jurisdiction and control of the secretary of the treasury, but on March 3, 1849, congress created the home, now the interior department, and by section 3 of that law provided that "the secretary of the interior shall perform all the duties in relation to the general land office of supervision and appeal now discharged by the secretary of the treasury." Thereafter the general land office became and still continues to be a bureau in the interior department. The secretary of the interior is now charged with the supervision of the public business relating to the public lands, including mines and pension and bounty lands. Rev. Stats. chaps. 2 and 3, pp. 74-78. See LAND OFFICE.

Under the supreme control which has been vested in it by the constitution, the congress has divided the public domain into various land districts, and has provided for the appointment of a surveyor general for the states and territories, and of certain deputy surveyors; U. S. Rev. Stat. §§ 2207-2233. It has also provided for the appointment of various registers and receivers, and the creation of what is known as local land offices in the various land districts. The duties of these officers is to receive applications to enter the public lands under the various land laws, and to hear contests concerning the same, with rights of appeal to the general land office and from thence to the secretary of the interior. See U. S. Rev. Stat. §§ 2234-2247. For the various land districts and their creation, see U. S. Rev. Stat. § 2248.

KINDS OF LAND AND METHODS OF ACQUIRING SAME. The public lands may be divided with respect to their character into, first, agricultural lands, which are acquired under the various laws, such as pre-emption, homestead, etc., at the price of $1.25 per acre when they lie without, and $2.50 per acre when they lie within, the limits of any grant made by congress in aid of the construction of a railroad; U. S. Rev. Stat. § 2357; 160 U. S. 136; second, mineral lands, which are sold at $5.00 per acre, under which term we include lands containing placer deposits of minerals, which are sold at $2.50 per acre; third, coal lands, which are sold at $20.00 per acre when situated within 15 miles of any completed railroad, otherwise at $10.00 per acre; fourth, desert lands, which are sold at $1.25 per acre, provided they do not lie within the limits of a railroad grant; 160 U. S. 136; and fifth, saline lands, sold at $1.25 per acre.

Various methods for the sale or other disposition of the public domain have been enacted from time to time, a very interesting history of which may be found in Donaldson's History of the Public Domain 196, 208, 676. The provisions of law which formerly existed relative to the acquisition of public lands by private entry and public sale and through the timber culture laws have been repealed; R. S. 1 Supp. pp. 682, 940. The methods of acquiring the agricultural lands of the United States are now, through the operation of the pre-emption law, superseded by the provisions of the amended homestead law and the desert land act.

Pre-emptions. The provisions of the law formerly existing with relation to the acquisition of title under the pre-emption laws were repealed and superseded by the act of March 3, 1891; Rev. Stat. 1 Supp. pp. 939, 940, especially section 3 of said act, p. 942. The acts of March 3, 1877, 19 Stat. L. 404, May 27, 1878, and June 14, 1878, 20 Stat. L. 63-113, permitting pre-emptioners who have changed to homestead entries to credit their time from original settlement, are superseded as to future permanent operations by the act of March 3, 1891, supra. See also act of March 2, 1889; Rev. Stat. 1 Supp. p. 682. Various other acts contain provisions common to pre-emption and homestead entry, and are by this act superseded as to the former. This act, however, does not affect entries made under the pre-emption laws prior to its passage. See sec. 4 of said act, and 15 Land Decisions 432.

Desert Land Act. Desert lands are such as will not, without artificial irrigation, raise an agricultural crop. These lands are confined to what is known as the arid regions which are situated in certain western states and territories. Provision is made for the acquisition of lands of this character by conducting water thereon, and performing certain other requirements, as provided in the act of March 3, 1877; Rev. Stat. 1 Supp. p. 137. For sections 4 and 8 added to this act, see act of March 3, 1891,

Rev. Stat. 1 Supp. pp. 940, 941.

Saline lands. Provision for the sale of land of this character is made by the act of January 18, 1877; Rev. Stat. 1 Supp. 137. Under its provisions a hearing is ordered and witnesses are examined as to the character of the land in question, and the testimony taken at the hearing is transmitted to the general land office for its decision. Should the tract be adjudged agricultural, it will be subject to disposition as such. Should the tract be adjudged to be of saline character it will be offered at public sale to the highest bidder for cash at a price of not less than $1.35 per acre. In case it is not sold, it is subject to private sale at a price not less than $1.35 per acre, in the same manner as other public lands are sold. Quere: Whether this act is repealed by section 9 of the act of March 3, 1891? U. S. Rev. Stat. 1 Supp. 948.

Coal lands. For the provisions relating to the acquisition of lands of this character, see Rev. Stat. U. S. § 3347. See also Donaldson's History of the Public Domain 1377, 1378.

MINERAL LANDS, RESOURCES, AND CLAIMS; location of, under U. S. Laws. The existing provisions and regulations relative to the acquisition of mineral lands, the title of which is in the government, are to be found in United States Revised Statutes, §§ 2319-2333, and in 1 Supp. Rev. Stats. pp. 166-7; 276, 63, 334, 943, 950. For a history of the attempted legislation prior to the passage of the act of 1886 (the first mining law), see Yale on Mining Claims 340-350; and Weeks on Mineral Lands, Addenda, chap. 1, for the act of 1886.

Requisites of location. All valuable mineral deposits in lands belonging to the United States, whether surveyed or unsurveyed, are "free and open to exploration and purchase by citizens of the United States, or those who have declared their intention to become such" (Rev. Stats. § 2319), and citizenship or declared intention is a condition precedent to the right of location; 19 Fed. Rep. 32; 13 Pac. Rep. (Ida.) 904. A state corporation is a citizen for this purpose, provided the members thereof are citizens and qualified to make the location; 21 Pac. Rep. (Col.) 1019; 13 Colo. 105; 180 U. S. 630. Upon declaring his intention to become a citizen, an alien may have advantage of work previously done, and of a record previously made; 19 Fed. Rep. 78; and an alien locator may convey to a citizen so as to give title from date of conveyance, provided no third person acquires rights prior to such conveyance; 1 Fed. Rep. 537. See 6 Wall. 122. A location made jointly by aliens and citizens is a good location by the citizens; 1 Fed. Rep. 537.

A mineral location can only be made on the unsold, unappropriated and unoccupied lands of the United States; 3 Wall. 304; 24 Cal. 562; 67 Cal. 656; 14 Cal. 461; 6 Colo. 893; but the right to possession is derived solely from a valid location; 4 Mont. 870; 4 id. 627; and cannot be held as "occupied" so as to defeat a subsequent location unless all the laws, including the yearly assessment work, etc., are complied with; 104 U. S. 284; 115 id. 408; 59 Cal. 613; 6 Mont. 53. The act describes mineral lands as "valuable mineral deposits." This means lands which may be profitably mined in the usual manner; Copp's Mining Lands 324. Lands containing minerals, but not in profitable quantities, are not mineral lands; 115 U. S. 392; 28 Fed. Rep. 463; 45 Cal. 482. But non-mineral lands, to the extent of 5 acres, may be located as mill sites, when in connection with a lode location or separately; Rev. Stats. § 2337. Title to mineral lands can only be acquired in the precise manner provided by the laws relating to such lands; and a patent obtained under the provisions of any other law is void; Rev. Stats. § 2318; 21 Wall. 660; 115 U. S. 392, 406. If a patent issue for agricultural land on which there is a known lode, title to such lode does not pass; 5 Ore. 104; but contra if subsequently discovered; Copp's Min. Lands 124; 17 Cal. 199. The right to locate is initiated by discovery and appropriation, which forms the source of title; development being the requisite of continued possession; 118 U. S. 387; 116 id. 418; 23 Pac. Rep. (Cal.) 804. A location before an actual discovery confers no rights upon the locator; 1 Fed. Rep. 580; 11 id. 676.

No specific time is designated by the statutes within which the location must be completed; but if one begin a location and then depart he cannot return and complete the location so as to hold it against one who, during such absence, has made a complete location; 65 Cal. 419. A location is dependent, primarily, upon what is found in the discovery shaft, the discovery of ore elsewhere being, as a rule, unavailing; 8 Fed. Rep. 735; but see 3 Utah 94; 6 Colo. 581; 15 Nev. 388, where evidence was admitted in proof of discovery to show the existence of a vein other than at the location point. The work leading up to the discovery need not have been done by the locator, provided the existence of the vein was known to him at the time of location; 7 Mont. 30.

It is not priority of discovery, but priority of compliance with the various requirements of the law that gives the right to the mine; 13 Nev. 455. As to the proper manner of staking out a claim so as to conform to the lode or vein, see 98 U. S. 463. See also 6 Colo. 393; 13 Nev. 442. Laws and regulations for the location, development, and working of mines may be made by the states and by the miners themselves; Rev. Stats. §§ 2319-2324.

As to the extent of ground open to location and the method of staking it off, see Rev. Stats. § 2320, and for the provisions relating to placer locations, see Rev. Stats. §§ 2329, 2333. See 128 U. S. 673; Copp's Min. Lands 52.

The term "placer claim," as used in Rev. Stats. § 2329, means "ground between defined boundaries which contains mineral in its earth, sand, or gravel; ground that includes valuable deposits not in piece, that is, not fixed in rock, but which are in a loose state, and may, in most cases, be collected by washing or amalgamation, without milling." 128 U. S. 679.

It is incumbent upon one in possession of a placer claim whereon is a vein or lode, to state that fact in his application for a patent, or the patent will not carry such vein or lode. If discovered subsequent to the issuance of the patent, however, such vein or lode is covered by the placer patent; Rev. Stats. § 2333; 37 Cal. 286; 116 U. S. 687.

The statutory requirements concerning the description of the location, Rev. Stats. §§ 2318, 2324, are: (1) that the location shall be along the vein or lode; (2) that it shall be distinctly marked on the ground so that the boundaries can be readily traced and that such description shall be by reference to some permanent object for the identification of the claim; (3) that all the lines shall be parallel—the last requirement being directory only, the object being to prevent a party from claiming more width of vein outside his surface lines than within them; 83 Cal. 203. All other details of location are governed by the rules and regulations of miners and state laws; Rev. Stats. § 2324.

Although the federal laws do not require the posting of any notice of location on the claim, but only require the recording of such notice in the mining district, yet the posting of a notice is almost universally required by the miners' regulations, and by state laws; 118 U. S. 537; 10 Cal. 446; 40 Fed. Rep. 797. See LODE; VEIN.

Re-location. A mining claim is subject to re-location where the owner has failed to comply with the statutory requirements, or has failed to observe local rules; Rev. Stats. § 2324; 73 Cal. 520; 12 Nev. 312; 1 Mont. 325. But the forfeiture must have actually occurred before re-location, otherwise the re-location is invalid and the re-locator a trespasser; 11 Fed. Rep. 680; 1 Idaho 107; 21 Pac. Rep. (Ida.) 413; 104 U. S. 279. A re-location is made in the same manner and carries the same rights as original location; 6 Colo. 893; 9 id. 339; 20 Pac. Rep. (N. M.) 788.

Annual work. It is provided by federal statute that during each year, after location and until a patent issues, there shall be performed on the claim not less than $100 worth of labor on improvements; Rev. Stats. § 2324; and this provision is applicable alike to placer claims and to lode claims; 65 Cal. 40. The work may be done anywhere upon the surface of the claim within its surface lines or below the surface within the lines extended vertically downward, but it must be done as a necessary means of extracting ore; 5 Sawy. 439; 6 Mont. 188. See also 109 U. S. 440; 104 id. 655. By act of February 11, 1875, U. S. Rev. Stats. 1 Supp. 63, it is provided that where a tunnel has been run for the purpose of developing a lode, the tunnel shall be considered as expended on said lode, and that it shall not be required to perform work on the surface of the lode as required in § 2324 Rev. Stats. See 111 U. S. 355.

This work may be done by any party in interest, whether such party have a legal or equitable claim; 11 Fed. Rep. 680. The amount of work required by the statute cannot be decreased by any state law or miners' regulation; 7 Colo. 443; 60 Cal. 631; and may be done at any time within the year; 104 U. S. 279; 8 Colo. 41.

Failure to perform the work will be excused if brought about by actual existing fear of bodily harm, or prevented by coercion or duress actually and presently existing; 7 Fed. Rep. 331; 113 U. S. 527.

Where claims are held in common, this annual work may be done on any one claim; Rev. Stats. § 2324; 111 U. S. 350; 109 id. 440.

The apex rule. Ordinarily the locator would be confined to the limits of his surface measurements both as to surface possession and beneath it, but by the apex rule the locator is entitled not only to the surface included within the lines of his location, but also to all of the veins, lodes, and ledges throughout their entire depth, the apex of which lies inside of such surface lines extending downward vertically, albeit such veins, lodes, or ledges may depart from a perpendicular course in such wise as to extend outside of the side lines of the location, provided such right shall not extend beyond the entire lines of the location projecting in their own line or until they intersect the veins or ledges; Rev. Stats. § 2322; 11 Fed. Rep. 670; 23 Pac. Rep. (Ida.) 547; 42 Fed. Rep. 626. But this right does not carry with it power to follow into the lands of an adjoining proprietor holding title to agricultural lands; 36 Fed. Rep. 668. But see 42 Fed. Rep. 98. This rule of the apex has been a fruitful source of litigation, the following being a few of the more important cases: 118 U. S. 196; 75 Cal. 78; 3 Fed. Rep. 368; 8 id. 725; 12 id. 297; 42 id. 98; 2 McCrary 121; 114 U. S. 576; 98 id. 463; 42 Fed. Rep. 98; 8 id. 297; 1 Ari. 426; 2 Utah 355.

PRIVATE ACQUISITION. The rule is well settled, that when public lands have been surveyed and placed in the market, or otherwise opened to private acquisition, a person who complies with all the requisites necessary to entitle him to a patent in a particular tract or lot is to be regarded as the equitable owner thereof, and the land is no longer open to location. Any subsequent grant of the same land to another party is void, unless the first location or entry be vacated and set aside; 98 U. S. 121; see 13 Pet. 493; and when different grants cover the same premises, the earlier takes the title; 130 U. S. 1.

Public lands of the United States may be granted by statute or by treaty, as well as by patent; 1 Doug. Mich. 546. As to the latter method, see LAND PATENT.

After public lands have been entered at the land office and a certificate of entry obtained, they are private property, the government agreeing to make a conveyance as soon as it can, and in the meantime holding the naked legal fee in trust for the purchaser, who has the equitable title; 138 U. S. 496; 123 id. 456; and they cease to be public; 182 id. 857.

Courts have power to protect the private rights of a party who has purchased in good faith from the government, against the interference or appropriations of corrective resurveys made by the land department subsequently to such purchase; 128 U. S. 699. The power to make and correct surveys of the public lands belongs to the political department of the government, and while the lands are subject to the supervision of the General Land Office, its decisions in such cases are unassailable by the courts, except by a direct proceeding; 128 U. S. 699; 142 id. 161.

Persons entering on lands, whether "vacant" or "public land," or land acquired by the government of the United States under a foreign grant, are to be deemed trespassers; 1 McAll. 119; and an agreement to sell and transfer their possession and improvements is an illegal and void agreement to continue the trespass, and a note given for the purchase money of an improvement on vacant lands of the United States is for an illegal consideration, and no action will lie upon it; 2 Miss. 150; 8 Fla. 84; and a trespasser of land from the government is entitled to improvements thereon at the time of the purchase, and if the party who made them should afterwards remove them he is liable in an action of trespass; 32 Miss. 138. The occupancy of the public lands of the United States constitutes, at least so far as trespasses by a stranger are concerned, a tenancy at will, and not a tenancy from year to year; 5 Stew. & P. 82. A person cultivating public lands to which he has no title is not protected by the doctrine of emblements, and a purchaser from the United States is entitled to all crops growing upon the land at the time; 5 Mo. 335; but a person by entry upon such land acquires no title to timber cut prior to, and lying upon the land at, the time of his entry; 19 id. 362.

In addition to the methods of disposing of the public domain to actual purchasers or settlers upon it, congress has disposed of immense quantities of land in various other ways. For example, grants made in aid of the construction of railroads, either granted directly to the road itself or to a state as a trustee for the use of the road. Large quantities of land have also been granted to the states as they were admitted into the Union, for educational, charitable, and other purposes. A large amount of the public domain has also been taken up under land bounties for military and naval services prior to 1861 and subsequent, and also by the granting of lands for town sites and county seat purposes. An interesting account of all this legislation will be found in Donaldson's History of the Public Domain. See also Barringer & Adams, Mines and Mining; INDIANS; IRRIGATION; MINES AND MINING; PATENT; LAND GRANT; LAND WARRANT; LAND OFFICE; LAND PATENT.

LANDS, TENEMENTS, AND HEREDITAMENTS. A phrase used in early English law to express all sorts of property of the immovable class, as goods and chattels did the movable class. Wms. R. P. 5.

The technical expression for the most comprehensive description of real property.

LANGEMANNI. The lords of manors. 1 Co. Inst. 5; Moz. & W.

LANGUAGE. The medium for the communication of perceptions and ideas. Spoken language is that wherein articulate sounds are used. See 90 Ga. 450.

Written language is that wherein written characters are used, and especially the system of characters called letters and figures.

By conventional usage, certain sounds and characters have a definite meaning in one country, or in certain countries, and this is called the language of such country or countries, as, the Greek, the Latin, the French, or the English language. The law, too, has a peculiar language. See Euom. Dial. 2.

On the subjugation of England by William the Conqueror, the French-Norman language was substituted in all law proceedings for the ancient Saxon, which, according to Blackstone, § Com. 317, was the language of the records, writs, and pleadings until the time of Edward III. Mr. Stephen thinks Blackstone has fallen into an error, and says the record was, from the earliest period to which that document can be traced, in the Latin language. Plead. Appr. note 14. The history of legal language in England is further stated by Blackstone as follows: By the statute 26 Edw. III. st. 1, c. 15, it was enacted that for the future all pleas should be pleaded, shown, defended, answered, debated, and adjudged in the English tongue, but be entered and enrolled in Latin. The Norman or law French, however, being more familiar as applied to the law than any other language, the lawyers continued to employ it in making their notes of the trial of cases, which they afterwards published in that barbarous dialect under the name of Reports.

After the enactment of this statute, on the introduction of paper into the courts, the style of the language as well as in other respects, the style of the records, which were drawn up in Latin. This technical language continued in use till the time of Cromwell, when by a statute the records were directed to be in English; but this act was repealed at the restoration by Charles II., the lawyers finding it difficult to express themselves as well and as concisely in the vernacular as in the Latin tongue; and the language of the law continued as before till about the year 1730, when the statute of 4 Geo. II. c. 26, was passed. It provided that both the pleadings and the records should thenceforward be framed in English. The ancient terms and expressions which had been so long known in French and Latin were now literally translated into English. The translations of such terms and phrases were found to be exceedingly ridiculous. Such terms as ni si prius, habeas corpus, habeas facias, mandamus, and the like, are not capable of an English dress with any degree of seriousness. They are equally absurd in the manner they are employed in law; but use, and the fact that they are in a foreign language, have made the absurdity less apparent.

By statute of 6 Geo. II. c. 14, passed two years after the last-mentioned statute, the use of technical words was allowed to continue in the usual language, which defeated almost every beneficial purpose of the former statute. In changing from one language to another, many words and technical expressions were retained in the new, which belonged to the more ancient language; and not seldom the parties were misled. The unlearned student, having an air of confidence and disfigurement of the language of the law. It has rendered essential, also, the study of the Latin and French languages. This, perhaps, is not to be regretted, as they are the keys which open to the ardent student vast stores of knowledge. In the United States, the records, pleadings, and all law proceedings are in the English language, except certain technical terms which retain their ancient French and Latin dress. 3 Bla. Com. 317.

From the Conquest until 1731, says Prof. F. W. Matland, the solemost language of the law was Latin, and even in the thirteenth century, though English was the language in which the laws were published and causes pleaded, Latin was the language in which the kings made grants of land. In the learned men of both races could write and speak in Latin. French was then little more than a vulgar dialect of Latin, and the language in which the people could not write anything. The Conqueror used both Latin and English in his laws, charters, and rights, but Latin soon got the upper hand and became for a while the one written language of the law. In Chancery there was nothing but Latin, and the judgments of the courts were in that language. This continued until 1731. Meantime in the twelfth or early in the thirteenth century, ordinances and statutes written in French began to appear. Under Edward I. French became the language in which laws were published and law books written and continued to be the genuine language of the books until the end of the middle ages. Under Henry VII. English became the speech in which English lawyers addressed their subjects. As the oral speech of litigants and their advisers, French prevailed from the Conquest onwards, but in the local courts a great deal of English must have been spoken. The jurisdiction of a French-speaking court became the common law, the measure of all rights and duties, and was carried throughout the land by the journeying justices. In the thirteenth century French was used in pleading and the professional lawyers wrote and spoke in French. In 1384 a statute endeavored to make English instead of French the spoken language of the law courts, but law writing was still in French. Gradually in the sixteenth century the lawyers began to write in English, though many French law terms still continued to be used; 1 Soc. Eng. 278; and see 1 Poll. & Matl. 56.

The effect of the Norman conquest of England is still apparent in the technical legal words in ordinary use. "At the present day," says a recent writer, "it would hardly be too much to say that all our words having a legal import are in a certain sense French words. A German jurist is able to expound the doctrines of Roman law in genuinely German words. On many a theme an English man of letters may by way of exploit write a paragraph or a page and use no word that is not in every sense a genuinely English word; but an English lawyer who attempted a similar puritanical feat would find himself doomed to silence. . . . It is worthy of remark that within the sphere of public law we have some old terms that have come down to us from unconquered England. Earl was not displaced by count, sheriff by viscount, our king, our queen, our lords, our knights of the shire are English; our aldermen are English if our mayors are French; but our parliament and its statutes, our privy council and its ordinances, our peers, our barons, our monarch, the sovereign, the state, the nation, the people are French; our citizens are French and our burgesses are more French than English. So too a few of the very common legal transactions of daily life can be described by English verbs. A man may give, sell, or let, hire, borrow, bequeath, take a rent, a will, a bond, and even be guilty of manslaughter or of theft, and all this is English. But this is a small matter. . . . Let us look elsewhere and observe how widely and deeply the French influence has worked. Contract, agreement, covenant, obligation, debt, condition, bill, note, master, servant, partner, guarantee, tort, trespass, assault, battery, slander, damage, crime, treason, felony, misdemeanor, arson, robbery, burglary, larceny, property, possession, pledge, lien, payment, money, grant, purchase, devise, descent, heir, easement, marriage, guardian, all are French. We enter a court of justice; court, justices, judges, jurors, counsel, attorneys, clerks, parties, plaintiff, defendant, action, suit, claim, demand, indictment, count, declaration, pleadings, evidence, verdict, conviction, judgment, sentence, appeal, every one and every thing, save the witnesses, writs and oaths, have French names. In the province of justice and police with its fines, its gaols, and its prisons, its constables, its arrests, we must, now that outlawry is a thing of the past, go as far as the gallows if we would find an English institution. Right and wrong we have kept, and though we have received droit we have rejected droit but even law probably owes its salvation to its remote cousin the French loi." 1 Poll. & Matl. 58.

Agreements, contracts, wills, and other instruments may be made in any language, and will be enforced. Bac. Abr. Wills (D 1). An English court, having to construe a contract made in a foreign country and foreign language, must obtain a translation of the instrument and an explanation of the terms of art, if any; 10 H. L. C. 624. And a slander spoken in a foreign language, if understood by those present, or a libel published in such language, will be punished as if spoken or written in the English language; Newell, Def. Sland. & L. 231; Bac. Abr. Slander (D 3); 1 Rolle, Abr. 74; 6 Term 163. See FOREIGN LANGUAGES. For the construction of language, see articles CONSTRUCTION; INTERPRETATION; Jacob, Intr. to the Com. Law Max. 46.

At an early period, the Latin was the diplomatic language in use in Europe. Towards the end of the fifteenth century that of Spain gained the ascendancy, in consequence of the great influence which that country then exercised in Europe. The French, since the age of Louis XIV., has become the almost universal diplomatic idiom of the civilized world; though some states use their national language in treaties and diplomatic correspondence. It is usual in these cases to annex to the papers transmitted a translation in the language of the opposite party, wherever it is understood this comity will be reciprocated. This is the usage of the Germanic Confederation, of Spain, and of the Italian courts. When nations using a common language, as the United States and Great Britain, treat with each other, such language is used in their diplomatic intercourse.

It is believed that the first departure from the rule that the French language should be used in all diplomatic conferences and congresses was in the Berlin conference of 1899, held between the representatives of Germany, Great Britain, and the United States, with reference to the affairs of Samoa. As appears by a protocol of the first session, the proposal was made by the representatives of the United States, and assented to by those of Germany and Great Britain, that the proceedings of the conference should be conducted in the English language. The president of the conference, however, though a German, reserved to himself the right to use the French language at any time if he should find difficulty in expressing himself satisfactorily in the English, but he did not find it necessary to avail himself of that right. Accordingly, the protocols of the first of these sittings were in French, and after that in English.

LANNIS MANUS. A lord of the manor. English.

LANO NIGER. A sort of base coin, formerly current in England. Cow.

LANZAS. In Spanish Law. A certain contribution in money paid by the grantees and other high officers in lieu of the soldiers they ought to furnish government in time of war.

LAPIDATION. The act of stoning a person to death. Webster.

LAPSE. In Ecclesiastical Law. The transfer, by forfeiture, of a right to present or collate to a vacant benefice from a person vested with such right to another in consequence of some act of negligence by the former. Ayl. Par. 331.

Upon six months' neglect of the patron, the right lapses to the bishop; upon six months' neglect of bishop, to archbishop; upon six months' neglect, to king. The day on which the vacancy occurs is not counted, and the six months are calculated as a half-year. 2 Burn, Ec. L. 335.

To glide; to pass slowly, silently, or by degrees. To slip; to deviate from the proper path. Webster, Dict. See LAPSED DEVISE; LAPSED LEGACY.

LAPSE PATENT. A patent issued to a petitioner for land. A patent for which land to another party has lapsed through neglect of patentee. The lapse patent relates to date of original patent, and makes void all mesne conveyances. 1 Wash. Va. 39. See LAND PATENT.

LAPSED DEVISE. A devise which has lapsed, or does not take effect because of the death of the devisee before that of the testator.

The subject-matter of the lapsed devise will, if no contrary intention appear, be included in the residuary clause (if any) contained in the will. In England, by stat. 1 Vict. c. 26, §§ 25, 26, 32, 33, if the devise be to children or other issue of the devisor, and the issue of the devisee be alive, the devise will not lapse, if no such intention appear in the will. A devise always lapses at common law if the devisee dies before the testator, and such was the general rule in this country; 37 N. Y. 54; 2 Yates 523; but in many if not all the states, if made to a son or grandson of the testator, it takes effect, by force of statute, in favor of his heirs, if he die before the testator. In North Carolina, a devise to a child dying before the testator does not lapse, but goes to the issue of such child; 107 N. C. 507; so in Massachusetts, in the case of a devise to a child or other relative; 3 Washb. R. P. *523; 101 Mass. 38.

In Maryland, the provision against lapse goes much further, and it is provided that no devise or bequest shall fail by reason of the death of the devisee or legatee before the testator, and it takes effect in like manner as if they had survived him; 6 Har. & J. 54. See 1 Jarm. Wills, 6th Am. ed. *307, n.; 4 Kent 541. In regard to a lapsed devise where the devisee dies during the life of the testator, the heir of the devisee will not take; 1 Dana 201; but the estate will go to the testator's heir, notwithstanding a residuary devise. But if the devise be void, as where the devisee is dead at the date of the will, or is made upon a condition precedent which never happens, the estate will go to the residuary devisee, if the words are sufficiently comprehensive; 2 Vern. 394; 15 Ves. 589; 3 Whart. 477; 1 Harring. 524; 4 Kent 541. But some of the courts hold in that case even, that the estate goes to the heir; 6 Conn. 292; 3 Jones, Eq. 141; 4 Ired. Eq. 320; 13 Md. 415, where it was said that there was no solid distinction between a lapsed and a void devise, and that in both cases the heir at law should take, and not the residuary devisee.

When the devise is to the person deceased, with such words as "and his heirs" added, they are generally held to be words of limitation, and not of description. So a devise of the proceeds of land to three persons, one-third to each, and to "their heirs respectively for ever," lapsed on the death of one as to his share, the word heirs designating the estate, not the takers; 36 W. N. C. Pa. 347; so where a residuary devise was to two persons, "their heirs and assigns"; 163 Mass. 448. The rule that devises lapse by the death of the devisee is not changed by adding to the devise the words "to have and to hold the same to them, their heirs and assigns for ever"; 118 N. Y. 396. And where land was devised to a daughter for life and then to be "equally divided among the lawful heirs of" another daughter, it was held that the word heirs must be taken in a technical sense, and as the last mentioned daughter was alive at the death of the first, the devise to the heirs lapsed; 1 Rich. Eq. 396.

In case of gifts to a class, the rule is that there is no lapse, but they go to the other members of the class; Theobald, Wills 643. It is, however, held that the gift is not to a class if the members of the class are named; 11 Sim. 397; 2 J. & H. 656; nor if to "five daughters of A" or "my nine children"; 9 Ch. D. 117; 15 Ch. D. 84; and where the residue was given to sons named, there being nothing to show that testator intended otherwise, they took as individuals and not as a class, and the share of the son who died before his father's death lapsed, and passed as intestate real estate; 15 R. I. 138. See LAPSED LEGACY.

In case of a devise to two as joint tenants, if one die before the testator, where survivorship in a joint tenancy has been abolished, his share has been held to fall in the residue; Wins. Eq. 89. Where land was devised to a son who was also appointed executor, and he died and the testator by codicil appointed another executor, referring to the death of his son, it was held that the devise did not lapse, and should be construed as a devise to the son's heirs; 6 Dana 51.

A devise to one for life with a remainder does not lapse by the death of the first taker before that of the remainderman; 15 Ark. 683. The refusal or incapacity of the first taker of a devise or legacy to several in succession does not cause it to lapse, but it passes to the next; 28 N. H. 459; 43 id. 17. If one is appointed by will to take in case of the death of the first devisee, and on that event, the appointee can take as contemplated by the will, there will be no lapse, although the devisee dies before the testator, but the ulterior gift will take effect immediately on testator's decease as a direct unconditional gift; 14 B. Mon. 333.

A devise in trust for a son, and "in the event of the son dying childless" then over, lapsed by the death of the son in the lifetime of the testatrix, and the devise over did not take effect; 152 Mass. 24.

A devise made to a wife for life, with remainder to the daughter, and with power to the wife to sell and invest the proceeds for the benefit of the daughter, does not lapse during the lifetime of the wife, being for the benefit of the latter as well as the former; 142 N. Y. 160.

In England, by the Wills Act § 32, a devise of an estate tail does not lapse, if at the death of the testator there is any issue who would inherit under the entail, and it was held that the section applies to a gift to a child dead at the date of will; 2 Sm. & G. 396.

With a single important exception, the same principles apply to devises and legacies with respect to lapse, and as to that difference, and also for other cases on the subject, see LAPSED LEGACY.

LAPSED LEGACY. A legacy which, on account of the death of the legatee before the period arrives for the payment of the legacy, lapses or deviates from the course prescribed by the testator, and falls into the residuum. 1 Wms. Ex., 7th Am. ed. *1071; 10 S. & R. 851.

A legacy which has never vested or taken effect; one which, originally valid, afterwards fails, because the capacity or willingness of the donee to take has ceased to exist before he obtained a vested interest in the gift. 128 N. Y. 615.

A distinction exists between a lapsed devise and a lapsed legacy. A devise which lapses does not fall into the residue unless so provided by the will, but descends to the heir at law; on the contrary, personal property passes by the residuary clause, where it is not otherwise disposed of; Beach, Wills 318; 2 Bouv. Inst. 2168, 2116; 15 Ves. 709; 2 Mer. 393; 8 Whart. 477. See LAPSED DEVISE.

A lapsed legacy passes by a general residuary clause; 27 Abb. N. C. 437; so also did a legacy which lapsed because it was void; 63 Hun 352. A lapsed or void legacy goes to the residuary legatee unless an intention to the contrary clearly appear; 1 Sm. & M. 589; 8 Edw. Ch. 79; 2 Tayl. 315; 3 Root 487.

The reason assigned for this difference is that a bequest of personal property refers to the state of the property at the time of the death of the testator, and that a devise operates only on land of which the testator was seized when he made his will; and it is not to be presumed he intended to devise by a residuary clause, a contingency which he could not have foreseen, nor to embrace in it lands contained in a lapsed devise; 1 Dana 207; Willes 293; 6 Conn. 292; 3 Harr. & McH. 333. "How far the alteration of the law of those states where after-acquired lands may be devised will destroy this distinction, it is difficult to say." 1 Bouv. Inst. 2150.

The Pennsylvania act of 1879, June 4, P. L. 88, made the law respecting the devolution of a lapsed devise the same as that of a lapsed legacy, but it was held that this applied only to lapsed specific devises in the body of the will, and that as to lapsed shares of the residue no change was intended; 15 W. N. C. Pa. 417. And the same provision exists, except where the will requires a different construction, in Virginia, North Carolina, West Virginia; but in the last state, if there is no residuary devisee, it goes to the heir at law.

The common-law distinction between lapsed devises and lapsed legacies with reference to falling into the residuum has been abrogated by statute in New York, and lapsed devises as well as lapsed legacies fall into the residuum; 152 N. Y. 475.

In Kentucky, in case of lapse, neither real nor personal property passes as part of the residue, but both are intestate property, unless the contrary intention appear in the will.

Where a testator gave a share of his residuary personal estate to his widow who took under the will, and another share to a daughter who died before him without issue, it was held that the testator died intestate as to the share given to the daughter, and that the widow was entitled to one-third of it under the intestate laws; 82 Pa. 423.

Where the rent of a house was given for life to testator's daughter, and at her death to be sold, the proceeds to go to her children when twenty-one years of age, and the income meanwhile to be applied to their maintenance, it was held that the legacy to the children was vested, and on their death in the lifetime of the mother there was no lapse, but the property vested in the life-tenant in fee as the heir of her children as against the heir at law of the original testator; 19 Wall. 167, reversing 7 D. C. 226.

If a legacy is payable out of real estate in consequence of a deficiency of personal property, it will go to the heir at law in case of lapse, and if the personal estate is sufficient to pay debts and legacies, it will go to the residuary legatee; 9 Paige 84. A legacy to one for life with remainder to another does not lapse upon the death of the first taker during the testator's life; 4 Desaus. 803; 8 Ired. Eq. 581. If a legacy is payable out of a particular debt due the testator, it does not fail on failure of payment of the debt; 6 Watts 473.

Unless the legatee survive the testator, as a rule neither he nor his representatives have any claim to the legacy; 2 W. & S. 450; 18 Pick. 41; 4 Strobb. Eq. 179; 64 Me. 388; 62 Conn. 140; and the same rule applies where a legacy is given to a man and his executors, etc.; 1 P. Wms. 83; 3 Bro. C. C. 128; 108 Mass. 382; 89 Conn. 219; though the testator may expressly provide otherwise; 1 Bro. C. C. 84; L. R. 14 Eq. 843. A declaration that a legacy shall not lapse is not sufficient to prevent it unless the intention is clear that it shall go to the estate of the legatee; 3 Ves. 403; 4 Beav. 818; 27 id. 418; 4 D. M. & G. 633; but gifts to A and his executors and administrators with the direction that it shall not lapse is sufficient; 2 Atk. 572. A direction that a legacy should vest on the date of the will is not sufficient to prevent lapse; 14 Eq. 843. From a devise of the remainder of an estate in distinct parcels there arises an inference that the testator did not intend that lapsed legacies should fall into the residue; 24 Ga. 84.

A gift to A, and in case of his death to his executors and administrators, will go to A's executors in the event of his death before the testator; 64 L. J. Ch. 648, affg 83 W. R. 516 and overruling 1 Myl. & K. 470.

Where a testator bequeathed his estate to several legatees, and having learned of their death, interlined in his will between the words "as follows" and the list of the legatees the words "or to their heirs," and after the names added words signifying their decease and republished the will, the legacies did not lapse; 154 Pa. 528, distinguishing 2 Rawle 28 and 104 Pa. 342. Where a legacy was given to one in trust for his wife, the income for her life, with power of appointment by will, and in default thereof "it shall be equally divided among my children or their legal representatives," the words legal representatives meant executors and administrators, and not next of kin, and the legacy to any child who died without issue in the lifetime of the testator lapsed; 1 Ohio N. P. 314. A bequest of personal property to one and "heirs and assigns" are words of limitation, and the legacy lapsed on the death of the legatee before that of the testator; 159 Mass. 280; so also to one and "his heirs"; 27 Abb. N. C. 437.

Where a legacy is given to a class it is generally held that the death of one of the class before the testator does not create a lapse, but simply reduces the number of the class; 2 Bradf. 172; in such a case, when one in whom the right is vested dies before distribution, his interest goes to his representatives; 2 Dev. & B. L. 125; 3 Metc. (Ky.) 463. See LAPSED DEVISE.

Where a residue was devised in trust for four sons, the intention was clear that their enjoyment was to be several and not joint, and the share of one who died before the testator was held not to go to the survivors, but to be disposed of as intestate real estate; 5 Allen 249; but where an estate was bequeathed to all the children in a family by name, the tenor of the whole will indicating that they were intended to take as a class, the share of one who died without issue before the testator went to the survivors; 14 id. 528. It was early provided by statute in Alabama that the death of a devisee or legatee, leaving a descendant, before the testator, should not cause a lapse, but the gift would vest in the descendant; 37 Ala. 646.

Under a Maine statute making an adopted child the same as a lawful child, such child is a lineal descendant of its adopting parents within the meaning of the statute to prevent the lapse of legacies to such descendants; 84 Me. 483.

Where there was a legacy to executors in trust for a person for life, afterwards to be divided into four equal parts for four named residuary legatees, the title to the residue vested subject to the trust estate, and the share of a residuary legatee did not lapse on his death before the time of distribution; 140 N. Y. 132.

Where separate sums are bequeathed to two named persons who take also the residuary estate, no intention appearing on the will to make them joint tenants, the separate estate and the share of the residue of the one who died before the testator were held to lapse; 84 Me. 386.

Where property is bequeathed to collateral relatives named, shares of those who died during the lifetime of the testator lapse; 62 Conn. 140.

The doctrine of lapse applies to an appointment by will; 2 Ves. Sen. 61; L. R. 3 Eq. 658; 47 L. J. Ch. 65; or an appointment under a covenant; 3 Ch. 183; or a gift to a debtor of his debt, whether the debt be given or forgiven; 1 P. Wms. 83; 3 Ves. 231; 2 Pr. 84.

If there is a gift to a charitable society by name and it has existed, but at the time of the testator's death has ceased to do so, the legacy fails; 1 Drew 642; 29 Ch. Div. 560; [1895] 1 Ch. 19. If the charity existed at the death of the testator and expired before administration of the estate, the cy pres doctrine is applied; 5 Russ. 113; [1891] 2 Ch. 236. A gift for a clearly defined and particular charitable use will fail if the subject becomes impossible; 1 Myl. & C. 123; 58 L. T. 147; and see as to the limits of the doctrine, L. R. 6 P. C. 96; 35 Ch. 460; 58 L. T. 588. See, generally, as to failure of charitable bequests, Theobald, Wills 304; and see CHARITABLE USE.

By the English law a residuary bequest operates upon all the personal estate which the testator is possessed of at the time of his death, and will include such as would have gone to pay specific legacies which lapse or are void; 4 Ves. Jr. 708, 732; 4 Paige 115; 4 Hawks 215; 1 Dana 206; 1 D. & B. Eq. 115; 82 Pa. 428; 1 Jarm. Wills. 6th Am. ed. *716.

LARBOARD. The left side of a ship or boat when one stands with his face towards the bow. The opposite term is starboard, which is the right-hand side looking forward. The word is now, however, no longer used, the term port having been substituted for it. The change was made by order of the English admiralty, for the very obvious reason that larboard was apt to be confused with the opposite term.

LARCENOUS. Thieving; pertaining to, characterized by, or tainted with, larceny; as a larcenous taking.

Larcenous purpose, an intention to commit larceny. See LARCENY.

LARCENY. The felonious taking of the property of another without his consent and against his will, with the intent to convert it to the use of the taker. 2 Leach 1089.

The felonious taking and carrying away of the personal goods of another. 4 Bla. Com. 299.

The appropriation, either to the use of the taker or to that of any other person, of money or personal property with intent to deprive or defraud the true owner of its use and benefit, or the withholding or secreting of the same. 71 Hun 72.

The wrongful and fraudulent taking and carrying away by one person of the mere personal goods of another from any place, with a felonious intent to convert them to his, the taker's, use, and make them his property without the consent of the owner. 2 East, Pl. Cr. 553; 4 Wash. C. C. 700; 37 Mo. 463.

This definition was criticised by Parke, B., who said: "Perhaps this was the more accurate definition; but it needed some addition; the taking should be not only wrongful and fraudulent, but also 'without any color of right.'" 1 Den. C. C. 370; but the words "felonious intent" are considered by an authoritative text writer to exclude any color of right; 2 Russ. Cr. 9th Am. ed. 146.

That this offence is the most technical in its distinctions of all the common-law felonies is, perhaps, to be found in the fact that inasmuch as the higher grade of the offence was, until Blackstone's time, punishable capitally, the courts were inclined to find technical reasons to avoid the infliction of that penalty for mere wrong done with reference to the property. By reason of the depreciation of money and the consequent appreciation of the money value of property which took place within two centuries and a half after the passage of the Statute of Westminster I, (A.D. 1275), ch. 15; which made grand larceny to consist of the stealing of property above the value of twelve pence, cases of larceny became capital which would not have been such at the time the statute was passed; and therefore Lord Coke suggests that the valuation of property in determining whether the offence was grand larceny ought to be reasonable; 1 McClain, Cr. L. § 584.

Larceny was formerly in England, and still is, perhaps, in some states, divided into grand and petty larceny, according as the value of the property taken was great or small; 2 East, Pl. Cr. 736; 3 B. & C. 187; 3 Hill, N. Y. 595; 1 Hawks 468; 8 Blackf. 498. In England this distinction is now abolished, by 7 & 8 Geo. IV. c. 36, § 2; and the same is true of many of the United States, although in some a difference is made, similar in theory, between cases where the amount stolen is more and where it is less than one hundred dollars or some fixed sum.

Compound larceny is larceny under circumstances which, in view of the law, aggravate the crime. The law in relation to this branch of larceny is to a great extent statutory.

The property of the owner may be either general; 2 Den. Cr. Cas. 449; or special; 10 Wend. 165; 14 Mass. 217; 13 Ala. N. S. 158; 21 Me. 14; 8 Tex. 115; 4 Harring. 570; 6 Hill 144; 9 C. & P. 44.

There must be an actual removal of the article; 1 Leach 238, n. 320; 7 C. & P. 553; 9 Yerg. 196; 63 Miss. 58; and at least a temporary possession in the thief; 94 Ala. 534; 65 N. C. 305; 38 Mo. 354; 35 Ga. 207; 16 Tex. App. 435; 64 Miss. 77; 71 Hun 72; 75 Cal. 383; but the having the property under control even for a short space of time is sufficient, though it is abandoned before being effectually appropriated by the wrong-doer; 106 N. C. 784; 22 W. Va. 779; 1 Moody 14; 20 Ohio St. 508; 30 Mo. 92; 88 id. 354. The taking and carrying away may be committed by setting in motion an agency, innocent or otherwise, by which the property is asported from the possession of the owner to that of the thief or his accomplice; 123 Mass. 390; 4 Allen 308; 11 Q. B. D. 21; 2 C. & B. 423; 45 La. 678.

A person who is seen to thrust his hand into the pocket of another and withdraw it empty can be convicted of an attempt to commit larceny, even though the pocket is empty; 123 N. Y. 54, reversing 7 N. Y. S. 582. See ATTEMPT.

The mere unlawful taking and carrying away of the property of another is not larceny unless it is done with criminal intent or animo furandi; 44 Ala. 396; 55 Ill. 884; 106 Mo. 611; 84 Neb. 250; 24 Tex. App. 383; 95 Cal. 227; but see 38 S. C. 848. The question whether the goods were taken animo furandi is one of fact for the jury; [1895] 3 Q. B. 484. If the taking is under a bona fide claim of right, there can be no larceny; 4 Col. 182; as where the purpose of taking is to test a right; 2 Doug. 517; or to protect one's own property; 4 B. & S. 169; 9 Tex. App. 164. One is not guilty of larceny in selling an article under the belief that it is his own property, though it belong to another; 41 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 606. See 11 Fla. 295; 47 La. 694; 63 Miss. 106; or in taking property in the belief that he has a right so to do; 25 Tex. App. 833; 79 Ga. 564; 25 Neb. 444; 24 Fla. 833; but the belief of ownership of right which will constitute a defence must be an honest belief and not a mere impression or pretence; 8 Ia. 540; 9 Tex. App. 70; 90 N. C. 596; 77 Ala. 71. Secrecy is not such an essential accompaniment of larceny that an attempt to conceal the taking must be shown; 114 N. C. 780; 103 id. 424.

An intent to convert to the thief's own use is not necessary; all that is required is the intent to deprive the owner of his property; 28 Cal. 380; 17 Tex. 521; 4 Dutch. 23; 35 Miss. 214; 10 Gratt. 758; 14 Ind. 86; but see 1 McAll. 196, where the accused took and carried away muskets to prevent others from using them against himself and his friends, and it was held larceny.

It is not an essential element of the crime that the taking should be lucri causa, for the sake of gain; 35 W. Va. 78.

The property must be of some value, though but slight; 4 Rich. 356; 3 Harring. 563; 7 Metc. 475. See 8 Pa. 260; 6 Johns. 103; 9 C. & P. 347; 39 Ill. 233; 90 Fla. 841; 68 Mo. 96; but the fact that the thief treated the property as of value will amount to proof of such value by inference; 61 N. C. 127; 8 Heisk. 120; 13 Ark. 66. An intrinsic value whatever is sufficient; 1 Bailey 280; 14 Gray 576; and it is not necessary that the value should be of some particular coin; 75 Va. 909.

There must be a taking against the consent of the owner; 8 C. & P. 291; 1 Den. Cr. Cas. 881; 9 Yerg. 196; 20 Ala. n. s. 438; 1 Rich. 30; 9 N. & M.C. 174; Core, N. J. 439; 106 Mo. 635; 36 Kan. 416; 18 Tex. App. 358; and the taking will not be larceny if consent be given, though obtained by fraud; 15 S. & R. 93; 9 C. & P. 741; 7 Cox, Cr. Cas. 289; but see 85 Ala. 17. But where one retains money paid by mistake, it is larceny, for the consent of the owner in parting with his property was only apparent, not real; 8 Ore. 394; 8 O. 81 Am. Rep. 590; 6 Hun 121.

Whenever the defendant can be regarded in the light of the servant or agent of the owner, he is guilty of larceny; 1 Den. 120; Whart. Cr. Law, 9th ed. §§ 966-970; 86 Ala. 64; 94 Cal. 573. Where a master paid his servant a £10 note, thinking it was a £1 note, and the servant took it innocently, but afterwards discovered the mistake and made up his mind to appropriate the note, it was held by a divided court that this was not larceny; [1895] 3 I. R. 709.

By stat. 24 and 25 Vict. c. 96, a bailee who fraudulently converts the property entrusted to him to his own use is guilty of larceny; Cox & Saunders, Cr. L. 26. The possession of the bailee is the possession of the owner, and a larceny thereof from the former is a larceny from the owner; 101 Mo. 316. When the possession of an article is entrusted to a person, who carries it away and appropriates it, this is no larceny; 4 C. & P. 545; 1 Pick. 375; 20 Ala. n. s. 428; 17 N. Y. 114; see 2 M'Mull. 382; 4 Mo. 461; 33 Me. 197; 11 Cush. 488; 18 Gratt. 803; 11 Tex. 769; but when the custody merely is parted with, such misappropriation is a larceny; 6 T. B. Monr. 180; 1 Den. 120; 11 Q. B. 929. One who obtains possession of property by fraud, from one who intends to retain the ownership, and subsequently carries it away, is guilty of larceny, though he would not be if he obtained both possession and ownership by fraud; 49 La. Ann. 1887. The crime of larceny may be committed by a finder of lost money or goods, who, knowing or having reason to know who is the owner of the same, instead of restoring them to him, conceals or fraudulently appropriates them to his own use; 6 Houst. 46; 87 Va. 554. See 116 Mass. 42; 28 Minn. 104; 16 Tex. App. 122. Abandoned property having no owner cannot be the subject of larceny; 6 Sawy. 640; 36 Tex. 375; 43 id. 650. See FINDER.

The decisions have not been entirely uniform as to whether the fraudulent retention of money delivered to be changed is larceny. It has been held in England not to be so, but here the contrary view has been taken; 56 N. Y. 894; 25 Minn. 66; 8 C. 38 Am. Rep. 453, n. See 9 C. & P. 741; 11 Cox, Cr. Cas. 82.

The taking must be in the county where the criminal is to be tried; 9 C. & P. 29. But when the taking has been in the county or state, and the thief is caught with the stolen property in another county than that where the theft was committed, he may be tried in the county where arrested with the goods; as, by construction of law, there is a fresh taking in every county in which the thief carries the stolen property; 7 Metc. 175; 43 La. Ann. 228; 48 Ill. 397; 76 Mo. 286; and the circuit court of the latter county has jurisdiction of the offence; 15 S. W. Rep. (Ky.) 861. One who steals property in a foreign country, and brings it into this, is guilty of larceny here, on the ground that as the legal possession remains in the owner when the first taking is felonious, every exportation of the property is a fresh taking; and on a prosecution for such an offence the courts will presume that the laws of the foreign country are the same as our own, and that the original taking there was criminal, upon proofs of acts which would make it criminal here; 88 Atl. Rep. (Vt.) 1070. Whether an indictment for larceny can be supported where the goods were proved to have been originally stolen in another state, and brought thence into the state where the indictment was found, is a point on which the decisions are contradictory. Where property was stolen in one of the British Provinces and brought by the thief into Massachusetts, it was held not larceny there; 8 Gray 484. See contra, 11 Vt. 650.

The property must be personal, and there can be no larceny of things fixed to the soil; 1 Hale, P. C. 510; but as the taking and carrying away would necessarily terminate the character of the property as realty even if it were such, the important point of this distinction is that if the severance from the realty of anything which is a part thereof, or annexed thereto, as to go with the realty by descent, or in case a conveyance is made by the wrongdoer himself, so that the taking and carrying away is a continuous act, the offence is not larceny, because the taking and carrying away is not of the personal property of another, that which was severed not having been in his possession as a chattel, but only as the portion of a realty; and one which has not been mined or otherwise severed, so as to convert it into a chattel, is not the subject of larceny; 64 N. C. 619; 8 Nev. 262; nor is water or ice, unless the ice is cut or stored in an ice-house; 6 Hill 144; 33 Ind. 402; or the water is pumped into supply pipes; 11 Q. B. D. 21; sea-weed lying ungathered on the shore is part of the realty and not the subject of larceny; 4 Ir. R. C. L. 6 (but see 106 Pa. 400, where waste coal was carried upon land by a stream and deposited there and the appropriator was held guilty of larceny). It is not larceny to detach any portion of a building and carry it away; 5 Harr. 492; 14 Bush 31; 23 La. Ann. 77; 96 Ala. 44; 8 Taunt. 48; but the courts have expressed their disapproval of a doctrine so technical even while compelled to follow it; 35 Cal. 671; and in many cases of constructive annexation have held the taking and carrying away to be larceny, such as window sashes not permanently annexed to the building; 1 Leach 20; chandeliers; 14 Bush 31; doors taken from their hinges; 34 Tex. 155; rails in a fence; 4 Tex. App. 26; belts belonging to a mill; 11 Ohio St. 104; valves in a portable pump; 96 Ala. 44; the key of a door; 5 Blackf. 417; 1 McClain, Cr. L. § 536.

If once severed by the owner, a third person, or the thief himself, as a separate transaction, any part of the realty becomes the subject of larceny; Cl. Cr. L. 245; 11 Ired. 70; 3 Hill, N. Y. 395; 7 Taunt. 188. The common-law rule has been modified from time to time in England, so as to afford protection to things fixed to the freehold. The rule was never satisfactory, and the courts in modern times have been inclined to confine it within the narrowest limits; 80 Am. Rep. 159, n.; 8 C. 4 Tex. Ct. App. 26; 11 Ohio 104. At common law there can be no larceny of animals, in which there is neither an absolute nor a qualified property, as beasts feræ naturæ; 1 Greene 106; 7 Johns. 16; 1 C. & K. 494; 9 Pick. 15; 78 N. C. 481; but otherwise of animals reclaimed or confined, as deer, or rabbits in a park, fish in a tank, pheasants, etc., in a mew; 65 N. C. 815; all valuable domestic animals, and all animals domitæ naturæ, which serve for food. But all other animals which do not serve for food, as dogs, unless taxed, are not subjects of larceny. But oysters, when planted for use, are so, as is the flesh of dead animals; 1 Whart. Cr. Law § 864. But under statute in some of the states there may be a larceny of dogs, and actions may be maintained for injury to them; 4 Parker, C. C. 386; 27 Ala. 480; 11 Kan. 480; 8 C. 15 Am. Rep. n.; 84 Ky. 681; a horse is a subject of larceny, although at the time he has been removed or strayed from the premises of his owner; 88 Ala. 86. By statutes passed in 1897, stealing electric currents from wires is made a crime in Connecticut, Montana, New Jersey, Tennessee, and Washington.

See Hale; Hawkins, Pleas of the Crown; Wharton; Bishop; Gabbett; Clarke; McClain, Criminal Law; Roscoe, Criminal Evidence; 14 Crim. Law Mag. 705; 2 Alb. L. J. 191; 6 Harv. Law Rev. 244; Russell, Crimes.

LARCENY AND EMBEZZLEMENT. The terms "larceny" and "embezzlement" in a bond or policy sued on are used as generic terms to indicate the dishonest and fraudulent breach of any duty, or obligation, upon the part of an employee to pay over to his employer, or account to him for any money, securities or other personal property, the title to which is in the employer, that may in any manner come into the possession of the employee. 115 Ky. 863, 75 S. W. 197.

LARD. The clarified semi-solid oil of hog's fat. Cent. Dict. The pure fat of healthy swine. 81 La. 642.

An act making a regulation for the sale of lard by which the public may know by inspection of the package the ingredients used in its preparation is not an unwarranted interference with trade and does not violate the constitutional provisions as to due process of law; id. See HEALTH.

LARDING MONEY. A small yearly rent paid by the tenants in the manor of Bradford in Wilts, for liberty to feed their hogs with the masts (acorns) of the lord's wood. Also a commutation for some customary service in connection with the word larder as carrying salt or meat. Whart. Lex.

LARGE (L. Fr.). Broad; having much size; complete; ample; at large, free from restraint or confinement; at liberty. It was formerly written at his large.

LARGE NUMBER. The expression "a large number of voters," means any number that the draftsman may have upon his mind, viz., ten, a hundred, etc., but it does not mean a majority of the legal votes cast. 93 Ky. 223.

LAS PARTIDAS. The name of a code of Spanish law. It is sometimes called las siete partidas, or the seven parts, from the number of its principal divisions. It is a compilation of the civil law, the customary law of Spain, and the canon law. It was compiled by four Spanish juriconsults, by the direction of Alfonso X., A. D. 1250, and published in Castile in 1263, but first promulgated as the law by Alfonso XI., A. D. 1348. The maritime law contained in it is given in vol. 6 of Pardes. Col. of Mar. Law. He follows the editions of 1807, at Paris. It has been translated into English. Such of its provisions as are applicable are in force in Florida, Louisiana, and Texas. 1 Bla. Com. 66; 1 White, Rees 354.

LASCIVIOUS COHABITATION. A term including those wanton acts between persons of different sexes, who are not married to each other, that flow from the exercise of lustful passions, and which are not otherwise punished as crimes against chastity and public decency. 2 Swift, Dig. 343; 2 Swift, Syst. 331. It includes, also, indecent acts by one against the will of another. 5 Day 81.

LASCIVIOUS COHABITATION. The act or state of a man and woman, not married, who dwell together in the same house, behaving themselves as man and wife.

In statutes forbidding unlawful cohabitation that term involves the ideas of habitual sexual intercourse, or living together in such a way as to hold out the appearance of being husband and wife, and it is the scandal resulting therefrom which constitutes the mischief against which the statutes are directed; 28 Fla. 389; and proof of occasional acts of illicit intercourse is not sufficient; 82 Va. 115; 43 W. Va. 215; 8 So. Rep. (Miss.) 287; but it has been held that such occasional acts may constitute the offence, unless there was no intention of continuing the intercourse, as desire and opportunity might arise; 18 So. Rep. (Ala.) 941. To constitute the offence there must be both lewd and lascivious intercourse and living together; 80 Va. 30; 98 Fla. 735; though it is said that there need not be actual assertion of the existence of marriage; 87 Miss. 132; 82 Ark. 187; and where the dwelling together is a lawful relation, as that of master and servant, the offence is not established; 39 Mo. App. 873. It is not sustained by evidence of acts of secret adultery or mere familiarity; 49 Mo. App. 823; nor where a man and woman stopped for one night only at a house and assumed marital relations; 60 Ark. 259; 10 Mass. 153; 56 Mo. 147; but it is said that it is not necessary that the cohabitation should be notorious; 2 Humph. 414. General reputation in the neighborhood is not admissible to prove the fact of cohabitation; 3 How. 338. Whether the facts proved constituted a living together in such relation is a question for the jury; 28 Fla. 735.

There must be averment and proof of habitual sexual intercourse which is the gist of the offence; 69 Miss. 393. In Massachusetts, the words "abide and cohabit" are sufficient where the statute used the word "associated"; 159 Mass. 61. An indictment alleging fornication and adultery, and that the parties lived together and were not married, was held sufficient, the language of the statute that they should "lewdly and lasciviously associate" being implied; 108 N. C. 774. The offence may be proved by admission made out of court, and proved by two witnesses; 6 Utah 381. Evidence of previous lascivious cohabitation is sometimes admitted in support of other crimes, as on prosecution for incest; 96 Mich. 449; 102 Cal. 229; 32 Tex. Cr. R. 86. It is not essential in a prosecution against one to prove that both parties had a guilty intent; 109 N. C. 764. When the charge is of such cohabitation of a married man with an unmarried woman, the marriage must be strictly proved, and it cannot be established by reputation; 89 Mo. App. 56. It has been held that a man and woman living together as man and wife, in the belief that they are married, cannot be convicted of "open lewdness"; 127 Mass. 459; 57 N. J. L. 209. See 111 U. C. 725.

Under the United States anti-polygamy act of March 22, 1882, Stat. L. p. 31, § 33, on prosecution for cohabitation with two women as wives, proof of the existence of the marriage relation is pertinent, and it may be proved by general reputation; 46 Fed. Rep. 750; 5 Utah 436; but evidence of general repute of guilt is not sufficient; the facts must be proved, and inferences left to the jury; 21 Pac. Rep. (Ida.) 409. In an indictment under the act it is sufficient to use the word cohabit and not to set out its meaning; id. 407, 409; it need not allege that defendant was a male person; 4 Utah 122.

LASCIVIOUS LEWDNESS. Lewd and lascivious conduct in public, or at least practised with such publicity as to be punishable as contra bonos mores.

It is an offence sometimes distinguished from lascivious cohabitation (q. v.), and described as open and lascivious lewdness; McClellan, Cr. L. § 1135. The specific characterization of the offence is the openness and publicity of the act as distinct from a secret act; 128 Mass. 52; 88 Wis. 180. The offence need not be a joint one, one person only may be guilty therein; 8 Bart. 576; and when two are charged so that both must have been guilty if one was, one may be convicted and the other acquitted; 81 Ia. 72.

An indictment should follow the statute; 4 Allen 313; and it must be averred that the parties were not married to each other and that the offence was open and public; 1 Swan 136. The crime cannot be established by general reputation; 4 Coldw. 171; but it may be by circumstantial evidence; 10 Humph. 96; and proof has been admitted of similar acts proved at a previous trial for the same offence; 8 Lea 47.

LASCIVIOUSNESS. Lascivious desires or conduct; lustfulness; wantonness; lewdness.

That form of immorality which has reference to sexual impurity; 51 Fed. Rep. 41. See the titles next preceding.

Lasciviousness and lewdness are generally treated as interchangeable if not synonymous terms. In both cases the principal use of the two words is now in each case in a secondary or derived meaning. The primary meaning of lascivius, from which the first is derived, is sportiveness, and its use in a bad sense is said to be post-Augustine, and never by Cicero; the other is derived from the Anglo-Saxon laseden, lay or unlearned.

LASHBITE. The ordinary Danish forfeiture, which was twelve ores, every ore being about 16 pence. M. & W. Also written Lashite, Lashlite. Encyc. Lond.

LAST. The same as last court (q. v.). Cent. Dict. A burden; and a measure of weight for bulky commodities, such as leather, wool, corn. Whart. L. Lex.

Where the plaintiff added new defendants after answer, the last answer was held to mean the last answer of the original defendants; 13 L. J. Ch. 99; 2 Hare 632.

In English Law. The Assisa de Ponderibus, etc. enacted that a dakir of hides should consist of ten hides that twenty dakirs should make a last. This was not the only measure known as a last. The enactment above mentioned provided that twelve sacks of wool should make a last of wool, and that ten thousand (really 12,000) herrings should make a last of herrings. Byrne.

LAST CLEAR CHANCE. If the plaintiff by his own negligence has put himself in a position of peril, and the defendant discovers his danger, or, by reason of some duty owing by him to the plaintiff, ought to discover it, and after that fails to exercise ordinary care to avoid the injury, then the defendant is liable notwithstanding this prior negligence of the plaintiff, because, having the "last clear chance," or opportunity, to prevent the accident, his negligence, and not that of the plaintiff, is regarded as the proximate cause. 144 Ky. 151, 137 S. W. 1066.

LAST COURT. A court held by the twenty-four jurors in the marshes of Kent and summoned by the bailiffs. It made orders for levying taxes, and imposing penalties for the preservation of marshes. M. & W.; Encyc. Lond.

LAST DAY OF THE TERM. See Rise.

LAST HEIR. He to whom the lands come if they escheat for want of lawful heirs; viz., sometimes the lord of whom the lands are held, sometimes the king. Bract. lib. 5, c. 17.

LAST RESORT. The highest court in any jurisdiction, beyond which there is no appeal, is termed court of last resort.

LAST SICKNESS. That of which a person dies.

The expenses of this sickness are generally entitled to a preference in payment of debts of an insolvent estate; La. Civ. Code, art. 816.

To prevent impositions, the statute of frauds requires that nuncupative wills shall be made during the testator's last sickness. Roberts, Frauds 556; 20 Johns. 502.

LAST WILL (Lat. ultima voluntas). A disposition of real estate to take effect after death.

Generally speaking, last will means the one latest in date, though there may be two or more wills, all speaking from the death of the testator; 85 L. J. Ch. 389; L. R. 1 Eq. 510; 55 Bea. 821. The phrase "This is my last will, and testament" does not, of itself, revoke a former will; 9 Moo. P. C. 181; but may be confirmatory proof of an intention to revoke; 16 Bea. 173; 23 L. J. Ch. 185; 1 W. R. 3. "My last will dated," etc., giving the date of the last will, was held to mean the last will in fact, the date given been rejected as a mistake; 46 L. J. P. D. & A. 30; 2 P. D. 111; 37 L. J. P. & M. 72, n.

It is strictly distinguishable from testament, which is applied to personal estate; 1 Wms. Exec., 7th Am. ed. § 4, n.; but the words are generally used together, "last will and testament," in a will, whether real or personal estate is to be disposed of. See WILL.

LASTAGE. A custom anciently exacted in some fairs and markets to carry things where one will; also a custom paid for goods sold by the last (a certain weight or measure); the ballast of a ship. Cow. Stowage law for goods in a vessel. Young, Naut. Dict.

LATA CULPA. Gross neglect. See BAILMENT.

LATCHING. An underground survey. Whart. L. Lex.

LATE. "Existing not long ago, but now departed this life." 17 Ala. 190. See 7 Cal. 215; 16 N. J. L. 47; 3 Pa. 329.

Last or recently in a place, as, A. B., late a resident, etc. Anderson; 7 Cal. 233. Recently in office, as A. B., late sheriff. Id.

LATELY. This word has come to have "a very large retrospect," as we say, lately deceased of one dead ten or twenty years; 2 Show. 294.

LATENS (Lat.). Latent (q. v.).

LATENT. Hidden; concealed; not appearing on the surface or face of a thing.

Applying equally to two or more different things; opposed to patent: as, a latent ambiguity (q. v.). Anderson.

LATENT AMBIGUITY. One which does not appear on the face of the instrument. A latent ambiguity is where words apply equally to two different things or subject-matters; 15 M. & W. 561; but where the parties may have intended either of the two things in dispute, the term does not apply. 10 Ohio 534.

It is settled both in England and in this country that extrinsic evidence is admissible to explain a latent ambiguity, but there has been some difficulty in defining precisely when and under what circumstances such evidence may be introduced to show the intention. Two rules are laid down in 2 Eng. Rul. Cas. 718, 726, as illustrated by two leading English cases. The first rule is: "Where a determinate intention appears to be expressed by the written instrument, extrinsic evidence is admissible to show that the description of an object contained in the instrument is applicable with legal certainty to either of two objects; and, a latent ambiguity having been thus disclosed, evidence of the surrounding circumstances is admissible to show which of the objects was meant by the description; and if, on this evidence, one of the objects is indicated with sufficient certainty, direct evidence of declarations of intention is not admissible." 9 L. J. Ex. 27; s. c. 5 M. & W. 368. In that case the language of the court was: "If, therefore, by looking at the surrounding facts to be found by the jury, the court can clearly see, with the knowledge which arises from those facts alone, that the testator meant either the lessor of the plaintiff or the defendant, it may so decide, and direct the jury accordingly; but we think that, for this purpose, they cannot receive declarations of the testator of what he intended to do in making his will." A good illustration of the uncertainty as to the person was, "where a testatrix gave a share of her residue to her 'cousin, Harriet Cloak,' and the testatrix had no cousin of that name, but had a married cousin, Harriet Crane, whose maiden name was Cloak, and a cousin T. Cloak, whose wife's name was Harriet; evidence was admitted to show the testatrix's knowledge of an intimacy with the members of the Cloak family. In the event 'cousin' was read in the secondary sense of 'wife of a cousin,' and the claim of Harriet, the wife of T. Cloak, allowed." 84 Ch. D. 255; 56 L. J. Ch. 171. Cited in the American note to the above cases as "a good type of the American doctrine," was a devise to "the four boys," where the testator had seven sons, of whom three were shown to be minors living at home; 113 Ill. 827. And in the case of Hardy v. Warren reported, Browne, Parol Evidence 461, there was a bequest by a woman to her "husband" when she had obtained a void divorce and was living with another man as his wife. These were held to be cases of latent ambiguity to explain which extrinsic evidence was admissible to determine the persons who were to take.

The other rule laid down by the work referred to is: "Assuming that the intention appears on the face of the instrument to be determinate, if, after exhausting such evidence of the surrounding circumstances as is necessary to place the court at the point of view of the maker of the instrument, there is still an ambiguity as to which of two objects is meant,—the description being sufficient to point with legal certainty to either if there were no other,—the intention as between those objects may be proved by direct evidence outside the instrument." 2 M. & W. 129; 8 C. 6 L. J. Ex. 59. It is said that courts of law are very jealous of the admission of extrinsic evidence to explain the intention of the testator, and that it should be permitted only where an ambiguity is introduced by extrinsic circumstances; 4 Dow 65; in this case illustrations are given of ambiguity both as to person and subject-matter, as a devise of an estate called Blackacre when the testator had two estates so called; or if a devise be given to a son, naming him, and there are two sons by that name; or to a nephew "William" where the testator had no nephew of that name. The rule as laid down by the American cases has been stated to be that where the terms describing the object of the testator's bounty apply indifferently to more than one person or thing, evidence may be introduced of any material fact relating to the property claimed, and the circumstances and affairs of the testator, his family, and of the claimant, "and the testator's declarations made before, at, or after the making of the will, are admissible in this view, but no evidence of mere mistake on the part of the testator or the draftsman is admissible." Browne, Par. Ev. § 126; 124 Mass. 314; 2 Dall. 70; 43 Pa. 103; 45 Wis. 211; 1 Wend. 549.

It was held by the United States supreme court that a bequest "to be equally divided between the board of foreign and the board of home missions," may be shown by parol to have been intended for the Presbyterian boards thus named, there being similar boards controlled by other religious denominations; 120 U. S. 586. See also, as to the admissibility of parol evidence to show intention, LEGACY.

LATENT DEED. One kept for twenty years or more in a person's strong box. See 7 N. J. L. 177.

LATENT DEFECT. A defect or blemish in any article sold, known to the seller but not apparent to the purchaser, and which cannot be discovered by mere observation, which, not being discoverable from mere observation, was concealed from the purchaser. See 21 N. Y. 552.

LATENT FAULT. Latent defect (q. v.).

LATERAL RAILROAD. A branch railroad. One running from some point on a main line intended as a connecting line or feeder.

A lateral road is said to be "one proceeding from some point on the main trunk between its termini." 14 Ill. 273. "The general route of the lateral road must lie at an acute angle with the main trunk;" id. "A lateral road is another name for a branch road;" id. The definition of such a structure does not depend on its length or direction, it may be a "direct extension" from the terminus as well as "merely an offshoot of the main road;" 107 Pa. 548; and it may run in the same direction as the main line so as to be in effect an extension; 66 Mo. 228; it may be an elevated road over a wharf; 107 Pa. 548. When authorized, the necessity and the location are in the discretion of the directors; id.; but the lateral railroad cannot be constructed without authority expressly granted or necessarily implied from the charter; 48 Pa. 355. When it is authorized, the right to acquire lands by the exercise of the power of eminent domain is implied as on the main line; 14 Ill. 273; 73 Mich. 206; 59 La. 563. Where there is a limitation of time for completing the main line, it does not apply to a branch road, certainly not to one for which the land has been acquired within the time limited; 66 Mo. 228.

The power is as large as the power granted for construction of the main line; 48 Pa. 355; and a power to construct such roads in the discretion of the directors is a continuing one, not to be abridged by a subsequent act giving to the company a time limited for completing the main line with sidings, appurtenances, etc.; 159 id. 331. The word appurtenances does not include branches; id.

The same reasonable rules as to furnishing, and having proper switches, turnouts, etc., apply to lateral roads as to other railroads; 2 Pittsb. 444; so also the same statutory requirements apply as to crossing highways; 1 B. & A. d. 441.

Words permitting the construction of such lines are not obligatory; 2 Macq. H. L. Cas. 514; and impose no duty which will be enforced by mandamus; 1 El. & Bl. 874. A charter power to construct branch or lateral roads includes the right to build one running in the same general direction and connecting the main line with another railroad; 86 Va. 618. When a railroad company has power to construct lateral or branch roads and purchases another road under an act authorizing its use under the charter of the purchaser, the latter may extend the purchased road; 94 Pa. 435. The mere fact that the building of a lateral railroad may add to the earnings of the main line will not authorize its construction in the absence of power in the charter; 116 Ill. 449; 138 id. 453.

A power "to construct such roads from the main line to other points or places in the several counties through which said road may pass," is limited to such as begin and end in the same county; 5 McLean 425. A lateral railroad may cross an ordinary railroad to reach a navigable river to which its construction is authorized and the continuity of the lateral road is not thereby destroyed; 74 Pa. 373. A statute authorizing a railroad company to subscribe to and acquire an interest not exceeding one-fifth, in any lateral or connecting road, confers a distinct privilege or franchise which renders the gross receipts derived from such interest liable to a state tax, notwithstanding an exemption of the principal company from such tax on its own gross receipts; 48 Md. 49. Branch railroads, under the Missouri act of March 21, 1868, are practically independent lines and not included in an exemption from taxation in the charter of the main line; 120 U. S. 569; 99 Mo. 80. Reduction of the number of trains on a branch road of which the business is lessened by charter of a competing line, will not operate as a forfeiture of the charter of the main line; 12 Gray 180.

The Pennsylvania acts of 1832, May 5, and 1865, April 18, limit the width of lateral railroads to 20 feet, whether single or double track, and under these acts the width has been held to be a jurisdictional fact, which may be taken advantage of at any stage of the proceedings; 111 Pa. 95. See RAILROAD; EMINENT DOMAIN.

LATERAL SUPPORT. The right of having one's land and the structures erected thereon supported by the land of a neighboring proprietor.

Each of two adjoining land-owners is entitled to the support of the other's land. The right of lateral support exists only with respect to the soil in its natural condition; 90 U. S. 635; and it is an incident to the land in that condition; 19 Barb. 383. If any excavation cause damage whilst the soil remains in this condition, an action will lie, but in the absence of negligence in excavating, or prescription, or grant, in favor of the neighbor, no action will lie for injury occasioned to the latter if he has increased the lateral pressure by building on the land; 122 Mass. 207; 2 Thomp. & C. 277; 10 H. L. Cas. 383; 22 Mo. 566; 58 Mo. App. 586; 37 Vt. 99. A land-owner has a right to assume that the soil will be permitted to remain in its natural state, and for a violation of this right, an action will lie independently of the question of negligence; 2 Rolle, Abr. 565; 25 Vt. 465; 25 N. J. L. 382. But see 47 La. Ann. 814, where it was held that an adjoining land-owner was liable for weakening his neighbor's wall, by the construction of a building on his own land.

A person's right to the support of the land immediately around his house is not so much an easement, as it has been called, as it is the ordinary right of enjoyment of property. Professor Washburn characterizes the right as "of a nature somewhat akin to the easement of light."

The doctrine of lateral support has been thus carefully stated by this eminent author: "This right exists independently of grant or prescription, and is also an absolute right; so that, if his neighbor excavates the adjoining land, and in consequence A's land falls, he may have an action, although A's excavation was not carelessly or unskillfully performed. This natural right does not extend to any buildings A may place upon his land; and therefore, if A builds his house upon the verge of his own land, he does not thereby acquire the right to have it derive its support from the land adjoining it until it shall have stood and had the advantage of such support for twenty years. In the meantime such adjacent owner may excavate his own land for such purposes as he sees fit, provided he does not dig carelessly or recklessly; and if, in so doing, the adjacent earth gives way, and the house falls by reason of the additional weight thereby placed upon the natural soil, the owner of the house is without remedy. It was his own folly to place it there. But if it shall have stood for twenty years with the knowledge of the adjacent proprietor, it acquires the easement of a support in the adjacent soil. . . . But this right of a land-owner to support his land against that of the adjacent owner does not, as before stated, extend to the support of any additional weight or structure that he may place thereon. If, therefore, a man erect a house upon his own land, so near the boundary line thereof as to be injured by the adjacent owner's excavating his land in a proper manner, and so as not to have caused the soil of the adjacent parcel to fall if it had not been loaded with an additional weight, it would be damnum absque injuria,—a loss for which the person so excavating would not be responsible in damages;" 2 Washb. R. P., 5th ed. 880.

It is settled law that "the unquestionable right of a land-owner to remove the earth from his own premises adjacent to another's building is subject to the qualification that he shall use ordinary care to cause no unnecessary damage to his neighbor's property in so doing." 110 Mo. 224; 25 N. Y. 334; 2 Allen 131; 76 Ill. 240; and as it is put by another author: "In exercising his rights over his land, the owner is bound to use ordinary care and skill for the purpose of avoiding injury to his neighbor. Thus, while, as a general rule, he is not bound to continue the support his land gives to a structure upon, or other artificial arrangement of, adjoining land, and is, therefore, not liable for the natural consequences of his withdrawing this support, yet in doing so, he must act with such care and caution that (as nearly as by reasonable exertion it is possible to secure such a result) his neighbor shall suffer no more injury than would have accrued if the structure had been put where it is without ever having had the support of his land."

The principle underlying this rule is that "if a man in the exercise of his own rights of property do damage to his neighbor, he is liable if it might have been avoided by the use of reasonable care;" 22 Mo. 573; 54 Kan. 323. In the absence of a statutory rule it is said that "the care required of a party so excavating is that of a man of ordinary prudence in the circumstances of the particular situation. . . . The particular circumstances so largely shape and indicate the duty that any attempt to reduce the rule to greater certainty would probably tend to impede rather than to promote the administration of justice;" 110 Mo. 234. It has been recently held that prior notice to the neighbor whose property may be endangered by the excavation is an essential part of the ordinary care referred to; 53 N. J. L. 442; 13 L. R. A. 589. In this case there was so emphatic a dissent that, standing alone, it could hardly be considered sufficient authority for the proposition. On this point it is said that "one who digs away land which affords support to an adjoining house ought to give the owner reasonable notice of his intention to do so, and he must allow the latter all reasonable facilities for obtaining artificial support, including a temporary privilege of shoring up the house by supports based upon the former owner's land;" 2 Shearm. & Redf. Neg., 4th ed. § 701. A more recent text writer says: "Thus the authorities are agreed that one who proposes to excavate, or make other alterations or improvements upon his own land, which may endanger the land or house of his neighbor, is bound to give the latter reasonable notice of what he proposes to do, to enable him to take the necessary measures for the preservation of his own property. But, after giving such notice, he is bound only to reasonable and ordinary care in the prosecution of the work."

1 Thomp. Neg. 276. In many cases it is held that after notice from the owner who proposes to excavate, it is the duty of his neighbor to shore up his own building; 44 Md. 268; 4 Paige 169; 9 B. & C. 725. And where a neighbor has no right to support by grant or by prescription, it is said that he must shore up his own house; 8 B. Monr. 353; but there is no obligation on the part of the owner of a building about to be removed to shore up the other buildings; Goddard, Easem., Bennett's ed. 48. The owner of land cannot be deprived of his right to excavate his own land by the action of his neighbor in building at or near the boundary line, and if he conduct his operations with due care, and no right by grant or prescription has been acquired by his neighbor; he is not liable, even though the building of the latter be ruined; 3 B. & Ad. 871; 76 Ill. 287; 18 Pick. 117; 4 N. Y. 201; 20 Conn. 538.

In the case of a party wall (q. v.) the joint owners of it have no easement of reciprocal support from each other's buildings, and if one proposes to remove the building, and injury to his neighbor is liable to result from it, he must notify him of his intention that he may look to his own protection, at the same time using reasonable care and precaution to protect the neighbor, and if this is done, and still injury results, no action will lie; 98 Ky. 284.

With respect to a right by prescription for the support of buildings, there is a difference between the tendency of judicial opinion in England and the United States. In the former country the tendency, "as in the case of all rights affecting real estate, is strongly in favor of the recognition of this right as acquired by prescription;" L. R. 6 App. Cas. 740; 19 Ch. Div. 281; 3 C. & K. 260. See 1 El. Bl. & El. 622; 9 H. L. Cas. 508. The American doctrine, after some fluctuation, is now considered as settled that an easement for the support of a building cannot be acquired by prescription; 99 Cal. 340; 42 Mo. App. 551 (overruling 18 id. 575); 49 Ga. 19; 7 Watts 460; 80 Va. 1 (overruling 27 Gratt. 77); 12 Mass. 380. See note on this branch of the subject, 20 L. R. A. 780.

The measure of damages in actions for removing the lateral support of another's land is the amount required to restore the property to its former condition with as good, means of lateral support, and special damages must be specially pleaded; 7 Houst. 219; or the diminution of the value of the land by falling, caving, or washing, as the natural result of the excavation; 23 N. J. L. 356; 57 Minn. 498; 64 id. 123; 149 Pa. 155; 153 id. 256; 3 S. Dak. 44; 3 Sutherland, Damages 417. See 121 Ind. 195; s. c. 6 L. R. A. 449.

The right of lateral support may be asserted as well against a municipal corporation's making excavations in changing the grade of a street as against private individuals; 88 Va. 992. But see 29 Abb. N. C. 154. So where a city built a sewer in a public street opposite land, under which and the street was a stratum of silt and quicksand which flowed into the sewer trench so that a building on the land was damaged, the city was held liable; 44 N. E. Rep. (Mass.) 344. In this case three judges dissented on the authority of 4 L. R. Exch. 244, in which it was held that there is no right of recovery for damages occasioned by the sinking in of land, and that this doctrine extended to a quicksand flowing so freely as to be raised by a pump.

Where a house is injured as an indirect effect of the improper working of mines, the right of action arises at the time the mischief is felt, and the statute of limitations runs from that time; 9 H. L. Cas. 508.

For a collection of cases depending on particular facts and illustrating the right of lateral support, see 87 Vt. 830.

In California it is made unlawful by statute for a land-owner to remove the lateral support of adjoining land without taking reasonable precautions to support it; Cal. Civ. Code § 832. It was held that this liability was not avoided by proof that the work was done by a contractor, but that where the excavation was done under contract, and no precaution was taken with respect to lateral support, both the owner and the contractor were liable to the owner of adjoining land which fell in; 105 Cal. 52.

See, generally, 13 L. R. A. 589, note; Ray, Neg. Imp. Dut. 190; EASEMENT; PRESCRIPTION.

LATERAN COUNCILS. The general name given to the numerous councils held in the Lateran Church at Rome.

The first of these was convened A. D. 649 to consider the doctrine of the Monothelites. This council held five sessions, during which the writings of the leading advocates of the theory were examined and condemned, and all persons anathematized who did not confess their belief in the existence of both the divine and the human will in the person of Jesus Christ. The second of the councils, held in the years 1106, 1112, 1116, and 1123, settled the controversy between the pope and the emperor as to the investiture of bishops, prescribed the methods of ordinations and elections, by which, although the pope apparently made large concessions to the emperor, he was, in fact, able to practically control the elections, and passed additional decrees to enforce the celibacy of the clergy. The third council, convened in 1139, condemned the antipope and deposed all thirty canons of discipline among which were several against simony, marriage, and immorality among the clergy. The fourth council (1179) decreed that the election of the pope should be confined to the college of cardinals, two-thirds of the votes of which should be requisite for an election, instead of a majority, had previously been necessary. It condemned the Albigenses and the Waldenses. The fifth council convened in the year 1215. It is usually called the fourth Lateran and was the most important as marking the summit of the papal power. It decreed that the doctrine of transubstantiation be one of the articles of faith, required all persons who had reached the age of discretion to confess once a year, arranged for the place of assembly and the time for the next crusade, and anathematized all heretics whose belief was opposed to the faith, decreeing that after their condemnation they should be handed over to the secular authorities, excommunicating all who received, protected, or maintained them, and threatening all bishops with deposition who did not use their utmost endeavors to clear their dioceses of them. The sixth council (1512-17) abolished the Pragmatic Sanction and substituted a concordat agreed upon by Leo X. and Francis I. in which the liberties of the Church were greatly restricted. Some authorities recognize five only, omitting the first above stated and numbering the others from one to five.

LATHE, LATH (L. Lat. lastrum or leda. Law Fr. and Eng. Dict.). A division of certain counties in England, intermediate between a county or shire and a hundred, sometimes containing three or four hundreds, as in Kent and Sussex. Cowel. But in Sussex the word used for this division is rape. 1 Bla. Com. 118. There was formerly a lathe-reeve or bailiff in each lathe. Id. This division into lathes continues to the present day. In Ireland, the lathe was intermediate between the tithing and the hundred. Spencer, Ireland. See T. L.

LATHREEVE, LEDGREEVE, or TRITHIN-GREEVE. An officer under the Saxon government who had authority over a lathe. Cowel.

LATIFUNDIUM (Lat.). In Civil Law. Great or large possessions; a great or large field; a common. Ainsworth. A great estate made up of smaller ones (funds), which began to be common in the latter times of the empires. Schmidt, Civ. Law. Introd. n. 17.

LATIFUNDUS (Lat. late possidens). A possessor of a large estate made up of smaller ones. Du Cange.

LATIMER. A word used by Sir Edward Coke for an interpreter. Cunningham; 2 par. Inst. fol. 515. It seems that the word is incorrect, and should be "latiner" because heretofore he that understood Latin, which in the time of the Romans was the prevailing language, might be a good interpreter. Camden agrees that it signifies a Frenchman or interpreter, and says the word is used in an old inquisition. Britan. fol. 598, and may be derived or corrupted from the French latmier, q. d. latiner. Id.; Cowell, edit. 1727.

LATIN. The language of the ancient Romans. See LANGUAGE.

Three causes made the Latin language useful and important in early English jurisprudence: (1) Its conciseness, expressiveness, and adaptability to condensation fitted it, in early times, to be the medium of preserving the principles of jurisprudence, in the same manner as it has been widely preferred for communication of philosophic, scientific thought, and information generally. (2) The civil and canon laws, and many of the early European Codes, were couched in Latin, and were received by the English people in that language; hence they might often be quoted in the original, as well as translated. (3) The conflict, after the Norman conquest, between the Saxon and the French tongues naturally promoted the use of any neutral speech which might be available. Other influences of less importance co-operated with these; hence Latin was, in ancient English jurisprudence, the language of statutes and formal treatises; and by Stat. 36 Edw. III. ch. 15, all pleas were directed to be debated in English, but to be recorded in Latin. English gradually predominated, however, until Stats. 4 Geo. II. ch. 26, and 6 Geo. II. ch. 14, declared that all judicial proceedings and records should be in English. Abbott.

During the gradual decline in the use of Latin in the courts, faulty and erroneous employment of it was, of course, frequent. Early legal authorities discriminate between three kinds of law Latin:

(1) Good Latin, allowed by the grammarians and lawyers. (2) False or incongruous Latin, which in times past would abate original writs; though it would not make void any judicial writ, declaration, or plea, etc. (3) Words of art, known only to the sages of the law, and not to grammarians, called "lawyers' Latin." Id.; Wharton; 1 Lit. Abr. 146.

LATIN UNION. A monetary alliance of France, Belgium, Switzerland, and Italy for the establishment of a mutual and uniform monetary policy and the maintenance of a uniform and interchangeable coinage of gold and silver based on the French franc. Greece and Roumania joined the association in April, 1867.

The convention was made at Paris, Dec. 23, 1865, and provided that certain named gold and silver coins and no others should be used by each state, and that they should be received interchangeably when not worn to one-half per cent. of the device effaced. Silver coins were made a legal tender between individuals of the state which issued them to the sum of fifty francs; but the state itself should receive them in any amount and the public banks of each country to the sum of one hundred francs. The contracting governments agreed to redeem the small coins in gold or five-franc silver pieces, when presented in sums of not less than one hundred francs. It was agreed that of silver coins of two francs and less there should not be issued more than six francs for each inhabitant; the amount for each country being specified according to the estimated population in 1865. Provision was made for any other nation to join the convention by accepting its obligations and adopting the monetary system of the union. The treaty was limited to remain in force till Jan. 1, 1870.

January 30th, 1874, a supplementary treaty was made, further limiting the coinage of 1874, and the same limitations were made for 1875 and 1876. In the conference of 1877 the coinage of five-franc pieces was suspended except in the million francs for Italy. In 1878 Belgium passed a law to suspend the coinage of silver entirely, and France did the same in 1878, and the law of Switzerland was to the same effect. Separate legislation to limit the coinage was permissible; the treaty of 1896 only limited the maximum but did not make any coinage obligatory.

In 1878 through a conference in Paris the same nations renewed the monetary treaty as it was "in all that relates to fineness, weight, denomination, and currency of their gold and silver coin." The free coinage of gold (excepting five-franc pieces, of which the coinage was suspended) was guaranteed each state, and the coinage of silver five-franc pieces was provisionally suspended to be resumed only by unanimous agreement. The treaty was in force, by its terms, until January 1st, 1898.

In November, 1898, France, Greece, Italy, and Switzerland renewed the convention for five years, absolutely, with the further agreement that after Jan. 1, 1899, it should be subject to termination on one year's notice. Belgium after some hesitation gave her assent. Silver coinage was made redeemable and no addition to it permitted.

See, generally, Int. Cyc. tit. Latin Union. Another group of European nations acting under a joint monetary convention includes Great Britain, Sweden, and Denmark, which have had a treaty known as the Scandinavian Monetary Convention, dated in 1873, for the mutual regulation of their coinages. In addition to the countries named as belonging to the Latin Union, Spain, Austria-Hungary, Finland, Roumania, Servia, Bulgaria, and Monaco have also coined large amounts of either or both gold and silver into money of weight, fineness, and value exactly proportionate to or identical with that of the countries included in the Latin Union.

LATINER. An interpreter. Co. 2 Inst. 515. See LATIMER.

LATINI COLONIARI. The free inhabitants of a colony founded with the jus latii, or of a country upon which the jus latii had been conferred. By the constitutio Antoniana, Caracalla extended to them the privilege of full Roman citizenship.

LATINI JUNIANI. Such freedmen as enjoyed their liberty tutiorne pretoris, and who, under the lex junia norbana, were made legally free, their freedom, however, being only of the kind enjoyed by the latini coloniarii. They possessed only the jus commercii and not the jus connubii, and even in regard to the former they were restricted, in that they had the commercium inter vivos, but not the commercium mortis causa. They could neither make a will nor take anything under a will, and when a latinus junianus died, his property reverted to his master as though he had remained a slave all his life. The privilege of Roman citizenship conferred upon the latini coloniarii did not include the latini juniani. See Sohm, Rom. L. § 22.

In the Roman Law. A class of freedmen (libertini) intermediate between the two other classes of freedmen called respectively "liberi Romani" and "Dediticii." Slaves under thirty years of age at the date of their manumission, or manumitted otherwise than by vindicta, censo, or testamentum, or not the quiritary property of their manumissioners at the time of manumission, were called "Latini." By reason of one or other of these three defects, they remained slaves by strict law even after their manumission, but were protected in their liberties first by equity, and eventually by the Lex Junia Norbana, A. D. 19, from which law they took the name of Juniani in addition to that of Latini. R. & L. Dict.; Brown. See MANUMISSION.

LATINS. See JUS LATI.

LATTITAT (Lat. he lies hid). In English Law. The name of a writ calling a defendant to answer to a personal action in the king's bench. It derives its name from a supposition that the defendant lurks and lies hid, and cannot be found in the county of Middlesex (in which the said court is holden) to be taken there, but is gone into some other county, and therefore requiring the sheriff to apprehend him in such other county. Fitz. N. B. 78. Abolished by stat. 2 Wm. IV. c. 89.

LATTER-MATH. A second mowing; the aftermath.

LATOR. A bearer; a messenger. Whart. L. Lex.

LAUDAMENTUM. See LAUDARE.

LAUDARE. To advise or persuade; to arbitrate. Whart.

In Civil Law. To cite or quote; to name; to show one's title or authority. Calv. Lex.

Laudamentum. The finding or award of a jury. 2 Bla. Com. 285.

LAUDATIO. Testimony delivered in court concerning an accused person's good behavior and integrity of life. It resembled the practice which prevails in our trials, of calling persons to speak to a prisoner's character. Wharton.

(Lat., laudare, to praise.) In the Civil Law. A praising or commending; a speaking in one's favor. Burrill.

LAUDATOR. A witness to character. A person to decide some point at issue between others.

LAUDENEO. In Spanish Law. Taxes paid by possessors of land held by quit-rent or emphyteusis to the owner of the estate when the tenant alienates his right in the property. Escriche.

It was provided that "the tenant may alienate the land, acquitting the lord who has the right of preemption (lanteo), with the price that another has offered; and he not giving that price, or being silent with respect thereto, for two months the tenant may sell, but to a person from whom the lord may recover the rent in order that he shall execute a new deed of lease, and for which he is entitled to a relief (laudemio), which is the fiftieth part of the price or value." L. 29, tit. 8 p. 5; 1 White, Rec., 87; Schmidt, Civil Law of Spain and Mexico 74.

LAUDINIUM (Lat. a laudando domo). In Roman Law. A fiftieth part of the purchase-money or (if no sale) of the value of the estate paid to the landlord (dominus) by a new emphyteuta on his succession to the estate, not as heir, but as singular successor. Voetius, Com. ad Pand. lib. 6, tit. 8, §§ 26-35; Mack. R. L. § 828.

In Old English Law. The tenant paid a laudimium or acknowledgment-money to the new landlord on the death of the old. Called also laudatium. See Blount, Acknowledgment-Money.

LAUDUM. Award or arbitrament.

In Scotch Law. Judgment or sentence; dome or doom. 1 Pitt. Cr. Tr. pt. 2, p. 8.

LAUGHE. Frank-pledge. 2 Reeves, Hist. Eng. L. 17.

LAUNCEGAY or LAUCEGAY. A spear or javelin, the use of which was prohibited by 7 Ric. III. c. 13.

LAUNCH. The movement by which a ship or boat descends from the shore into the water when she is first built, or afterwards.

A vessel already in the water cannot be launched; 70 Me. 352.

A large, long, low, flat-bottomed boat. Mar. Dict. The long boat of a ship. R. H. Dana. A small vessel employed to carry the cargo of a large one to and from the shore.

The goods on board of a launch are at the risk of the insurers till landed; 5 Mart. L. n. s. 887. The duties and rights of the master of a launch are the same as those of the master of a lighter.

When the master of a vessel agreed to take cotton on board his vessel from the cotton-press, and employed a steam-lighter for that purpose, and the cotton was lost by an explosion of the steam-boiler of the lighter, it was held that his vessel was liable in rem for the loss; 28 Bost. L. Rep. 277.

LAUNDRY. A place where clothes are washed. 105 Ky. 265, 49 S. W. 28.

LAUNDRYMAN. A "laundryman" is one who conducts a place where clothes are washed. 105 Ky. 265, 49 S. W. 28.

LAUREATE or LAUREAT. An officer of the English sovereign. His duty formerly consisted only in composing an ode annually, on the sovereign's birthday, and on the New Year; sometimes also, though rarely, on occasions of any remarkable victory. The annual birthday ode has been discontinued since the conclusion of the reign of George III. The title has been said to be derived from the circumstance that in classical times and in the middle ages, the most distinguished poets were solemnly crowned with laurel. Out of this association of ideas sprang the custom of the presentation of a laurel wreath to graduates in rhetoric and versification at the English universities, the king's laureate simply meaning a rhetorician in his service. In allusion to this custom Selden, in his Titles of Honor, speaks of the laurel crown as an ensign of the degree of mastership in poetry. A relic of the old university practice of crowning distinguished students of poetry exists in the term "laureation," which is still used at one of the Scotch universities (St. Andrews), to signify the taking of the degree of Master of Arts.

A succession of poets from Chaucer to Spenser acted occasionally as informal poets laureate, or court poets; and the academic use of the title poets laureate ceased. The first actual appointment as poet laureate was that of Ben Jonson in 1617. Since then the office has been conferred by letters patent on various poets, of whom Dryden, Southey, Wordsworth, and Tennyson were the most notable. From 1670 the laureate got annually a butt of canary; and there has always been also a stipend which is at present £72 a year. Now the laureate has no definite duties. Byrne.

LAUREL. An English gold coin worth twenty shillings, or about five dollars, coined in 1619 by James I., so-called because the head of the king was wreathed with laurel, and not crowned as on English coins.

LAW. That which is laid down; that which is established. A rule or method of action, or order of sequences.

The rules and methods by which society compels or restrains the action of its members.

The aggregate of those rules and principles of conduct which the governing power in a community recognizes as those which it will enforce or sanction, and according to which it will regulate, limit, or protect the conduct of its members.

The aggregate of rules set by men as politically superior or sovereign, to men as politically subject. Aust. Jur., Campbell's ed. 88.

A rule of civil conduct prescribed by the supreme power in the state, commanding what is right and prohibiting what is wrong. 1 Bla. Com. 44.

A rule of civil conduct prescribed by the supreme power in a state. 1 Steph. Com. 25.

The general body of rules which are addressed by the rulers of a political community to the members of that society, and which are generally obeyed. Markby, Ele- ments of Law 8.

A rule of conduct contained in a command of a sovereign addressed to the subject. Enoyc. Brit.

A general rule of human action, taking cognizance of external acts only, enforced by a definite authority, which authority is human, and among human authorities is that which is paramount in a political society. More briefly, a general rule of external human action enforced by a sovereign political authority. Holland, Jur. 87.

All other rules for the guidance of human action are called laws merely by analogy; and any propositions which are not rules for human action are called laws by metaphor only. Id.

A rule or enactment promulgated by the legislative authority of a state; a long-established local custom which has the force of such an enactment. 10 Pet. 18.

The doctrines and procedure of the common law of England and America, as distinguished from those of equity.

An oath. So used in the old English practice, by which wager of law was allowed. See WAGER OF LAW.

Perhaps few terms whose use requires equal precision serve in so many diverse meanings as the term law. In its root signifies that which is laid down, that which is established. "In the largest sense," says Montesquieu (Esprit des Loix, b. 1, ch. 1), "laws are the necessary relations which arise from the nature of things; and, in this sense, all beings have their laws. God has his laws, the material universe has its laws, intelligence superior to man has its laws, animals have their laws, man has his laws. In this sense, the idea of a command proceeding from a superior to an inferior is not necessarily involved in the term law. It is frequently thus used to denote simply a statement of a constant relation of phenomena. The laws of science, thus, are but generalized statements of observed facts." "It is a perversion of language," says Paley, "to assign any law as the efficient operative cause of anything. A law presupposes an agent: this is only the mode according to which an agent proceeds."

It has been said that "the one idea that is common to all meanings of the word law is that of order or regularity in the happening of events. Starting from this, the meanings divide into two groups which may be distinguished as law in the scientific and in the juristic sense." Terry, Anglo-Am. L. 1. The author cited continues that "the former seems to contain no elements in addition to the one above mentioned. A scientific law can be expressed as a mere formula; but law in the juristic sense involves the further idea that the regularity manifested is the result of an act or omission of a rational being, produced by an attempt to conform his conduct to some standard or ideal more or less clearly conceived. The result of this process is the evolution in any community of individuals of common principles of action, which as soon as reason takes cognizance of them become laws in the most general, juristic sense of the word. With the advance of civilization new elements come into being: (1) The idea of force is added to that of order and is applied to compel obedience, or, going one step further, to change, modify, or add to these rules of action. (2) The primitive law becomes differentiated from other bodies of rules with which it is at first confounded, so that in the end what is termed law in the stricter sense may conflict with other recognized principles of action which are termed laws in the more general sense, as the natural or the moral law. Id.

In its relation to human affairs there is a broad use of the term, in which it denotes any of those rules and methods by which a society compels or restrains the action of its members. Here the idea of a command is more generally obvious, and has usually been thought an essential element in the notion of human law.

A distinction is to be observed in the outset between the abstract and the concrete meaning of the word. That which is usually intended by the term "laws" is not coextensive with that which is intended by the term "law." In the broadest sense which it bears when used in the abstract, law is a science. It treats of the theory of government, the relation of states to each other and to individuals, and the rights and obligations of states, of individuals, and of artificial persons and local communities among themselves and to each other.

An analysis of the science of law presents a view, first, of the rights of persons, distinguishing them as natural persons and artificial persons, or bodies politic or corporations. These rights are deemed either absolute, as relating to the enjoyment of personal security, liberty, and of private property, or, on the other hand, as relative,—that is, arising out of the relation in which several persons stand. These relations are either (1) public or political, viz.: the relation of state and people; or, (2) private, as the relations of master and servant, husband and wife, parent and child, guardian and ward, to which might be added relations arising out of private contracts, such as partnership, principal and agent, and the like. Under the head of the rights of persons as arising out of public relations may be discussed the constitution and polity of the state, the distribution of powers among the various departments of the government, the political status of individuals, as persons, citizens, and the like.

In the second place, the analysis presents the rights of property, which is divided into personal property or chattels, viz., that which is movable, and real property, or that which is immovable, viz., lands, including nearly all degrees of interest therein, as well as such chattels as by a peculiar connection with land may be deemed to have their character as legally movable: these rights of property are viewed in respect to the origin of title, the transmission of title, and the protection of the enjoyment thereof.

In the third place, the analysis presents a view of private wrongs, or those injuries to persons for which the law provides a redress for the aggrieved party; and under this head may be considered the tribunals through which the protection of rights or the redress of wrongs may be obtained, and the various modes of procedure to those ends.

Lastly, the analysis presents a view of public wrongs, or crimes and misdemeanors, in which may be considered the theory of crime and punishment, the persons capable of committing crimes, the several degrees of guilt of principals and accessories, the various crimes of which the law takes cognizance,—as, those against religion, those against the state and its government, and those against persons and property,—with the punishment which the law affixes to each, and also the tribunals and procedure by which crimes threatened may be prevented, and crimes committed may be punished. Bla. Com.

In a stricter sense, but still in the abstract, law denotes the aggregate of those rules and principles of conduct which the governing power in a community recognizes as those which it will enforce or sanction, and according to which it will regulate, limit, or protect the conduct of members of the community.

It is the aggregate of legal rules and principles, as distinguished from any particular rule or principle. No one statute, nor all statutes, constitute the law of the state; the principles laid down by the courts and the regulations of municipal bodies, as well as, to some extent, the universal principles of ethics, go to make up the body of the law. It includes principles, which rest in the common sense of justice and right, as well as positive rules or regulations, which rest in ordinance. It is the aggregate of the rules or principles only which the governing power in the community recognizes, because that power, whether it be deemed as residing in a monarch, an aristocracy, or in the people at large, is the source of the authority and the sanction of those rules and principles. It is the aggregate of those rules and principles which are recognized as the law by that power, rather than those which are actually enforced in all cases; for a statute is none the less a law because the community forbear to enforce it, so long as it is officially recognized by them as that which, in theory at least, should be enforced; nor does a departure from the law by the governing power in itself abrogate the law. It comprises not only those rules and principles which are to be enforced, but also those which are simply permissive; for a very large part even of modern statute-law—which is commonly defined as a rule commanding or prohibiting—in reality neither commands nor prohibits, except in the most distant and indirect sense, but simply authorizes, permits, or sanctions; and this is much more generally true of those principles of the law which rest in custom and the adjudications of the courts. It is only those which relate to the members of the community in question; for laws, as such, have no extra-territorial operation.

The state has in general two, and only two, articulate organs for law-making purposes—the legislature and the tribunals. The first organ makes new law; the second attests and confirms old law, though under cover of doing so it introduces many new principles. Holland, Jur. 85. "The statute law is the fruit of the conscious power of society, while the unwritten and customary law is the product of its unconscious effort. The former is indeed to a certain extent a creative work; but, as we have already seen, the condition of its efficacy is that it must limit itself to the office of aiding and supplementing the unconscious development of the unwritten law." Address of James C. Carter, Rep. (1890) Am. Bar Assn. 236.

The earliest notion of law was not an enunciation of a principle but a judgment in a particular case. When pronounced in the early ages, by a king, it was assumed to be the result of direct divine inspiration. Afterwards came the notion of a custom which a judgment affirms or punishes its breach. In the outset, however, the only authoritative statement of right and wrong is a judicial sentence rendered after the fact has occurred. It does not presuppose a law to have been violated, but is enacted for the first time by a higher form into the judge's mind at the moment of adjudication. Maine, Anc. Law (Dwight's ed.) pp. xv, 5. See PRECEDENT. As to Primitive Notions of Law, see 10 Am. L. Rev. 422.

The idea of law has commonly been analyzed as composed of three elements: (1) a command of the lawgiver, which command must prescribe not a single act merely, but a series or class of acts; (2) an obligation imposed thereby on the citizen; (3) a sanction threatened in the event of disobedience; Benth. Frag. on Gov.; Austin, Prov. Jur.; Maine, Anc. Law. Hamilton declared a sanction essential to the idea of law. Federalist, No. 15.

The latter clause of Blackstone's definition has been much criticized. Mr. Chitty modifies it to "commanding what shall be done or what shall not be done"; 1 Bla. Com. 44, note; and Mr. Stephen omits it in his definition. See supra. As to Law and Command, see 1 Law Mag. & Rev. N. S. 189.

These definitions, though more apt in reference to statutes and edicts than to the law in general, seem, even in reference to the former sort of law, to look rather at the usual form than the invariable essence of the thing. The principle of law, that a promise without a consideration is void, neither commands men to provide a consideration for every promise nor forbids them to promise without consideration, for this is lawful; nor does it forbid them to fulfill such promises. It simply amounts to this, that if men choose to break such promises, society will not interfere to enforce them. And even many statutes have no form of a command or prohibition; and, moreover, some that are such in form are not in reality. An enactment that no action shall be brought on a simple contract after the lapse of six years from the time the cause of action accrued cannot aptly be said to command men to bring actions within six years, nor even, in fact, to forbid them to bring such actions after that time; for it is still lawful to sue on an outlawed demand, and, if the defendant do not object, the plaintiff may succeed. It may be deemed a command in so far as it is a direction to the court to dismiss such actions; but as a rule of civil conduct it amounts simply to this, that when an obligation has become stale to a certain degree, society will sanction the debtor in repudiating it.

A recent work on legal history disclaims philosophical analysis and definition of law, as belonging neither to the historical nor to the dogmatic science of law, but to the theoretical part of politics. Legal science is said to be "not an ideal or ethical result of political analysis; it is the actual result of facts of human nature and history." Accordingly, "law may be taken for every purpose save that of strictly philosophical inquiry to be the sum of the rules administered by courts of justice." When, therefore, "a man is acquainted with the rules which the judges of the land will apply to any subject of dispute between citizens or to any act complained of as against the common weal, and is further acquainted with the manner in which the decisions of the common court can be enforced, he must be said to know the law to that extent." It is not necessary that he should "have opinions on the metaphysical analysis of laws or legal duty in general, or the place of the topic in hand in a scientific arrangement of legal ideas." 1 Poll. & Mail. Intro.

As to philosophy of the law, see 1 Law Mag. & Rev. N. S. 577.

The difficulty of defining law is nowhere more clearly shown than in a late work on English and American law, in which the leading definitions are enumerated and criticized. It is truly said that the expression "our law," adopted by the author, does not mean moral law, although rules regulating civil conduct may "be imported by the tribunals when necessary for the purposes of the actual decision of causes, from the field of morality," when they become invested with the quality of law to the extent that they are recognized and enforced by the judges. The author referred to agrees with Mr. Justice Markby (Elem. of Law § 12) that no greater service was rendered by Austin than the definition of the boundaries of jurisprudence which separate it from ethics or morality. This separation was too much overlooked by continental jurists, with the result, particularly in Germany, of merging "the scientific treatment of law in the larger region of ethical inquiry." (Amos, Science of Law ch. I, ii, iii.) Nor does the law include the science of politics or government, which falls "within the domain of the statesman or legislator" (see also Pollock, Hist. Science of Politics). So law and legislation are not synonymous; the latter is the usual and effective instrument for changing and amending the former or making additions to it. Leaving behind him what the law is not and pausing before undertaking to define what it is, the author remarks, "It requires a bolder man than I to propound a definition of the law of the land which is both comprehensive and accurate." He criticises the definitions of Blackstone, Markby, and Austin (supra) as being defective in that the words "prescribed," "command," "addressed," "set," would require an elasticity not consonant with their general or appropriate use. These definitions are apt and accurate as describing the ordained or enacted law of a state, but would exclude a large body of what is, unquestionably, law. He adopts Holland's as sufficiently accurate for his purpose, "although with a conscious sense of its inadequacy." It answers the purpose because "law, as the lawyer has to deal with it, is concerned only with the legal rights . . . coercion by the state is the essential quality of the law, distinguishing it from morality or ethics." The conclusion is, "If you ask me to define law, I can, speaking as a lawyer, do no better than to adopt Professor Holland's definition already given. If you ask me to enumerate all the ultimate sources whence legal rights and duties originate and how these are evolved, I hide my diminished head and confess my inability to satisfactorily formulate an answer." Dillon, Laws and Jur. Lect. I.

This emphatic statement gathers added force when the thoroughness of the author's research, as shown by his notes, is considered. Among them is found a reference to the elaborate and learned examination of the subject by Professor Clark, who devotes sixteen chapters each to "The Definition and Origin of Law" and "The Form of Law" in his "Practical Jurisprudence: A Comment on Austin." See, as to definition of law, 10 L. Quart. Rev. 228.

This criticism of the most frequently quoted definitions leads naturally up to a reference to the clear and forcible views of Mr. James C. Carter in his address upon The Ideal and The Actual in the Law. Reference has already been made to another address of Mr. Carter in the title International Law (q. v.), to which subject much of what is here said is particularly applicable. Concluding his discussion of the sources of law generally, he thus states the result of his argument against the conception of Austin: "Law is not a body of commands imposed upon society from without, either by an individual sovereign or superior, or by a sovereign body constituted by representatives of society itself. It exists at all times as one of the elements of society springing directly from habit and custom. It is, therefore, the unconscious creation of society or growth. For the most part it needs no interpreter or vindicator. The members of society are familiar with its customs and follow them, and in following custom they follow the law. It is only for the exceptional instances that judicial tribunals or legislative enactments are needed. In those cases where the customs are doubtful or conflicting, the expert is needed to ascertain or reconcile them, and hence the origin of the judicial establishment. . . . New customs, new modes of dealing, must be contrived to meet new exigencies, and society by the unconscious exercise of its ordinary forces proceeds to furnish itself with them. But this is a gradual and slow process attended with difficulty and loss. Another agency is needed to supplement and assist the work of society, and legislation springs into existence to supply the want." Rep. Am. Bar Assn. (1890) 217.

It has been very truly said that much of the obscurity involving the origin of law and the mutual relations and proportions of customary, statute, and case law is caused by ambiguous uses of the term source. It is employed (1) to indicate whence we obtain our knowledge of the law; (2) the mode in which or the person through whom have been formulated rules which have acquired the force of law; (3) the authority which gives them that force. The last two uses are most frequently confused. Recognition by the state is the sole source of laws in the sense of that which impresses upon them their legal character. Their sources, in the sense of the causes to which they owe their existence as rules, are thus classified: (1) usage which becomes law at the moment at which it receives the imprimatur of the state; (2) religion, the influence of which cannot be left out of account in studying the development of any secular system of law; (3) adjudication, whatever theory be accepted as to its nature as a source of law; (4) scientific discussion; (5) equity, as particularly exemplified in the administrations of law by the Roman praetor and the English chancellor; (6) legislation, whether by the supreme power of the state or by subordinate authorities exercising a delegated function. Holland, Jur. Ch. 5.

When used in the concrete, the term law usually has reference to statutes or expressions of the legislative will. "The laws of a state," observes Mr. Justice Story, "are more usually understood to mean the rules and enactments promulgated by the legislative authority thereof, or long-established local customs having the force of laws." 16 Pet. 18. Hence, he argues, "in the ordinary use of language it will hardly be contended that the decisions of courts constitute laws." In the Civil Code of Louisiana they are defined to be "the solemn expression of the legislative will." See 145 U. S. 454.

The constitution of a state is a law of the state, within the meaning of the United States constitution; 148 U. S. 137; but a municipal ordinance is not; 146 U. S. 258.

But, as has already been said, "law" in the abstract involves much more. Thus, a reference in a statute to "the cases provided by law" includes not only those cases provided by former statutes, but also those contemplated by the common or unwritten law; 18 N. Y. 115.

The law of the land, an expression used in Magna Charta and adopted in most of the earlier constitutions of the original states, means, however, something more than the legislative will; it requires the due and orderly proceeding of justice according to the established methods. See 8 Gray 329; 21 Cent. L. J. 147; DUE PROCESS OF LAW.

When the term law is used to denote enactments of the legislative power, it is frequently confined, especially by English writers, to permanent rules of civil conduct, as distinguished from other acts, such as a divorce act, an appropriation bill, an estates act. Report of Eng. Stat. L. Com., March, 1856.

In the United States, the organic law of a state is termed the constitution, and the term "laws" generally designates statutes or legislative enactments, in contradistinction to the constitution. See STATUTES.

Law, as distinguished from equity, denotes the doctrine and procedure of the common law of England and America, from which equity is a departure. As to where separate courts of law and equity are maintained, see EQUITY.

Law is also used in contradistinction to fact. Questions of law are, in general, for the decision of the court; while it is for the jury to pass upon questions of fact. See JURY; JUDICIAL POWER.

In respect to the ground of the authority of law, it is divided as natural law or the law of nature or of God, and positive law.

The classification and arrangement of the law is a subject as to which the lack of systematic discussion is in striking contrast to the measureless volume of treatises upon particular legal topics. The extent to which the latter overlap each other, and thus add to the labor of the patient investigator of any given title, has been frequently suggested, but there is to be found in legal literature little more than the merest recognition of the necessity of a remedy. As to Legal Chaos, see 2 Pol. Sci. Quart. 91.

The familiar analysis based on the arrangement of Blackstone's Commentaries remains after the lapse of more than a century without the recognition of a substitute which warrants the omission of its substance from the place heretofore assigned to it in this title, inadequate as it is.

Like the classification of Blackstone, of much suggestive interest, but inadequate for modern purposes, is Sir Matthew Hale's Analysis of the Law, a posthumous tract frequently bound with the History of the Common Law.

The subject of classification forms a large part of the able work on jurisprudence by Professor Holland, but it is there dealt with in sections, and without any attempt to present as a whole a comprehensive analysis or classification. The work does furnish most valuable material to be used in making one. Of value for similar use will be found Digby's Introduction to the History of the Law of Real Property, appendix to Part I. with tables; papers by O. W. Holmes, Jr., 5 Am. L. Rev. 1; 7 id. 46; Hammond's Blackstone, notes on Book I. Ch. I., and Introduction to Sandars' Justinian. See also an article by Sir Frederick Pollock, "Divisions of Law," 8 Harv. L. Rev. 188, in which he contends that "it is not possible to make any clear-cut division of the subject-matter of legal rules." He discusses some of the more obvious general divisions of the law, but his view as to a complete classification is thus expressed: "Ambitious writers have sometimes gone to work as if it were possible to reduce the whole contents of a legal system to a sort of classified catalogue where there would be no repetition or cross references, and the classification would explain itself. Ambition on that scale is destined to disappointment by the nature of things." The subject was brought to the attention of the American Bar Association in 1888 by a letter of Professor Henry T. Terry, which is printed in the annual report of 1889, p. 327. A committee was appointed, and made a report in 1891, which discussed with much ability the importance of the subject and the difficulty of its practical accomplishment. The conclusion reached was that a classification could only be successfully attempted with respect to one legal system, and that it must be made in harmony with the spirit of the law as it grows and in the light of legal history. The objects are, first, arrangement to enable the mind to comprehend the law as a whole; second, the cataloguing of topics, to the end that authorities may be collected under a well recognized title of each principal topic of the law. The two methods are not consistent, one being required for the jurist and the scholar and the other for the judge and the lawyer. Both, therefore, are needed, but the last is of more general importance. The committee reported a tentative classification under the first head only, leaving the other for a further report, which has not yet been made. Rep. Am. Bar Assn. (1891) 379-403. In 1896, the subject was revived, and a brief report expressed the belief that it was possible "to determine more definitely the sphere of each of the ordinary topics of the law and determine where each subject may be looked for." Rep. Am. Bar Assn. (1896) 405. Nothing further has been done by the committee, which has been continued with the promise of further attention to the subject. Report (1897) 53.

For more elaborate discussions of the subject, see, generally, Austin Lect. Jur. outline of the course; Amos, Science of Jurisprudence; Terry, Anglo-American Law, Ch. XVI.; 94 Am. L. Rev. 911, 874, 1027; 25 id. 317, 322.

Arbitrary law. A law or provision of law so far removed from consideration of abstract justice that it is necessarily founded on the mere will of the law-making power, so that it is rather a rule established than a principle declared. The principle that an infant shall not be bound by his contract is not arbitrary; but the rule that the limit of infancy shall be twenty-one years, not twenty nor twenty-two, is arbitrary.

The term is also sometimes used to signify an unreasonable law,—one that is in violation of justice.

Irrevocable laws. All laws which have not in their nature or in their language some limit or termination provided are, in theory, perpetual; but the perpetuity is liable to be defeated by subsequent abrogation. It has sometimes been attempted to secure an absolute perpetuity by an express provision forbidding any abrogation. But it may well be questioned whether one generation has power to bind their posterity by an irrevocable law. See this subject discussed by Bentham, Works, vol. 2, 402-407; and see Dwarria, Stat. 479.

Municipal law is a system of law proper to any single state, nation, or community. See MUNICIPAL LAW.

A penal law is one which inflicts a penalty for its violation.

Positive law is the system naturally established by a community, in distinction from natural law. See POSITIVE LAW.

Private law is a term used to indicate a statute which relates to private matters which do not concern the public at large.

A prospective law or statute is one which applies only to cases arising after its enactment, and does not affect that which is already past.

A public law is one which affects the public, either generally or in some classes.

A retrospective law or statute is one that turns backward to alter that which is past or to affect men in relation to their conduct before its enactment. These are also called retroactive laws. In general, whenever a retroactive statute would take away vested rights or impair the obligation of contracts, it is in so far void, because opposed to the constitution of the United States; 3 Dall. 391. But laws which only vary the remedies, or merely cure a defect in proceedings, or merely cure a defect in proceedings, or merely cure a defect in proceedings, are valid; 10 S. & R. 102, 103; 15 id. 72; 2 Pet. 380, 627; 8 id. 88; 11 id. 420. See RETROSPECTIVE.

As used in the 5th amendment to the constitution, it embraces all legal and equitable rules defining human rights and duties, and providing for their enforcement; not only as between man and man, but also between the state and its citizens; 30 Pac. Rep. (Utah) 780.

Of the Case. The phrase "law of the case," as applied to the effect of previous orders on the later action of the court rendering them in the same case, merely expresses the practice of courts generally to refuse to open what has been decided—not a limit to their power. 225 U. S. 436.

Of Another State. The "law of another State" is a fact to be pleaded and proved, and in the absence of pleading and proof it will be presumed that the common law is in force, and that it is the same as the common law prevailing in this jurisdiction. 162 Ky. 833, 173 S. W. 162.

Of the State. The "laws of the State" are such enactments as its Legislature promulgates, and as expounded by its courts. 131 Ky. 561, 115 S. W. 703.

Of United States. The expression "law of the United States," referred to in clause 6 of § 250, Judicial Code, regulating appeals from and writs of error to the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia, "embraced only laws of the United States of general operation" and does not therefore include "laws of the United States local in their application to the District of Columbia."

Law is a statement of the circumstances in which the public force will be brought to bear upon men through the courts. But the word commonly is confined to such prophecies or threats when addressed to persons living within the power of the courts. 213 U. S. 356.

LAW AGENTS. In Scotch Law. Solicitors whose qualifications are provided for by 36 and 87 Vic. and several acts of sederunt.

A law agent has a right to retain his client's papers (not being part of a process), which have come lawfully into his possession in the course of his employment, in security of his business account, though incurred before the possession. This is the only case in which writs may be held in pledge as things distinct from the property to which they relate. It gives no active right. The purpose of the possession is immaterial, unless there be an express obligation to surrender the writs when that purpose has been accomplished. They are no security for payment of cash advances or salary or commissions. If the client becomes bankrupt, the agent must surrender the documents to the trustee or liquidator under reservation of his lien. The right gives a preference against all and sundry—the client, his successors, universal and singular, his trustee in bankruptcy, or an inhibitor, but not as against one who has a better title to the writs than the client. A law agent is subject like a counsel to certain unwritten rules of the legal profession. One of these is that in the conduct of a cause he shall follow the directions of counsel, with the resulting benefit of escaping personal liability.

The courts are so jealous of the purity of this important and powerful class of men that they will direct a return of a gift made by a client in excess of the sums fixed for professional charges; and will demand proof of the utmost independence and freedom from undue influence before allowing a testator's legacy to his solicitor to pass. Ersk. Prin. pp. 272, 323, 378.

Any person entitled to practise as an agent for another in a court of law in Scotland. Abbott; M. & W.

LAW OF ARMS. Ordinances which regulated proclamations of war, leagues, treaties, etc. Cowel.

This law was necessary between two strange princes of equal power who have no other method of determining their controversies, because they have no superior or ordinary judge, but are supreme and public persons. Jacob; Treat. Laws 57.

It is a kind of law among all nations, that in case of war, the Prince who conquers gains a right of dominion, as well as property over the things and persons he has subdued. Jacob; Hale's Hist. L. 73, 74.

LAW BORGH. In Old Scotch Law. A pledge or surety for appearance.

LAW-BURROWS. In Scotch Law. Security for the peaceful behavior of a party; security to keep the peace. This process was much resorted to by the government of Charles II. for political purposes.

The action for contravention of law-burrows is penal. It proceeds on a decree of law-burrows (from borgh, a cautioner). The decree is obtained in the sheriff's or justice of the peace court, after service of a petition setting forth dread of bodily harm, and after proof taken—in which parties are competent witnesses. Failing caution, the decree orders imprisonment for not more than six months or fourteen days, according as the case is brought before a sheriff or a justice. The complainant does not require to allotment the defender in prison. Instead of caution being ordered, the defender may be directed, on pain of imprisonment, to give his own bond. So that the old rules are annulled whereby letters of law-burrows (not now issued) did not require the previous citation of the party complained upon, on the ground that the caution which the law required was only for doing what was every man's duty; and that before the letters were executed against him the complainant had to make oath that he dreaded bodily harm from him. These proceedings can only be quashed by suspension or by suspension and liberation on proof of malice and want of probable cause. Ersk. Prin. p. 668.

LAW OF THE CASE. A doctrine which applies to cases in their progress towards final decision. When a point of law has been decided by an intermediate appellate court, that decision is binding on the trial court and on the intermediate appellate court itself in all subsequent stages of the case, until it is carried up to a higher court of appeal. If the decision is by a court of last resort, it is binding on the lower courts on retrial or rehearing. Their duty is to apply that decision to the facts. If the case comes before a court of last resort on second appeal, it is held in some jurisdictions that the court is bound by its own former ruling, even though it be now recognized as erroneous. In other jurisdictions this rule is relaxed for the purpose of correcting palpable error. This doctrine, like that of res judicata (q. v.), applies only to the particular case, and the particular facts in evidence, and they affect only the parties to that case and their privies. Other courts in the same jurisdiction, or the same court subsequently, may reach different conclusions in other cases, similar in facts, but with different parties. Nevertheless, the former case cannot be reopened. The parties have had their day in court, and must abide by the conclusions reached. This doctrine differs from res judicata in that it applies to cases in their progress towards final decision, whereas res judicata applies only to final judgments, by which is meant either judgments by courts of last resort, or by courts not of last resort when the parties to an action have neglected appeal until it is no longer allowable. See RES JUDICATA. Hicks, Mat. & Meth. Leg. Res. 83, 84.

LAW CHARGES. Costs incurred in court in the prosecution of a suit, to be paid by the party cast. 17 La. 206; 11 Rob. La. 28. See 8 Mart. La. 282.

LAW OF CITATIONS. In the Civil Law. The most important of the laws of citation were those enacted by Valentinian III. A. D. 426, which enacted that the writings of the jurists Papinian, Paulus, Ulpian, Gaius, and Modestinus, as well as of all those who were cited by these writers (the limits of classic literature being thus determined), should possess quasi-statutory force so that their opinions should be binding on the judge. If the opinions differed on the same question, that opinion should prevail which was supported by the largest number of the jurists; if the numbers were equal, Papinian's opinion should prevail, or, if Papinian had expressed no opinion on the subject, the judge was to exercise his discretion. Valentinian the Third's law of citations marks the completion, for the time being, of that development which had commenced with the responsa of the old pontifices and the ius respondendi of Augustus. See Sohm, Inst. Rom. L. 84.

LAW CLERK. A person serving a certain period in the office of a practising attorney or solicitor, in order to qualify himself to practice as an attorney or solicitor. Burrill. See ARTICLED CLERK.

LAW COURT OF APPEALS. In American Law. An appellate tribunal, formerly existing in the state of South Carolina, for hearing appeals from the courts of law.

LAW DAY. The day fixed in a mortgage or defeasible deed for the payment of the debt secured. 24 Ala. N. S. 149: 10

Conn. 380; 21 N. Y. 343. This does not occur now until foreclosure, and the use of the term is confusing; 21 N. Y. 343.

IN OLD ENGLISH LAW. A leet or sheriff's tourn. Termes de la Ley. Law day or lage day denoted a day of open court; especially the more solemn courts of a county or hundred. The court-leet, or view of frankpledge.

LAW OF THE FLAG. See FLAG.

LAW FRENCH. See LANGUAGE.

LAW OF THE LAND. The general law; a law which hears before it condemns, which proceeds upon inquiry, and renders judgment only after trial. The meaning is that every citizen shall hold his life, liberty and property, and immunities under the protection of the general rules which govern society. 4 Wheat. 518; 49 Fed. Rep. 833. See DUE PROCESS OF LAW.

LAW LATIN. See LANGUAGE, LATIN.

LAW LIBRARY. A collection of books, manuscripts, pamphlets, etc., relating to legal subjects. Under a bequest of "Law Library and books of antiquity," Dugdale's Monasticon, Domesday Book, and State Trials were held to pass. 4 L. J. O. S. Ch. 74.

LAW LIST. In English Law. An annual publication of a quasi-official character, comprising various statistics of interest in connection with the legal profession. The present law list is prima facie evidence that the persons therein named as solicitors or certified conveyancers are such. 23 & 24 Vict. c. 127.

The contents include, among other information, the following matters: A list of judges, queen's counsel, and sergeants-at-law; the judges of the county courts; benchers of the inns of court; barristers, in alphabetical order; the names of counsel practising in the several circuits of England and Wales; London attorneys; country attorneys; officers of the courts of chancery and common law; the magistrates and law officers of the city of London; the metropolitan magistrates and police; recorders, etc. Abbott; M. & W.

LAW LORDS. In English Law. Peers who have held high judicial office, or have been distinguished in the legal profession. Moz. & W.

LAW OF MARQUE. See LETTER OF MARQUE AND REPRISAL.

LAW MARTIAL. See MILITARY LAW.

LAW MERCHANT. The general body of commercial usages in matters relative to commerce. Blackstone calls it the custom of merchants, and ranks it under the head of the particular customs of England, which go to make up the great body of the common law. 1 Bla. Com. 75. Since, however, its character is not local, nor its obligation confined to a particular district, it cannot with propriety be considered as a custom in the technical sense; 1 Steph. Com. 54. It is a system of law which does not rest exclusively on the positive institutions and local customs of any particular country, but consists of certain principles of equity and usages of trade which general convenience and a common sense of justice have established, to regulate the dealings of merchants and mariners in all the commercial countries of the civilized world. 3 Kent 2.

These usages, being general and extensive, partake of the character of rules and principles of law, not of matters of fact, as do usages which are local or special. They constitute a part of the general law of the land, and, being a part of that law, their existence cannot be proved by witnesses, but the judges are bound to take notice of them ex officio; Winch 24; and this application is not confined to merchants, but extends to all persons concerned in any mercantile transaction. See Beawes, Lex Mercatoria Rediviva; Calaneo, Lex Mercatoria Americana; Comyns, Dig. Merchant (D); Chitty, Com. Law; Pardessus, Droit Commercial; Collection des Lois maritimes antérieures au dix-huitième Siècle, par Dupin; Capmany, Costumbres Maritimas; Il Consolato del Mare; Us et Coutumes de la Mer; Piantandla, Della Giurisprudenza Marittima Commerciale, Antica e Moderna; Valin, Commentaire sur l'Ordonnance de la Marine, du mois d'Août, 1681; Boulay-Paty, Droit Comm.; Boucher, Institutions au Droit Maritime; Parsons, Marit. Law; Smith, Merc. Law.

LAW OF NATIONS. See INTERNATIONAL LAW.

LAW OF NATURE. That law which God, the sovereign of the universe, has prescribed to all men, not by any formal promulgation, but by the internal dictate of reason alone. It is discovered by a just consideration of the agreeableness or disagreeableness of human actions to the nature of man; and it comprehends all the duties which we owe either to the Supreme Being, to ourselves, or to our neighbors: as, reverence to God, self-defence, temperance, honor to our parents, benevolence to all, a strict adherence to our engagements, gratitude, and the like; Erskine, Pr. Sc. Law 1. 1. See Ayliffe, Pand. tit. 2, p. 2; Cicero, de Leg. lib. 1.

The divine will, or the dictate of right reason, showing the moral deformity or moral necessity there is in any act, according to its suitableness or unsuitableness to a reasonable nature. Sometimes used of the law of human reason, in contradistinction to the revealed law, and sometimes of both, in contradistinction to positive law.

They are independent of any artificial connections, and differ from mere presumptions of law in this essential respect, that the latter depend on and are a branch of the particular system of jurisprudence to which they belong; but mere natural presumptions are derived wholly by means of the common experience of mankind, without the aid or control of any particular rule of law, but simply from the course of nature and the habits of society. These presumptions fall within the exclusive province of the jury, who are to pass upon the facts. 3 Bouv. Inst. n. 3064; Greenl. Ev., 15th ed. § 44.

The primitive laws of nature may be reduced to six, namely: comparative sagacity, or reason; self-love; the attraction of the sexes to each other; the tenderness of parents towards their children; the religious sentiment; sociability.

When man is properly organized, he is able to distinguish moral good from moral evil; and the study of man proves that man is not only an intelligent but a free being, and he is, therefore, responsible for his actions. The judgment we form of our good actions produces happiness; on the contrary, the judgment we form of our bad actions produces unhappiness.

Every animated being is impelled by nature to his own preservation, to defend his life and body from injuries, to shun what may be hurtful, and to provide all things requisite to his existence. Hence the duty to watch over his own preservation. Suicide and duelling are, therefore, contrary to this law; and a man cannot mutilate himself, nor renounce his liberty.

The attraction of the sexes has been provided for the preservation of the human race; and this law condemns celibacy. The end of marriage proves that polygamy and polyandry are contrary to the law of nature. Hence it follows that the husband and wife have a mutual and exclusive right over each other.

Man from his birth is wholly unable to provide for the least of his necessities; but the love of his parents supplies for this weakness. This is one of the most powerful laws of nature. The principal duties it imposes on the parents are to bestow on the child all the care its weakness requires, to provide for its necessary food and clothing, to instruct it, to provide for its wants, and to use coercive means for its good, when requisite.

The religious sentiment which leads us naturally towards the Supreme Being is one of the attributes which belong to humanity alone; and its importance gives it the rank of the moral law of nature. From this sentiment arise all the sects and different forms of worship among men.

The need which man feels to live in society is one of the primitive laws of nature whence flow our duties and rights; and the existence of society depends upon the condition that the rights of all shall be respected. On this law are based the assistance, succors, and good offices which men owe to each other, they being unable to provide each every thing for himself. See Jus NATURALE; INTERNATIONAL LAW.

LAW AND ORDER ASSOCIATIONS. Societies formed for the preservation of the public health and morals and the prosecution of those who offend against them.

Knowledge and approval of the members of such a league that one of its officers had retained counsel to prosecute violations of the law, will not render them personally liable for his services, if they believed the expenses incurred would be paid from a fund contributed for that purpose and placed at the disposal of the officers; 133 N. Y. 89.

LAW OF THE ROAD. See RULE OF THE ROAD; NAVIGATION RULES.

LAW SOCIETY. See INCORPORATED LAW SOCIETY.

LAW OF THE STAPLE. See LAW MERCHANT.

LAW REPORTS. See REPORTS.

LAW SOCIETY. See INCORPORATED LAW SOCIETY.

LAW SPIRITUAL. Ecclesiastical law (q. v.).

LAW STUDENT. See PRIVILEGED COMMUNICATIONS.

LAW TERMS. Those periods of the year during which the law courts sit in banc or in full court. See TERM.

LAWFUL. Legal. That which is not contrary to law. That which is sanctioned or permitted by law. That which is in accordance with law. The terms "lawful," "unlawful," and "illegal" are used with reference to that which is in its substance sanctioned or prohibited by the law. The term "legal" is occasionally used with reference to matter of form alone; thus, an oral agreement to convey land, though void by law, is not properly to be said to be unlawful, because there is no violation of law in making or in performing such an agreement; but it is said to be not legal, or not in lawful form, because the law will not enforce it, for want of that written evidence required in such cases.

LAWFUL AGE. Majority. This usually means twenty-one years, but in some of the states, for certain purposes, a woman attains lawful age at eighteen. 4 Md. Ch. 228.

LAWFUL AUTHORITIES. The expression "lawful authorities," used in our treaty with Spain, refers to persons who exercised the power of making grants by authority of the crown. 9 Pet. 711.

LAWFUL CAUSE. Under a statute forbidding a priest to deny the communion without lawful cause, that the person was an open and notorious evil liver was held such a cause. 45 L. J. P. C. 1; 1 P. D. 80.

Whether a coroner's absence is from any lawful or reasonable cause is a question for the judge. Such a cause was his taking a vacation, even though part of it was spent in shooting; 42 L. J. M. C. 41; L. R. 2 C. C. R. 15.

LAWFUL DISCHARGE. Such a discharge in insolvency as exonerates the debtor from his debts. 13 Wheat. 870.

LAWFUL GOODS. Whatever is not prohibited to be exported by the positive law of the country, even though it be contraband of war, for a neutral has a right to carry such goods at his own risk. 1 Johns. Cas. 1; 2 id. 77; id. 120.

LAWFUL HEIR. See HEIR; NEXT OF KIN.

LAWFUL ISSUE. In a devise to A for life, and on her death to her lawful issue, etc., these words are to be given the same effect as "heirs"; 8 Edw. I.; 21 Tex. 804. Under the term lawful issue, bastards cannot take a remainder in a life estate to the mother; 10 B. Mon. 188. See ISSUE.

LAWFUL MONEY. Money which is a legal tender in payment of debts: e. g. gold and silver coined at the mint. 2 Salk. 440; 6 Mod. 7; 3 Ind. 358; 9 How. 244; 3 id. 717; 16 Ark. 83. See Hempst. 236. See GOLD; MONEY.

LAWFUL MONEY OF THE UNITED STATES. Is lawful money of any State or territory. See LAWFUL MONEY.

LAWFUL TRADE. A clause in an insurance policy against loss "in lawful trade" was construed to mean during employment by the owner in lawful trade; 51 L. J. Q. B. 472.

LAWFULLY BEGOTTEN. In a will such a limitation creates an entail. 7 Taunt. 85; 51 L. J. Q. B. 472; 9 Q. B. D. 468; 8 App. Cas. 898.

In such expressions as "lawful heirs," "lawful issue," "heirs lawfully begotten," the words "lawful" or "lawfully begotten" are mere redundances and do not affect the meaning of the words "heir" or "issue." Byrne.

LAWFULLY POSSESSED. In a statute concerning forcible entry and detainer, it is equivalent to peaceably possessed. 45 Mo. 35.

LAWING OF DOGS. Mutilating the fore-feet of mastiffs, to prevent them from running after deer. 3 Bla. Com. 71. See EXPEDITATION; COURT OF REGARD.

LAWLESS COURT. An ancient local English court, said to have been held in Essex once a year, at cock-crowing, without a light or pen and ink, and conducted in a whisper.

LAWLESS MAN. An outlaw.

LAWMAN. A man authorized to declare the law.

Anciently the particular citizen of a Scandinavian community, who acted as a popular spokesman against the king and the court at public assemblies, etc., and the guardian of the law, president both of the legislative bench and of the law courts. The president of the supreme court of Orkney and Shetland while the islands remained under Norse rule. Cent. Dict.

A Danish magistrate in an English town; his office was hereditary. The presiding officer in the Supreme Court of Shetland and Orkney under the rule of the Norse. English.

LAWND or LOUND. Synonymous with frythe (q. v.).

LAWS OF OLERON. See CODE.

LAWS OF WAR. See MILITARY LAW.

LAWSUIT. An action at law, or litigation. This is, however, only the vernacular expression for a case before the courts in which there is a controversy between two parties. Technically we speak of a suit in admiralty or equity, an action at law, a prosecution in a criminal court, etc. The term lawsuit may include an arbitration; 7 Cow. 434.

LAWYER. One skilled in the law. Any person who, for fee or reward, prosecutes or defends causes in courts of record or other judicial tribunals of the United States, or of any of the states, or whose business it is to give legal advice in relation to any cause or matter whatever. Act of July 18, 1866, § 9, Stat. L. 121. See ATTORNEY; BARRISTER; PROCTOR; SOLICITOR.

LAY. In English Law. That which relates to persons or things not ecclesiastical. In the United States, the people are not by law divided, as in England, into ecclesiastical and lay. The law makes no distinction between them. The word is also used in the sense of opposed to professional. Also applied to a share of the profits of a fishing or whaling voyage, allotted to the officers and seamen, in the nature of wages; 3 Story 108.

In Pleading. To state or to allege. The place from whence a jury are to be summoned is called the venue, and the allegation in the declaration of the place where the jury is to be summoned is, in technical language, said to lay the venue. 3 Steph. Com. 574; 3 Bouvier, Inst. n. 2830.

To lay damages. To state at the conclusion of the declaration the amount of damages which the plaintiff claims. And. Steph. Pl. § 220.

LAY CORPORATION. See CORPORATION.

LAY DAYS. In Maritime Law. The time allowed to the master of a vessel for loading and unloading the same. In the absence of any custom to the contrary, Sundays are to be computed in the calculation of lay days at the port of discharge; 10 M. & W. 831. See 3 Esp. 121; 3 Kent 203; 2 Steph. Com. 141; 65 Hun 625. See DEMURRAGE.

LAY FEE. A fee held by ordinary feudal tenure, as distinguished from the ecclesiastical tenure of frankalmoign, by which an ecclesiastical corporation held of the donor. The tenure of frankalmoign is reserved by stat. 12 Car. II., which abolished military tenures. 1 Bla. Com. 101.

LAY IMPROPRIATOR. Lay rector, to whom the greater tithes are reserved, the lesser going to the vicar. 1 Burn, Eccl. Law 75, 76.

LAY INVESTITURE. See INVESTITURE; ANNULUS ET BACULUS.

LAY OUT. This term has come to be used technically in highway laws as embracing all the series of acts necessary to the complete establishment of a highway. 28 Conn. 363; 121 Mass. 382; 83 Me. 514. See 11 Ired. 94.

LAY PEOPLE. Jurymen. Finch, Law 381.

LAYING THE VENUE. See LAY.

LAYMAN. In Ecclesiastical Law. One who is not an ecclesiastic nor a clergyman. One who is not a member of the legal profession. One who is not a member of any profession.

LAZARET, LAZARETTO. A place, selected by public authority, where vessels coming from infected or unhealthy countries are required to perform quarantine. See HEALTH.

LEA. Pasture. Co. Litt. 4 b.

LEROI'S AVISERA, or LA REINE S'AVISERA. The king will consider of it. This phrase is used by the English monarch when he gives his dissent to an act passed by the lords and commons. This power was last exercised in the year 1707, by Queen Anne; May, P. L. ch. 18. The same formula was used by the king of the French for the same purpose. 1 Toullier, n. 52. See VETO.

LE ROI LE VEUT. The king assents. This is the formula used in England, and formerly in France, when the king approved of a bill passed by the legislature. 1 Toullier, n. 52.

LE ROI VEUT EN DELIBERER. The king will deliberate on it. This is the formula which the king of the French used when he intended to veto an act of the legislative assembly. 1 Toullier, n. 42.

LEADING A USE. A term applied to a deed executed before a fine is levied, declaring the use of the fine: i. e. specifying to whose use the fine shall enure. If executed after the fine, it is said to declare the use. 2 Bla. Com. 368. See DEED.

LEADING CASE. A case decided by a court of last resort, which decides some particular point in question, and to which reference is constantly or frequently made, for the purpose of determining the law in similar questions.

Many elements go to the constitution of a case as a leading case: among which are, the priority of the case, the character of the court, the amount of consideration given to the question, the freedom from collateral matters or questions. The term is applied to cases as leading either in a particular state or at common law. A very convenient means of digesting the law upon any subject is found to be the selection of a leading case upon the subject, and an arrangement of authorities illustrating the questions decided. See B. & H. Lead. Cr. Cas. 2 v.; Sn. Lead. Cas.; Sm. L. Cas. Comm. L.; Hare & W. Sel. Dec. 2 v.; Tudor, Cas. R. P. 1 v.; Tudor, L. Cas. Merc. L. 1 v.; Sedgwick, Damages; Bigelow, L. C. The French Causés Célèbres correspond to the English state trials.

LEADING COUNSEL. That one of two or more counsel employed on the same side in a cause who has the principal management of the cause. Sometimes called the leader. So called as distinguished from the other, who is called the junior counsel.

LEADING QUESTION. In Practice. A question which puts into the witness' mouth the words to be echoed back, or plainly suggests the answer which the party wishes to get from him. 7 S. & R. 171; 4 Wond. 247. In that case the examiner is said to lead him to the answer. It is not always easy to determine what is or is not a leading question.

Such questions cannot, in general, be put to a witness in his examination in chief; 3 Binn. 130; 1 Phill. Ev. 221; 1 Stark. Ev. 123; unless he is a hostile witness; 43 Ill. App. 180. But, in an examination in chief, questions may be put to lead the mind of the witness to the subject of inquiry; and they are allowed when it appears that the witness wishes to conceal the truth or to favor the opposite party, or where from the nature of the case the mind of the witness cannot be directed to the subject of inquiry without a particular specification of such subject; 1 Campb. 43; 1 Stark. 100; 49 Ill. App. 357; 53 Mo. App. 383. The permitting of such questions is within the discretion of the trial court; 35 Neb. 831; 97 Ala. 681; 75 Hun 17; 85 Wis. 615; 91 Ga. 319; 154 U. S. 134; 52 Mo. App. 102. Where the answers of a witness have taken by surprise the party calling him, the court may permit such party to put leading questions to the witness; 154 U. S. 134.

In cross-examinations, the examiner has generally the right to put leading questions; 1 Stark. Ev. 132; Whart. Ev. § 501; but not perhaps when the witness has a bias in his favor; Best, Ev. 805. See WITNESS.

As the allowance of leading questions to a witness is largely in the discretion of the trial judge, the appellate court will reverse for such cause only where it appears that this discretion has been abused; 91 Mich. 611; 189 Ill. 644.

While it cannot be safely said that in no case can a court of errors take notice of an exception of the trial court in permitting leading questions, such conduct must appear to be a plain case of the abuse of discretion: 138 U. S. 271.

LEAGUE. A measure of length, which consists of three geographical miles. The jurisdiction of the United States extends into the sea a marine league. See Acts of Congress of June 5, 1794, 1 Story, Laws 352; and April 20, 1818, 3 Story, Laws 1694; 1 Wait, State Papers 195.

A conspiracy to do an unlawful act. The term is but little used.

An agreement or treaty between states. Leagues between states are of several kinds: First, leagues offensive and defensive, by which two or more nations agree not only to defend each other, but to carry on war against their common enemies. Second, defensive, but not offensive, obliging each to defend the other against any foreign invasion. Third, leagues of simple amity, by which one contracts not to invade, injure or offend the other: this usually includes the liberty of mutual commerce and trade, and the safeguard of merchants and traders in each other's domain. Bacon, Abr. Prerogative (D 4). See CONFEDERACY; CONSPIRACY; PEACE; TRUCE; WAR.

LEAKAGE. The waste which has taken place in liquids, by their escaping out of the casks or vessels in which they were kept. See 107 Mass. 140, 145.

By the act of March 2, 1790, s. 59, it is provided that there be an allowance of two per cent. for leakage on the quantity which shall appear by the gauge to be contained in any cask of liquors subject to duty by the gallon, and ten per cent. on all beer, ale, and porter in bottles, and five per cent. on all other liquors in bottles, to be deducted from the invoice quantity, in lieu of breakage; or it shall be lawful to compute the duties on the actual quantity, to be ascertained by tale, at the option of the importer, to be made at the time of entry.

Where in a bill of lading a clause is inserted exempting the owner of the ship from loss caused by "rust, leakage, or breakage," he will be liable if damage from these causes be occasioned by the negligence of himself or his servants in stowing; L. R. 2 A. & E. 375; 38 L. J. Adm. 63; 37 L. J. C. P. 3; L. R. 3 C. P. 14; 52 L. J. Q. B. 230; 10 Q. B. D. 521. The primary and natural meaning of the stipulation is that the shipowner will not be answerable if the thing comprised in the bill of lading shall itself rust, leak, or break, and therefore it furnishes him no protection against his liability to compensate for consequential damage happening to that thing by reason of some other thing's rusting, leaking, or breaking; 48 L. J. C. P. 402; 2 C. P. D. 432.

LEAL. Loyal; that which belongs to the law.

LEAP YEAR. See BISSEXTILE.

LEARNING. Doctrine. 1 Leon. 77.

LEASE. A species of contract for the possession and profits of lands and tenements either for life or for a certain period of time, or during the pleasure of the parties.

A conveyance by way of demise, always for a less term than the party conveying has in the premises. Tayl. Landl. & Ten. § 16; 47 Minn. 189.

One of its essential properties is, that its duration must be for a shorter period than the duration of the interest of the lessor in the land; for if he disposes of his entire interest it becomes an assignment, and is not a lease. In other words, the granting of a lease always supposes that the grantor reserves to himself a reversion in the leased premises.

And a distinction is to be noted between a lease and a mere agreement for a lease. The whole question, however, resolves itself into one of construction, and an instrument is to be considered either a lease or an agreement for a lease, according to what appears to be the intention of the parties; 26 Pick. 401; 16 Barb. 621; 9 Ad. & E. 644; 81 Me. 56; 75 N. C. 154; though, generally, if there are apt words of demise followed by possession, the instrument will be held a lease; 8 N. Y. 44; 3 C. & P. 441; 102 Mass. 892; 4 Ad. & E. 325; otherwise, if a fuller lease is to be prepared and executed before the demise is to take effect and possession to be given; 21 Vt. 172; 24 Wend. 201; 3 Stor. 325; 4 Conn. 238; 75 Ill. 44; L. R. 2 Ex. Div. 355; 5 B. & C. 41.

The party who leases is called the lessor, he to whom the lease is made the lessee, and the compensation or consideration of the lease is the rent. The words lease and demise are frequently used to signify the estate or interest conveyed; but they properly apply to the instrument of conveyance. When a lessee parts with the estate granted to him, reserving any portion thereof, however small, he makes an underlease; Tayl. L. & T. § 16; 5 Den. 454; 36 N. Y. 569; 12 Iowa 319; 16 Johns. 150.

The estate created by a lease, when for years, is called a term (terminus), because its duration is limited and determined,—its commencement as well as its termination being ascertained by an express agreement of the parties. And this phrase signifies not only the limitation of time or period granted for the occupation of the premises, but includes also the estate or interest in the land that passes during such period. A term, however, is perfected only by the entry of the lessee; for previous to this the estate remains in the lessor, the lessee having a mere right to enter, which right is called an interesse termini; 1 Washb. R. P. 292, 297; 5 Co. 123 b; Co. Litt. 46 b; 1 B. & Ald. 593.

Any thing corporeal or incorporeal lying in livery or in grant may be the subject-matter of a lease; and therefore not only lands and houses, but commons, ways, fisheries, franchises, estovers, annuities, rent charges, and all other incorporeal hereditaments, are included in the common-law rule; Shepp. Touchst. 208; 110 Mass. 175; 24 Mich. 279; 33 N. Y. 251; 66 Me. 229; 17 C. E. Green 130; 27 Conn. 164. Rent cannot properly be said ever to issue out of chattels; 3 H. & M. 470; 35 Barb. 295; 15 Ohio, N. S. 186; 5 Rep. 16; but goods, chattels, or live stock upon or about real property may be leased with it and a rent contracted for, to issue from the whole, upon which an action for rent in arrear may be maintained as upon such lease; Co. Litt. 57 a; 31 Pa. 20; 24 Wend. 76; 9 Paige 310.

Leases are made either by parol or by deed. The former mode embraces all cases where the parties agree either orally or by a writing not under seal. The technical words generally made use of in the written instrument are, "demise, grant, and to farm let;" but no particular form of expression is required in any case to create an immediate demise; 9 Ad. & E. 650; 15 Wend. 379; 111 Mass. 30; 71 Ill. 317; 7 Blackf. 403; 12 Me. 135; 6 Watts 362; 1 Den. 602; Will. R. P. 327; 83 Ind. 536; 72 Pa. 286; 66 Mo. 430. An ordinary receipt expressing the nature and terms of the tenancy may be considered a lease; 111 Mass. 30; 78 Ill. 317. Any permissive holding is, in fact, sufficient for the purpose, and it may be contained in any written memorandum by which it appears to have been the intention of one of the parties voluntarily to dispossess himself of the premises for any given period, and of the other to assume the possession for the same period; Tayl. L. & T. § 26; 1 Washb. R. P. 300.

By the English statute of frauds of 29 Car. II. c. 3, §§ 1, 2, 3, it is declared that "all leases, estates, or terms of years, or any uncertain interest in lands, created by livery only, or by parol, and not put in writing and signed by the party, should have the force and effect of leases or estates at will only, except leases not exceeding the term of three years, whereupon the rent reserved during the term shall amount to two third parts of the full improved value of the thing demised."

"And that no lease or estate, either of freehold or term of years, should be assigned, granted, or surrendered unless in writing." The principles of this statute have been adopted, with some modifications, in nearly all the states of the Union. 4 Kent 95; 1 Hill. Abr. 130. For a summary of the provisions of the statutes in the various states, see Browne, Frauds. App.; 18 Stms. Am. Stat. L. §§ 4143, 1471; and for the provisions as to a particular state, reference should be made to its statutes. See STATUTE OF FRAUDS.

It has been held that a lease to take effect in future is not within the statute of frauds; 5 N. Y. 463; 61 id. 518; 53 Mich. 462; contra, 19 Ill. 576; 78 id. 125; 8 Ore. 251; and see note on these authorities, 23 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 387. A tenancy from year to year is not a lease or a "term" exceeding one year within the statute; 60 Wis. 1.

As to the surrender or assignment of parol leases for less than three years, it is said that with the exception of Connecticut, perhaps, Pennsylvania stands alone in denying the English rule which holds such parol assignments invalid; Browne, Frauds § 46. See also 16 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 641, where both the English and Pennsylvania cases are collected.

A lease signed by an agent who had no written authority to do so, and also executed by the lessee, was held void within the statute of frauds; 2 Cal. 603; and such a lease cannot be effective as evidence until the agency is shown by evidence of equal dignity; 19 La. Ann. 158.

A written agreement is generally sufficient to create a term of years. But in England, by statute, all leases that are required to be in writing must also be under seal; 8 & 9 Vict. c. 100. See 77 Cal. 286. In Massachusetts and Maryland, leases for more than seven years must be by deed. 30 in Virginia, of those for more than five, and in Delaware, Rhode Island, and Vermont, of those for more than one. A letting by parol for a sum certain per month, without anything being said about a year, constitutes a lease from month to month, and not a lease from year to year; 100 Pa. 206. A lease is valid and binding on the lessee, who has signed the same and occupied the premises under it, though it is not signed by the lessor; 71 Hun 536.

All persons seized of lands or tenements may grant leases of them, unless they happen to be under some legal disability: as, of unsound mind, immature age, or the like; 8 C. & P. 676. See as to infants, 10 Pet. 63; 7 Cow. 179; 11 Johns. 539; 3 Mod. 310. Contracts by them are voidable only and not void, and may be affirmed or disaffirmed by them on attaining their majority; 17 Wend. 119; 29 Vt. 465; 11 Johns. 539; 0 Conn. 494. As to persons of unsound mind, see 3 Camp. 126; 51 N. Y. 384; 11 Pick. 304; 8 C. & P. 679; intoxicated persons, 2 Paige 30; 19 Ves. 16; 4 Harring. 295; married women, Sm. L. & T. 43; 1 Tayl. L. & T. § 101. The execution of a lease by an authorized agent of a corporation is valid and effectual to create a term without the use of the corporate seal; 43 N. J. L. 329; 87 Ind. 505. A lease made by one railroad corporation to another, neither of which is expressly authorized by law to enter into the lease, is ultra vires and void; 131 U. S. 371; 130 id. 1. See PARTIES; CONTRACTS. But it is essential to the validity of a lease that the lessor has, at the time he undertakes to make the grant, possession of the premises; otherwise, whatever he does will amount to nothing more than the assignment of a chose in action; Cro. Car. 109; Shepp. Touchst. 260. But possession is always presumed to follow the title unless there is a clearly marked adverse possession.

And although a lease may not be sufficient to authorize a lessee to demand possession for the want of a possessory title in his lessor, it will still operate by way of estoppel, and enure to his benefit if the lessor afterwards comes into possession of the land before the expiration of the lease; Bacon, Abr. Leases (1 4); 61 N. Y. 6; 7 M. &

G. 701; 3 Pick. 53; 18 How. 82; 8 Watts 60; 2 Hill N. Y. 554; 16 Johns. 110, 201; 5 Ark. 693. See 8 Wash. 603.

The power to lease will, of course, depend upon the extent of the lessor's estate in the premises; and if he has but an estate for life, his lease can only be coextensive therewith; when for a term of years, its commencement as well as its termination must be ascertained, for certainty in these respects is of the essence of a term of years. But although this term may not at first appear to be certain, it may be rendered so by reference to some fact or event; id certum est quod certum reddi potest. Thus, if a lease be made to a man for so many years as he has in the manor of Dale, and he happens to have a term of two years in that manor, the lease will be good for that period; Co. Litt. 45 b; 1 M. & W. 533; 3 Co. 340; 97 Mass. 200; 102 id. 93; 10 R. I. 335.

Lord Coke states that, originally, express terms could not endure beyond an ordinary generation of forty years, lest men might be disinherited; but the doctrine had become antiquated even in his day, and at the present time there is no limitation to a term of years except in the state of New York, where land cannot be leased for agricultural purposes for a longer period than twelve years; see Co. Litt. 45 b, 46 a; 18 Ohio 334; 1 Washb. R. P. 310; 41 N. Y. 430; 62 N. Y. 524.

In all leases of uncertain duration, or if no time has been agreed upon for the continuation of the term, or if after the expiration of a term the tenant continues to hold over, without any effort on the part of the landlord to remove him, the tenancy is at the will of either party. And it remains at will until after the payment and receipt of rent on account of a new tenancy, or until the parties concur in some other act which recognizes the existence of a tenancy, from which event it becomes a tenancy from year to year, invested with the qualities and incidents of the original tenancy. After this, neither party has a right to terminate it before the expiration of the current year upon which they have entered, nor then without having first given due notice to the other party of his intention to do so. See 128 Pa. 390; 85 Ky. 280; 62 Mich. 141. The length of this notice is regulated by the statutes of the different states; 11 Wend. 610; 4 Ired. 294; 3 Zab. 111. Where a person enters in possession under a verbal lease for one month and continues in possession thereafter, paying rent monthly, in contemplation of law a new letting commences with each monthly term; 37 Ill. App. 160. See LANDLORD AND TENANT.

When leases provide for the renewal of the term, such renewal is a mere continuance of the old term, for the preservation and protection of rights acquired therein; 49 N. J. Eq. 619. See 61 Hun 521. A lease for a term exceeding the period prescribed by the statute against perpetuities is not void on that account, as it does not suspend the power of alienation; 81 Hun 566.

The formal parts of a lease by deed are: first, the date, which will fix the time for its commencement, unless some other period is specified in the instrument itself for that purpose; but if there is no date, or an impossible one, the time will be considered as having commenced from the delivery of the deed; 2 Johns. 230; 4 B. & C. 908; 17 Wend. 103; 12 N. H. 52. Second, the names of the parties, with respect to which the law knows but one Christian name; and therefore the middle letter of the name of either party is immaterial, and a person may always show he is as well known by one name as another; 14 Pet. 322; 36 Ill. 362; 55 N. Y. 380. The entire omission of the lessee's name from a lease will render the instrument simply void; 8 Md. 118; 24 N. Y. 336; 6 Allen 305; 19 Iowa 290; 2 Wall. 24. See 25 Hun 136; 116 Mass. 155; 33 Ind. 94; 40 Conn. 522. Third, recitals of title or other circumstances of the case. Fourth, some consideration must appear, although it need not be what is technically called rent, or a periodical render of compensation for the use of the premises; but it may be a sum in gross, or the natural affection which one party has for the other. It may also consist of grain, animals, or the personal services of the lessee; 3 Hill N. Y. 345; 1 Spears 408; Tayl. L. & T. § 152; 29 Barb. 171; or a promise to pay rent; 107 Ill. 33; and when the lease does not stipulate for the cessation of rent upon the destruction of a building by fire, or that the lessor shall repair, a tenant is not relieved from the payment of rent by a partial destruction of the building; 85 Ala. 99. See LANDLORD AND TENANT. Fifth, the operative words of the lease are usually "demise, grant, lease, and to farm let;" 50 N. Y. 414; 53 N. H. 513; 27 Md. 173. Sixth, the description of the premises need not specify all the particulars of the subject-matter of the demise, for the accessories will follow the principal thing named; thus, the garden is parcel of a dwelling-house, and the general description of a farm includes all the houses and lands appertaining to the farm; 9 Conn. 374; 11 C. E. Green 82; 4 Rawle 330; 9 Cow. 747; 72 Mich. 438; 41 I. H. 337; and a building includes the land on which it stands; 37 Minn. 4. But whether certain premises are parcel of the demise or not is always matter of evidence; 14 Barb. 434; 9 B. & C. 870; 14 B. Mon. 8. Seventh, the rights and liabilities of the respective parties are regulated by law in the absence of any particular agreement in respect thereto; but express covenants are usually inserted in a lease, for the purpose of limiting or otherwise defining their rights and duties in relation to repairs, taxes, insurance renewals, residence on the premises, modes of cultivation, fixtures, and the like. Certain covenants are also implied in law from the use of certain technical terms in leases. The intention of the parties to a lease must be gathered from the instrument taken as a whole; 83 Va. 819.

In every well-drawn lease, provision is made for a forfeiture of the term in case the tenant refuses to pay rent, commits waste, or is guilty of a breach of the covenant to repair, insure, reside upon the premises, or the like. This clause enables the lessor or his assigns to re-enter in any such event upon the demised premises and eject the tenant, leaving both parties in the same condition as if the lease were a nullity; but in the absence of a proviso for re-entry the lessor would possess no such power, the mere breach of a covenant enabling him to sue for damages only; 3 Wils. 127; 2 Cow. 591; 2 Overton 233; 1 Dutch. 285; 15 Cal. 233. The forfeiture will generally be enforced by the courts, except where the landlord's damages are a mere matter of computation and can be readily compensated by money; 7 Johns. 285; 4 Munf. 832; 2 Price 200; 44 Vt. 285; 9 Hare 688; 5 R. I. 144; 60 Pa. 131; 30 Vt. 415; 81 Conn. 469; 40 N. H. 434. One condition essential to the forfeiture of a lease by the lessor is a demand of the rent; 140 U. S. 25; 35 Neb. 766. But in case of a forfeiture for the non-payment of rent, the proviso is allowed to operate simply as a security for rent, and the tenant will be relieved from its effects at any time by paying the landlord or bringing into court the amount of all arrears of rent, with interest and costs. The right to terminate the lease for the non-payment of rent will not give the lessee any right to avoid the lease or his liability for agreed rent; 150 U. S. 665; 11 Tex. Civ. App. 701.

Where under a provision in a lease that if the lessee keeps all its conditions he may purchase the land, the acceptance of the landlord of the rent after it is due, without objection, waives a breach of the condition as to the time of its payment; 30 Atl. Rep. (Vt.) 686.

A lease may be surrendered by any agreement between the parties that the term shall be terminated, which is irrevocably acted upon by both; 84 Neb. 455; but a mere agreement, unless accompanied by the act, is inoperative; 41 Ill. App. 223.

A lease may also be terminated before the prescribed period if the premises are required to be taken for public uses or improvements, or the subject-matter of demise wholly perishes or is turned into a house of ill-fame; 29 Barb. 116; 119 Mass. 28; 46 N. Y. 297; 38 Mo. 143; 58 Pa. 271; 118 Mass. 125; 38 Cal. 259; 5 Ohio 303. A lessor who knows that the premises are to be used for gambling cannot recover rent; 62 Ill. App. 134. The same result will follow when the tenant purchases the fee, or the fee descends to him as heir at law; for in either case the lease is merged in the inheritance; since there would be a manifest inconsistency in allowing the same person to hold two distinct estates immediately expectant on each other, while one of them includes the time of both, thus uniting the two opposite characters of landlord and tenant; 2 C. & P. 317; 25 Ill. 19; 6 Johns. Ch. 417; 13 Pa. 18; Tayl. L. & T. § 502. A lease of land is not terminated by the death of the lessee, but an action will lie against his administrator for rent during the remainder of the term; 69 Miss. 664.

A provision in a lease that the lessee may buy the land "at the option of the parties" means that the lessee may buy at his own option; 30 Atl. Rep. (Vt.) 686.

The general rule that a deed cannot be varied by parol applies to leases, and it has been enforced with respect to their date; 8 Scott, N. R. 48; the amount of the rent; 1 Man. & Gr. 539; the contemporaneous grant of rights and privileges inconsistent with the terms of the lease; 19 Cal. 354; 17 La. Ann. 153; time of payment of rent; 7 Blackf. 309; that the lessee agreed to pay taxes; 6 Ves. Jr. 334, n.; or that the lessor, at the time of the lease, agreed to repair; 2 E. D. Sm. 248; though a subsequent agreement for a consideration may be proved; 5 Sandf. 512; 67 N. W. Rep. (Minn.) 1026; but an allegation that the lessee was induced to occupy the premises by the lessor's promise to put in fixtures, made after the execution of the lease, does not show such consideration; 32 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 438. See as to this rule, generally, and the exceptions to it, PAROL EVIDENCE; CONTRACT; DEED. It was held that the question whether there had been a modification, as between lessor and lessee, was for the jury unless it was admitted by the pleadings; 57 Mo. App. 454.

An assignment of a lease does not become complete and valid until there is consent by the proposed assignee; 7 Mont. 320.

An agreement not to assign without the written consent of the lessor does not bind the lessee where he signs the lease, and at the request of the lessor assigns it to a third person, to whom it is never, in fact, delivered; 114 Cal. 511.

There is no implied warranty on the part of a landlord that a building is adapted for the purposes for which it is leased; 70 Tex. 727; 132 N. Y. 306; 158 Mass. 348.

A corporation authorized to hold real estate may lease its real estate, to be used in a business different to that which the corporation is authorized to carry on; 6 A. & E. Corp. Cas. N. S. (Mass.) 247. A corporation may lease a portion of its real estate to its directors subject to ratification by the stockholders; id. See also 122 N. Y. 91; 49 Minn. 483. As to the nature of the interest and liability for rent under gas and oil leases, see GAS; OIL. See, generally, LANDLORD AND TENANT.

Lease of railroad. A lease by a railroad company of all its road, rolling stock, and franchises, for which no authority is given in its charter, is ultra vires and void; 101 U. S. 71, the leading case. The decision is based upon the ground that such a company exercises its functions in a large measure for the public good, and that it is forbidden by public policy to disable itself to perform its duties to the public without the consent of the state; id. The ordinary clause in a charter authorizing the company to contract with other transportation companies for the mutual transfer of goods and passengers over each other's roads does not authorize a lease of the road and its franchises; id. Unless specially authorized by its charter or some legislative action, a railroad company cannot, by lease or other contract, turn over to another company for a long period of time its road and appurtenances or the use of its franchises and the exercise of its powers, nor can any other railroad company make a contract to run and operate such road, property, and franchises. Such a contract is not among the ordinary powers of a railroad company; 118 U. S. 290. See also 130 id. 1; 88 Ala. 573; 115 Mass. 347; 24 Neb. 148; 34 N. J. Eq. 455; 63 Me. 69; 98 N. Y. 609; 66 Tex. 49. If it were otherwise, a railroad company, by leasing its road to irresponsible persons, might enjoy all the benefits conferred by its charter and practically leave the public generally, as well as individuals, without any of the protection which the obligations imposed by its charter, as well as the general law of the state, were designed to afford; 28 S. C. 401. The authority to the lessee company to make such lease is not authority to the lessor company for that purpose; 130 U. S. 1. Where a railroad company of New Jersey leased its franchise and roads to a railway corporation of another state, the lease being not only not authorized, but expressly forbidden by law, and its effect being to combine coal producers and carriers of anthracite coal, it was held to be an excess of corporate power which tended to monopoly and the public injury; 51 Am. & Eng. R. Cas. 1; 24 Atl. Rep. (N. J.) 984; and the lessor road is subject to forfeiture; 33 Am. & Eng. R. Cas. 383.

A valid lease will not release the lessor from the obligation to discharge its charter obligations, unless the law authorizing it contains a provision to this effect; 63 Me. 68; 23 Am. & Eng. R. Cas. 50.

Power under the law to mortgage or sell property, or lease it for a term, does not extend to the franchises of a corporation, including the right of way and other property essential to such franchises; 1 Tex. App. 163.

A corporation of one state lawfully leasing a railroad in another state is, as to it, subject to local legislation to the extent to which the lessee would have been subject had there been no lease; 116 U. S. 347. The laws of a state granting to a railroad company authority to lease its roads do not authorize a lease of a part of it which runs in the Indian country, without the consent of the United States expressly given; 40 Fed. Rep. 380.

A lease is not necessarily void because it extends beyond the time of the lessor's corporate existence, it may be valid for the period of the company's corporate existence; 19 Abb. N. C. 193. The fact that the majority of the directors of a lessor company are personally interested in the lessee company will not make the lease void, but merely voidable at the election of the lessor, or at the suit of stockholders brought within a reasonable time; 43 Fed. Rep. 483.

Where the rental was reduced by directors who were substantially the same in both companies, it was held that this action was voidable at the election of either company, so far as the power of the directors was concerned, but that as their act had been approved by the stockholders, it was valid; 11 N. Y. S. R. 732. But where the rental was reduced on account of the financial embarrassment of the lessee, it was held within the power of the board of directors; 39 Am. & Eng. R. Cas. 199.

A lessee is not estopped to deny the validity of a lease by the fact that he has paid rental under it for three years; 145 U. S. 53; but see 98 N. Y. 609; but a stockholder who has waited nineteen years cannot then object; 33 Fed. Rep. 440.

Two railroads contracted that one should operate the other for a term of years, the operating road to receive 85 per cent. of the gross earnings of the line so operated, and out of the remaining 85 per cent. pay interest on the road's bonds, and pay the residue to the company owning the road; this was held not to be a lease; 7 Am. & Eng. R. Cas. 249; 102 Ill. 492.

A corporation in debt cannot transfer its entire property by lease so as to prevent the application of the property at its full value to the satisfaction of its debts; 184 U. S. 276; where a company which was in debt had transferred its entire property by lease so as to prevent the application of it to the satisfaction of its debts, equity may decree the payment by the lessee of a judgment debt of the lessor; 118 U. S. 116; 118 id. 376; 26 Fed. Rep. 820.

A lease requires the consent of a majority of the stockholders, which must be expressed at a stockholders' meeting; 12 Fed. Rep. 513; 87 id. 307; 188 Mass. 123; 14 Abb. N. C. 103; 15 Am. & Eng. R. Cas. 1; so also does a modification of a lease; id.; and the action of a majority of the stockholders in favor of a lease will not be upheld where it appears that the interests of the minority will be seriously prejudiced by it; 41 N. J. Eq. 1. But it has been held that if power to lease its railroad is conferred upon a corporation by its charter or by statute, the board of directors may execute a lease thereof; 39 Am. & Eng. R. Cas. 199. Where one company owns substantially all the stock and bonds of another, a lease of the latter's line is not void for want of consideration; 51 Am. & Eng. R. Cas. 162; 51 Fed. Rep. 309. The mere fact that the same persons were directors of both corporations is not of itself sufficient to avoid the lease at the instance of stockholders against the will of the corporation. The fact alone might entitle either corporation to avoid the lease, but does not give the right to a stockholder; 12 Hun 460. The lease of a railroad does not dissolve the corporation, and it remains liable for debts incurred prior to the lease; 1 Fed. Rep. 700. A lessee assumes all the duties of the lessor in relation to the property as well as its rights and privileges, but this would not include the payment of the debts of lessor; 131 U. S. 371; 35 Fed. Rep. 444.

Where a lease of a railroad provided for the payment of the net earnings to mortgage bondholders who were creditors of the lessor, the agreement between the lessor and lessee, having been assented to by the bondholders, operated as an irrevocable assignment to them of the net earnings; 78 Fed. Rep. 690.

Without a law authorizing it, railroads cannot guarantee the performance of a lease of a road entered into by two other roads, the leased road being outside of the states creating the guaranteeing roads, and not connecting with their lines; 24 Am. & Eng. R. Cas. 58; 118 U. S. 290.

Where, under a void lease, the property had been used for a time, the railroad company may recover compensation for the use of its property; 2 Fed. Rep. 117; 118 U. S. 290; see 139 U. S. 24; but a lessee, who had received nothing, but had been paying out money under a void contract, cannot be compelled to pay more money under the same contract; 118 U. S. 290; but relief in such case must be based on the invalidity of the contract, and not in aid of its enforcement; 118 U. S. 290. The lessee of a railroad under a lease which all parties admit to be illegal, cannot be compelled by mandamus to operate the road; 42 Fed. Rep. 638.

Where a railroad lease for ninety-nine years contained covenants for monthly instalments of rent to keep the road in repair, etc., a bill which shows failure to pay rent, depreciation of the road, and a combination between the guarantors of the lease and the lessee to divert the earnings of the road to the benefit of the guarantors, presents a case of equitable jurisdiction when it prays for the specific performance of the obligations of the lease. A suit at law on each instalment of rent is not an adequate remedy; 118 U. S. 290.

A lease does not vest in the lessee the right of eminent domain as to the lessor company; 109 Mass. 103; 14 Neb. 339; 117 Ill. 611.

A receiver does not become liable upon the covenants of a lease because of his position of receiver, but only by virtue of an election to adopt the lease, if he sees fit to make such election; and even if the lessee is solvent, the lessor cannot force upon the receiver the adoption of the lease; 77 Fed.

Rep. 700. It is well settled that a receiver may take and retain possession of leasehold interests for such period as will enable him to elect intelligently whether it is best to adopt the lease or return the property; 74 Fed. Rep. 91; 143 U. S. 331; 145 id. 82; 150 id. 287; 58 Fed. Rep. 257, 268; and he is not required to pay rental for a depot property as stipulated by the railway company, and is liable only for a reasonable rental if he occupies the property; 74 Fed. Rep. 88; 145 U. S. 82. He takes possession of leasehold property and holds for the court; id. The appointment of a receiver is not an eviction of a lessee; 8 Biss. 456.

As to the relative liability of the lessor and lessee for injuries committed in the operation of the road, the following rules have been laid down in a recent work on the law of railroads: 1. The lessee is liable for all injuries resulting from the negligent operation of the road. 2. Where the lease is void the liability of the lessor continues. 3. Where the lease is valid, some authorities hold that the lessor is relieved from liability for injuries resulting from the negligent operation of the road; 86 Va. 639; 14 Ore. 426; 63 Tex. 549; 14 S. W. Rep. (Ky.) 848. But the last rule admits of serious question, unless the lease contains a specific provision for the lessor's exemption from liability; 70 Ga. 404; 119 Ill. 68; 26 Neb. 159; 145 Mass. 64. Some of the cases hold that the lessor cannot be relieved from liability unless there is express authority in the statute; 57 Fed. Rep. 165; 21 Am. & Eng. R. Cas. 228; 25 id. 497; 119 Ill. 68; 26 Neb. 159. See also Wood, Railroads 2034. In 80 Me. 62, the rule was thus laid down: "An unauthorized lease without any exemption clause absolves the lessor from the torts of the lessee resulting from negligence in the general management of the leased road over which the lessor could have no control. But for an injury resulting from the negligent omission of some duty owing to the public, such as the proper construction of its road, station-houses, etc., the charter company cannot, in the absence of statutory exemption, discharge itself of legal responsibility," and a covenant in the lease to save the lessor harmless does not affect the case. The lessee is liable whether the lease is valid or invalid; 49 Am. & Eng. R. Cas. 603. But it has been held that though the lease is void, a servant of the lessee company cannot recover against the lessor company for injuries sustained in the operation of the road; 72 Fed. Rep. 743; 80 N. Y. 27; 73 Tex. 375; 88 Tenn. 310. While the lessor may be liable to a party injured by the negligence of its lessee's servants, the lessee is also liable; 33 Am. & Eng. R. Cas. 440.

In some states statutes provide for the joint and several liability of both lessor and lessee; 43 Ind. 354; 36 Ia. 327; 46 Me. 95; 145 Mass. 64; 27 Mo. App. 394.

See Patterson, Railw. Acc. Law § 1801, which lays down the rule that where the lease is valid, the lessor is not liable for the lessee's torts in the operation of the road. See REVERSIONARY LEASE; SUB-LEASE.

LEASE AND RELEASE. A species of conveyance much used in England, consisting theoretically of two instruments, but which are practically united in the same instrument.

It was invented by Sergeant Moore, soon after the enactment of the statute of uses. It is thus contrived: a lease, or rather bargain and sale upon some pecuniary consideration for one year, is made by the tenant of the freehold to the lessee or bargainee. This, without any enrolment, makes the bargainee stand seized to the use of the bargainee, and vests in the bargainee the use of the term for one year, and then the statute immediately annexes the possession. Being thus in possession, he is capable of receiving a release of the freehold and reversion, which must be made to the tenant in possession, and accordingly the next day a release is granted to him.

The lease and release, when used as a conveyance of the fee, have the joint operation of a single conveyance; 2 Bla. Com. 339; 4 Kent 482; Co. Litt. 207; Cruise, Dig. tit. 32, c. 11.

LEASEHOLD. The estate held by virtue of a lease. In practice the word is generally applied to an estate for a fixed term of years. A lease of chattels is not a leasehold interest; 48 L. J. Ex. 35.

LEASING-MAKING. In Scotch Law. Verbal sedition, viz.: slanderous and untrue speeches to the disdain, reproach, and contempt of his majesty, his council and proceedings, etc. Bell, Dict.; Erskine, Inst. 4. 4. 29.

LEAVE. See TICKET OF LEAVE.

LEAVE OF COURT. Permission granted by the court to do something which, without such permission, would not be allowable.

The statute of 4 Anne, c. 16, s. 4. provides that it shall be lawful for any defendant or tenant in any action or suit, or for any plaintiff in replevin, in any court of record, with leave of the court, to plead as many several matters thereto as he shall think necessary for his defence. The principles of this statute have been adopted by most of the states of the Union.

When the defendant, in pursuance of this statute, pleads more than one plea in bar to one and the same demand or thing, all of the pleas except the first should purport to be pleaded with leave of the court. But the omission is not error nor cause of demurrer; Lawes, Pl. 132; 2 Chitty, Pl. 421; And. Steph. Pl. 167; Story, Eq. Pl. 72, 76; Gould, Pl. c. 8, § 21; Steph. Pl. 272; 3 N. H. 523.

Asking leave of court to do any act is an implied admission of jurisdiction of the court, and in those cases in which the objection to the jurisdiction must be taken, if at all, by plea to the jurisdiction, and it can be taken in no other way, the court, by such asking leave, becomes fully vested with the jurisdiction. Bacon, Abr. Abatement (Δ); Bacon, Abr. Pleas, etc. (E 2); Lawes, Pl. 91; 6 Pick. 391. But such admission cannot aid the jurisdiction except in such cases.

LEAVE TO DEFEND. The bills of exchange act 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 67) allowed actions on bills and notes commenced within six months after being due to be by writ of summons in a form provided by the act, and unless the defendant should within twelve days obtain leave to appear and defend the action, allowed the plaintiff to sign judgment on proof of service. This procedure was retained by the judicature act, but abolished in 1890. It is now provided that in all actions where the plaintiff seeks merely to recover a debt or liquidated demand in money or possession where a tenancy has expired or been determined by notice to quit, the writ of summons may be specially indorsed with the particulars of the amount sought to be recovered after giving credit for any payment or set-off; in which case, if the defendant fail to appear, judgment may be signed for the amount claimed; and it is further provided that where the defendant appears on a writ of summons especially indorsed, the plaintiff may, on affidavit verifying the cause of action and swearing that in his belief there is no defence to the action, call on the defendant to show cause before the court or a judge why the plaintiff should not be at liberty to sign final judgment for the amount so indorsed, together with interest, if any, and costs; and the court or judge may, unless the defendant, by affidavit or otherwise, satisfy the court or judge that he has a good defence on the merits or disclose sufficient facts to entitle him to be permitted to defend the action, make an order empowering the plaintiff to sign judgment accordingly. Whart. Lex.

LEAVE AND LICENSE. A defence to an action of trespass setting up the consent of the plaintiff to the trespass complained of. Whart. Lex.

LECCATOR. A debauched person. Cowel.

LECTOR DE LETRA ANTIQUA. In Spanish Law. The person duly authorized by the government to read and decipher ancient documents and titles, in order to entitle them to legal effect in courts of justice.

LECTORES. A term sometimes applied to notaries in the middle ages. So. Air. L. Dict.

LECTRINUM. A pulpit. Mon. Ang. iii. p. 243.

LECTURER. An instructor; a reader of letters who has the copyright in them if he be an author by 5 & 6 Wm. IV. c. 65. See COPYRIGHT.

A clergyman who assists rectors in preaching. 7 & 8 Vict. c. 59; 18 & 19 Vict. c. 127. Whart. Lex.

Assistants appointed to the rectors of churches. They are chosen by the vestry or chief inhabitants. Within the meaning of the term a readership is not an ecclesiastical preferment; 4 D. & R. 720; 3 B. & C. 49; nor is it included under the definition of benefice given by 1 & 2 Vict. c. 106. The power of the bishop over the lecturer is limited to the right to judge of his qualification and fitness for the office; he may not determine his right to a particular lectureship; 18 East 419; 3 Salk. 87. In the absence of a custom to employ a lecturer, and where the lectureship is to be supported by voluntary contributions, and where the rector has refused his consent to the person applying for the lectureship, the ordinary is the proper judge as to whether or not a lecturer should be admitted; 1 Wils. 11; 1 Term 331; 4 id. 125. In the language of Lord Mansfield, "No person can use the pulpit of another unless he consents. But if there has been an immemorial usage, the law supposes a good foundation for it; and if the lectureship be endowed, that furnishes a strong argument to support the custom." 1 Term 381.

The court will not grant a mandamus to compel a bishop to grant a licence to a clergyman to preach as lecturer to a parish; 1 Wils. 11; 2 Str. 1192. Trustees of a lecture to be preached at a convenient hour may appoint any hour they please and vary their appointment; 1 W. Bla. 210. As to the right of and qualification for voting in the nomination of a lecturer, the usage of the parish is, if consistent with the deed of trust, a safe criterion; 1 Ves. 43; 14 id. 7; 3 Atk. 599; 2 Vern. 387; but no person can be a lecturer, although elected by the parishioners, without the rector's consent, unless there be an immemorial custom to such effect; 1 Add. 97; 4 B. & C. 569. See 2 Burn, Eccl. L. 398.

LEDGER. In Commercial Law. A book in which are inscribed the names of all persons dealing with the person who keeps it, and in which there is a separate account, composed generally of one or more pages for each. There are two parallel columns, on one of which the party named is the debtor, and on the other the creditor, and presents a ready means of ascertaining the state of the account. As this book is a transcript from the day-book or journal, it is not evidence per se.

LEDGER BOOK. In Ecclesiastical Law. The name of a book kept in the prerogative courts in England. It is considered as a roll of the court, but, it seems, it cannot be read in evidence. Bacon, Abr.

LEHMANN'S ACTS. Acts 30 Vict. c. 29 and 35 & 36 Vict. c. 91, by which contracts for the sale of bank shares are void unless the number of the shares are set forth in the contract; 9 Q. B. D. 546; and by which are authorized the application of the funds of municipal corporations and other governing bodies under certain conditions towards promoting or opposing parliamentary and other proceedings for the benefit or protection of the inhabitants.

A name by which the Banking Companies (Shares) Act, 1867, and the Borough Funds Act, 1872, are known. Byrne.

LEGA or LACTA. The alloy of money. Spelman.

LEGACY. A gift of personal property by last will and testament.

A gift or disposition in one's favor by a last will. Schoul. Ex. & Ad. § 459. The term is more commonly applied to a bequest of money or chattels, although sometimes used with reference to a charge upon real estate; 2 Wms. Ex. 1051; see 9 Cush. 297; 13 Fed. Eq. 450; 7 Ves. 391, 522. A direction to the executor to support and maintain a person during his life gives him a legacy; 4 Mass. 634; but a recommendation "to give from time to time some little assistance to A" does not; 5 La. Ann. 890. It is said that the word legacy in a will may include real as well as personal property; 1 Law Repos. N. C. 107.

An absolute legacy is one given without condition, to vest immediately; 1 Vern. 254; 19 Ves. 86; Comyns, Dig. Chancery (14); they are usually absolute; Schoul. Ex. & Ad. § 466; 19 Ves. 86; Comyns, Dig. Chancery (14).

An additional, or, more technically, a cumulative legacy is one given to a legatee to whom a legacy has already been given. It may be given by the same will in which a legacy has already been bequeathed, or by a codicil thereto; 1 Bro. C. C. 90; 17 Ohio 537; 23 Conn. 371.

An alternate legacy is one by which the testator gives one of two or more things without designating which.

A conditional legacy is a bequest the existence of which depends upon the happening or not happening of some uncertain event; 1 Rep. Leg. 645. The condition may be either precedent; 2 Conn. 106; 9 W. & S. 103; 17 Wend. 398; 14 N. H. 315; 10 Cush. 129; or subsequent; 23 Me. 529; 33 N. H. 285; 3 Pet. 876; 55 Md. 575.

A demonstrative legacy is a bequest of a certain sum of money, stock, or the like, payable out of a particular fund or security; Wms. Ex. 300; 23 N. H. 154; 19 Gratt. 493; 10 Pa. 387; 2 Dev. & B. Eq. 453; 16 N. Y. 365. See DEMONSTRATIVE LEGACY.

A general legacy is one so given as not to amount to a bequest of a particular thing or money, of a particular fund, distinguished from all others of the same kind; 1 Rep. Leg. 170; 8 N. Y. 518; 6 Madd. 92.

An indefinite legacy is a bequest of things which are not enumerated or ascertained as to numbers or quantities; as, a bequest by a testator of all his goods, all his stocks in the funds; Lownd. Leg. 84; Swinb. Wills 435; Ambl. 641; 1 P. Wms. 697; of this class are generally residuary legacies.

A lapsed legacy is one which, in consequence of the death of the legatee before the testator or before the period for vesting, has never vested. See LAPSED LEGACY.

A legacy for life is one in which the legatee is to enjoy the use of the legacy for life.

A modal legacy is a bequest accompanied with directions as to the mode in which it should be applied for the legatee's benefit; for example, a legacy to Titius to put him an apprentice; 2 Vern. Ch. 431; Lownd. Leg. 131.

A pecuniary legacy is one of money. Pecuniary legacies are in most cases general legacies, but there may be a specific pecuniary legacy, for example, of the money in a certain bag; 1 Rep. Leg. 150, n. In Maryland pecuniary legacies are by statute to be paid out of the real estate if the personal is insufficient; Laws 1894, ch. 438.

A residuary legacy is a bequest of all the testator's personal estate not otherwise effectually disposed of by his will; Lownd. Leg. 10; Bacon, Abr. Legacies (1); 6 H. L. Cas. 217. An ordinary residuary bequest cannot be treated as specific, but from its very nature must be considered as a general legacy; L. R. 3 Ch. D. 309; even though some of its particulars are enumerated in the will; 4 Hare 628; but a bequest of the remainder of a particular thing or fund after the payment of other legacies or of all one's estate in a particular locality may be specific so long as the identity of the thing or fund is not destroyed; 5 Ves. 130; Schoul. Ex. & Ad. § 462.

A specific legacy is a bequest of a specified part of the testator's personal estate, distinguished from all others of the same kind; 3 Beav. 349; 20 Me. 105; 3 Rawle 337; 23 N. H. 154; 49 id. 107; L. R. 20 Eq. 304; 35 N. J. Eq. 461; 128 Mass. 433; 13 Pa. 189. Such a legacy may be the undistributed balance of a partnership or a goodwill; Amb. 309; 31 Beav. 602; or debt due testator; 2 Del. Ch. 200; 122 Mass. 283; 15 Co. Ct. Rep. Pa. 285; in such case it is rendered worthless by insolvency; Schoul. Ex. & Ad. § 461. A specific legacy may be of animals or inanimate things, provided they are specified and separated from all other things, as money in a bag, or money marked and so described; as, I give two eagles to A. B. on which are engraved the initials of my name. Such a legacy may also be given out of a general fund; Amb. 310; 4 Ves. 565; 3 V. & B. 5. If the specific article given be not found among the assets of the testator, the legatee loses his legacy.

All natural persons and all corporations are capable of becoming legatees, unless prohibited by statute or alien enemies. The statute under which it is created must be resorted to in order to ascertain whether a corporation has legal capacity to take a legacy, but the act of incorporation or legislative confirmation of the rights may be secured after the legacy takes effect; 53 Md. 466; 4 Dem. 271; 6 W. & S. 218. The right of a corporation to take by will is subject to the general laws of the state passed after the incorporation; 79 N. Y. 327. See CORPORATION; FOREIGN CORPORATION. A bequest to the United States from which came the Smithsonian Institution was held valid in the English chancery court; Schoul. Ex. & Ad. § 460, note; but under the terms of the state statute a devise of lands in New York to the United States was held void; 94 U. S. 315; 52 N. Y. 530. As to the difference of the law applicable to real and personal property, see CONFLICT OF LAWS. Legacies to the subscribing witnesses to a will are by statute often declared void. See 2 Wms. Ex. 1059; Rop. Leg. 201; 3 Russ. 437; L. R. 13 Eq. 381; 106 Mass. 474; 1 Moo. & R. 288. It was held in England that a subscribing witness to whom a legacy was given was incompetent by reason of interest, and that the will would fail unless there was enough witnesses without him; 2 Stra. 1253. To save the will it was enacted that the legacy should be void; 25 Geo. II. c. 6. Similar statutes have been enacted in most of the states; Schoul. Wills § 357 and note; 1 Stims. Am. St. L. § 2650. In most of these, if there are enough witnesses without the legatee, the legacy is saved, but in a few states it is said that it seems that it may be void in any case; id. Bequests to superstitious uses are prohibited by many of the English statutes; 2 Beav. 151; 5 Myl. & C. 11. But in the United States the free toleration of all religious opinions would seem to make it almost impossible to hold any use superstitious; 1 Watts 218; 2 Dana 170. Legacies by Roman Catholics for masses for the repose of the soul were held in England void as for superstitious uses; 2 Myl. & K. 684; but in this country have been held valid; 2 Dem. 87; 134 Mass. 426; contra, McHugh will case, Wis. Sup. Ct. Oct. 22, 1897. But the courts will not intervene to support and maintain a legacy for any purpose which is illegal or subversive of public policy; 63 Pa. 465. Bequests to charitable uses are favored both in England and the United States. See CHARITABLE USE.

Construction of legacies. First, the technical import of words is not to prevail over the obvious intent of the testator; 6 Ad. & E. 167; 7 M. & W. 1, 481; 1 M. & K. 571; L. R. 11 Eq. 280; 11 Pick. 257, 375; 1 Root 332; 1 Nott & M'C. 69; 12 Johns. 389; 36 Me. 216; 68 Pa. 427; 51 N. H. 443; 64 Me.

490; 86 Tenn. 81; 70 Tex. 523. Second, where technical words are used by the testator, or words of art, they are to have their technical import, unless it is apparent they were not intended to be used in that sense; 3 Brown. Ch. 68; 1 Younge & J. 512; 5 Mass. 500; 2 M'Cord 66; 5 Denio 616; 75 Pa. 230; 3 Green 218; 1 Sumn. 239; 18 N. Y. 417; 25 Wend. 119. Words are to be construed with reference to the surrounding of the testator when the will was made; 70 Tex. 523. The particular intent will always be sacrificed to the general intent; 11 Gray 460; 70 Pa. 335; 106 Mass. 24; 26 Mo. 590; 6 Pet. 68. Third, the intent of the testator is to be determined from the whole will; 1 Coll. Ch. 631; 8 Pet. 377; 4 Rand. 213; 8 Blackf. 387; 100 Mass. 343; 51 N. H. 83; 78 Pa. 40; 35 Ind. 198; 52 N. Y. 450; 22 Me. 413; 83 Va. 343. In ascertaining this intention, courts should not seek it in particular words and phrases, or confine it by technical objections, but should find it by construing the provisions of the will with the aid of the context and by considering what seems to be the entire scheme of the will; 113 N. Y. 115; 69 Tex. 227; 84 Ky. 206; 88 id. 354; and should put itself in the position occupied by a testator; 134 U. S. 572. See 3 C. C. App. 649. Fourth, every word shall have effect, if it can be given without defeating the general purpose of the will, which is to be carried into effect in every reasonable mode; 2 B. & Ald. 448; 3 Pick. 360; 7 Ired. Eq. 267; 10 Humphr. 368; 2 Md. 82; 6 Pet. 68; 9 H. L. Cas. 420; 40 N. H. 500; 53 Pa. 106; 12 Gratt. 196; 19 N. Y. 348. But where it is impossible to form a consistent whole the latter part will prevail; 5 Beav. 100; 52 Me. 287; 53 N. Y. 12; 29 Pa. 234; 78 id. 484; 73 Iowa 684; 40 La. Ann. 284. Fifth, the will will be favorably construed to effectuate the testator's intent, and to this end words may be transposed, supplied, or rejected; 21 Beav. 143; 7 H. L. Cas. 68; 8 Sim. 184; 30 Iowa 294; 4 Rich. Eq. 22; 63 N. C. 391; 105 Mass. 338; 22 Me. 429; L. R. 14 Eq. 54; 10 Wheat. 204; 35 Md. 198; 54 Pa. 245; 20 Ohio St. 416; 84 Va. 523; 50 N. J. Eq. 547; it will be so construed when not inconsistent with rules of law; 127 U. S. 300; 74 Cal. 96; 77 Ga. 636; 24 Neb. 215. Sixth, in the case of a will of personality made abroad, the lex domicilii must prevail, unless it appear the testator had a different intent; Story, Conf. Laws § 479 a, 490; 1 De G. F. & J. 404; L. R. 1 H. L. 401; 99 Mass. 136; 52 Me. 165; 34 N. Y. 584; 14 How. 426. Seventh, a will of personality speaks from the time of testator's death; 9 De G. M. & G. 391; 34 N. Y. 201; 22 N. H. 434; 21 Conn. 610; 41 Barb. 60. In interpreting a will several of the states provide by statute that they are to be construed and take effect, as of the date of the death of testator, with respect to both real and personal property, unless a contrary intention appear in the will. It is so provided in Pennsylvania, Virginia, West Virginia, North Carolina, Kentucky, and Tennessee. And in Georgia words of survivorship refer to the death of the testator in order to vest remainders. In Louisiana a legacy must be delivered with everything appertaining to it in the condition in which it was on day of testator's decease. In some states where death or survivorship are referred to, the words relate to the time of testator's death unless possession is actually postponed, in which case they refer to time of possession. Such is the statute law in California, the Dakotas, Montana, and Utah; Stims. Am. Stat. L. § 2806.

In interpreting a will, the true inquiry is not what the testator meant to express, but what the words used express; 29 W. Va. 784; 83 Va. 724; and effect cannot be given to unexpressed intention; 11 Ky. L. Rep. 87; 84 Va. 880. As to the weight to be given to previous decisions upon the construction of certain words, it may be said that if the words are identical they are not strictly binding, much less so if the words are only similar; L. R. 10 Ch. 397; 22 Ch. D. 489; and this is true even of the decision of the appeal court; 23 Ch. D. 111.

The general policy of the law and the rules of interpretation require that legacies in all cases, unless clearly inconsistent with the intention of the testator, should be held to be vested rather than contingent; 45 N. J. Eq. 478; 124 Pa. 10; 84 Ky. 817.

Whether cumulative or repeated. Where a testator has twice bequeathed a legacy to one person it becomes a question whether the legatee is entitled to both or one only. Where there is internal evidence of the intention of the testator, that intention is to be carried out; 2 Beav. 215; 7 id. 107; 8 Hare 620; 2 Drur. & W. 133; 3 Ves. 462; 5 id. 369; 2 Sim. & S. 145; 4 Hare 219; L. R. 3 Ch. Div. 788; 10 Johns. 156; 4 Harr. N. J. 127; 1 Zabr. 573; and evidence will be received in support of the apparent intention, but not against it; 5 Madd. 351; 2 Beav. 115; 1 My. & K. 589; 2 Bro. Ch. 528; 4 Hare 216; 1 Drur. & W. 84, 113. Where there is no such internal evidence, certain presumptions are recognized; 10 Sim. 453; and the following positions of law appear to be established. First, if the same specific thing is bequeathed twice to the same legatee in the same will, or in the will and again in a codicil, in that case he can claim the benefit of only one legacy; Toll. Ex. 333; 2 Hare 432. Second, where two legacies of quantity of equal amount are bequeathed to the same legatee in one and the same instrument, there also the second bequest is considered a mere repetition, and he is entitled to one legacy only; 1 Bro. C. C. 80; 4 Ves. 75; 3 Myl. & K. 29; 10 Johns. 156. See 4 Gill 280; 1 Zabr. 573; 16 Pa. 127; 5 De G. & S. 698; 16 Sim. 423. Third, where two legacies of quantity of unequal amount are given to the same person in the same instrument, the one is not merged in the other, but the latter shall be regarded as cumulative, and the legatee entitled to both; Finch 267; 2 Bro. C. C. 225; 3 Hare 620. Legacies not of the same kind are presumed to be cumulative; 2 Russ. 257; otherwise the presumption is slight and easily shaken; 17 Ves. 84, 41. Fourth, where two legacies are given simpliciter to the same legatee by different instruments, in that case also the latter shall be cumulative, whether its amount be equal; 1 Cox 592; 17 Ves. Ch. 34; 1 Coll. Ch. 495; 4 Hare 216; or unequal to the former; 1 Ch. Cas. 801; 1 P. Wms. 428; 5 Sim. 431; 1 Myl. & K. 589; 4 H. L. Cas. 393; 1 De G. F. & J. 183; L. R. 12 Eq. Cas. 525; 7 Ch. App. 448. And see 1 Bro. Ch. 272; 2 Beav. 215; 2 Drur. & W. 133; 1 Bligh. n. s. 491; 1 Phil. 291. For recent cases where they were held cumulative, see 63 N. H. 129; 55 Vt. 317; 107 Pa. 85. See, generally, on this subject notes to Hooley v. Hatton, 2 Lead. Cas. Eq. *346; Schoul. Ex. & Ad. § 468, n. 8.

Description of legatee.—Children. This may have reference to the time of the testator's death, or that of making the will. The former is the presumed intention, unless from the connection or circumstances the latter is the apparent intent, in which case it must prevail; 2 Cox 191; 11 Sim. 42; 2 Wms. Ex. 1089; 11 Gill & J. 185; 21 Conn. 16; 59 Me. 325; 2 Dev. & B. 80; 101 Mass. 182; 54 N. Y. 63; 110 Mo. 164; 44 La. Ann. 603; 2 Jarm. Wills 154, 156, and Bigelow's notes. And this rule extends to grandchildren, issue, brothers, nephews, and cousins; 3 De G. M. & G. 649; 1 Houst. 561; 148 Mass. 345; Schoul. Wills § 529. The judicial disposition to let in subsequent issue and near relations of a class as generously as possible has resulted in a rule thus stated by the author last cited: "Hence the English rule, confirmed by many American precedents, that the devise or bequest of a corpus or aggregate fund to children as a class, where the gift is not immediate, vests in all the children in existence at the testator's death, but so as to open and let in children who may come into existence afterwards, at any time before the fund is distributable." Id. § 580; 1 Bro. C. C. 587; 2 Madd. 129; 73 Md. 67; 5 R. I. 129; 87 Miss. 65; 88 Ill. 206. This rule also extends to grandchildren, issue, brothers, nephews, and cousins; 8 De G. M. & G. 649.

This term will include a child en ventre sa mère; 2 H. Bla. 899; 1 Sim. & S. 181; 1 Meigs 149; 15 Pick. 255; 80 Pa. 173; 124 id. 10; L. R. 1 Ch. Div. 480; 84 Ala. 48; 60 Ga. 681; see 109 N. C. 675. Such a child is included in a devise by a father to his children "living" at his death; 2 Ired. Eq. 226. The rule of construction by which a child en ventre sa mère is in law considered as a child in esse is not confined to cases in which the unborn child is benefited by its application; [1895] 2 Ch. 497; 13 Reports 689.

Where the division of a fund to legatees is postponed until a certain event or period, the word "child" will apply to all those answering that description when the fund is to be divided; 8 Ves. 38; 9 Leigh 79; 1 Hill, Ch. 322; 1 McCart. 159; 4 Sandf. 86; 101 Mass. 138; 19 So. Rep. (Ala.) 435. But it will sometimes have a more restricted application, and thus be confined to children born before the death of the testator. But children born after the period of distribution take no share; L. R. 12 Eq. 427; 45 N. H. 270; 8 Conn. 49; 5 Jones Eq. 208; 1 Houst. 561. See 147 Pa. 121. And it will make no difference that the bequest is to children begotten, or to be begotten, or which "may be born"; 2 Myl. & K. 46; 14 Beav. 453; 5 R. I. 318; 1 Rop. Leg. 51; unless such be the testator's clear intent; 19 Ves. 566; 16 Gray 305; 4 Sneed 254; 4 R. I. 121; 3 Head 493; 8 Jones Eq. 490; 3 Jarm. Wills 84.

"Children," when used to designate one's heirs, may include grandchildren; 12 B. Monr. 115, 121; 5 Pa. 365; 37 N. Y. 42; 63 Mass. 289; 33 Me. 464; Rop. Leg. 68; 5 Binn. 606; 73 Cal. 594; 28 Atl. Rep. (Vt.) 819; but see 71 Md. 175. But if the word children is used, and there are persons to answer it, then grandchildren cannot be comprehended under it; 4 Myl. & C. 60; L. R. 11 Eq. 91; 29 Md. 443; 14 Allen 205; 6 C. E. Green 85; 2 Whart. 876; 5 Ired. Eq. 421. The general rule is, that a bequest to a man and his children, he having children living at the time the will takes effect, creates a joint estate in the father and children; but if he have no children, he takes an absolute estate; 5 Sim. 548; L. R. 12 Eq. 818; L. R. 14 Eq. 415; L. R. 7 Ch. App. 253; 5 Gray 336. But in both cases slight circumstances will warrant the court in holding the limitation to be for life to the father, with remainder over to the children; 4 Madd. 361; 13 S. & R. 68; 16 B. Mon. 309; 1 Bailey Eq. 357; 5 Jones Eq. 219; 23 Ala. 705.

The term children will not include illegitimate children, if there are legitimate to answer the term; 98 Pa. 479; 14 N. J. Eq. 159; 2 Russ. & M. 336; see 2 Wms. Ex. 1100 (but see 117 Ind. 330; 113 N. C. 801); otherwise, it may or may not, according to circumstances; 1 Ves. & B. 422; 1 Bail. Eq. 351; 6 Ired. Eq. 135; 9 Paige 88; 2 Sneed 625; 81 N. J. Eq. 398; L. R. 10 Eq. 160; L. R. 1 Ch. Div. 644; 37 Conn. 429; L. R. 7 H. L. 576; L. R. 4 P. C. 164. See Schoul. Wills § 534 and notes. Nor will it include a child adopted after the will was made; 84 Ala. 48. In a recent English case it is said that although, prima facie, the word "children" in a will means legitimate children, there may be sufficient explanation, in the light of surrounding circumstances, that the word is not used in its primary meaning, and the word was held to mean stepchildren; 18 Reports 627. But a legacy to a natural child of a certain man still en ventre sa mère was held void, as contravening public morals and decency; 1 P. Wms. 529; 2 Myl. & R. 769; contra, L. R. 8 Ch. Div. 778; 5 Harr. & J. 10. It is said that the term grandchildren will not usually include great-grandchildren; 8 Ves. & B. 59; 4 Myl. & C. 60; 8 Beav. 247; but it has been held otherwise in the absence of anything to show a contrary intent; 3 Pittab. L. J. Pa. N. S. 403. See CHILD. The same rule applies to adopted children who are not prima facie included; 54 Pa. 304.

It is held that a bequest to "my beloved wife," not mentioning her by name, applies exclusively to the wife at the date of the will, and is not to be extended to an after-taken wife; 9 Hare 181; L. R. 8 Eq. Cas. 65; 81 Beav. 598. One not lawfully married may, nevertheless, take a legacy by the name or description of the wife of the one to whom she is reputed to be married; 9 Sim. 615; 1 De G. J. & S. 177; 11 W. R. 614; but not if the reputed relation is the motive for the bequest; 4 Ves. 802; 5 Myl. & C. 145; L. R. 2 Ex. 819. But see 1 Keen 685.

Nephews and nieces are terms which, in the description of a legatee, will receive their strict import, unless there is something in the will to indicate a contrary intention; 14 Sim. 214; 27 Beav. 490; 2 Yeates 196; 8 Barb. 475; 3 Halst. Ch. 462; 10 Hare 68; 7 De G. M. & G. 494; L. R. 6 Ch. App. 351; 2 Jones Eq. 302. "All my nephews and nieces" was held to include only those of the testatrix and not those of her husband; 42 Pa. 25; but "nephews and nieces on both sides" was held to include those by marriage; 3 De G. F. & J. 466; and such was the inference where a testator had no nephews or nieces of his blood; L. R. 8 Ch. 928; L. R. 15 Eq. 306; great-nephews and great-nieces are not usually included; 43 Ch. D. 569; but may be if such intention is shown by the context; 57 Conn. 24. A provision that the residue was to be divided among the testator's grand-nephews and grand-nieces does not include the nephews and nieces; 27 Abb. N. C. 437.

The term cousins will be restricted in its signification, where there is something in the will to limit its meaning; 9 Sim. 437. A rule of convenience limits the term to first cousins only, if there be such, or if there are cousins of different degrees, to the nearer rather than the more remote; 6 De G. M. & G. 68; 31 Beav. 305; and "first cousins" does not include first cousins once removed; 4 Myl. & C. 56; but "all the first and second cousins" embraced equally first cousins once removed and first cousins twice removed; 2 Bro. C. C. 125; 1 Sim. & Stew. 301; 3 Russ. 140.

Terms which give an estate tail in lands will be construed to give the absolute title to personality; 8 H. L. Cas. 571; 8 Md. Ch. 36; 10 Verg. 287; 23 Pa. 9; 4 Dev. & B. 478; L. R. 5 Eq. Cas. 388.

A legacy to one and his heirs, although generally conveying a fee-simple in real estate and the entire property in personality, may, by the manner of its expression and connection, be held to be a designation of such persons as are the legal heirs of the person named, and thus they take as purchasers by name; 4 Bro. C. C. 542; 10 B. Mon. 104; 108 Mass. 579; 64 Me. 490; 15 N. J. 404; 15 Ohio 559. But the authority of these cases is doubtful. The word "heirs," when used to denote succession or substitution, is understood in the case of a legacy to mean persons entitled under the intestate law; 65 Me. 368; 59 N. Y. 151; 9 Pet. 483; L. R. 9 Eq. 258; 100 Mass. 348; 3 Pa. 305. But if not so used, the word heir is construed in its ordinary and legal sense; 68 Me. 879; 59 N. Y. 149; 37 Pa. 9; 108 Mass. 579; 8 H. L. Cas. 557; L. R. 7 Eq. Cas. 151; see 51 N. J. Eq. 1; 26 S. W. Rep. (Ky.) 187; 87 Ga. 239; the words heir and heirs are interchangeable, and embrace all legally entitled to partake of the inheritance; 85 Va. 724. See HEIR.

The word "issue," used as a word of purchase, comprises all descendants of him to whose issue the bequest is made; 23 Beav. 40; 7 Allen 76; 63 Pa. 484; 103 Mass. 288; 26 Atl. Rep. (R. I.) 89; 65 Hun 155. It may mean heirs at law; 8 Misc. Rep. 192; children and not descendants generally; 69 Hun 228. See 155 Pa. 628. See ISSUE.

The word descendants cannot be construed to include any but lineal heirs without clear indications in the will of a different purpose; Schoul. Wills § 535; 2 Bradf. 413; 9 Gray 101; a sister's child is not a descendant; 1 Bradf. 314; this word, like issue, is very general, but is said to be less flexible in construction, requiring a stronger context to confine it to such; Schoul. Wills § 535; 2 Jarm. Wills 98-100. See DESCENDANTS.

The term "relations" includes those only who would otherwise be entitled under the statute of distributions; 1 Bro. C. C. 81; 54 Me. 291; 20 N. H. 481; 8 S. & R. 45; and so of the word "family"; 9 Ves. 823; 19 Beav. 580; L. R. 9 Eq. Cas. 622; 9 R. I. 412; see 63 Conn. 324. The term family is very flexible and may mean, according to circumstances, a man's household, consisting of himself, his wife, children, and servants; it may mean his wife and children, or his children, excluding the wife; or if he has no wife and children, it may mean his brothers and sisters, or his next of kin; or it may mean the genealogical stock from which he sprung, since all these applications of the word and even others are found in common parlance; 1 Keen 181. The word family may include an illegitimate child; L. R. 6 Ch. 597. See FAMILY: RELATIONS. Nearest relations means brothers and sisters to the exclusion of nephews and nieces; 45 N. J. Eq. 97. "Poor relations, equally," was held to include testator's brothers and sisters, and the mother of his wife per capita, as if the word "poor" were not used; 8 S. & R. 43.

A legacy to A and his executors and administrators, legal representatives or personal representatives (which titles see), gives A an absolute interest in the legacy; 15 Ves. 537; 118 Mass. 198; 18 Gratt. 529; L. R. 4 Eq. 859. But in some instances these words will be taken as words not of limitation but of purchase; L. R. 4 Eq. 359; 2 Beav. 67; 25 Md. 401. Generally when persons take under this description they will be bound to apply the legacy as the personal estate of the testator or intestate; 3 Bro. C. C. 224; 2 Yeates 587; 8 Sim. 328.
